GASTOLDI, GIOVANNI GIACOMO (b. Caravaggio c. middle of 16th cent.; d. beginning of 17th cent.), maestro di cappella at Santa Barbara in Mantua from about 1581 until his death. He was the author of 'Balletti a 5 per cantare, suonare, e ballare' (Venice, 1591-95; Antwerp, 1596), which are said to have served Morley as models for his 'Ballets or Fa-las.' His later collections are 'Balletti a 3 voci,' etc. 1594, and 'Canzonette a 3 voci.' Two of them are well known to English amateurs under the names of 'Maidens fair of Mantua's city,' and 'Soldiers brave and gallant be.' Two others, 'Viver lieto voglio,' and 'A lieta vita,' are given by Burney in his History of Music. These were adopted as Hymn tunes by Lindemann in 1597 to the words 'Jesu, wollst uns weisen,' and 'In dir ist Freude' respectively (Döring, 'Choralkunde,' 45). A Magnificat and two madrigals are in vol. ii. of L'arte musicale in Italia, and 'Al mormorar' in Ausgewählte Madrigale. F. G.

GASTOUÉ, AMÉDÉE (b. Paris, Mar. 13, 1873), French 'musicologist,' was a pupil of Ad. Deslandres. He is a precentor and organist, and has been professor of Gregorian chant at the Schola Cantorum since its foundation, for a long time teaching that subject at the Institut Catholique. In 1904 he was appointed one of the editors of the Pontifical edition of Gregorian books. His works on this subject are of great importance, being among the best which have been written in France during these last 30 years on the restoration of plain-song. Their list is long:

Histoire du chant liturgique à Paris (1904); Les Origines du chant romain (1907); Catalogue des manuscrits de musique byzantine (1908); Les Anciens Chants liturgiques des églises d'Apt et du Comtat, Le Graduel et l'antiphonaire romain (Lyon, 1913), etc.

Of a more popular character are: L'Art grégorien (Paris, 1910), Les Primitifs de la musique française (1922), On the organ: L'Orgue en France, de l'antiquité au début de la période classique (1921), La Musique populaire en France (Lyon, 1924). Educational works: Cours théorique et pratique de chant grégorien (2d ed., 1917); Nouvelle Méthode pratique de chant grégorien (1909), etc.; A Classical Method for Piano (1917).

He has composed motets, 2 Masses etc., and harmonised ancient 'Noëls.' Some of his books have been crowned by the Institut.

M. L. P.

GASTRITZ, MATHIAS, organist at Amberg, 1569; composed 'Novae harmonicae cantiones' (Nürnberg, 1569); 'Kurze und sonderliche newe Symbola,' etc., 1571; single numbers in collective MS. volumes. (See Q.-L.)

GATES, BERNARD (b. 1685; d. North Aston, near Oxford, Nov. 15, 1773), 2nd son of Bernard Gates of Westminster, is mentioned in 1702 as one of the children of the Chapel Royal; was made a gentleman of the same in 1708 in place of John Howell, who died July 15, and master of the choristers, vice J. Church, at some time before 1732; and resided in James Street, Westminster. He was a member of the choir of Westminster Abbey, and held the sinecure office, now abolished, of Tuner of the Regals in the King's household—see the memorial tablet at Aston.

His chief claim to mention is his connexion with Handel, whose 'Esther' was acted under Gates's care by the children of the Chapel Royal at his house, Feb. 23, 1732, and afterwards at the King's Theatre, Haymarket. He also sang one of the airs in the Dettingen Te Deum on its first performance in 1743. In 1737 his wife died and he retired to North Aston, where he died at the age of 88 (according to the epitaph at Westminster). He was buried in the north cloister of the Abbey on Nov. 23; he bequeathed his property to Dr. T. S. Dupuis with a further remainder to Dr. Arnold. He composed a service in F, and some single songs. His portrait is in the Bodl. Music School.

GATTI, LUIGI (b. near Mantua, June 11, 1740; d. Salzburg, Mar. 1, 1817), priest (abbe) and (1797-1816) Kapellmeister at Salzburg Cathedral; wrote several operas, oratorios, masses and other church music (Q.-L.).

GATTI, TEOBALDI (Teofilo de—Riemann) (b. Florence c. 1650; d. Paris, Aug. 1727), an excellent viola da gambist, went to Paris, c. 1675, and was for about 50 years a member of the Royal Chapel. He was a friend and pupil of Lully. He composed several operas, 'Airs Italiens,' motets with instruments, and other church music (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GATTI-CASAZZA, GIULIO (b. Udine, Feb. 3, 1869), an Italian operatic manager. He was first an engineer. In 1898 he was manager of La Scala, in Milan, and in 1908 was called to the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. In 1910 he married the singer Frances Alda.

R. A.

GATTO, SIMONE, a Venetian, trombone-player in Munich court chapel, 1568-71. In 1571 he became Kapellmeister of the Archduke Karl at Graz. He composed masses, motets, etc. (See Q.-L.)

GATTY, NICHOLAS COMYN (b. Bradfield, near Sheffield, Sept. 13, 1874), composer, chiefly of operas. From Downing College, Cambridge, he took the degree of B.A. in 1896, and that of Mus.B. in 1898. After leaving Cambridge he was three years at the R.C.M., holding an exhibition there for a short time for composition, which he studied under Stanford. Until his appointment as musical critic to the Pall Mall Gazette (1907-14), he held various musical posts in London, among them that of organist to the Duke of York's Royal Military School. He was musical assistant on the stage at Covent Garden for several seasons. His most important compositions are for the stage, for which he has a remarkable aptitude in individualisation. His 1-act opera, 'Greysteel,' to a libretto by his brother, Reginald Gatty, was produced by the Moody-Manners Company during the 'University Opera Week' at Sheffield in Mar. 1906, and 'Duke or Devil,' also in 1 act, to words by another brother, Ivor Gatty, was given by the same company at Manchester in Dec. 1909. M.

Two later operatic productions, strongly contrasted in style, have added considerably to Gatty's reputation. 'Prince Ferelon,' a musical extravaganza in 1 act, was produced by the Florence Ktlinger School of Opera (Nov. 1919), and has taken a definite place in the repertory of the 'Old Vic.' (1921). The vocal score has been published by the Carnegie Trust. 'The Tempest,' a romantic opera in 3 acts on Shakespeare's text, condensed for musical purposes by Reginald Gatty and the composer, was first given at the Surrey Theatre (Apr. 17, 1920), and afterwards (1922) at the 'Old Vic.' It was chosen as the first opera to be given under the auspices of the Ernest Palmer Opera Study Fund at the R.C.M. in 1925. It still, however, awaits a public performance worthy of its high musical quality. Since then he has taken a still more ambitious subject, 'Macbeth,' not yet (1926) performed. Gatty's style shows singularly little concern with those questions of idiom, more particularly harmonic, which engross many of his contemporaries. He commands a simple, but for him sufficient musical vocabulary, by which he produces direct musical impressions apposite to the stage situations dealt with.

Among other works not connected with the stage, Variations for Orchestra on 'Old King Cole,' (New Symphony Orchestra,) Milton's 'Ode on Time' for choir and orchestra (Sheffield Festival, 1905), 'Three Short Odes' (words by Clough and Shelley) for choir and orchestra (1915), sonata for violin and piano in G, variations and other works for violin, variations for string quartet, and two sets of waltzes for piano, are noteworthy. (See B. M. S. Ann. 1920.) Gatty's invaluable work as assistant to the editors of two editions of this Dictionary is recorded in the Prefaces thereto. C.

GAUBERT, PHILIPPE (b. Cahors, July 4, 1879), flautist, composer and conductor, was a pupil at the Paris Conservatoire, with Taffanel for flute, Caussade, Xavier Leroux and Lenepveu for harmony and composition. He won the first prize for flute in 1894 and the Prix de Rome in 1905.

He is a leading player of his instrument and has been soloist in the principal Paris orchestras, and professor since 1919 of the flute class at the Paris Conservatoire.

As a composer, he can already show an important list of chamber music, sonatas for violin, flute, trios, etc.; songs with accompaniment for PF. or orchestra; lyric works, of which the principal are: 'Philotis,' ballet in 2 acts (Opéra, 1914); 'Fresques' (Opéra, 1923); 'Naïla,' lyric tale in 3 acts.

His early success as conductor has somewhat overshadowed the other aspects of his artistic personality. Since 1919 he has been a very popular conductor of the orchestra of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, and since 1920 at the Opéra, where he chiefly gives new works and a Wagnerian repertory.

GAUCQUIER, ALARD DU (DUNOYER, called DU GAUCQUIER, Latin, Nuceus) (b. Lillo, tenor singer in the Vienna court chapel, 1564-76; vice-Kapellmeister, 1574; Kapellmeister of the Archduke (afterwards Emperor) Matthias, 1589; a distinguished church composer (masses, magnificats, etc.) (Q.-L.; Riemann).

GAUL, ALFRED ROBERT (b. Norwich, Apr. 30, 1837; d. Birmingham, Sept. 13, 1913), was a chorister in Norwich Cathedral from 1846, and was afterwards articled pupil and assistant to Dr. Buck. He held the post of organist in succession at Fakenham, St. John's, Lady Wood, Birmingham, and St. Augustine's, Edgbaston. He took the degree of Mus.B. at Cambridge in 1863. He was appointed conductor of the Walsall Philharmonic Society in 1887, and taught harmony and counterpoint at the Birmingham and Midland Institute, and other places. His works, the superficial fluency of which won them a wide popularity, include 'Hezekiah,' oratorio, Amateur Harmonic Association, Birmingham, 1861; Psalm i., 1863; 'Ruth,' sacred cantata, 1881; 'The Holy City' (Gaul's best-known work), Birmingham Festival, 1882; Passion Music, 1883; Psalm cl., London Church Choir Association, 1886; 'Joan of Arc,' Birmingham Festival Choral Society, 1887; 'The Ten Virgins,' 1890; 'Israel in the Wilderness,' Crystal Palace, 1892; and 'Una,' Norwich Festival, 1893. Many psalms, hymn-tunes, chants, partsongs, etc., and some piano-forte pieces, are also included among his compositions. (Brit. Mus. Biog.)

GAULTIER, the name of French lutenists of the 17th century, who take rank amongst the most famous 'luthériens' of their time. Their history remains still very obscure, but the actual state of research on their behalf allows the following statements.

(1) ENNEMOND (d. Villette, Dauphiné, 1653), considered in 1636 by Mersenne as one of the most excellent lute-players then living, mentioned in the Mercur of 1678 as 'Mr. Gaultier de Lyon,' designated in MSS. as 'le vieux Gaultier.' He was 'valet de chambre' to Queen Marie de Médicis, and afterwards her lute-master; among his pupils belonging to the Court circle may be cited Cardinal Richelieu. The Christian name, Ennemond, being peculiar to the region near Lyons and in 'the Dauphiné,' there is every reason to believe that he came from there. He retired to the village of Villette (Dauphiné), where he died.

To him, therefore, must be attributed the 'Allemande giguée de Gaultier de Lion;' (Bibliothèque Nationale), which occurs again in four other lute-books, and is in each case called 'Gigue du vieux Gaultier.' In a certain MS. he is also called 'Sieur de Neüe' (MS. Milleran). The date of his birth is not known; O. Fleischer assigns it without proof to 1597.

(2) JACQUES, or 'Gaultier d'Angleterre.' It has been proved that he was 'Mr. Goutiere,' a famous lutenist in his time.¹ His name appears also in the following forms: James Gwalter, James Gualtiar, Gouter, Gottière, Gaultier. He was court lutenist in England from 1617-47. He fled from France after a ducland went to London about 1617.² It was he whom Constantin Huygens met in London in 1622. In Oct. 1647 Gaultier sent him 'quelques petites choses de nostre luth et quelques airs à chanter,' presumably of his own composition. Two years later they were corresponding on the subject of a 'luth de Bologne' that Huygens was anxious to acquire; in a letter preserved in the British Museum³ Gaultier writes:

'Je vous prie, Monseigneur, de ne trouver rude que je traite avec vous de pris pour quoy que ce soit, qui soit à moy. Je vous priay de regarder l'état de ma fortune. Après trent années de service à un si grand roy et royaume, que je n'ay rien à montrer que ce luth; et de plus je suis marié,' etc.⁴

This was rather ungrateful, for he was receiving an annuity of £100 for his services by royal warrant (see D.N.B. s.v. Gouter). M. de la Barre, also writing to Huygens (p. 148) on Oct. 15, 1648, alludes to 'Mrs. les Gautiers et autres excellents joueurs de luth.' There is a portrait of Jacques Gaultier by Jan Livens, or Lieveens, who was called to England by Charles I. in 1630 and stayed three years. It bears the inscription:

'Jacobus Goutero, inter regios magnae Britanniae Orpheos Amphiones Lydiae, Doriae, Phrygiae testudinis fidelem et modulatum,' etc. 'Joannes Livius fecit et excudit.'⁵

In 1660, the lutenist John Rogers replaced Gaultier in the Royal Music. He went to Holland in 1630 and also to Madrid, where he played before the court. As for the portrait painted by F. de Troyes (1644-1730), mentioned by Titon du Tillet as that of 'Gaultier le vieux,' no trace of it has been found. A presumed portrait of J. Gaultier, by Van Dyck, is kept at the Prado Museum, Madrid. Concerning his music, there are but few MSS. in which a piece of his can be identified and the British Museum does not possess any.⁶

(3) DENIS (DENYS) (d. Paris, Jan. 1672)⁷ nephew or cousin of Ennemond (not of Jacques) was 75 years old when he died. He is the author of all the compositions designated under 'Gaultier le jeune,' 'Gaultier de Paris,' 'Gaultier.' Very probably born at Marseilles, as his biographers have stated, he was certainly living in Paris some time before the death of the 'Sieur de l'Enclos,' the lute-player, in 1630. He composed the 'Hamilton Codex,' an important collection of sixty-nine compositions entitled 'La Rhétorique des dieux,' etc. etc., compiled between 1664 and 1672, and now in the Berlin State Museum. Gaultier's compositions for the lute are always effectively written, generally consisting of short dance tunes grouped together in sets or suites. The characteristic fashion of labelling each piece with a descriptive title such as 'Phaëton foudroyé,' 'Artemis ou l'oraison funèbre,' 'La Coquette virtuosa,' 'La Caressante,' is shown in the Hamilton Codex. Fleischer published all the music in the Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft, 1886. Identification of Denis Gaultier (according to Fleischer) with another of the same name, who was 'lieutenant-général au baillage et comté de Beauvoisis' in 1656, cannot be admitted, on account of the frequency of the name Gaultier in France at all times.

'La Rhétorique des dieux' (see for contents O. Fleischer, Viertelj. f. Musikwissenschaft, 1886).

Pièces de luth de Denys Gaultier sur 3 différents modes nouveaux, gravé par Richer, avec privilège du roy (Oct. 1669). A Paris chez l'auteur, rue ballets, proche La Monnaie, no date. (Bibliothèque Nationale, containing compositions of Rameau.)

Becker (Die Tonwerke des 16. und 17. Jahrhunderts 1855) mentions: Livre de tablature de pièces de luth de Mr. Gaultier Sr. de Neüe et de M. Gaultier son cousin, sur plusieurs différents modes avec quelques règles qu'il faut observer pour le bien toucher, gravé par Richer, chez la veuve de M. Gaultier dans La Monnaie. (Apparently the same work with another title in a later edition.)

Livre de musique pour le luth. 'Contenant une méthode nouvelle et facile, etc., par le Sr. Perrine. (Priv. du roy dated Dec. 9, 1679.) Has 'Le canon ou courante de Mr. Gaultier,' lute tablature with transcription.

Pièces de luth en musique par le Sr. Perrine. Paris, 1680. A collection of lute pieces by both Gaultiers in tablature with transcription. Fleischer reprints two: 'Pavane du Jeune Gaultier,' and 'Allemande au Tombeau de l'Enclos du Jeune Gaultier.'

The following MSS. are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris:

Vm. 7, 379, obl. 4to. Pièces de luth recueillies et écrites à Caen et autres lieux &c. années 1672-73, belonged to S. de Brossard's Pieces by Gaultier, le vieux Gaultier (formerly 2658).

Vm. 7, 6211, obl. 4to (after 1672), without title. Lute pieces by Gaultier, Gaultier le vieux, Gaultier de Paris, Gaultier de Lion, belonged to S. de Brossard (formerly 2659).

Vm. 7, 6212, obl. 4to, belonged to Marguerite Monin in 1864, but composed before. Pieces by Gaultier, Gaultier le vieux (formerly 2600).

Yn. 7, 6214 (after 1672), belonged to S. de Brossard. Pieces by Gaultier, le vieux Gaultier, the larger number initialled G. only (Pleischer) (formerly 2600 (3)).

MS. Milleran (see 'Mileran'), Paris, Bibliothèque du Conservatoire.

Pieces de luth et de théorbe par Jacquesen de Vivé et autres 2 MSS. (1699) at the Library of Beaumont (Doubs), including compositions of the Gaultiers.

Tilou du Tillet (Parades, 1732) and La Borde (Essai sur la musique . . . 1780, ill. p. 322), mentions a series of pieces, 'l'Immortelle', 'La Non Pareille', 'Le Tombeau de Mézangeau', etc., attributing them either to 'le vieux Gaultier' or Denys, but the authorship must be considered with caution.

In the Berlin Staatsbibl. No. 20,032. The lute-book of Virginia Renata von Gehena includes two pieces by 'Gottlieb, a. Gigue' and 'Gloria Gravelin'.

MS. in the Staatsbibliothek Augsburg.

MS. belonging to Max. Kalbeck.

MS. Stiehl-Lubeck (see G.-L.).

In Vienna Staatsbibl. No. 17,706. A collection of pieces in lute tablature by various composers. Includes 'l'Honorable', anonymous, and 'Courante (d. G.) Le Canon'; 'Allemande Courante'; 'Gigue, Courante'; 'l'Immortelle'; 'Courante, suite la superbe de Duifoux'; 'Dernière Courante'; all by Denys Gaultier. (Mantuan's cat.)

In the Mecklenburg-Schwerin Bibl. A MS. in lute tablature, dated Oct. 10, 1651. Among the twenty-two compositions, Nos. 52, 54, and 69 are 'Courantes de gaultier'; No. 55, 'Jaconne de gaultier'; 57, 'Courante de l'immortelle de gaultier'; 59, 'Capr. de gaultier'; and 63, 'Allemande de gaultier'. (Kade's Cat. p. 257.)

In No. 47 of the Griseholmi Bibl. 'La Paysant', 'l'Immortelle', 'Courante de D. Gaultier', 'Le Canon courante du Gaultier', 'Courante du Gaultier', etc. (Tobias Nollind, Die Musikgeschichte Schwedens).

In the Badse Universitätsbibl. is a 'Courante de Gauthier' and 'Gigue de Gaultier' (J. Richter's Cat.).

In the Bodleian (MS. Mus. Sch. G. 616-618) there is a very fine collection of MS. lute music, in three small obl. volumes, by Dubut le vieux, Mouton, Pinei, Gallot, Blanchocher, Ennon, etc., but the larger number of rebutes, pavans, sarabandes, courantes, allemandes, giges, and one canarie, are all by Gaultier, 'le vieux Gaultier', 'Gaultier de P.', and 'Gaultier de Lyon'. These include the allemande 'Les Dernières Paroles ou Testament de Mézangeau', the courantes 'Les Larmes de Bousset', 'l'Immortelle', with the 'Contrepain de l'Immortelle', and 'L'Adieu' by le vieux Gaultier; the sarabande 'La Bergère' by Gaultier; the allemand 'Le Tombeau de Blanchocher', the pavan 'La Dédicace', the courantes 'La Belle houlide', 'La Champre', and 'La Confidante', and the canarie by Gaultier de Paris.

A similar MS. (Mus. Sch. F. 576) contains the three courantes 'Le Canon', 'l'Immortelle', 'l'Honorable', and a sarabande by Gaultier.

(4) PIERRE, native of Orléans, had probably no connexion with the preceding. It is known that he was staying at Rome in 1638, as is shown in his works entitled: 'Œuvres de Pierre Gaultier, orléanois, dédiées à Mgr. le Duc d'Éggenberg . . . Rome 1638.' (Copy in the Royal Library, Brussels.)

GAUNTLETT, HENRY JOHN, eldest son of the Rev. Henry Gauntlett (b. Wellington, Salop, July 9, 1805; d. Feb. 21, 1876), a church musician memorable for reform which he advocated in the construction of church organs. His father was presented to the vicarage of Olney, Bucks, and there, at the age of nine, young Gauntlett entered on the duties of his first organist appointment. His father took him to London about 1821, and Attwood wished to take the boy as a pupil, but his father refused, and, after a short stay in Ireland as a private tutor, he was assisted to a solicitor in 1826. During his clerkship he pursued the study of law and music with equal assiduity, and in 1827 obtained the post of organist of St. Olave's, Southwark, which he held for upwards of twenty years. In 1831 he was admitted a solicitor, and started practice in the City of London in partnership with a brother. About 1836, having attained a high reputation as an organist, he began his advocacy of a reform in organ-building by the adoption of the C organ in the place of the old F and G instruments. He met with the strongest opposition, but finding a valuable auxiliary in William Hill, the organ-builder (who, under his superintendence, constructed the organs in St. Luke's, Cheetham, Manchester; St. Peter's, Cornhill; Ashton-under-Lyne Church; Dr. Raffles's Chapel, Liverpool; and St. John's, Calcutta; and reconstructed the large organs in Birmingham Town Hall, and Christ Church, Newgate Street), he attained his aim, and through his exertions the C organ was firmly settled in England. In 1836 he became evening organist of Christ Church, Newgate Street, at a salary of two guineas a year. The organ at this church was transformed in time for the visit of Mendelssohn in 1837, and he played upon it (see an account in the Musical World of Sept. 15, 1837). He lectured at the London Institution in 1837-42. In 1842 Dr. Howley, Archbishop of Canterbury, conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Music. About the same time he gave up the law and devoted himself wholly to music. In the year 1844 Gauntlett, in conjunction with Charles Child Spencer, drew attention to the subject of Gregorian music (of which he was a devoted adherent) by the publication of the Hymnal for Matins and Evensong (Bell & Daldy). It is as a composer and editor of psalm and hymn tunes that he is best remembered. After quitting St. Olave's and Christ Church in 1816, Gauntlett was successively organist of Union Chapel, Islington (for eight years), of All Saints, Notting Hill, and of St. Bartholemew the Less, Smithfield. He was chosen by Mendelssohn to play the organ part in 'Elijah,' on its production at Birmingham, Aug. 26, 1846. He died suddenly, from heart disease, and was buried at Kensal Green Cemetery.

Gauntlett's principal publications, besides those mentioned, were:

The Psalms, 1839-41; Gregorian Canticles, 1844; The Church Hymn and Tune Book (with Rev. W. J. Blew), 1844-51; Cantus Melodici, 1845 (originally intended as the title of a separate work, and subsequently as the preface to The Church Hymn and Tune Book); The Comprehensive Tune Book (with Keatts), 1846-47; The Gregorian Psalter, 1846; Harmonies to Gregorian Tones, 1847; Comprehensio Choir Book, 1848; Quire and Cathedral Psalter, 1848; Christmas Carols, 1848; The Bible Psalms, 1848; Christus Ascendit et Moxerit, 1849; The Hallalujah (with Rev. J. J. Watts), 1848-55; The Statut Nat., set to eight melodies, 1849; Order of Morning Prayer, 1850; Church Anthem Book (incomplete), 1852-54; Hymns for Little Children, 1853; The Congregational Psalter (with Rev. Dr. Henry Allen), 1856; Carlyle's Manual of Psalms, 1860; Christmas Minstrelsy, 1864; Tunes, New and Old, 1866; Harland's Church Psalter and Hymnal, 1869; Service of Song, 1870; Parish Church Tune Book, 1871; National Psalter, 1876. In 1856 he worked at an Encyclopedia of the Church, for the Rev. J. J. Watts (published in 1885). (D.N.B.)

GAVEAU, (1) JOSEPH (d. Paris, 1903) pianoforte-maker in Paris, 1847-93. His successor was his son, Etienne (1893). In 1896 the latter built the model factory at Fontenay-sous-Bois, near Paris, and also the Salle Gaveau in the rue de la Boétie, Paris (1907). Since its foundation the house of Gaveau has produced over 70,000 pianos.

(2) GABRIEL, (b. 1855) son of Joseph, piano-forte manufacturer, founded a house in Paris, Avenue Malakoff, 1911, from which have issued over 4000 pianos.

J. G. P.

GAVEAUX, (1) PIERRE (b. Béziers, Aug. 1761¹; d. Passy, near Paris, Feb. 5, 1825),² studied composition under Beck, conductor of the Grand Théâtre at Bordeaux. There he made his début as tenor with a success which decided his future career. His voice was warm and flexible, he sang with great expression, and during an engagement at the Opéra-Comique in Paris in 1789 created many important parts; but his career as an actor was ephemeral. As a composer he produced between 1792 and 1818 at the Opéra-Comique more than 35 dramatic works, ballets, comic operas and operas, written in an easy and essentially dramatic style, natural and simple in melody, but not characterised by depth or originality. Among these may be specified 'Les Deux Suisses' (1792); 'Le Petit Matelot' (1796); 'Léonore ou l'amour conjugal' (1798), his best work, the same subject which Beethoven afterwards set as 'Fidelio'; 'Le Bouffe et le Tailleur' (1804), sung by Ponchard and Cinti-Damoreau as late as 1835, and played in London in 1849; 'Monsieur Deschalambeaux' (1806), afterwards played as a pantomime, and 'L'Enfant prodigue.' He also published a book of Italian 'Canzonette' dedicated to Garat, and another of French 'Romances.' These are forgotten, but some of his operatic airs for a time maintained a certain popularity, and occupy an honourable place in 'La Clé du caveau.' He wrote, also, a revolutionary hymn, 'Le Réveil du peuple' (1795), words by Sourignière, performed with the greatest enthusiasm for four years. The titles of 26 operas are given in Q.-L. He died insane.

GAVINIÉS, PIERRE (b. Bordeaux, May 26, 1726³; d. Paris, Sept. 9, 1800), an eminent French violinist.

He made his first successful appearance at the Concert Spirituel in 1741, and after this to the end of his life he but rarely left Paris, where he soon came to be considered as the best living violinist, and was a great favourite in fashionable circles. Contemporary writers attribute to him all the qualities of a really great performer—wonderful execution, a great tone, spirit and feeling. His fiery temperament at one time got him into considerable trouble: he became involved in a liaison with a lady of the court, and on being detected had to fly from Paris, but was captured and imprisoned for a year. This experience effectually sobered him, and we are assured that later in life he was as much esteemed for his social virtues as for his artistic gifts. During his imprisonment he composed a piece which, under the name of 'Romance de Gaviniés,' for a long time enjoyed considerable popularity in France, and, according to Fétis, used to move the hearers to tears when performed by the composer. He directed the Concert Spirituel in 1773-77, and on the foundation of the Conservatoire in 1794 was appointed to a professorship of the violin.

In France Gaviniés is generally considered the founder of the great French school of violinists. This is true in one sense, as he was the first professor of the violin at the Conservatoire, but with such a predecessor as Lécclair, the title appears at least disputable. Viotti is said to have spoken of him as the French Tartini. But, although there can be no doubt that Gaviniés did more than any one before him towards transplanting into France the true and earnest style of the great Italian school of violin-playing, it is impossible to rank him in any way with Tartini as a composer for the violin or even as a performer. His works, while not devoid of a certain pathetic dignity, do not show an individual original style, and are in every respect inferior to Tartini's masterpieces. They are on the whole rather dry and laboured. On the other hand it must be granted that they indicate considerable advance in technical execution. His most celebrated work, 'Les vingt-quatre Matinées,' surpasses in difficulty anything ever written by Tartini, and as we are assured that Gaviniés used to play them even in his old age with the greatest perfection, we must assume him to have possessed an eminent execution.

Capron, Robineau and Le Duc ainé, are the best known of Gaviniés's numerous pupils. Besides the 'Matinées' he published 6 concertos for the violin, 2 sets of sonatas for violin and bass (some of which have been republished by Alard and David), 6 sonatas for 2 violins, 3 sonatas for violin solo (one of them entitled 'Le Tombeau de Gaviniés'). He also composed an opera, 'Le Prétendu,' which was played at the Comédie-Italienne in 1760.

GAVOTTE, a French dance, the name of which is said to be derived from the Gavots, or people of the pays de Gap in Dauphiné. Its original peculiarity as a danse grave was that the dancers lifted their feet from the ground, while in former danses graves they walked or shuffled—(Littré). It is in common time, of moderately quick movement, and in two parts, each of which is, as usual with the older dances, repeated. In the original form of the dance the first part consisted of four and the second of eight bars; when introduced as one of the movements of a suite, it has no fixed number of bars. The gavotte should always begin on the third beat of the bar, each part finishing, therefore, with a half-bar, which must contain a minim, and not two crotchets. Occasional exceptions may be found to the rule that the gavotte is to begin on the third crotchet, as, for instance, in that of No. 3 of Bach's 'Suites françaises,' which begins on the first crotchet, but of which it should be noticed that in the most authoritative editions it is termed an 'Anglaise.' In any case it is not strictly a gavotte. The same may be said of the 'gavotte' in Gluck's 'Orphée,' which begins on the fourth beat of the bar, and should therefore rather have been marked 'tempo di gavotta.' A second gavotte frequently succeeds the first as a 'trio,' in the modern sense of that term. This second gavotte is either similar in construction to the first, as in Bach's orchestral Suite in D ('Französische Ouverture'), or is a Musette, i.e. founded on a 'drone-bass,' as in the third and sixth of Bach's 'Suites anglaises.' The position of the gavotte in the suite is not invariable, but it usually follows the sarabande, though occasionally it precedes it. E. F.

GAWLER, WILLIAM (b. ? Lambeth, 1750; d. there, Mar. 15, 1809), organist and composer. In 1785 he was organist to the 'Asylum of Refuge for female orphans, Lambeth,' and in the following year published a book of 'Hymns and Psalms' in use there, followed by a 'Supplement.' Other sacred compilations and compositions followed and preceded this work, including 'Harmonia sacra,' Dr. Watts's 'Divine Songs,' 'Voluntaries for the Organ,' etc. 'Lessons for the Harpsichord' and similar works also came from his pen. Before 1798 he had become a music publisher, living at 19 Paradise Row, Lambeth, and from here he issued much sheet and other music. F. K.

GAWTHORN, NATHANIEL, clerk at the Friday Lecture in East Cheap, published in 1730 a collection of psalm tunes in four parts under the title of 'Harmonia perfecta,' containing also some hymns and anthems, and an Introduction to Psalmody. W. H. H.

GAY, MARIA (b. Barcelona, June 13, 1879), operatic contralto. An all-round talent for art marked the romantic girlhood of this gifted Spanish prima donna. She worked hard at sculpture until 16, and studied the violin for some time before deciding to develop her voice, which no one had noticed until one day she was put in prison for singing a revolutionary song. Still she took no lessons, but grew up a self-taught singer until she went to Brussels by the invitation of Raoul Pugno, the pianist, and appeared in 1902 at concerts given by him and Ysaÿe. Heard at one of these by the director of the Théâtre de la Monnaie, she agreed to sing the part of Carmen at five days' notice, untrained as she was, and, thanks to her fine voice and natural stage aptitude, she achieved an instant success. Happily she then left the stage for a year to study seriously in Paris with the famous Mme. Adiny. On her reappearance she showed a distinct advance, more especially as Carmen, which grew in her hands into a superb impersonation and helped to win her an international reputation. She sang it on her début at Covent Garden in the autumn of 1906, but appeared here in no other character. In America, however, her repertory (after 1908) became much extended, and she settled down permanently in that country, where she married in 1913 the well-known tenor, Giovanni Zenatello. H. K.

GAYARRÉ, JULIAN (b. Roncal¹ or near Pampeluna,² Jan. 9, 1844; d. Madrid, Jan. 2, 1890), tenor singer, the son of a poor blacksmith. Through the kindness of Esalava, he studied singing at the Conservatorio of Madrid. He began his career at Varese as a second tenor, but soon after made a great success as Nemorino in 'L'Élixir.' He sang at Parma and Rome 1873, where on Apr. 6 he played Amadeus II. in Libani's 'Conte Verde,' and on Apr. 8, 1876, Enzo in Ponchielli's 'Gioconda' at the Scala, Milan; he sang at Vienna, St. Petersburg, South America and elsewhere. From 1877-81 he was engaged at Covent Garden, where he made his début, Apr. 7, 1877, as Fernando in 'La favorita,' and proved himself a very serviceable tenor, though he did not fulfil the hopes entertained of him as Mario's successor. He reappeared there in 1886-87, and sang, on July 12, 1887, the tenor part in the production of Glinka's 'Vie pour le Czar.' In the meantime he played in Madrid, in 1884 at Paris in Italian, in 1886 for a few nights as Vasco da Gama in French at the Opéra, in 1888 at Milan, and in 1889 in Spain. He founded a school of singing for indigent youths of his native country. (Gazzetta Musicale di Milano.)

GAZZANIGA, GIUSEPPE (b. Verona, Oct. 1743; d. Crema, 1819), one of the most celebrated opera-composers of his time. He was a pupil of Porpora, both in Venice and at San Onofrio in Naples. He also studied under Piccinni. Through Sacchini's influence his first opera, 'Il finto cieco,' was performed in Vienna (1770).³ Among his many operas may be men-

Three oratorios are mentioned in Q.-L., where 8 of his numerous operas are noted as extant.

GEBAUER, FRANZ XAVER (b. Eckersdorf, Glatz, Prussian Silesia, 1784; d. Vienna, Dec. 13, 1822), received his early musical education from his father, the village schoolmaster. In 1804 he became organist at Frankenstein; and in 1810 went to Vienna, where he soon became known for his extraordinary execution on the Jew's-harp, and lived by giving excellent piano-forte lessons, and playing the violoncello. In 1816 he was appointed choirmaster of the church of St. Augustin, and there, thanks to his indefatigable efforts, the larger works of the great masters were satisfactorily performed. He was also one of the earliest and most active members of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, founded in 1813. In 1819, through his endeavours, were started the Spirituel-Concerte, which continued in existence until 1848. Gebauer was the first conductor, but did not long enjoy the fruits of his labours. In Oct. 1822 he returned from a journey to Switzerland seriously ill, and died in Vienna. He published a few Lieder, and left a small number of choral compositions in MS. He was intimate with Beethoven, who in a note preserved by Seyfried² puns upon his name in his favourite style, calling him 'Geb' Bauer' and 'der Bauer.'

GEBAUER, GOTTFRIED ALOIS (c. 1666), trombone-player and copyist in the Vienna court chapel.

GEBAUER, four sons of an apparently German military musician. (1) MICHEL JOSEPH (b. La Fère, Aisne, 1763; d. Russia, 1812), at first violinist then oboist in the National Guards; professor at Paris Conservatoire, 1794-1802; bandmaster of the Consular Guards; oboist of the Imperial Chapel; died in the Russian campaign. He composed a great deal of music for the flute and other wind instruments, duets for 2 vlns., and vln. and v'la, marches, etc.

(2) FRANÇOIS RENÉ (b. Versailles, 1773, d. July 6, 1844) was professor of the bassoon at the Conservatoire, 1796-1802, and again from 1825; bassoon-player at the Opéra, 1801-26; composed overtures, symphonies, concertantes for wind instruments, quintets, quartets, trios, duets, sonatas, studies chiefly for wind instruments, and a Tutor for the bassoon.

(3) ÉTIENNE FRANÇOIS (b. Versailles, 1777; d. 1823), flautist at the Opéra-Comique 1801-22, wrote a large amount of flute music, including excellent studies, also violin duets, duets and solos for clarinet.

(4) PIERRE PAUL (b. Versailles, 1775), horn player at the Vaudeville Theatre; died young, and left 20 duets for 2 horns (Sieber, Paris).

GEBEL, (1) JOHANN GEORG (b. Breslau, 1685; d. 1750), gives a detailed account of his own life in Mattheson's Grundlage einer Ehrenpforte, 1740. He was apprenticed to a tailor when 14, but threw this up for music when 18, and became a pupil of Fr. Tiburtius Winckler, the cathedral organist. At the Hofkapelle concerts he often accompanied soloists by ear only, either from the figured bass, or when they were extemporising. He acted as deputy organist for Winckler, Krause and others, and also gave lessons in music. In 1709 he was appointed organist at the Pfarrkirche at Brieg, and continued his studies with the Kapellmeister G. H. Stöltzel. In 1713 he returned to Breslau and was appointed organist, and in 1714 Musik-director at the church of S. Christopher. Gebel failed to obtain the principal organistship of S. Elisabeth in 1739, a post which his second son occupied ten years later. Of an ingenious turn of mind, he invented a clavicord with quarter-tones, and a large clavicembalo with six complete octaves, etc. In 1749, although old and feeble, he took the place of his second son as organist of the Dreifaltigkeitskirche at Breslau. His two elder sons were both professional musicians, and it is not always easy to distinguish between the respective compositions of father and son, but to the father may probably be attributed:

1. In the Berlin königl. Bibl. MS. 7210, Passion-music with instrumental accompaniment. MS. 7212, 4 sonatas for string instruments. MS. 7213, 2 sonatas for 2 flutes or strings. (Q.-L.)

2. In the Bibl. of the Joachimsthalsche Gymnasium, Berlin, 3 cantatas in score. (Ritner.)

3. In Löhbeck Stadtbibl. in a MS. collection of motets for 4 v. in score: No. 20, 41. Gebel. Motetta: 'Der Herr ist mein Licht.' (Stiehl's Cat. p. 19.)

Gebel himself (Mattheson, p. 407, etc.) says he composed many clavier pieces; a canon in 30 parts, which had to be played through 12 times if it were to end in the key in which it began; Psalms for double choir; a Mass for double choir with instrumental accompaniment; 48 chorales for the organ; partite, chaconnes, etc.

(2) GEORG, his elder son (b. Brieg, Oct. 25, 1709; d. Rudolstadt, Sept. 24, 1753), began to play the harpsichord when 4 years old. He was carefully taught by his father, and when 12 years old was taken to exhibit his powers as an organist before the Duke and Duchess of Oels. He acted as deputy organist to his father, studied composition, and in 1729 became sub-organist at S. Maria Magdalena, Breslau. In 1730 he was playing the second harpsichord at the Italian opera in Breslau. Among his friends were Fedele, the organist Hoffmann, and the lutenist Kropfgans. In 1733 he became Kapellmeister to the Duke of Oels. In 1735 he was appointed clavicembalist in the Dresden Hofkapelle, then at Warsaw under the direction of Count von Brühl, but soon after returned to Dresden, where he learned to play the pantaleon, a difficult stringed instrument invented by HEBENSTREIT (q.v.). His wife, Susanna, was a clever painter, and he devoted a great deal of his time to painting. In 1747 Johann Friedrich von Schwarzbürg appointed him concertmeister and later Kapellmeister at Rudolstadt.

1. In the Mecklenburg-Schwerin grossherzogl. Bibl. is a 'Partita per il cembalo composta da Georg Giedel, maestro di concerti di sua Altezza serenissima. Mondsignor il Principe reuante di Schwartzburg,' etc. Dedicated to Joh. Fried. of Schwarzbürg. Printed at the expense of C. F. Eschrich at Rudolstadt.

2. And in MS. part-books: Oratorium auf den heiligen Christ-Abend, 'Jauchzet ihr Himmel, erheue dich Erde,' for soprano, alto, tenor, bass, clarino I. and II., ingotto, flauto, viol. I. and II., viola e fondamento. The text-book is dated 1738.

3. Sinfonia in G, and Sinfonia in D^{major} (i.e. D major), for corni I. and II., oboe I. and II., viol. I. and II., viola e fondamento.

4. Sinfonia in D major, for same instruments, with the addition of clarino I. and II. (Köch's Cat. p. 236).

5. In the Gotha herzogl. Bibl. is a MS. Cantata 'Ich will meinen Engel senden.' (Eitner.)

6. In the Darmstadt Hofbibl. is a MS. score of a Sinfonia for viol. I. and II., viola and basso. (Eitner.) Three MS. Partite a 4 (2 vln., viola, and basso) and one overture a 7 (1. douce, 2. trav., ob. 2. vln., viola and basso) are in Breitkopf's Catalogue for 1756.

Gebel is also said to have composed music for two years of Church high-days and festivals; more than a hundred sinfonie and partite; Passion-music; Christmas oratorios; 12 operas, of which one 'Serpillius und Melissa' was performed at Dresden, and 5 more at Rudolstadt, 'Oedipus,' 1751; 'Medea,' 1752; 'Tarquinius Superbus,' 1752; 'Sophonisbe,' 1753; and 'Marcus Antonius,' 1753.

(3) GEORG SIGISMUND, the second son (b. Breslau, 1715; d. there, 1775), was a clever composer and clavier player. In 1736 he was appointed sub-organist at S. Elisabeth, Breslau. He married, June 17, 1744, the daughter of the organist J. G. Hoffmann. In 1748 he became organist at the Dreifaltigkeitskirche, Breslau, and in 1749 principal organist at S. Elisabeth, which post he held till his death. (Marpurg, Hist.-krit. Beyträge, 1754, i. 364.) He published various compositions for the organ. c. s.

GEDACKT-WORK (i.e. gedeckt). All the Flue-stops of an organ composed of pipes that are entirely covered or closed in at the top are members of the 'Gedackt' or Covered-work. To this class, therefore, belong the Sub-Bourdon, 32; Bourdon, 16; Stopped Diapason, 8; and Stopped Flute, 4 foot-tone. When made to a 'small scale,' and voiced so as to produce a sweet tone, the adjective 'Lieblich' is prefixed, as Lieblich Bourdon, 16 ft., Lieblich Gedackt, 8 ft., Lieblich Flöte, 4 ft. Large stopped pipes are generally made of wood; the smaller ones either of wood or metal. Covered Stops were first made in Germany, in the early part of the 16th century. E. J. H.

GÉDALGE, (1) ANDRÉ (b. Paris, Dec. 27, 1856; d. Feb. 5, 1926), composer, won the 2nd Prix de Rome (1886), and became professor of counterpoint and fugue at the Conservatoire (1905). His compositions are:

Le Petit Savoyard (Nouveauté, 1891), 'Pris au piège' (Opéra-Comique, 1895), 'Phœbé' (Opéra-Comique), 'Hélène' (Prix Crescent, 1894), 3 symphonies, chamber music, concertos, fugues, melodies, etc.

Gédalge has published a Traité de fugue (1900, transl. into German by Stier, 1907). Among his pupils were Ravel and Florent Schmitt. He was active in the propagation of choral singing in France. His wife,

(2) AMÉLIE ALEXANDRINE (née D'OBIGNY DE FERRIÈRES) (b. Paris, Feb. 21, 1865), won the first prize for harmony at the Conservatoire in 1884. She has devoted herself to the teaching of music. She has published Les Gloires musicales du monde (1888). J. G. P.

GEERES, JOHN, a 17th-century English composer. He composed 3 anthems in a MS. of 1664 from Durham Cathedral (B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478).

GEHOT, JOSEPH, an 18th-century violin virtuoso who was in London between 1780-90, where 2 books of string quartets, 2 books of string trios, and 2 books of duets for vln. and v'cl., as well as 24 pieces for military band and a treatise on the theory and practice of music appeared during that time. Fétis describes him as a Belgian who went from London to Paris and thence to Berlin, and published various works of chamber music in each of these towns. Five quartets in MS. are in the State library at Berlin (Q.-L.).

GEIGE (Ger.), the exact equivalent of our word 'fiddle,' as a familiar, if not slightly contemptuous, term for instruments of the violin family. It seems more than likely that it is derived from the same source as the word 'jig,' for the old French word 'gigue' or 'gigue' originally meant a fiddle, whether or not it were derived from the English. (See Oxford Dict. s.v. 'Jig'.) (See VIOL FAMILY.)

GEIGEN-PRINCIPAL, i.e. Violin Diapason, an organ-stop of 8 ft. or unison pitch; crisp in tone, and held to resemble the violin in quality. A 'violl and violin' stop originally formed one of the features in the choir organ of the instrument in the Temple Church, built by Father Smith in 1688; but seems to have been removed shortly afterwards to make room for an additional reed stop. The Geigen-principal was first brought under notice in England in recent times by Schulze, who introduced two, one of 8 ft. and another of 4, into the admirable little organ he sent to the Great Exhibition of 1851.

GEIJER, ERIK GUSTAF (b. Ransäter near Karlstad, Jan. 12, 1783; d. Stockholm, Apr. 23, 1847), one of the greatest Swedish historians and poets, also excelled as a composer of songs. He belonged to a musical family, especially on his mother's side, and the letters which he wrote to his sister and others (1799-1809) plainly show that the real world in which he fully lived was not in the sphere of poetry, philosophy, or history, but of music.

His first compositions were confined to simple ditties, such as 'The Little Coal-boy,' 'Knight Toggenborg,' and 'The Viking'; he made further progress in his powerful 'Swanwhite's Song,' and attained, during the thirties, full maturity in musical composition in 'The Song of the Cow-boy,' 'Courage and Sacrifice,' 'The Knife-grinder Boy,' 'The Night-sky,' etc.

Professor Geijer was a many-sided man; he spoke of the 'five fingers on his spiritual hand': history, philosophy, theology, poetry and music; and he devoted himself to them all, thoroughly and successfully. Although he could only give himself up to music in his leisure hours, it was a natural necessity to him to express his feelings in composition.

He visited England and was fortunate in hearing really good music. Handel's 'Messiah' impressed him greatly, and he declared it 'the most sublime work that ever gladdened my soul—sorrow, joy, triumph and devotion are characteristically expressed.'

Geijer has not left much music, but what remains is pure gold.

There is much symbolical thought expressed in his statue at Upsala. Below the figure of Geijer sits a daughter of the people, simply attired, with a dreamy look in her eyes and holding a lyre in her hand. It was his idea of what Swedish folk-song should be; simple in its outward form, but pure and strong in its poetical depth.

GEISLER, (1) BENEDICT, an early 18th century Augustinian monk who composed a considerable number of masses and other church music published at Augsburg and Bamberg between 1741–59 (Q.-L.).

(2) JOHANN GOTTFRIED (Mendel has Gottlieb) (b. 1776; d. Zittau, Feb. 13, 1827), a teacher of music who wrote Beschreibung und Geschichte der neuesten Instrumente und Kunstwerke für Liebhaber und Künstler, 1792–1800, 2nd ed. 1811. E. v. d. S.

GEISLER, PAUL (b. Stolp, Pomerania, Aug. 10, 1856; d. Posen, Apr. 3, 1919), received his first musical instruction from his grandfather, who was conductor at Marienburg in Prussia, and was afterwards a pupil of Constantine Decker, a pianist and composer of distinction.

In 1881 he conducted at the Leipzig Musical Theatre. The following year he was associated with A. Neumann's travelling Wagner Company, after which he occupied for two years a post as conductor in Bremen. He resided for many years first in Leipzig and then in Berlin before taking up the post of director of the Conservatoire at Posen. He composed for the stage: 'Ingeborg' (Bremen, 1884), 'Hertha' (Hamburg, 1891), and 'Palm' (Lubeck, 1893), 'Warum?', 'Fridericus Rex' (Berlin, 1899), 'Prinzessin Ilse' (Posen, 1903). His remaining works include two cyclic cantatas: 'Sansara' and 'Golgotha'; several symphonic poems, of which two deserve special mention: 'The Pied Piper of Hamelyn' and 'Till Eulenspiegel'; the music to several dramas, a number of smaller vocal compositions, and a few piano works. The bulk of his compositions remain in MS., but a few of his more interesting works are available, amongst them the full score of the 'Pied Piper,' which was performed in 1880 under the auspices of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Magdeburg, where it had considerable success. E. E.

GELINEK, JOSEPH (b. Selcz, Bohemia, Dec. 3, 1758; d. Vienna, Apr. 13, 1825), secular priest, composer of variations, fantasies and other salon music for pianoforte.

On going to Prague to complete his philosophical studies he took lessons from Segert in composition and organ playing. In 1783 he became a divinity student at the General-Seminar, the orchestra of which elicited praise from Mozart himself when in Prague. Mozart also applauded Gelinek's pianoforte playing. In 1786 he was ordained priest, and became domestic chaplain and pianoforte teacher to Prince Joseph Kinsky, who settled an income upon him for life, and took him to Vienna, where he studied with Albrechtsberger. There he became the favourite pianoforte teacher of the nobility, and was liberally paid. In 1795 he entered Prince Esterhazy's household as chaplain and music master, and remained there till his death. For Gelinek's relations with Beethoven, see Czerny in Pohl's Jahresbericht des Conservatoriums in Wien, 1869–70; also see BEETHOVEN, Vol. I. p. 265.

Gelinek composed with ease and rapidity; both he and his publishers made large profits from his works, the variations in the fashionable style of the day especially having a ready sale; many of these were no doubt made by other hacks under Gelinek's name. Of these there is a thematic catalogue (Offenbach, Andre) containing 98, with spaces for more. The catalogue of Gelinek's extant works is summarised in Q.-L. C. F. P.

GEMINIANI, FRANCESCO (b. Lucca, 1667; d. Dublin, Sept. 17, 1762),¹ eminent violinist and composer. His first teacher on the violin was Carlo Ambrogio Lunati, surnamed 'il Gobbo,' at Milan. He afterwards studied under Corelli at Rome, and is said to have had instruction in composition from Alessandro Scarlatti. He was violinist in the band of the Signoria at Lucca, 1707–10. Geminiani must be considered one of the foremost representatives of the school of Corelli, however different from his master he proved himself to be as a performer and composer. While classical beauty and imperturbable dignity were the main characteristics of Corelli's style, Geminiani's unbounded vivacity of temperament showed itself in his performances, which contemporary critics describe as eccentric. Tartini is said to have spoken of him as 'il furibondo Geminiani.' This easily accounts for the fact that, however great his success as a solo-player, he failed as a leader and conductor, from want of the necessary calmness and control. Burney relates, on the authority of Barbolla, that he lost the post of leader of the opera-band at Naples because none of the performers were able to follow him in his tempo rubato and other unexpected accelerations and relaxations of measure,¹

'after this discovery he was never trusted with a better part than tenor during his residence in that city.'

In 1714 Geminiani came to England, and quickly gained a great reputation as a virtuoso. When invited to play at a court concert, he only consented on condition that Handel should accompany him. While he made but rare use of his really great talent as a performer, he spent much time in writing theoretical works of secondary value. His passion for dealing in pictures, without, we are assured, having much knowledge of the subject, at one time involved him in difficulties and brought him even into prison, from which he was only extricated by Lord Essex, his friend and pupil. This same nobleman procured for him in 1728 the post of master and composer of the State Music in Ireland, on Cousser's death in 1727. It is supposed that Horace Walpole objected to this appointment on account of Geminiani being a Roman Catholic. At all events it was not Geminiani, but Dubourg, his pupil, who went to Dublin in this official capacity. Geminiani paid long visits to Dublin, and in 1733 settled down in a splendid house with concert-room attached, in Spring Gardens, a court at the lower end of Dame Street. Here (1733-40) he received pupils, and gave private concerts. On his return to London, his 'Concerns and Great Music Room' were taken over by one Charles, a horn-player (Dublin Journal, Nov. 1742). In 1741 Geminiani gave a benefit concert in the 'little theatre in the Haymarket,' and his third set of concertos, op. 6, was published in London. He seems to have lived in London until 1749, when he conducted Lenten Concerts at Drury Lane Theatre; he then went to Paris and remained there until 1755. Nothing, however, is known about his doings there, except that he brought out a new edition of his solo-sonatas. From Paris he returned to London. He went to Ireland in the spring of 1759, as violin-master to C. Coote of Cootehill, and in 1760 he went to visit Dubourg. Grief for the loss of a MS. treatise on music, stolen from his lodging in College Green, is said to have hastened his death.¹

Geminiani and VERACINI (q.v.), coming at about the same time to England, found the art of violin-playing in every respect in its infancy. Corelli's solos were considered to afford almost insurmountable difficulties of execution. Now Geminiani not only played these, but in his own compositions shows considerable progress in the technique of the violin, by freely employing the shift, and by frequent use of double-stops. Burney naively enough assures his readers that some of Geminiani's sonatas were too difficult to be played by any one. His published compositions—sonatas and concertos for the violin—show him to have been a clever musician, but, with all his impetuosity, wanting in originality and individuality. His slow movements are more modern in feeling than most of Corelli's, bearing a certain likeness to Tartini's style, though without ever equalling the best works of that great master. His allegros have a more developed and freer form than those of Corelli.

The most valuable contribution, however, which he has made to the literature of the instrument is his Art of Playing the Violin, op. 9, London.² This book, written in English, was the first of its kind ever published in any country, twenty-two years earlier than Leopold Mozart's Violinschule. It has the great merit of handing down to posterity the principles of the art of playing the violin, as they were finally established by Corelli. The rules which Geminiani gives for holding the violin and bow, the management of the left hand and the right arm, are the same as are recognised in our days. In one particular point he even appears to have been in advance of his time, since he recommends the holding of the violin on the left side of the tailpiece, a practice now universally accepted and indispensable for a higher development of the technique, but, strange as it seems, not adopted either by Leopold Mozart or by the masters of the German school until the beginning of the 19th century.

His other theoretical works, including Rules for Playing in a true Taste on the Violin, German Flute, Violoncello and Harpischord, op. 8 (qu. 1730); Guida armonica, op. 10 (1742); The Art of Accompaniment, op. 11 (1755); Treatise of Good Taste (1749); The Art of Playing the Guitar (1760), are of less value, although The Art of Accompaniment has a special interest as an account of how a great solo-player liked to be accompanied.³ Many of them appeared not only in English, but in Italian, French, German and Dutch.

² This seems to have been practically identical with an anonymous work, The Art of Playing on the Violin with a New Scale, etc., included in Praetorius's Modern Music-Master, 1731. See E. Heron-Allen's De Adriaens bibliotheca, pt. v. sect. 2, where the date 1720 is conjectured for that of the publications of this treatise in book form, but reference to F. Kildson's British Music Publishers shows that it cannot have appeared before 1734. The whole question is discussed in The Oxf. Hist. Mus. vol. iv., The Age of Bach and Handel p. 170, note.

Of original compositions he published the following :

XII Solos, op. 1, London, 1716.
Six Concertos in seven parts, op. 2, London, 1732, and Paris, 1755, in score.
Six Concertos, op. 3, London and Paris, 1775.
Six Concertos, op. 4, 1745.
XII Solos, op. 4, London, 1739.
Six Solos for Violoncello, op. 5 (these were arranged for violin solo, the keys in some instances being changed).
Six Concertos, op. 6, London, 1741.
Six Concertos in eight parts, op. 7, 1748.
XII Sonatas for Violin, op. 11, London, 1758.
XII Trios and VI Trios, the latter arrangements of op. 1.
Pièces de Clavecin, Harpsichord, London, 1743.
He also made and published in London an arrangement of Corelli's Solos, op. 5, as 'Concerti grossi.'

(See list in Q.-L.) Geminiani's portrait was painted by Latham in 1737, and by Howard.

GEMSHORN (i.e. Chamois horn), an organ-stop 8, 4 or 2 feet in length, the pipes of which, generally of metal, are taper-shaped, being at the top only about one-third the size of what they are at the mouth, with a tone somewhat lighter than that of a cylindrical stop of the same scale at the mouth; and very musical. It was first introduced here by Father Smith, who placed one in the choir organ at the Temple. It passed out of sight for many years, but was reintroduced by William Hill.

GENDRE, JEAN LE, an early 16th-century singer in the Royal Chapel of Francis I. and Henry II. of France. He wrote a treatise on plain-chant and counterpoint (Paris, 1545) and composed motets and songs. (See Q.-L.)

GENÉE, FRANZ FRIEDRICH RICHARD (b. Danzig, Feb. 7, 1823; d. Baden, near Vienna, June 15, 1895), the son of a music-director in a theatre at Danzig, was first intended for the medical profession, but took up music and studied with A. Stahlknecht at Berlin. Between 1848 and 1867 he was successively Kapellmeister at theatres at Reval, Riga, Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, Düsseldorf, Danzig, Mayence, Schwerin, Amsterdam and Prague. From 1868–1878 he was conductor at the Theatre 'an der Wien' in Vienna, retiring in the latter year to his villa at Pressbaum in the neighbourhood of Vienna. He was a clever writer of librettos, and often collaborated with F. Zell, writing some of his own books as well as others for Strauss, Suppé and Millöcker. The list of his own operettas, very few of which have attained more than an ephemeral success, is as follows :

'Der Geiger aus Tirol' (1857), 'Der Musikfeind' (1862), 'Die Generalprobe' (1862), 'Rosita' (1864), 'Der schwarze Prinz' (1866), 'Am Ruckenstein' (with Flotow, 1868), 'Der Seekadett' (1876), 'Nanon' (1877), 'Im Wunderlande der Pyramiden' (1877), 'Die letzten Mohikaner' (1878), 'Niada' (1880), 'Rosina' (1881), 'Die Zwillinge' (with Roth, 1885), 'Die Piraten', 'Die Dreizehn' (1887).

He also wrote many partsongs, among which one for male voices, 'Italienische Salat,' is most amusing in its travesty of the older style of Italian operas sung to nonsense words. (Riemann's Lexikon; Opern-Handbuch; Baker.)

GENERALI, PIETRO (b. Masserano, near Vercelli, Oct. 4, 1783; d. Novara, Nov. 3, 1832), opera composer. His real name was Mercandetti, but his father, becoming bankrupt, changed his name and removed to Rome. Pietro studied music under Giovanni Massi, a pupil of Durante, and soon wrote masses and church music. In 1800 he produced his first opera, 'Gli amanti ridicoli,' after which he travelled to Southern Italy, and coming back to Rome in 1801 composed a cantata, 'Roma liberata,' and two operas, 'Il Duca Nottolone' and 'La villana al cimento.' These were followed by 'Le gelosie di Giorgio' (Bologna, 1802); 'Pamela nubile' and 'La calcolaja' (Venice, 1803); 'Misantropia e pentimento,' after a play of Kotzebue's; 'Gli effetti della somiglianza' (ibid. 1805); and 'Don Chisciotto' (Milan, 1805). These are for the most part opere buffe; and an attempt at opera semiseria, 'Orgoglio e umiliazione' (Venice), was a failure. In 1807 he wrote 'L' idolo cinese' for the San Carlo, and 'Lo sposo in bersaglio' for Florence. Many other comic operas were well received in Venice, especially 'Adelina,' a farce, 'La moglie di tre mariti,' and his chef-d'œuvre, 'I Baccanali di Roma' (Venice, 1815). In the meantime Rossini had come to the front, and Generali's popularity suffered. In 1817 he accepted a position as conductor of the theatre at Barcelona, but returned to Italy in 1821. Ultimately he withdrew to Novara, and accepted the post of maestro di cappella to the cathedral. In his retirement he studied Rossini's style, appropriating as much of it as he could; and in 1827 reappeared, first at Trieste and then at Venice, where his 'Francesca di Rimini' (Dec. 26, 1829) was a total failure. He returned to Novara. His operas number in all more than 45. He also wrote much church music, an oratorio, masses, etc. Generali's reputation, says Fétis, rests on his having been the first to employ certain harmonies and modulations of which Rossini took advantage. In fact he was the true precursor of Rossini, but the latter possessed genius, while Generali had only talent. An 'Elogio' of him by C. Piccoli was published at Novara in 1833.

GENET, ELZÉAR (b. circa 1470; d. Avignon, June 14, 1548), French composer and priest surnamed by the Italians, 'Il Carpentasso,' of Carpentras, as he called himself. From an interesting memoir by Chanoine Requin, Elzéar Genet dit Il Carpentasso (Mémoires de l'Académie de Vaucluse, 1918), the following information may be gathered concerning his scanty biography.

Genet's first stay at Rome, under the pontificate of Julius II., was in 1508, his name figuring in the list of the Papal singers. It is also known he was at the French court of Louis XII., and Rabelais mentions him with other musicians in 'Le quart Livre des Faicts et Dits héroïques de Noble Pantagruel' (1552). His second stay at Rome dates from 1513, under Pope Leo X., when he directed the Papal Chapel as 'Magister Capellae.' There would appear to be no foundation for the title of bishop (in partibus) bestowed on him by Fétis and Baini. All the titles, honours and prebendaryships that Genet obtained in his lifetime were granted to him by briefs of Leo X. The list is long: Dean of Saint-Agricol, Canon of the Metropolitan churches of Avignon and Aix, Prior of Châteauneuf-lès-Magnelonne, Saint-Étienne de Tourves, etc., Vicar of La Palud, Meyreste, etc. He left Rome in 1521, and he is inscribed as Dean of Saint-Agricol, Avignon, on Mar. 24, 1522. His third and last sojourn at Rome was under the pontificate of Clement VII., Easter 1524. He heard his Lamentations so incorrectly performed that he scarcely recognised them and decided to give a new version of them. The experience induced him to publish his works. In the last years of his life he was nominated Canon of Saint-Didier, Avignon, Dec. 13, 1542, and on May 29, 1548, he was present at the chapter of the canons at the Metropolitan Church. He died of a painful disease from which he had been suffering since 1527, and was buried at Saint-Agricol. His will and death certificate are given in the above-mentioned memoirs. Of detached pieces by Genet in the various collections of the time, we know very few. Two motets from the first and third books of the 'Motetti della corona' (Petrucci, Fossombrone, 1514), two psalms from the 'Psalmorum selectorum tom. ii.' (Petreius, Nuremberg, 1539), and a few 2-part motets printed by Gardane in 1543,¹ a slender legacy, if in truth these had been all the works—and they were very nearly being all—that were to come to us; for Genet's position and the powerful patronage he enjoyed made him independent of the usual collections and publishers, and enabled him to bring out his works in an exceptional way, which almost resulted in their being lost to posterity.

It was only in modern times that a copy, the only complete one known at present, of four splendid volumes, printed by De Channey for Genet at Avignon, was found in the State Library at Vienna. These books are remarkable for being the first to introduce Briard's new types, in which the notes are round instead of square and diamond-shaped, and, what is much more important, ligatures are abandoned, and the complicated system in which the same notes have different meanings at different times gives place to a simple method, such as we use at present, in which the notes bear at all times a fixed ratio to each other. This improvement, first introduced in the publication of Genet's works, may, we think, be fairly attributed to his suggestion. Of the four volumes (complete at Staatsbibl., Vienna; incomplete at Paris Conservatoire) printed by Jean de Channey of Avignon² with the new types invented by BRIARD (q.v.), the first, 'Liber primus missarum,' and the second, 'Liber Lamentationum,' appeared in 1532. The third, 'Liber hymnorum,' appeared probably between 1532 and 1533; and the fourth, 'Liber cantici Magnificat,' not a posthumous work as was believed, might be assigned to 1537.³ The first contains five Masses: 'Se mieulx ne vient,' 'A l'ombre dung buissonnet,' 'Le cueur fut mien,' 'Fors seulement' and 'Encore iray je jouer'; the second volume contains Lamentations; the third, Hymns for the principal Church festivals of the year; and the fourth, a collection of Magnificats. Solemn and dignified, unbending and severe in style, Genet nevertheless won the sympathy of his Roman colleagues, who indeed valued so highly and cherished so long the works he gave them that fifty years after his death nothing less than the special command of Pope Sixtus IV. could shake their firm adherence to his 'Lamentations' or cause them to recognise in place of them those of the popular Palestrina. Much of Genet's music was written in the short intervals of comparative health allowed him by an agonising complaint which attacked him in the ear and brain, was beyond the experience of his physicians, and embittered the last years of his life.

GENOVEVA, opera in 4 acts, words after Tieck and Hebbel, arranged by Robert Reinick, and the composer; music by Schumann (op. 81). Produced Leipzig, June 25, 1850; in English, by the pupils of the R.C.M., Drury Lane Theatre, Dec. 6, 1893.

GENTILI, GIORGIO, violinist in the Ducal Chapel at Venice, c. 1708–14, composed 12 concerti a 4 (1716); 12 concerti da camera; sonate a 3: 2 vln. e v'cl. with bass op. 1 (Q.-L.).

GENTLE SHEPHERD, THE. A Scottish pastoral play which may be said to have had the same standing in Scotland as 'The Beggar's Opera' has obtained in England. As in 'The Beggar's Opera,' the popular tunes of the day were employed for the songs, but it preceded the English opera by a couple of years.

'The Gentle Shepherd' was written by Allan Ramsay; and was first published, dedicated to Susanna, Countess of Eglinton, in 1725, though five years before some fragments had been included among his poems. The pastoral deals with the loves of two shepherds, Patie, the Gentle Shepherd, in love with Peggie, and Roger, a rich young shepherd, in love with Jenny. The other characters are Sir William Worthy, Mause, an old woman supposed to be a witch, and some few rustics, male and female. It is entirely in verse, interspersed with songs, the airs of which are the Scottish tunes that were then commonly known, and the whole is in the Scottish dialect. The pastoral had immense success in Scotland, and countless editions of it have been published. Of these the finest is that one, in large quarto, with aquatint illustrations by David Allan, issued by Foulis, of Glasgow, in 1788; reprinted in 1798 and 1808.

In 1730 Theophilus Cibber anglicised 'The Gentle Shepherd'; and as 'Patie and Peggie, or the Fair Foundling,' it was acted at Drury Lane, as a ballad opera.

Other versions have also been put upon the stage, including one by Cornelius Vanderstop, acted at the Haymarket, in 1777. A more important revival than this was one altered by Richard Tickell, with the music arranged by Thomas Linley; this was produced at Drury Lane in 1781. Others, which were probably not acted, were English translations, one by Dr. Ward, 1785, and another by Margaret Turner, 1790.

The scene of Ramsay's 'Gentle Shepherd' has been a matter of dispute; Ramsay gives the locale as 'A Shepherd's Village, and fields some few miles from Edinburgh.'

In 1808 there was published, anonymously, in Edinburgh, a bulky work, in two volumes, 'The Gentle Shepherd, a pastoral comedy with illustrations of the Scenery.' This is adorned with charming copper-plate engravings and a map, the text very logically following each scene of the pastoral, and identifying it with sundry parts of the Pentland Hills near Newhall, twelve miles or so westward of Edinburgh.

GENVINO, FRANCESCO, an early 17th-century composer, of Naples, who composed 5 books of madrigals a 5 v. His known books are: book 2 (1605); book 3 (1612); book 5 (1614). Single numbers are in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

GEORGES, ALEXANDRE (b. Arras, Feb. 25, 1850), studied at the École de Musique Religieuse (Niedermeyer), where he carried off the first prizes for organ, piano and composition, as well as diplomas as maître de chapelle, and organist, awarded by the State. Georges has written music for two plays by Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, 'Le Nouveau Monde' (1883) and 'Axel' (1894), for 'Alceste' (Odéon, 1891); an opéra-comique in one act, 'Le Printemps,' was performed at the Ministry for Public Works, in 1888, and later at the Théâtre Lyrique; a three-act 'opéra lyrique,' 'Poèmes d'amour' (Bodinière, 1892); 'Charlotte Corday,' lyric drama in three acts (Opéra Populaire, May 6, 1901); 'Miarka,' comédie lyrique, four acts (Opéra-Comique, Nov. 7, 1905); as drama, two acts (Opéra, Jan. 16, 1925). Among his concert works, his 'Chansons de Miarka' (1899), taken from J. Richépin's 'Miarka la fille à l'Ours' (v. and PF.), have been orchestrated (v. and orch.), and are some of the most beautiful of modern French songs, and his symphonic poems, 'Léila,' 'La Naissance de Vénus,' 'Le Paradis perdu,' etc., have added to his reputation. Other works by him are: 'La Passion' (1902); 'Les Chansons de Leilah' (1907); 'Myrrha' (1909); 'Sangre y sol,' lyric drama (Nice, Mar. 1, 1912); 'Trois Chansons anglaises de Thomas Carew' (1913).

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC

Roy. App. 23, 25. Fragments of lugal and other movements, a 4, in lute and acory.
B.M. Add. MSS. 31,390/30. 'Chera la fontayne,' for 5 viols.

It is probable that Gerarde lived and composed in England for some time. Roy. App. 17-22, 23-25, 49-54 belonged to John, 6th Baron Lumley (d. 1609), and some of them, at an earlier date, to 'Crouder of Crouder's Hill.' Roy. App. 31-35 belonged to Henry Fitzalan, 18th Earl of Arundel (d. 1580). Gerarde's single chanson in B.M. Add. MSS. 11,583 is bound up with other secular compositions by Newark, Turges, Sheryngham and Fayrfax. A duplicate copy of this is in B.M. Add. MSS. 34,071, a mid-16th-century collection of chansons in score by 'Philippe de Vuilre,' Adrian Willaert, Clemens non Papa and others, and is designated as by '[D.] Gerardus, 1550.' In the Roy. App. 23-25 collection, vol. iii. contains the following inscriptions in the motet section :

- (1) 'John Theodoricus.'
(2) 'fnis qd Master Redford.'

The second of these refers to John REDFORD (q.v.), who was a contemporary of Gerarde. What connexion (if any) Redford had with Gerarde, or what indeed Redford had to do with these volumes, is not known : they are all in a hand quite different from his (as at B.M. Add. MSS. 29,996). J. M^r.

GERARDY, JEAN (b. Spa, Dec. 7, 1877), Belgian violoncellist, began his studies when 7 years of age under Bellmann, a pupil of Grützmacher and member of the famous Heckmann Quartet. In 1885 he entered the Verviers Conservatoire, made rapid progress, and was already a graduate in 1888. Before this he had made occasional appearances as a soloist near home (at Liège where his father was professor at the Conservatoire, at Aix-la-Chapelle, Lille and elsewhere), but it was in the year 1888 that he definitely adopted the career of travelling virtuoso, fulfilling his first engagement at a concert at Nottingham in which Ysaÿe and Paderewski also took part. His next appearance was in London, where he gave several successful recitals and was spoken of as the successor to Piatti in classical music. Tours in France, Germany, Russia, the United States and Australia followed, during which he was heard chiefly in solos, though in America he occasionally took part in concerted music, playing quartets under Ysaÿe and Marteau and trios with Kreisler and Hofmann. w. w. c.

GERBER, (1) HEINRICH NICOLAUS (b. Weingen-Ehrich, Schwarzburg, Sept. 6, 1702; d. Sondershausen, Aug. 6, 1775), son of a peasant, studied at the University of Leipzig, where his love of music found encouragement in the teaching and conversation of Sebastian Bach; in 1728 he was organist at Heringen, and in 1731 court organist at Sondershausen. Here for the first time he felt himself safe, as, on account of his extraordinary height, he had been constantly pursued by the recruiting officers of Frederick William I. He composed much for clavier, organ and harp; a complete Choralbuch, with figured basses; and variations on chorales, long and widely used. He also made musical instruments, and planned many improvements and new inventions. Among others a kind of 'Strohfiedel' or xylophone, harpsichord-shape, with a compass of four octaves: the keys liberated wooden balls which struck on bars of wood, and thus produced the notes. From 1749 Gerber was also court secretary.

Hisson, (2) ERNST LUDWIG (b. Sondershausen, Sept. 20, 1746; d. there, June 30, 1819), one of the most famous of musical lexicographers, learned singing and clavier from his father, and studied music from an early age. In 1765 he went to the University of Leipzig, but returned home in order to assist his father in his offices, and succeeded him on his death. He then entered on those labours which finally conducted him to an end he himself scarcely contemplated, and by which he has earned the gratitude of all lovers of music. His love of musical literature suggested to him the idea of making a collection of portraits of musicians, for which he wrote biographies, mainly on the authority of Walther's Lexikon (1732). As Walther was at that time out of date, he procured the necessary additions, obtained biographical sketches of living musicians, took journeys, and tried to fill up the gaps by consulting all the books then in existence on the subject. Thus the idea suggested itself of adapting Walther's work to the wants of the time, and of writing a completely new work of his own, which eventually became the Historisch-biographische Lexikon der Tonkünstler (2 vols. Leipzig, Breitkopf, 1790 and 1792) translated into French by Choron (1810, 1811). While writing musical articles¹ and reviews for various periodicals (Erfurter Gelehrten Zeitung; Leipziger A. M. Z. from 1798, etc.) he received from all quarters corrections and information of all kinds, which enabled him, or rather made it his duty, to prepare an enlarged edition. Accordingly his Neues hist.-biogr. Lexikon der Tonkünstler appeared in 4 vols. with 5 appendices (Leipzig, Kühnel, 1812, 1814). This new edition did not supersede the former one, to which it often refers the reader, but rather completed it. Gerber took pains to keep up with the times, recorded events for after use, was continually making additions to his collection of books and music, and composed industriously pianoforte sonatas and organ preludes. Hoping to keep together the collection he had made at the cost of so much labour and pains, he offered it for sale to the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna, with the solitary stipulation that he should retain it during his own life. The price was fixed, and the negotiation completed in Jan. 1815, but he still continued his additions, encouraged doubtless by the knowledge that his treasures would be in safe keeping, in a city so famed for its musical tastes. He was still court secretary at Sondershausen when he died. C. F. P.

GERBERT VON HORNAU, MARTIN (b. Horb on the Neckar, Aug. 12, 1720; d. St. Blaise, May 13, 1793), an eminent writer on the history of music. He received a thorough literary education, including music, at Lud-wigsburg. In 1737 he entered the Benedictine monastery of St. Blaise in the Black Forest, was ordained priest in 1744, and appointed Prince-Abbot, Oct. 15, 1784. Historical research, especially in music, was his favourite pursuit, and a taste for this he endeavoured to infuse into the convent. The library afforded him ample materials, and much valuable matter hitherto unused. But this was not enough. Between the years 1759 and 1765 he travelled through Germany, France and Italy, making important discoveries, and establishing relations with various learned societies. His acquaintance with Padre Martini at Bologna was of special service to him. Their objects were closely connected—Gerbert's work being a history of church music, Martini's one of music in general. In 1762 Gerbert published his prospectus in Marburg's Critische Briefe, and invited contributions, which were furnished him in abundance. The first volume was nearly complete when a fire at the monastery in 1768 destroyed all the materials which had been collected; in 1774, however, the complete work appeared at St. Blaise, in two vols. 4to, with 40 engravings, under the title De cantu et musica sacra a prima ecclesiae aetate usque ad praesens tempus, a book which has ever since formed the foundation of all musical scholarship, although naturally requiring much correction at the present day. A description of it appears in Forkel's Geschichte der Musik, which without Gerbert's work would possibly never have been written, or would at any rate have been published later and in a far less complete form. Ten years after, in 1784, appeared Gerbert's second great work, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum, 3 vols., also printed at St. Blaise; a collection of treatises by the most important writers on music, afterwards continued by Coussemaker. A reprint of this appeared in 1905. Three more works, also printed at St. Blaise, deserve special mention, Iter alemanicum, accedit italicum et gallicum (1765; 2nd ed. 1773; German ed. by Kochler, Ulm, 1767), which contains the account of his travels, and abounds in interesting particulars; Vetus liturgia alemannica (2 vols., 1776); and Monumenta veteris liturgiae alemannica (2 vols., 1777). He also made the Latin translation of Opusculum theodiseum de musica, a treatise in four chapters written in old German by Notker (Labe) a monk of St. Gall in the 10th century (see Becker's Literatur der Musik, p. 68). His other writings are mainly theological. Some offertories of his composition were published at Augsburg. A 'Missa in Coena Domini' by him is printed at the end of De cantu et musica sacra. In 1787 the abbot obtained the consent of the chapter to banish all instruments but the organ from the church, and thenceforth nothing was heard but the Gregorian chant, or simple 4-part masses with organ accompaniment.

Gerbert realised the ideal of virtue and industry in his illustrious order; his gentle character and engaging manners secured the friendship of all who came in contact with him. Bonndorf (four leagues from St. Blaise, and the chief town of the principality) is indebted to him for a hospital and house of correction, over the entrance of which is the inscription 'Dedicated by Martin II. to the poor, and to the improvement of mankind.' He also built the fine church of the Convent (after the model of the Pantheon at Rome), and founded and endowed an orphanage for the five surrounding districts. The peasants of the neighbourhood, of their own accord, erected his statue in the market-place of Bonndorf, a most unusual tribute of respect. His memory still lives in the district. Carl Ferdinand Schmalholz, the able musical director of the Cathedral at Constance, possessed an excellent half-length oil picture of Gerbert. (See Mus. T. for Nov. and Dec. 1882, which contains an admirable essay on Gerbert by Professor F. Niecks, based on such sources as Schlichtegroll's Nekrolog auf das Jahr 1793, and Sander's Reise zu St. Blasien, 1781.) C. F. P.

GERHARD, LIVIA, see FREGE, Mme.

GERHARDT, ELENA (b. Leipzig, Nov. 11, 1883), has attained a position as one of the foremost Lieder singers (soprano) of Germany. She studied at the Leipzig Conservatorium under Mme. Hedmondt, but it was Arthur Nikisch who formed her style, and on several of her early appearances she had the great advantage of singing to his piano accompaniment. She was first heard in England in June 1906, and in America in 1912. Her frequent tours since on both sides of the Atlantic have established her fame as an interpreter of Schumann, Brahms and other German masters. c.

GERHARDT, PAUL (b. Gräfenhainichen, Saxony, Mar. 12, 1607; d. Lübben, May 27, 1676), Dean of Nicolaikirche, Berlin, 1657; resigned (1666) on account of doctrinal disputes, and became Archdean of Lübben in 1669. He was the author of certain famous chorales, e.g. 'Befehl Du Deine Wege,' 'Nun ruhen alle Wälder,' 'O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden,' etc. (See CHORAL.)

GERICKE, WILHELM (b. Graz, Styria, Apr. 18, 1845; d. Oct. 1925), orchestral, choral and operatic conductor, studied at the Vienna Conservatorium, 1862–65, chiefly under Dessoff. On leaving the Conservatorium he went to Linz as conductor, remaining there till offered the second conductorship of the Hofoper in Vienna in 1874. At the opera he was associated with Hans Richter. In 1880 he became conductor of the Gesellschaftskonzerte, and also took the leadership of the Singverein in the Austrian capital. He remained thus employed until 1884, when he went to America, and for five years conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, declining a re-engagement on account of his health. Returned to Vienna, he again became conductor of the Gesellschaftskonzerte, and continued in the office until 1895. After three years of rest he accepted a reappointment as conductor of the Boston orchestra, whose great efficiency was largely due to his indefatigableness and skill as a drill-master, his conscientious devotion to high ideals, and his remarkable sense of euphony and tonal balance (see BOSTON). He resigned from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1906 and retired to Vienna. He was the composer of an operetta, 'Schön Hannchen' (Linz, 1865), a Requiem, a concert overture, many solo songs and choruses, and considerable chamber music.

GERLACH, DIETRICH (d. Nuremberg, 1575), a famous 16th-century music printer. From 1566-71 he was in partnership with Ulrich Neuber, and continued alone till his death, when his widow carried on the business until 1592. A catalogue of his publications appeared at Frankfurt-on-M., 1609 (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GERLE, the name of a Nuremberg family of lute-makers and lutenists. (1) KONRAD (d. 1521), lute-maker, had a more famous son, (2) HANS, whose books on the lute and fiddle have historical importance. He published in 1532 a book of instructions for the viol and the lute entitled Musica teusch auf die Instrument der grossen und kleynen Geygen auch Lautten. A second part appeared in the following year, and a second edition, 1537. It is quoted by John Dowland in the short treatise on lute-playing appended to Robert Dowland's Varietie of Lute-lessons (1610). A further edition, with additional examples, was printed in 1546, under the title Musica und Tablatur auff die Instrument der kleinen und grossen Geygen, etc. In 1552 Gerle published Ein neues sehr kunstliches Lautenbuch, containing compositions by distinguished lutenists in tablature. There are copies of these three books, all of which are now of extreme rarity, in the State Library at Berlin, and in the British Museum. This Hans calls himself, from 1552 onwards, 'the Elder.' It is believed, therefore, that another (3) HANS (d. 1570) was his son and was also a lutenist.

GERMAN, EDWARD (originally EDWARD GERMAN JONES) (b. Whitchurch, Shropshire, Feb. 17, 1862), distinguished as the composer who carried on, as far as it could be carried on, the vogue of English light opera established by Sullivan.

He was educated at Bridge House School, Chester, until 1878, when he returned to Whitchurch. Here he spent much time in organising a local band, which used to perform at village concerts. While arranging and composing the music for this band, he taught himself the violin. At the beginning of 1880, he went to Shrewsbury to study with Walter Hay; in September of that year he entered the R.A.M., with the organ (under Dr. Steggall) as principal study. In the following year he took the violin as principal study, under Weist-Hill and Alfred Burnett. In 1885 he won the Charles Lucas medal with a Te Deum for chorus and organ, and became a sub-professor of the violin. His principal composition, while at the R.A.M., was an operetta, 'The Rival Poets,' performed at St. George's Hall, Dec. 21, 1886. This work showed very remarkable power of writing graceful and really comic music, and on its revival by the pupils of the R.A.M. at the same hall on Mar. 7, 1901, its success was emphatic. He left the R.A.M. in 1887, and was made an Associate. For a little more than a year German led the life of an orchestral violinist. At the close of 1888 he was engaged as musical director of the Globe Theatre, under the management of Richard Mansfield, and his first great opportunity came in the production of the incidental music to 'Richard III.' This, the first of a long series of compositions for plays, was at once hailed as something a good deal better than what theatre-goers were as a rule accustomed to hear, and in the form of orchestral suites, arrangements and extracts, many of the compositions for plays have obtained universal and lasting popularity. From the second theatrical composition, the music for 'Henry VIII.' at the Lyceum (1892), the 'Shepherds' Dance' and other numbers at once caught the ear of musical people and the general public, and have maintained their popularity ever since. A rather similar set of dances written for Anthony Hope's 'Neil Gwynn' (Prince of Wales's, 1900) rivalled the dances from 'Henry VIII.' in popularity.

Although so much in request for the theatre, German did not neglect symphonic music; since the production of his first symphony in E minor, at the Crystal Palace in 1890, many orchestral suites, symphonic poems, etc., have been brought forward, mostly at the provincial festivals of the autumn, and always with great success. Conspicuous amongst them is the 'Welsh Rhapsody' for orchestra, in which four fine folk-melodies are woven into a rich orchestral texture. Apart from the orchestra, it is curious to see how, although himself a violinist, he has favoured the wind instruments, as in his charming 'Suite' for flute and piano, a serenade for wind instruments, another serenade for tenor voice with accompaniment of piano and wind, and many other compositions.

When Sir Arthur Sullivan's last opera, 'The Emerald Isle,' was left unfinished at his death (1901), German was commissioned to finish it, and his part of the work was done with such remarkable skill that with the production of his charming 'Merrie England,' it seemed as if the success which the Savoy Theatre had enjoyed for so long under Sullivan was to be continued under German; this might indeed have been so if the younger man had been strong enough to resist the various influences which allowed interpolations into the score of this and of his next work, 'A Princess of Kensington' (1903). The cultivated section of the public which had hailed the new composer as the legitimate successor of Sullivan (and it must be admitted that German had contrived to give them something quite as good as Sullivan, while preserving his own individuality), naturally resented the liberties taken with the pieces, and the career of the theatre as the constant home of national light opera of a high class ceased with this work. Nevertheless German's later essays in light opera, 'Tom Jones' (1907) and 'Fallen Fairies' (1909), the latter with a libretto by W. S. Gilbert, though by no means one of his best, did something to revive the genre. German's music leans to what is light and graceful rather than to what is strongly emotional or tragic; but his ideas are original, their expression is always exquisitely refined, and his skill of orchestration is remarkable. He writes admirably for the voice, and it is no wonder that his songs are as popular with singers and musicians as they are with the public. He was made a Fellow of the R.A.M. in 1895, and a member of the Philharmonic Society in 1901. The following is a list of his principal compositions:

LIGHT OPERAS

- * 'The Rival Poets' (operetta with accomp., 2 pianos). (1886.)
- * 'The Emerald Isle' (with Sullivan). (Savoy, 1901.)

GERN, AUGUST, was foreman to Cavallé Coll of Paris, and came over to London to erect the organ built by the latter for the Carmelite church at Kensington. Having set up on his own account in London in 1866, he built an organ for the French church near Leicester Square, besides many excellent instruments for churches and private houses. v. de p.

GERNESHEIM, FRIEDRICH (b. Worms, July 17, 1839; d. Berlin, Sept. 10-11, 1916), eminent player, composer and conductor, born of Hebrew parents. His ability might have tempted him to become a virtuoso of the piano, but he preferred a different path, and at the Conservatorium of Leipzig under Moscheles, Hauptmann, Rietz and Richter, during the years 1852-55 underwent a thorough musical education. He followed this up by a residence in Paris. Later he was successively at Saarbrück (1861); Cologne, as professor of pianoforte, counterpoint and fugue (1865); Rotterdam, as conductor of the 'Erudition Musica,' and of the Theatre (1874). In 1890-97 he was a teacher at the Stern Conservatorium and director of the Sternscher Gesangverein till 1904; he was made a member of the senate of the Royal Academy of Arts in Berlin. His works include 4 symphonies (G minor, E flat, C minor, 'Miriam,' and B flat), an overture, 'Walde-meisters Braufahrt,' concertos for violin and pianoforte, and many choral works, such as 'Salamis,' 'Hafis,' 'Wächterlied an der Neujahrsnacht 1200,' 'Preislied,' 'Nornenlied,' 'Phöbus Apollo,' 'Agrippina,' etc. His chamber music consists of 3 quartets and 2 quintets, for piano and strings; 2 trios, one of which, in F (op. 28) was often given at the Popular Concerts (St. James's Hall, London); 3 violin sonatas, 2 string quartets, and a string quintet.

GERO, JHAN (? 1518-53). For some time it was thought that Jhan Gero and Maistro Jhan were one and the same person, and under this impression Féti's records that Gero was maestro di cappella first at Orvieto Cathedral, and afterwards to the Duke of Ferrara. The latter part of the statement certainly applies to Maistro JHAN (q.v.) and not to Gero. That there were two composers is shown by their compositions being always kept quite distinct, a primo libro de madrigali by Jhan Gero and one by Maistro Jhan were published at Venice (Ant. Gardane) in 1541. Collections of various compositions contain works by both, as in Selectissimas cantiones, Augsburg, 1540; Electiones diversorum metetorum, Venice, 1549; and the Sextus tomus evangeliorum, Nuremberg, 1556.

LIST OF WORKS

Jhan Gero. Il primo libro de madrigali italiani et canzoni francese, a due voci. Novamente composti, etc. Aggiuntovi alcuni canti di M. Andriano, e di Comst. Festa, 1541. Exceudelat Venetia, apud Antonium Gardane. Duo primi, di Jhan Gero. Obl. 4to, pp. 56. The 'cantus partbook in the Vienna Hofbibl. Eighteen editions of this book appeared down to 1687.

In Collections:

1. Selectissimae necnon familiarissimae cantiones. Augsburg, M. Kriestein. 1540. Jhan Gero: 'Io v' amo and' for three voices.

2. Trium vocum cantiones centum a praestantiss. divers. nationum. Toni prim. Northbergae, J. Petreus, 1541. (contains thirty-two Italian songs by Jhan Gero (see Eitner, Bibliop. for text).

3. Di Constantio Festa. Il primo libro de madrigali a tre voci, con la gloria de quarante madrigali di Jhan Gero, etc. 1541. Venetia. Ant. Gardane. The title-page appears to be incorrect. Possibly thirty-nine madrigals were composed by Jhan Gero; of these, thirty-two were certainly his. Four of the madrigals in this volume were reprinted in the 1543-51 56-64-68 editions.

4. Il secondo libro de li madrigali de diversi eccellentiss. autori a misura di breve. A quattro voci. Venetia. Ant. Gardane. 1543. Contains fourteen madrigals by Jan Gero. Another edition was published 'Venetia, G. Scotto, 1552.'

5. Electiones diversorum notetorum distincte quatuor vocibus. Venetia. Ant. Gardane. 1549. Jhan Gero: 'Dens qui sedes' and 'Tibi derelictus.'

6. Musica quatuor vocum, quae materna lingua Moteta vocantur. Venetia. H. Scotum. 1549. Six motets by Jhan Gero.

7. Il vero terzo libro di Madrigali de diversi autori a note negre 'a qu tro voci.' Venetia. 1549. Jhan Gero: 'Felice l' alma,' 'Una ragazz' una.'

8. Madrigali a tre voci de diversi eccellentiss. autori. Libro primo. Venetia. Ant. Gardane. 1551. And in 1556-59-61-69-67 editions. Nine madrigals by Jhan Gero.

9. Evangelia dominicorum et festorum dierum musica numeris. Toni prim. Northbergae. 1554. Joan. de Gero: 'Hodie Christus auctus est' for five voices.

10. Sexatus totius evangeliorum. Northbergae. 1556. Joh. Gero: 'Pecentum me quotidie' and 'Deus in homine tuo' for four voices.

11. Selectissimorum tricenarium (Bassus). Northbergae. 1559. Thirteen Italian madrigals by Joan. Gero.

12. Musica libro primo a tre voci di Adrian Willard, Cipriano de Rore, Archadelt, Jhan Gero, etc. Vinegia. Scotto. 1566. Five madrigals by Gero, from the 1551 Madrigali a 3 voci, q.v.

13. Della scelta di madrigali de più eccellenti autori de' nostri tempi a tre voci. Libro primo. Firenze. G. Marscatelli. 1582. Jhan Gero: 'Alia dolce ombra,' 'Iste gratie celesti.'

14. Richina, sive cantiones suavis. duarum vocum. Antverplae. P. Phaleusius. 1590. Giovan. Gero: 'Au joly son du chansonet,' 'Non si vedra giamai,' 'Quand je boy du vin.'

MSS.

In the Berlin Konigl. Bibl.: some madrigals in MS. T. 141. In the Bologna Liceo Musicale: motets by Joan Gero, 'O magnum mysterium (a 4), 'Vox de coelis' (a 4), 'O sacrum convivium' (a b) in a codex inscribed '1518 a di 10 di giugno,' which if correct is an earlier date for Gero than is to be found elsewhere. It is a year before the first appearance of a motet by 'Maistre Jhan' (see Parisini's cat. iii. 3).

In the B.M.: A madrigal for 2 v., 'Non si vedra giamai' in Add. MSS. 3054, p. 218. Three for 2 v.: 'Refuses d'aimer,' 'Quand l'estoie à marier,' 'Tant que j'irai en cage.' In Add. MSS. 31,406, copied 'from a MS. written in ye year 1551, and weh. belonged to Wallerus Erlé one of the Gentlemen of ye Bedchamber to K. Henry ye 8th.' Two of the madrigals for 2 v. from the 1546 edition, 'Phillida mia,' and 'Au joly son du chansonet' in Add. MSS. 34,071, ff. 14b, 15.

Gero's compositions have been reprinted in Stanford Smith's Musica antiqua, p. 134, 'Phillida mi plic hel' (a 2) from the 1546 edition.

In Peter Wagner's 'Das Madrigal und Paestina' (Viertelj.) viii. 478), three from the Madrigali de diversi autori a quattro voci, 1543.

In Luigi Torchi's L'arte musicale, 1897, vol. 1, four compositions for four voices. Two from the Madrigali de diversi autori, 1552; one from Il vero terzo libro, 1549, and 'O beatum pontificem' from Musica quatuor vocum, 1510. C. S.

GERSHWIN, GEORGE (b. New York, Sept. 26, 1898), began his career as pianist to a firm of music publishers. This brilliant pianist successfully composed many musical plays and songs including the famous 'Swanee.' In his first serious work, a 'Rhapsody in Blue,' the composer conceives a no longer 'blatant' Jazz as the expression of one definite and vital part of American life; not Negro, a popular supposition; and crystallises this fact by using 'Jazz' incidentally as he uses syncopation. The second work, a concerto in F (for PF. and orch.) is a distinctive and original contribution to American musical literature (1st perf. Carnegie Hall, N.Y., Dec. 3, 1925, under Damrosch).

WORKS.—Musical Plays: 'La La Lucille,' Stop Flinging, 'Primrose,' 'Tell me more,' 'Lady be Good,' 'Tip Toes,' 'Song of the Flame,' 'Rhapsody in Blue,' New York Concerto.

GERSON, JEAN CHARLIER DE (real name, CHARLIER) (b. Gerson, near Rethel, France, Dec. 14, 1363; d. Lyons, July 12, 1426), a learned theologian and chancellor of Paris University. In his writings (republished Amsterdam, 1706) are the treatises, De laude musices; De canticorum originu ratione; and descriptions of musical instruments (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GERSTER, ETELKA (b. Kaschau, Hungary, June 17, 1855; d. Aug. 20, 1920), singer, pupil of Mme. Marchesi at Vienna, made her début, in Jan. 1876 (Illustr. Zeitung), at Venice as Gilda and Ophelia, with great success. She played next at Genoa and Marseilles, and in Feb. and Mar. 1877 at Kroll's Theatre, Berlin, with her sister Mme. Bertha Kausser Gerster at an Italian season there under the direction of Signor Pietro Gardini. She made a great success there, and subsequently at Pest, where she married Gardini; she also appeared at the Silesian Festival at Breslau. On June 23 of the same year she made her début at Her Majesty's as Amina, and became an immediate favourite, remaining there for four seasons until 1880 inclusive.

In 1878, 1883 and 1887, she sang in opera and concert, in America. She also sang with great success at the Birmingham Festival of 1879. On May 29, 1890, she reappeared in London, at Covent Garden, as Amina, but her vocal powers were impaired. In 1896 she opened a school of singing at Berlin; among her pupils was Frau v. Dulong.

GERVAIS, CHARLES HUBERT (b. Paris, Feb. 19, 1671; d. there, Jan. 15, 1744), Intendant of the Music of the Duc d'Orleans, 1716; second, —afterwards first—master of the Royal Chapel, 1726. He composed two operas, an opera ballet and a number of motets and airs (Q.-L.; Fétis).

GERVAIS, LAURENT (b. Rouen, end of 17th cent.), at first music teacher and member of the Academy at Lille; then music publisher at Paris. He wrote a 'Méthode pour l'accompagnement du clavecin' (1733). E. v. d. s.

GERVAISE, CLAUDE, a 16th-century viol-player in the chamber music of Francis I. of France who wrote six books of 'Danceries à quatre et cinq parties,' whereof books 3-6 (published by Attaignant, 1550-56) are in the National Library, Paris. Twenty chansons (4 v.) are contained in collective volumes of 1542-1553 (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GERVASIUS DE ANGLIA, a 15th-century English composer. Four (or five?) of his songs are in Codex 37, Liceo, Bologna, and one in Codex 92, Trient Cathedral (Q.-L.).

GESE or GESIUS, BARTHOLOMÄUS (or more familiarly Barthel Gösse) (b. Müncheberg, near Frankfort-on-the-Oder in Brandenburg, c. 1555; d. 1613 or 1621).¹ Like many of the older Lutheran cantors he was first a student of theology. He was cantor at Frankfort from at least 1595 to his death. His works, like those of Michael Praetorius, are important as covering the whole field of the liturgical music of the older Lutheran Church, and showing the thoroughly liturgical character of the older Lutheran service with its mixture of Latin and German and its combination of plain-song and vocal polyphony, before first the church cantata and then the organ-accompanied chorale had swallowed up everything, and before pietism and rationalism between them had destroyed interest in the artistic development of a proper church music in Lutheran or Protestant Germany. His more important works are as follows:

1. 'Historia vom Leiden und Sterben unsers Herrn Jesu Christi,' etc. (Passion according to St. John for two to five voices), Wittenberg, 1588. This work was reprinted by Commer in his edition of Lassus, and appears also in Schöberlein's 'Schatz des liturgischen Gesanges.'

2. Hymni scholaestici . . . 4 v. (adjectae quaedam precationes 3 voc. una cum cantionibus Gregorianis), 1597. Two editions appeared, with 37 and 41 numbers respectively.

3. Psalmodia choralla continens Antiphonas, Psalmos, Responsoria, Hymnos, Introitus, etc. additis Lamentationibus quae Vesperis in hebdomada Palmiarum . . . 1630. 631 plain-song melodies to Latin and German texts.

8. Magnificat 6 et 8 ton . . . Insertis cantionibus aliquot natalitibus . . . Resonet in laudibus, In dulci jubilo, etc. (It was a favourite custom at Christmas in Lutheran churches to sing the Latin Magnificat with Christmas carols inserted between the verses. It was in a similar fashion that Bach's Magnificat was originally produced at Leipzig. See Rittner, J. S. Bach (Eng. tr. vol. II, pp. 369-374).

9. Rittner enumerates a large number of occasional compositions, chiefly for weddings and funerals, after the custom of the time. Gesse also published in 1615 a theoretical work entitled 'Synopsis musicae practicae,' with numerous examples of hymns for four voices.

Besides the 'St. John Passion,' Schöberlein's 'Schatz' contains a large number of Gesse's four- and five-part settings of German Chorals.

GESTEWEITZ, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH (b. Prieschke, Saxony, Nov. 3, 1753; d. Dresden, Aug. 1, 1805), a pupil of Joh. Ad. Hiller, whose daughter he married. He was Kapellmeister at the opera buffa, Dresden, and composed masses and some operas. E. v. d. s.

GESUALDO, DON CARLO, PRINCE OF VENOSA (b. Naples c. 1560; d. Naples, 1613), nephew of Alfonso Gesualdo, Archbishop of Naples, is important as a modernist among madrigal composers.

Gesualdo was probably a pupil of Pomponio Nenna of Bari, the madrigalist, learning composition and the playing of various instruments from him. He became a skilled lutenist, his proficiency on that instrument being acknowledged through all Italy. In 1586 he married a noble Neapolitan lady, Donna Maria d'Avalos. After three years² a love affair with a certain Don Fabrizio Caraffa, Duke of Andria, excited the jealousy of the husband, and Donna Maria was murdered with her lover by Gesualdo's orders. This event took place in 1590. Gesualdo is next heard of in 1594 at the court of the Estensi at Ferrara. The meeting-place of Ariosto and of Tasso, visited for a shorter or greater length of time by Josquin des Prés, Brumel, Palestrina, di Lasso, Willaert and di Rore, Ferrara was, at the time of Gesualdo's appearance there, the most brilliant cultural centre of late-Renaissance Italy. The Duke Alfonso II. of Este was a magnificent patron of the arts, not only protecting but practising that of music. In 1594 Gesualdo married Donna Eleonore d'Este. In this year there appeared his first and second books of five-part madrigals. The third was published in 1595, the fourth in 1596, the fifth and sixth in 1611. The Duke of Ferrara, last of his line, died in 1597, and with him the gaiety of Ferrara came to an end. Gesualdo stayed on there for some time, and later returned to Naples, where he gave himself up for the remainder of his life to musical activities. In 1613 there appeared the

The first four books of madrigals (1594-96) attest Gesualdo as a composer adequately schooled in the contemporary conventions of composition. These works seem to have enjoyed a large amount of popularity, for the first and fourth books had each three reprints, the second had five, and the third two.⁴ Those madrigals that are still available are seen to be thoroughly sound examples of constructive skill, full, also, of delicate vocal characterisation that is ever in close affinity with the verbal utterance. Ariosto, Guarini and, most signally, Tasso all excelled in depicting the depth and temperature of sorrow. And in these early madrigals Gesualdo manifests a fine susceptibility in adding music to what Tasso has uttered. His musical training had been directed in the ways of the great madrigalists of the past. The important changes that were preparing at the time of the publication of these early books of madrigals cannot have left him untouched. Like Monteverdi he was well grounded in the classics of his art. Like that master, again, the liberating influences of his time affected him powerfully. It is not recorded that he had any direct communication with the Bardi group in Florence. But it is improbable that he was unaware of the forward movement in preparation there. The evident difference in style and substance between the four early books and the later fifth and sixth points to a definite crystallisation of ideas and aims.

The fifth book of madrigals was once reprinted (1614), likewise the sixth (1616). In 1626 Muzio Effrem, formerly in Gesualdo's service, issued a posthumous set of six-part madrigals. These works, from 1611 onwards, are the most noteworthy that have reached posterity from Gesualdo's hand. They stand not only in advance of their time as regards the technique of musical composition, but also far apart from any contemporary effort in their astonishing directness of presentation. The treatment of the words is as individual as that of the voices and as worthy of close consideration. It will be found that the emotions which are most profoundly emphasised are, as a rule, those deep-seated, comprehensive ones of pain, sorrow, happiness, joy and so forth. A more subtle division of the feelings is not attempted. Whether or not this treatment is deliberate or merely accidental does not affect the case in any great degree. The result is sufficiently monumental to be its own justification. There is here, especially in the later madrigals, an almost static presentation. Short phrases, ejaculatory of strong emotion, alternate with passages of pure contrapuntal writing. In these former short phrases the harmonic element is stressed. The parts move in blocks of voices through, or rather over, chords whose relationship may sometimes be found to reside in a pivotal note, and often not to exist at all. In the madrigal 'Moro lasso al mio duolo' (see Burney's General History), all these methods can be noted. The madrigal opens with three bars of changing harmonies answered in the fourth bar by strict contrapuntal motion. This procedure continues throughout the work. At the words 'Ahi che m' accide' the two methods join forces for the space of three bars, the phrase starting in what would now be called the key of C minor being stated in perfect simplicity and swiftly deflected in such a way as to end in C sharp major.

In approaching such works as these by Gesualdo the mind must be purged of all the implications of modern harmonic method. Rightly to gauge the significance of this composer it is necessary to realise that music during the time of his apprenticeship had hardly begun to move out of the straightened bonds of modal deportment. That novelty which even now startles us in the madrigal from the sixth book, quoted above, consists to a large extent, though not wholly, in the unwonted freedom of harmonic activity. It is this seemingly irrational disregard of the existing laws of harmony that was first to be felt in the works of such composers as Vicentino. Gesualdo, far more audacious than his predecessors or even his contemporaries, sums up all previous effort, going, with swift decisiveness, ahead of what had been, until then, but tentatively tested. He was the contemporary of Peri, Caccini and Monteverdi. And even as Monteverdi outstripped Peri and the Florentines in the domain of dramatic music, so Gesualdo outdistanced them all in the ease with which he moved among his strange new sounds, already employing them as a well-tryed medium, fundamental to his main purpose of expressing manifold sensation through the agency of the madrigal.

Gesualdo founded no school, and seems to have had no followers to carry on the inspired methods he professed. Historically his position is important as being that of one whose ability was large enough to translate the harmonic tendencies of the most advanced of his own and past ages into terms of high art. In comparison with the attempts of a Vicentino or of so forward a spirit as John Bull, the achievement of Gesualdo is revealed as that of a poet by whom the means of harmonic progression were directed towards a higher spiritual end, one which he did not fail to attain with an ever-increasing frequency.

GEVAERT, FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE (b. Huyse, near Oudenarde, July 31, 1828; d. Brussels, Dec. 24, 1908), historian and 'musicologist'; former director of the Brussels Conservatoire was also a composer.

His father, a baker, wished to bring him up to his own trade, but his great musical ability becoming apparent, he was sent in 1841 to the Conservatoire at Ghent, where he studied under Sommere and Mengal. He was then appointed organist of the Jesuits' church, and in 1846 a Christmas cantata of his composition was performed in Ghent. In June 1847 his psalm 'Super flumina' was performed at the festival of the 'Zangverband'; and Spohr, who was present, congratulated the young composer. In the previous May he had won the first prize for composition at the national competition in Brussels, but was allowed to postpone his foreign tour for two years, during which he produced in Ghent his first opera, 'Hugues de Somerghen' (Mar. 23, 1848), followed by 'La Comédie à la ville,' at Brussels, a decided step in advance. In 1849 he started on his tour, and after a short stay in Paris proceeded to Spain, where he composed an orchestral fantasia, 'Sobre motivos españoles.' His reports on Spanish music, regularly forwarded to the Ministre de l'Intérieur, were printed in the bulletin of the Académie de Brussels for 1851. From Spain he went to Italy, and returning through Germany reached Ghent in the spring of 1852. On Nov. 27 of that year he produced 'Georgette, ou le Moulin de Fontenoy' with Vaez and Royer, performed at the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris, Nov. 28, 1853; and on Oct. 7, 1854, 'Le Billet de Marguerite,' in 3 acts, libretto by Leuven and Brunswick—both with extraordinary success. 'Les Lavandières de Santarem' (Oct. 25, 1855), however, was a fiasco. Gevaert received the order of Leopold for his cantata 'De nationale verjaerdag,' composed in honour of the fifth anniversary of King Leopold's reign. 'Quentin Durward' (Mar. 25, 1858), 'Le Diable au moulin' (May 13, 1859), 'Château Trompette' (Apr. 23, 1860) 'La Poularde de Caux' (Palais Royal, May 17, 1861, with other composers) and 'Le Capitaine Henriot' (Dec. 29, 1864) were all successes at the Opéra-Comique in Paris. So also was 'Les Deux Amours,' opéra-comique, at the theatre of Baden-Baden, July 31, 1861. A cantata 'Le Retour de l'armée' was performed at the Opéra, Aug. 15, 1859. Other important compositions are a Requiem for male voices and orchestra; 'Jacques van Artevelde,' ballads, choruses, etc.

In 1867 he was appointed 'directeur de la musique' at the Paris Opéra, a post he retained till the closing of the theatre (Sept. 1870) on account of the Franco-German war. From that time he devoted his attention to the history of music, and in 1875 brought out the first part of his Histoire et théorie de la musique dans l'antiquité (Henzel, Paris, one vol. 8vo), a work remarkable for much new matter, the result of careful and original research. This had been preceded by his Leerboek van den Gregoriaenschen zang (Ghent, 1856), his Traité général d'instrumentation (1863) and Les Gloires d'Italie (Paris, 1868), a collection of secular vocal music by Italian composers of the 17th and 18th centuries, with introduction and biographies, etc. The Traité général d'instrumentation, revised as Nouveau Traité général d'instrumentation (Paris 1885; translated into German by Riemann, Spanish by Neuparth, Russian by Rebikov, English by G. F. E. Suddard), is an outstanding treatise on its subject, second only in importance to that of Berlioz. A second part, Cours méthodique d'orchestration (2 books), followed in 1890.

Among his works are Recueil de chansons du XV^e siècle (1875) and other editions of old compositions; Les Origines du chant liturgique (1890); La Mélodie antique (1895); La Musique, l'art du XI^e siècle (1896); Les Problèmes musicaux d'Aristote (1899-1902); Exécution musicale (1906). His researches were finally summed up in his Traité d'harmonie, théorique et pratique (pt. i. 1905; pt. ii. 1907). In 1871 he succeeded Fétis as director of the Conservatoire at Brussels; a post which gave scope for his remarkable powers of organisation. Under his direction the Conservatoire became famous for its well-planned curriculum and its teaching by an able staff. One of his reforms consisted in placing the singing-classes under the annual inspection of some celebrated singer. Faure was the first engaged. In 1873 Gevaert was elected a member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts in place of Mercadante; an appointment hailed with satisfaction in France. He was created a baron some months before his death, on the composition of a national hymn for the Congo. Gevaert was incontestably a musician of a very high order; and his fame rests on the solid foundation of a thoroughly good early education. G. C., with addns.

GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS, see LEIPZIG (2).

GHERARDELLO (GHIRARDELLUS DE FLORENTIA), one of the foremost representatives of the new school of composition which sprang up in Florence in the 14th century; he composed madrigals, caccias and ballads. His fine caccia 'Tosto che l' alba,' was republished in Intern. Mus. Gesellschaft, vol. iii, 4 (1902), and Riemann, Handbuch d. Mus.-Gesch., i. 2, p. 324, etc. (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GHERARDESCHI, FILIPPO MARIA (b. Pistoja, c. 1738; d. Pisa, 1808), pupil of Padre Martini, wrote his first opera bouffe for Lucca in 1763, which was followed by a number of others. In 1769, on the occasion of a visit of the Grand Duke Leopold of Tuscany, his opera 'I due gobbi' was given at Pisa with great success, which caused his nomination as maestro di cappella of the Conventual Church of the Cavalieri, and shortly afterwards also of the grand-ducal chapel. He also became the music-master of the Princes and Princesses, and had a great reputation as harpsichord-player. He remained at the court under Leopold's successor, Ferdinand III., and afterwards served under Louis I., King of Etruria, on whose death he composed a Requiem Mass which was considered one of his finest works. He composed several other masses, a pianoforte sonata, songs, etc. (Q.-L.; Fétis).

GHERSEM, GERY DE (b. Tournay before 1570; d. there, May 25, 1630), pupil of Philip Rogier; went to Spain 1596 as Kapellmeister of the Imperial Chapel; returned before 1604, when he was at the court of the Governor-General of the Netherlands; 1611, court Kapellmeister, Brussels; 1614, he became a canon at Tournay. He composed masses, motets, etc. E. v. d. s.

GHEYN, VAN DEN, a renowned Flemish family of bell-founders originally of Malines, where they began their business, which was subsequently continued at Louvain, Turnhout, Nivelles and St. Trond.

Their names through many generations are to be found on the bells of numerous carillons, amongst which may be mentioned Nymegen, Louvain, Oudenarde and Malines. During the war (1914-18) many of the Van den Gheyn bells were destroyed, notably at Turnhout and Termonde.

Although as bell-founders they are held in the highest esteem, the greatest member of the family was undoubtedly (1) MATTHIAS (b. Tirlémont, Apr. 7, 1721; d. June 22, 1785), organist, carillonneur and composer. He was appointed organist of St. Peter's Church, Louvain, in 1741, and in 1745 secured by public competition the post of town carillonneur of Louvain, which he held until his death. His duties in connexion with the latter appointment may be enumerated, as they are much the same as those of the official carillonneur of to-day. He had to play on market days and on all special public occasions; he was responsible for the upkeep of the automatic playing of the carillon by the clock, to ensure its efficiency and also to set new tunes on the chime barrel as required by the authorities. His stipend was 100 'pattacons' per annum, but extra fees were paid for private festivities.

His reputation as a carillonneur was great, and it is recorded that he was particularly skilled in the art of extemporisation. It was his custom to begin his carillon recitals with a brilliant extempore fantasia, and it is probable that no player since his day has attained such virtuosity save Josef Denyn, the present city carillonneur of Malines and the director of the School of Carillon Playing in that city.

As a composer he is of the Handelian school, and his works are written in the idiom of his contemporaries, and resemble the composition of Arne. Some of his preludes are carillon music in its most artistic form, amongst which may be mentioned 'The Cuckoo,' edited by Miss Fanny Davies.

Chev. van Elewyck collected 51 compositions of Matthias. Of these three were printed:

- (1) Fondements de la basse continue, etc. (Louvain.)
- (2) 12 Petites sonates pour l'orgue ou le clavecin et violon.
- (3) 6 Diversiments pour clavecin. (London.)

The others in MS. consist of a second treatise on harmony and composition, preludes and fugues for organ, sonatas for clavecin, airs, rondos, marches, minuets, fugues, etc., for carillon.

Elewyck, with the collaboration of Lemmens, the famous organist, issued in 1863 a volume of pieces selected from these, published by Schott. His work is out of print.

Matthias was succeeded by his son (2) JOSSE THOMAS (b. 1752) as organist of St. Peter's Church. W. W. S.

G H I B E L (GHIBELI GHIBELLINI), ELISEO (b. Osimo, Ancona, c. 1520), maestro di cappella at S. Sacramento, Ancona, until 1581. In 1554 and 1565 he lived at Naples, and in the interim he appears to have been for some years at Messina as maestro di cappella. He composed madrigals, motets, introtius missarum, canzoni. (See list in Q.-L.)

GHISELIN, JEAN, a 15th-16th century Netherlands composer; one of the best masters of his time, whose work is full of grace and fantasy. A number of masses, motets, songs, etc., were published by Petrucci between 1501-42. The error of his identification with Jo. Verbonnet has been explained by Ambros.¹ (See also Q.-L.)

GHIZEGHEM, HAYNE VAN (also called HEYNE, or AYNE), singer in 1453 at Cambray Cathedral (?); in 1468 singer at the court of Charles the Bold. Morelot (De la musique au X^e siècle, p. 10) reproduces a poem in which Ghizeghem is mentioned in conjunction with Morton, when both accompanied their songs richly with bass instruments. Several of his chansons are in MS. collections in various libraries, and in printed collective volumes of 1501, 1538 (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GHIZZOLO, GIOVANNI (b. Brescia), a Franciscan monk; maestro di cappella of Prince of Correggio in 1613, of Cardinal Aldobrandini at Ravenna in 1618; and at St. Antonio, Padua, in 1622. He retired to Novara, 1625. Q.-L. gives a list of his numerous still extant sacred and secular compositions which appeared between 1609-40.

GHRO, JOHANN (b. Dresden, 16th cent.), was organist to the Churfürstl. Schule of S. Affran, in Meissen, Saxony, in 1604-12, and in 1625 Musik-director and organist of the Kapelle of Rudolph von Bünaw at Wessenstein. He published pavans and galliards, which are described as plain and heavy in style.

GIACOBBI, GIROLAMO (HIERONYMUS JACOBUS) (b. Bologna, c. 1575; d. there, Nov. 30, 1630), maestro di cappella St. Petronio, Bologna, Aug. 18, 1604. In 1615 Adr. Banchieri founded the Accademia dei Gelati, the members of which used to meet at Giacobbi's house. He composed several dramatic works, but few have survived in MS. He left, however, a large number of published motets, psalms, vespers, hymns and other church compositions. (See Q.-L. and Riemann.)

GIACOMELLI, GEMINIANO (b. Parma,¹ c. 1686; d. there, Jan. 19, 1743), pupil of Capelli. His opera 'Ipermestra', produced at Parma and Venice, 1704, was so successful that the Duke sent him to Alessandro Scarlatti for further studies. Between 1724-39 he produced 19 operas with great success. He was for some time at the court at Vienna. His 'Cesar in Egitto' (Milan, 1735) is considered his best work. He also wrote some concert arias and a psalm for 2 tenors and a bass. (See list in Q.-L.)

GIACOMETTI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA DEL VIOLINO, one of the earliest 16th-century violin virtuosi, often referred to without his family name. He lived in Rome from 1571 until

GIAMBERTI, GIUSEPPE (b. Rome, 15—), a pupil of Nanino and Paolo Agostino. He was maestro di cappella at Orvieto Cathedral in 1628, and at S. Giovanni Maggiore in 1629. He wrote several important works of church and secular music, some 'to sing or play,' published 1623-1689. (For list and further particulars see Q.-L.)

GIANETTINI, ANTONIO (b. Venice, 1649; d. Modena, Aug. 1721), maestro di cappella at the court of the Dukes of Este from May 1, 1686. His first opera was produced at Venice, 1676. He composed operas, cantatas, oratorios, psalms, motets, etc. (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GIANNI SCHICCHI, opera in 1 act; text by Gioachino Forzano; music by Puccini. Produced Metropolitan Opera House, New York, Dec. 14, 1918; Costanzi Theatre, Rome, Jan. 11, 1919; Covent Garden, June 18, 1920; in English, British National Opera Co.; Theatre Royal, Glasgow, Nov. 7, 1923.

GIARDINI, FELICE DE (b. Turin, Apr. 12, 1716; d. Moscow, Dec. 17, 1796), an eminent violinist. He entered the choir of Milan Cathedral as a boy, and became a pupil of Paladini in singing, composition and the harpsichord. He afterwards returned to Turin, and studied the violin under Somis. He was still very young when he entered the opera-band at Rome, and soon afterwards that of San Carlo at Naples. In possession of a brilliant execution, he appears to have been fond of displaying it by interpolating in the accompaniments of the airs all sorts of runs, shakes and cadenzas, and thereby eliciting the applause of the house. Of this habit, however, he was cured in an emphatic manner. During the performance of an opera by Jommelli, the composer came into the orchestra and seated himself close to young Giardini. Giardini, anxious to give the maestro a proof of his cleverness, introduced into the ritornello of a pathetic air a brilliant cadenza of great length, at the end of which Jommelli rewarded him with a sound box on the ear. Giardini in after years was fond of relating this incident, and used to add that he never had a better lesson in his life.

From Naples he started in 1748 for a tour through Germany and thence to London. The date of his first public appearance here is variously given.² According to Burney it took place in 1750, at a concert of Cuzzoni's. His success was immense, and Burney affirms that no artist, Garrick alone excepted, was ever so much applauded as Giardini. His powerful yet mellow tone, the brilliancy and boldness of his execution, the spirited and expressive style in which he played the grand works of Tartini, as well as his own lighter but pleasing composi sions, created a perfect furore, and he became at once the declared favourite of the London public. In 1751 he started subscription concerts with the oboist Thomas Vincent. After Festing's death in 1752, Giardini took the place of leader at the Italian Opera, and appears to have infused new life and spirit into the band, which had much deteriorated under Festing's languid leadership.

In 1756 he undertook the management of the Italian Opera, but thereby suffered great losses. Nevertheless we find him as impresario in 1763, 1764 and 1765. After this he devoted himself once more to playing and teaching the violin, and leading at concerts and musical festivals. At this period F. Cramer became his formidable rival, though the two remained on most friendly terms. From 1770-76 he was leader at the Three Choir Festivals, from 1774-1780 at the Pantheon Concerts, and in 1782 and 1783 once more at the Italian Opera. In 1784 he left England, apparently resolved to retire from public activity and spend the rest of his life in Italy. But his restless spirit brought him back to London in 1790, when he started a comic opera at the Haymarket. This proving a failure, he went with his troupe to Russia, and died at Moscow.

Although Giardini's star went down as soon as Salomon and Cramer became his rivals, his influence on musical and operatic life in England was considerable. He brought out a number of operas, though with little success. He composed the second part of an oratorio, 'Ruth,' in 1763, the first part being by Avison and the third by Boyce. In 1765 and 1768 he wrote the other two parts, and his work was several times performed in London. He was the composer of the once popular hymn-tune called 'Moscow.' His numerous chamber compositions include :

- Nine sets of Six Violin Solos (sonatas) (opp. 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 16, 19, Violin Duets (opp. 3, 5).
- Six Sonatas for Piano and Violin (op. 3).
- Twelve Violin Concertos (opp. 4, 5, 15).
- Seven sets of Trios for stringed Instruments (opp. 2, 4, 13, 17, 20, 26, 28).
- Six Quintets for strings (op. 11).
- Eighteen Quartets for strings (opp. 22, 23 and 29).

GIBBONS. The name of a noted family of English musicians in the 16th and 17th centuries. (1) WILLIAM (d. Cambridge, 1595). The date of his birth is unknown, and his origin and parentage have not as yet been traced. In 1567 he was admitted as one of the 'waits' of the city of Cambridge, an appointment that at that period provides evidence that he was a skilled musician, either as a singer or instrumentalist, or both. From about the year 1573 until his death he lived in the parish of Holy Trinity, Cambridge; his name was among the 'parish councillors' in 1574 and again in 1578, and four of his children were baptized in that church. He was buried at Holy Trinity on Oct. 26, 1595. His will was proved in the Archidiaconal Court of Cambridge on Nov. 13 following. His widow died in Apr. 1603. He left four sons, EDWARD (2), ELLIS (3), Ferdinando and ORLANDO (4), and four daughters, three of whom married. Of Ferdinando nothing further is known.

(2) EDWARD (b. circa 1570; d. circa 1650), was the eldest son of William. He graduated B.Mus. at Cambridge and was incorporated in the same degree at Oxford in 1592. Early in the year 1593 his name first appears in the Weekly Lists of King's College, Cambridge, as a lay-clerk with a salary of 20s. In the following Christmas term he received an addition of 11s. 8d. to his salary on succeeding Thomas Hammond as master of the choristers. The office of organist is nowhere mentioned in connexion with either Hammond or Gibbons in the records at King's. In the autumn of 1598 Hammond resumed his place as master of the choristers, and the name of Edward Gibbons disappears from the lists. John Walker, writing in 1714,¹ states that Gibbons was brought to Exeter by Bishop Cotton when he was first appointed to the see. His appointment was in Nov. 1598. It is not unlikely that Walker's statement is true, and it is not known otherwise what became of Gibbons when he left Cambridge. The statement that he became precentor and organist of Bristol Cathedral was made by Anthony Wood, and copied by most historians; but recent research proves beyond doubt that he never held office at that cathedral. The statement that he was in holy orders is also disproved. Walker, indeed, mentions that Cotton brought Gibbons from Bristol, but he does not say the cathedral. In the will of Ellis Gibbons, in 1603, Edward was described as 'of Acton,' but no explanation of this description has been discovered.

In any case it would seem that Edward Gibbons was already working at Exeter before 1607, and in 1609 he was, beyond all doubt, appointed a 'priest-vicar' of Exeter Cathedral, a special dispensation for his appointment having been granted by his patron, Bishop Cotton. In 1615 he was appointed successor and duly installed. He was also chosen from time to time custos of the College of Vicars-choral, an office to which all the 'vicars,' priest and lay, annually elect one of the priest-vicars, but in spite of this evidence of their confidence, the fact that he was a layman was the subject of a formal protest to Archbishop Laud's commissioners in 1634, and he was also on this occasion accused of neglecting his duties. The protest had little effect upon his position, which he seems to have retained until his death; but the records during the years of the civil war are very incomplete, and nothing definite is known about him after the year 1634. Walker states that he lived to over 80 years of age and was twice married, in each case to a wealthy lady.

He had several children, two of whom were born before he left Cambridge. It was Walker, too, who was responsible for the story that he presented Charles I. with £1000 'when under his distresses.'

Very little of Edward Gibbons's music survives. In the British Museum is an organ prelude to an anthem, 'How hath the city sate solitary.' A three-part anthem, 'Awake and arise,' is at Ch. Ch., Oxford, and also a setting of the Kyrie and Creed to go with William Mundy's 'short' service. There is an 'In Nomine' a 5 in the Bodleian Library.

(3) ELLIS (b. Cambridge, 1573; d. May 1603), second son of William and Mary Gibbons, was baptized at Holy Trinity, Cambridge, on Nov. 30, 1573. He was singularly honoured by Morley, who included two of his madrigals, 'Long live fair Oriana' (Hark, did you ever hear) and 'Round about her charret' in 'The Triumphes of Oriana.' No other composer except Morley himself contributed more than one number to this famous collection. No other composition, sacred or secular, by Ellis Gibbons is known to exist to-day.

Historians, following Anthony Wood, have unanimously stated that he was organist of Salisbury Cathedral, but this is apparently untrue. No trace of his name can be found at Salisbury, either in the registers or in the Chapter Act books or in the 'Clerk of Fabrik' accounts. The Act books are incomplete, but the 'Clerk of Fabrik' accounts cover the whole period in question and show that Richard Fuller was organist from 1592-98, that John Farrant then succeeded him until 1602, when John Holmes became organist. Ellis Gibbons was sole executor and residuary legatee of his mother's will, proved by him in Apr. 1603. His own will was dated May 14, 1603, and proved¹ on May 18. He left no children. He left property in Cambridge to his brother Edward, whom he described as 'of Acton,' subject to the life interest for his widow, Joan. In the printed index of P.C.C. wills he is described as of the parish of St. Benet's, Paul's Wharf, but the source of this statement is not mentioned and he is not so described in the will. The will was witnessed by his sister Elizabeth and her husband, James Dyer, and he gave a legacy to their daughter.

(4) ORLANDO (b. 1583; d. June 5, 1625) was the youngest child of William and Mary Gibbons of Cambridge. There is little reason to doubt that he was born at Cambridge, as stated by all historians as well as on the monument erected to his memory in Canterbury Cathedral; nevertheless, he was not baptized at Holy Trinity, Cambridge, but at St. Martin's, Oxford.² This fact was first noticed by Anthony Wood. The date recorded in the registers is Dec. 25, 1583. The parents may have been residing temporarily in Oxford. Be that as it may, it is scarcely conceivable that two children born that year bore the very unusual combination of names 'Orlando Gibbons,' and the absence of the name from the Holy Trinity registers removes the last vestige of doubt that this entry concerns the composer. Nor can there be any doubt about the identity of the Orlando Gibbons incorporated at Oxford on July 14, 1607, as 'M.A. of Cambridge.' Writers have submitted solutions of this problem without verifying the facts, for investigation of the Cambridge University registers shows that never in the whole history of the University did any one of this name take an Arts degree. The Oxford entry in 1607, therefore, contains an error, and Joseph Foster³ is without doubt right in supposing that M.A. was accidentally written for Mus.B. by the registrar, and that the famous composer is the subject of this entry.

Early in 1596, when just 12 years of age, Orlando Gibbons entered the choir of King's College, Cambridge, and his name appears regularly in the weekly lists of the College (not of the 'choir,' as sometimes stated) until the autumn of 1598. The lists provide no evidence of his having been senior chorister. During this time he was his brother's pupil, and the two brothers left the choir at the same time. But Orlando's connexion with the College was kept up. He matriculated in 1598 as 'a sizar from King's.' In the years 1602 and 1603 the 'Mundum books' of King's College show that he received fees for music composed for special occasions. On Mar. 21, 1604, when only just 21 years old, he was appointed organist of the Chapel Royal, and held this post for the rest of his life. In 1606 he took the degree of B.Mus. at Cambridge, and about this date he married Elizabeth, daughter of John Patten of Westminster; Patten was at this time a yeoman of the Vestry of the Chapel Royal, and shortly afterwards he became Keeper of the King's Closet. He died in 1623; Orlando Gibbons was his sole executor and inherited a moderate sum as residuary legatee. Gibbons at this period was living in the Woolstaple in Westminster where Bridge Street now stands, and all his seven children were baptized in St. Margaret's Church. As marks of royal favour he received handsome grants from the King and Queen in 1611 and 1615, and in addition to his appointment as organist of the Chapel Royal he succeeded Walter Earle in 1619 as one of his majesty's 'musicians for the virginalles to attend in his highnes privie chamber' at a salary of £46. He already held a somewhat similar appointment at a salary of £40. A receipt for a quarter's pay in connexion with this latter office is preserved in the British Museum (Add. MS. 33,965), and is valuable as providing an authentic example of the composer's autograph. This receipt covers the quarter ending Christmas day 1619. On May 17, 1622, when Camden founded the Chair of History at Oxford, the degree of Mus.D. was conferred upon Gibbons on the ground of his personal friendship with Camden. William Heyther, who founded the Chair of Music, was on the same occasion admitted to the degree of Mus.D., and not being a skilled musician, Gibbons's eight-part anthem, 'O clap your hands together,' was allowed to serve as Heyther's 'Commencement Song.' The 'Gostling' set of partbooks, now at York Minster, provide almost the only early text of this anthem, and in each book a note is appended referring to Heyther's use of this anthem. A score also belonging to Gostling and made for these partbooks is similarly endorsed. The score belonged recently to Dr. W. H. Cummings, and is now in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge.

In 1623 John Parsons, organist of Westminster Abbey, died, and Gibbons, who at the age of 39 had already enjoyed nineteen years of experience as organist of the Chapel Royal, was appointed in his place. Here he remained for the two years of life that were left to him. But during this short period he was responsible for conducting the music at one state function of the first importance, namely, the funeral of King James I. This was on Apr. 5, 1625. On that occasion he received as senior organist of the Chapel Royal, nine yards of 'blackes,' with two more for his servant. In less than two months after this Gibbons himself died. He was summoned with the whole of the Chapel Royal to attend the new King, Charles I., in state at Canterbury, where he was to await the arrival of his Queen, Henrietta Maria, from France. The royal marriage took place in Paris on May 1, the Duke of Buckingham representing the King as his proxy. The King arrived at Canterbury on June 1. For various reasons the arrival of the Queen was delayed, but she arrived at Dover on June 12. The next morning the King met her at Dover, and the same evening the bride and bridegroom reached Canterbury, where they stayed two nights before setting out for London. No ceremony connected with the marriage took place at Canterbury, nor is there any record of Gibbons being commissioned to write special music. The attendance of the Chapel Royal on the King on such an occasion of state was merely in accordance with ancient custom.

Meanwhile, before the arrival of the Queen, Gibbons was seized with an apoplectic fit and died on Whitsunday, June 5. He was buried the next day in Canterbury Cathedral, and a monumental tablet, surmounted by his bust (see PLATE XXVII.) and coat-of-arms (arg. a lion rampant sa. depressed by a bend, gu. charged with three escallops or), was placed on the north wall of the nave. A suspicion of plague was set at rest by a post-mortem examination by the two court physicians, which clearly describes the symptoms of apoplexy. Hawkins and others are in error in giving small-pox as the cause of Gibbons's death.

Letters of administration of his estate were granted to his widow on July 13, 1626, by the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.¹ Nothing further is known of the widow, who is thought to have died shortly after this date. The statement that her will was proved in July 1626 is an error. Gibbons had seven children, all of whom were baptized at St. Margaret's, Westminster. James, the eldest child, died in infancy; of CHRISTOPHER (5) more presently; Orlando, the youngest son, died unmarried at Exeter in 1650; the four daughters were Alice, Ann, Mary and Elizabeth.

A portrait of Gibbons, presented to the University by Dr. Philip Hayes, is now in the examination schools at Oxford. It is a copy of an original portrait once in the possession of Mrs. Fussell, widow of Peter Fussell, organist of Winchester; but this is unfortunately lost.

It is on his church music that the great reputation of Orlando Gibbons has been generally founded. He wrote no music for the Latin rites of the church, as far as is known, and in this matter he differs from all the great Tudor composers, for even those others wrote a few Latin motets who towards the close of the polyphonic period chiefly favoured the English rites. None of Gibbons's church music, except the two little anthems in Leighton's 'Teares or Lamentacions,' was printed in his lifetime, but Barnard in 1641 included in his 'First Book of Selected Church Musick' both Gibbons's services, his first Preces and Psalms and the following anthems: 'Almighty and everlasting God,' 'Deliver us' (both sections), 'Hosanna,' 'Lift up your heads' and 'Behold thou hast made my days.' This printed selection seems in early days to have precluded the rest of his work. Boyce in his 'Cathedral Music' retained of these only the F service, 'Almighty and everlasting God,' 'Hosanna' and 'Lift up your heads,' while he added 'O clap your hands,' and the spurious sanctus in F. The Boyce selection alone was available to keep Gibbons's name alive in cathedral circles for a century and a half after Boyce's time. Yet there are as many as forty anthems known to exist in addition to the Psalms attached to the Preces, among which 'Awake up, my glory' is definitely written in anthem form. Of these forty anthems it is remarkable that no more than fifteen are written in the purely polyphonic style, the remaining twenty-five are designed for chorus and verse or solo voices, the solo portions having an independent instrumental accompaniment, in some instances for strings and in others for organ. In his polyphonic work Gibbons can challenge comparison with any other composer of that school; on a big scale 'Hosanna,' 'Lift up your heads,' 'O clap your hands,' and 'O Lord in thy wrath' stand supreme; and there are seven little gems written for four voices, among which 'O Lord increase my faith' and 'Almighty and everlasting God' are of special beauty. In the verse anthem, which, if we may judge by numbers, Gibbons more particularly favoured, he was to a large extent experimenting. It is true that this form was exploited by others before him, notably by Byrd, but in reaching out so far as he did in this direction Gibbons marked out a new path which was destined to be more clearly defined in the light of increased experience by Blow, Pelham Humfrey and Purcell half a century later. He deserves all the credit that is due to the pioneer, even if his own reputation as a composer is slightly tarnished when these twenty anthems or so are subjected to detached criticism. His second Service, with its passages for solo and verse and its many elaborate features, stands in the same relation to the well-known polyphonic Service as the verse anthems do to the others. Yet in certain instances Gibbons attained success of a very high order in the new style, as, for example, in 'O all true faithful hearts,' very generally sung now to modern words, 'O thou central orb' and 'This is the record of John,' in which the declamatory features of the solo voice are treated with consummate skill. Gibbons wrote seventeen hymn tunes of exceptional dignity and purity. In 1873 Sir Frederick OUSELEY (q.v.) edited and published a collection of Gibbons's church music in as complete a form as was possible at that date. Early in 1925 volume iv. of the Carnegie Edition of Tudor Church Music was issued containing all that is known of his church music (including fragments) as shown in the list below.

In 1612 Gibbons published his set of 'Madrigals and Mottets of 5 Parts: apt for Viols and Voyces.' This set consists of twenty numbers, but as some of these are separate sections of single compositions, the number is really only thirteen. The term motet had not at this date the limited meaning which has in later days been imposed upon it, and Gibbons no doubt was using it here to denote the serious type of madrigal of which there are several examples in the set. Written of necessity in the polyphonic style these works represent Gibbons at his highest level of excellence. The choice of words reflects the austerity of the composer's mind. The suggestion, based upon a phrase in the dedication of the text, that his patron, the younger Sir Christopher Hatton, wrote the words is disproved by the fact that the authorship of seven of the twenty numbers can be identified among the poems of Sylvester, Spenser and Raleigh; the selection may have been made by Hatton. Space will only permit brief mention here of 'The silver swan,' which closely approaches the form of the lutenist's 'Ayre,' 'Dainty fine bird' and the splendid and stern 'What is our life?' as representing types of madrigals and 'mottets' in Gibbons's noble set. (See English Madrigal School, vol. v.) Gibbons was one of a small group of composers, with Weelkes and Dering, who made elaborate settings of the 'CRIES OF LONDON' (q.v.), using the traditional musical phrases associated with the cries. Gibbons's piece took the form of a fantasy constructed upon the traditional plain-song used by all the Elizabethan composers in their 'IN NOMINES' (q.v.). As far as is known Gibbons wrote no solo songs. The anthem 'The secret sins' is, however, a solo song with chorus.

Apart from his work as a composer, Orlando Gibbons was an executant of rare distinction, and was at the time of his death without a rival in England as a performer on the organ and the virginals; writing to Sir Dudley Carleton just after Gibbons's death, John Chamberlain described him as having 'the best hand in England.' As a natural consequence he wrote brilliantly for the keyboard instruments of his day. The only keyboard works of his that were printed appeared in the famous collection called Parthenia, which contained eight pieces by Byrd, seven by Bull and six by Gibbons, but more than forty of his keyboard pieces survive in MS. A modern edition of these, compiled by Miss Margaret Glyn, has been published in 5 vols. (Stainer & Bell).

It remains to speak of Gibbons's compositions for strings. In his lifetime a set of nine fantasies for three instruments was printed. The precise date of publication is unknown, and no record of them was entered at Stationers' Hall, but as they are described as the first music ever 'cut in copper' in England, they must have been produced before 1611, the date of Parthenia, and after 1606, for the composer is styled 'Batchelour of Musick.' The phrase on the title-page describing him as 'late' organist of the Chapel Royal cannot be explained and must be an error. There are nine pieces in this set and they are excellent examples of the fantasy form as the precursor of the fugue; they are characterised by a remarkable freedom in rhythmic design. They were reprinted for the Musical Antiquarian Society in 1843, and again, edited by the present writer, in 1924. There are fifteen more 3-part fantasies of the same character by Orlando Gibbons in manuscript in Marsh's Library, Dublin. Nos. 9-12 of these are also in the Christ Church (Oxford) Library. Two 4-part fantasies for strings at Christ Church and a pavan and galliard for six strings in Marsh's Library and the Bodleian Library are especially attractive; these have recently been published under the editorship of the present writer. The list of Gibbons's known compositions in this class, including four In Nomines and four 6-part fantasies is given below.

(5) CHRISTOPHER (b. Westminster, 1615; d. Oct. 20, 1676), second son of Orlando Gibbons, was baptized at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on Aug. 22, 1615. He was not 10 years old when his father died and is said to have been adopted by his Uncle Edward at Exeter. He received his early education as one of the children of the Chapel Royal. At Exeter he would have been the companion of Matthew Locke, with whom in later years he collaborated in writing the music for Shirley's masque, Cupid and Death. In 1638 he became organist of Winchester Cathedral, and on Sept. 23, 1646, he married at St. Bartholomew-the-Less, Mary, daughter of Dr. Kercher, Canon of Winchester and later Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral. Mrs. Gibbons died in 1662. Gibbons married secondly Elizabeth Ball. She survived her husband six years and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey on Dec. 27, 1682, the entry in the register being made in her maiden name, accidentally misspelt Bull. Christopher Gibbons was appointed organist of the Chapel Royal and private organist to Charles II. in 1660, and in the same year he became organist of Westminster Abbey. In 1663, at the special request of the King, he was admitted to the degree of Mus.D. at Oxford. He died Oct. 20, 1676, and was buried in the cloisters of the Abbey. His nuncupative will¹ was proved on Nov. 6 following. He left three daughters by his second wife. Both as an executant and as a composer he was much inferior to his father. He wrote a very large number of string fantasies of two and three parts and some anthems. These are to be found in MS. in the Bodleian Library, the British Museum, Ch. Ch., Oxford, the R.C.M., Marsh's Library, Dublin, and at Durham and Ely Cathedrals.

(6) RICHARD GIBBONS is a name appended to two fantasies for strings and are in Marsh's Library, (Z 3, Tab. 4, 1-6.) The same two fantasies are in the Bodleian Library (MS. Mus. Sch. C. 64-9), and in these partbooks in six cases the ascription is given as Mr. R. Gibbons, and in the other two cases as Mr. Gibbons. The compiler of the Bodleian Summary catalogue has assumed that R stands for Roland (Orlando), but there is no evidence for this, while the Dublin ascription gives the name Richard. If Richard Gibbons is the correct name of the composer of these two fantasies nothing at all is known of his personal history, but it may be an error for Richard Gibbs, organist of Norwich Cathedral, circa 1622-30. The Bodleian and Marsh MSS. may have a common origin and this would offer an explanation for the duplication of the error, if it be one.

GIBBS, CECIL ARMSTRONG (b. Great Baddow, near Chelmsford, Aug. 10, 1889), composer, was educated at Winchester and Cambridge (Trinity). At the latter he profited by the help of Edward J. DENT (q.v.), studied further at the R.C.M., and subsequently joined the staff as a teacher of composition there. Gibbs excels in the sensitive treatment of poetry in song, and he has been particularly successful in setting the lyrics of Walter de la Mare. His incidental music to Crossings, written for performance at a private school and there performed (1919), was his first introduction to the stage, and incidental music to Maeterlinck's The Betrothal (Gaiety Theatre, 1921) brought his work before the public. A comic opera, 'The Blue Peter' (libretto by A. P. Herbert), was awarded publication by the Carnegie Trust in 1924, and 'Midsummer Madness,' a comedy (Clifford Bax) with music, had a successful production at the Lyric Theatre, Hammer-smith, in July 1924. chamber music and the earlier songs see B. M. S. Ann. 1920. O.

GIBBS, RICHARD, English church composer of the first half of the 17th century, was organist at Norwich Cathedral in 1635. This date is given on the score of his anthem 'Have mercy' (Harl. 7340); but West (Cath. Org.) gives two query dates, 1622 and 1630, to define the period of his service there. There is some confusion as to the authorship of certain anthems by Gibbs, as a John Gibbs, described by Davey, in the index to his Hist. of Music, as 'of Westminster Abbey,' was composing about the same time: another Gibbs was organist at Hereford from 1595-57. The anthem included in Clifford's 'Collection' (1664) is the work of Richard, but the Gibbs who figures among the composers of the 40 In Nomines in the Bodl. Mus. Sch. is John Gibbs. Even the anthem referred to above is included in the Catalogue of Ancient Choral Services at Ely as by Richard (or John) Gibbs, but in the Parish Choir Collection (published in 1846 by the Society for Promoting Church Music) it is described as by Richard Gibbs.

GIBSON, GEORGE ALFRED (b. Nottingham, Oct. 27, 1849; d. Mentone, May 21, 1924), violinist, began the study of the violin at the age of 10 under his father. Studied afterwards under Henry Farmer, and made appearances as a soloist at the age of 12. In 1867 he came to London and played in the band at the Prince of Wales's Theatre; in 1870 he was a first violin in the Italian Opera at Drury Lane, a year later he joined the Covent Garden orchestra. He made his first appearance at the Monday Popular Concerts on Jan. 28, 1882, appearing at intervals until 1893, when on the retirement of Strauss he was appointed to the post of viola in the Quartet. On Nov. 5, 1893, he was appointed leader of Her Majesty's Private Band. He led the orchestra at the coronations of King Edward VII. and King George V. Gibson's reputation rests primarily on his concerted music-playing, in private as well as in public, and on his ability as a teacher. He was professor of the violin at the R.A.M., and the G.S.M. His portrait, painted by Olivier, was exhibited at the Royal Academy and presented to him. W. W. C.

GIGAULT, (1) NICOLAS (b. 1624 or 1625; d. circa 1707), a Paris organist, who was appointed organist of St. Nicholas des Champs c. 1652. In 1685 he published a large 'Livre d'orgue,' which shows him to have had encyclopædic knowledge of the organ music of his time. Gigault treated discord with boldness and ability. His organ book has been re-edited by Guilman and Pirro.

(2) JOACHIM (b. May 17, 1676; d. Mar. 1765), son of the preceding, succeeded his father as organist of St. Nicholas. F. R.

GIGELIRA, Italian for XYLOPHONE (g.v.).

GIGLI, (1) GIOVANNI BATTISTA, IL TEDESCHINO, a 17th-century composer at the court of Tuscany, and probably also of Este, as the MSS. of 2 oratorios, a cantata, and 6 trio sonatas by him are in the library at Modena. Gerber (2) mentions 12 sonatas composed for the Duke of Tuscany.

(2) INNOCENZO (b. Finale, Modena, Dec. 3, 1708; d. Aug. 13, 1772), composed oratorios (Q.-L.).

GIGOUT, EUGÈNE (b. Nancy, Mar. 23, 1844; d. Avenue de Villiers, Paris, Dec. 9, 1925), an eminent French organist, was educated at the maîtrise of the cathedral there, and entered Niedermeyer's École de Musique religieuse, in Paris, at the age of 13. He was one of Niedermeyer's favourite pupils, and subsequently married his younger daughter. At the Niedermeyer School he studied with Saint-Saëns (whom he often replaced at the Madeleine). He was professor in that school for upwards of twenty years, and, after a long interval, re-entered it in 1902 as professor of the organ. He became organist of Saint-Augustin in 1863, and during his tenure of that post made tours as a virtuoso on the organ in England, Germany, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, and played in Paris during the various international exhibitions. He enjoyed a great reputation as an extempore player. In 1885 he founded an organ school for organ and improvisation, subventioned by the State, an institution which has produced many distinguished pupils. In 1911 he succeeded Guilman as professor of the organ at the Conservatoire.

G. F., with addns.

A prolific composer, Gigout has written much vocal and church music, a meditation for violin and orchestra, a pianoforte sonata, etc. He is best known, however, by his admirable organ music, which comprises two albums of ten and twelve pieces, about 50 detached works (many being of considerable proportions), and over 400 short pieces, chiefly modal, with pedal ad lib., issued in three collections. In the last-named the variety and interest achieved in narrow space and by slender means is remarkable, and a large number of the pieces stand as model voluntaries and interludes. The style of Gigout's organ music, always scholarly and frequently austere, makes it as a whole more suitable for church use than for the concert-hall.

REEL.—Festivals & Eugene Gigout, containing biography by G. Fauré and catalogue of works (Paris, 1923).

GIGUE (GIGA) is an old Italian dance which derives its name (or vice versa) from the Giga, Gigue, Geige, or early fiddle. It was written indiscriminately in 3-8, 6-8, 3-4, 6-4 and 12-8 time, and was in two strains or sections, each of which was repeated. Its time was lively, and it was usually employed to finish up a suite. A good example is that which winds up No. 8 of Corelli's twelve solos.

Bach also employs them to close his suites, and has left an immense variety, not a few of which are in common time, as well as 9-16 and 12-16. The well known one in the partita in B_♭ is in 4-4, and that in the last partita of the same set in 8-4. Handel's sixteen suites contain thirteen giges, one of which contains 143 bars, and unlike most giges, is not divided into two sections. There was a convention that the second part of the gigue should be built on an inversion of the first subject. (See Spitta, J. S. Bach, Engl. tr. iii. 159.) Mozart has left a very fine little specimen (Köchel, p. 574) which he wrote in an album at Leipzig after a surfeit of Bach.

English Jigs seem to have no special characteristics. The word came to be synonymous with any light irreverent rhythm, giving the point to Pope's line:

'Make the soul dance upon a jig to heaven.'

GILBERT, HENRY FRANKLIN BELKNAP (b. Somerville, Massachusetts, U.S.A., Sept. 26, 1868), an American composer. He studied music in Boston, and for a time was occupied in business and in the study of French literature. In recent years he has devoted himself to composition, with the special purpose of utilising in music the idiom of the American negroes. In 1918 his symphonic ballet, 'The Dance in Place Congo,' based on Creole themes from Louisiana, was performed at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and then in Boston. Gilbert has also written numerous articles on musical subjects. His compositions include:

ORCHESTRAL

'Americanaesque,' based on 3 minstrel-tunes. (About 1903.)
'Cumbly-Overture on Negro Themes.' (1911, New York, Pittsburg, Boston, and often since.)
Three 'American Dances.' (1911.)
'Negro Rhapsody.' (1913, Norfolk Festival.)
Two 'Episodes,' 'Legend,' 'Negro Episode.'
Symphonic Prologue, 'Riders to the Sea,' after the tragedy of Synge, utilising studies in Celtic folk-music. (1915, Peterborough Festival.)
'Salammbo's Invocation to Tanith,' after Flaubert, for soprano and orch.
Six 'Indian Sketches,' for chorus and orch.
Hymn, 'To America.'
Symphonic Ballet, 'The Dance in Place Congo,' based on four Creole themes quoted by Cable.

PIANOFORTE

'The Island of the Fay,' after Poe.
'Indian Scenes,' 'Negro Dances.'

GILES (GYLES), NATHANIEL, Mus.D. (b. circa 1558, in or near Worcester; d. Windsor, Jan. 24, 1633), organist and composer, was the son of Thomas Giles, organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. It was formerly supposed that he was a chorister at Magdalen College, Oxford, but this is now discredited.¹ He may, however, have been a clerk in that chapel in 1577, but for one year only. He was organist of Worcester Cathedral, 1581-85. He graduated Mus.B. at Oxford, June 26, 1585, supplicated for his doctor's degree in 1607, but not having sent in his exercise, he did not receive it until July 15, 1622. On Oct. 1, 1585, he became clerk, organist and master of the choristers at St. George's Chapel, Windsor.² He was employed in a similar capacity at the Chapel Royal (1596), as an indenture of that date states 'that (Nathaniel Gyles, B.M.) shall have for his Life a Clerk's Place, and be one of the Players on the organ. . .'.³ On the death of William Hunnis in June the next year, he was officially appointed his successor as Gentleman and Master of the Children there, and held this post, as well as his Windsor appointment, until the time of his death. He was succeeded at Windsor by William Child, and was buried in one of the aisles of the chapel.

In the commonplace book of John BALDWIN (q.v.), there is appended an elaborate Lesson of Descent of thirtie-eight Proportions of sundrie Kindes, made by Master Giles, Master of the children at Windsor (reprinted by Hawkins in the appendix to his History of Music). GILLIER (GILLIERS), JEAN CLAUDE (b. Paris, c. 1667; d. there, May 30, 1737), for thirty years contrabass-player at the Paris Opéra; a friend of Montéclair. He wrote airs and incidental music for Regnard's and Dancourt's plays. His son, 'GILLIER THE YOUNGER,' appears to have lived in London, where he published several sets of sonatas and a harpsichord concerto between 1750-60.

GILLIER, JOHN, a 17th-18th century English composer of catches, contributed to Hilton's 'Catch that catch can' (1701, 1720, 1730), and the Catch Club, Edinburgh (Q.-L.).

GILLY, DINU, French-Algerian baritone, a pupil of Cotogni. Gilly appeared for the first time in England at Covent Garden on May 16, 1911, as Amonasro to the Aida of Emmy Destinn, and impressed at once by his dramatic style and the splendid resonance of his voice. Later in the season he sang Rana in the 'Girl of the Golden West' and Athanael in Massenet's 'Thaïs.' Gilly became a favourite at Covent Garden and sang there till the war caused opera to be closed down. Later, under Beecham, he made some appearances in opera in English, and though he could not hide his foreign accent his words were very clear. He has opened a singing-school in London.

S. H. P.

GILMAN, LAWRENCE (b. Flushing, New York, July 5, 1878), critic and author. He was educated in Hartford, Connecticut, but was self-taught in music. From 1901-13 he was musical critic of Harper's Weekly; in 1913 he occupied the same post on The North American Review. In 1923 he was appointed musical critic of the New York Tribune to succeed the late H. E. Krehbiel. For several years he has also written the programme notes for the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society and of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Gilman's sympathies and studies have led him to a especial appreciation of modern tendencies in composition, and much of his writing has been in interpretation and advocacy of modern music. His literary style is noted for its finish and brilliancy.

GILMORE, PATRICK SANSFIELD (b. County Galway, Ireland, Dec. 25, 1829 ; d. St. Louis, Missouri, U.S.A., Sept. 24, 1892), a popular bandmaster. After emigrating to Canada as a member of a military band, he went to Massachusetts, where he organised and led a band of his own. During the Civil War he was a bandmaster in the United States Army. His widest reputation was made in organising two immense music festivals in Boston, called 'Peace Jubilees,' in 1869 and 1872. The first had an orchestra of 1000 and a chorus of 10,000 ; the second an orchestra of 2000 and a chorus of 20,000. A large organ, chimes of bells, and the detonations of artillery were added to the orchestral effects. Soon after the second 'Jubilee' Gilmore moved to New York and organised a brass band there which became widely known through its concert tours.

R. A.

GILSON, PAUL (b. Brussels, June 15, 1865), an eminent composer, critic and professor of harmony in the Conservatoires of Belgium. He is the author of numerous orchestral, choral and vocal compositions.

Having learnt the elements of music from the organist Cantillon, he studied harmony and counterpoint with Duyck, a pupil of the elder Fétis. He also took private lessons from Gevaert, and in 1889 obtained the Prix de Rome, instituted by the Belgian government in imitation of the similar prize given by the French Institut. His prize cantata, 'Sinaï,' performed in 1890 at Brussels, produced a very great sensation. It was followed by a symphonic work, 'La Mer,' after a poem by Eddy Lévis, which is recited before each movement of the symphony. Performed at the Concerts Populaires of Brussels in 1892, afterwards at Paris, at the Colonne Concerts, in many towns of Germany, and in London at the Crystal Palace, Nov. 1897, it is published in a piano score by Breitkopf & Härtel. It revealed a most remarkable mastery of orchestral technique, a strong sense of picturesque instrumentation, an uncommon knowledge of harmony joined to an interesting originality of invention, together with a clever employment of rhythms taken from Oriental folk-music.

Though of Flemish race, Gilson is the spiritual descendant of the Russian School, whose works he studied with marked attention.

Besides his cantata already spoken of, we may mention among his choral works, 'Francesca da Rimini,' for soli, choir and orchestra (Concerts Populaires, Brussels, 1895) ; Inaugural Cantata for the Brussels Exhibition of 1897 ; and 'Le Démon,' an oratorio, after Lermontov, performed at Mons. For orchestra there are a fantasia on Canadian themes, a Scottish Rhapsody, a 'Humoresque' for wind instruments, often played at the Brussels Conservatoire. There are about 30 songs, with accompaniment for piano or orchestra. His dramatic works include a ballet, 'La Captive' (Théâtre de la Monnaie, 1902) ; incidental music for Em. Hiel's drama 'Alva,' and an opera, 'Princes Zonnenschijn' (produced at Antwerp, 1904). In later years Gilson has devoted himself more particularly to developing the repertory of music for wind instruments in combination. His scholastic appointments began with that of professor of harmony in the Conservatoire of Brussels (1899) followed (1904) by a similar post at Antwerp. In 1909 he resigned both posts for that of musical inspector in the schools of Belgium. He was musical critic to the Soir from 1906-16 and later became critic to the Midi. M. K. ; addns. E. C.

GINES PÉREZ, JUAN (b. Orihuela, baptized Oct. 7, 1548 ; d. there, 1612), Spanish church composer, maestro de capilla and director of the choir school at Valencia, 1581-95. He had previously held a similar post in his native town ; having been appointed at the early age of 14 and before 1601 he returned to it as a canon of the cathedral, appointed by Philip II. Uncertain and irascible by temperament, he wrote music which has an individual quality, due mainly to his method of spacing the voices, and to his endeavour in his motets to express the feeling of the text in general and not sentence by sentence. Pedrell (Hisp. Schol. Mus. Sacr. vol. 5) published several compositions, including motets for double choir ; an autograph MS. containing psalms, motets and a villancico to Spanish words is preserved in the cathedral at Segorbe. Others are at Valencia (Cathedral and Colegio del Patriarca.) He also composed some of the music sung during the annual performances of the Mystery of ELOHE (q.v.). J. B. T.

GINGUENÉ, PIERRE LOUIS (b. Rennes, Apr. 25, 1748 ; d. Paris, Nov. 18, 1816), a poet and historian of literature. He wrote Notice sur la vie et les ouvrages de Piccini, Entretiens sur l'état actuel de l'opéra de Paris, Lettres et articles sur la musique, articles in various papers concerning the quarrel between the Gluckists and Piccinists, and in his Histoire littéraire de l'Italie, etc. (See Riemann.)

GINTZLER, SIMON, a 16th-century lutenist, court musician of the Cardinal of Trento, 1547. He wrote Intabulatura de Lauto, Venice, 1547.

GIOCONDA, LA, opera in 4 acts, the libretto founded on Victor Hugo's Angelo by 'Tobia Gorrio' (i.e. Arrigo Boito); music by Amilcare Ponchielli. Produced Scala, Milan, Apr. 8, 1876; in a revised version, Genoa, in Dec. 1879; Covent Garden, May 31, 1883, in Italian; New York, Metropolitan Opera House, Dec. 20, 1883; in English, Moody-Manners Co., Kennington Theatre, May 6, 1903.

For another opera on this subject, see GIURAMENTO, IL.

GIOJELLI DELLA MADONNA, I; opera in 3 acts; text by C. Zangarini and E. Golisciani, to a plot of the composer, Wolf-Ferrari. Produced as 'Der Schmuck der Madonna,' Kurfürsten Oper, Berlin, Dec. 23, 1911; Covent Garden, May 30, 1912; in English (Carl Rosa Co.), Theatre Royal, Glasgow, Mar. 1912; Chicago, Auditorium Theatre, Jan. 16, 1912.

GIORDANI. An Italian musical family of the 18th century, the head of which seems to have been one (1) CARMINE GIORDANO, or Giordani, who wrote an opera, 'La Vittoria d'Amor,' at Naples in 1712, and whose 'versetti' for organ are in the B.M. Add. MSS. 14,247; a cantata for soprano is in B.M. Add. MSS. 14,227. That the name 'Carmine' was the surname of the family is an error which has been copied from Fétis into most of the dictionaries. The family appeared in comic operas at Naples until 1753, when the father, two daughters, and the elder son, Tommaso, migrated to London. T. Oliphant stated that they came out at the Haymarket Theatre under fictitious names in 1752-54.

(2) TOMMASO (b. Naples, c. 1733; d. Feb. 1806), went to Dublin in 1761, where he produced Italian operas at the Smock Alley Theatre, with a brother, a dancer, named Francesco.¹ In or about 1762 the whole family, with the exception of Giuseppe, came out at the Haymarket Theatre with great success; in 1765 and 1766 Tommaso was again in Ireland, and on Apr. 24 of that latter year, he brought out his comic opera 'Love in Disguise' for the first time. In 1767 his 'Phillis at Court' (words adapted from R. Lloyd's 'Capricious Lovers') was played at Crow Street (libretto in British Museum). He conducted the Castle Ode for Lord Townshend, the Viceroy, in Aug. 1769. His 'Artaserse' is mentioned in Bremner's catalogue for 1778. In 1778-81 he opened the little theatre in Capel Street, in partnership with a singer named Leoni, and remained there for nearly two years. He returned to London in 1781, and lodged at Spring Gardens, in the room above John O'Keeffe. Two of his airs were introduced into Arnold's 'Castle of Andalusia.' He returned to Dublin in 1783, married a Miss Wilkinson, and settled in the Irish capital. He taught Lady Morgan, Tom Cooke and others, the piano. In Apr. 1789 he composed and conducted a new Te Deum in the Catholic Chapel, Francis Street, Dublin, at a solemn High Mass, in thanksgiving for the King's recovery. In the same year his opera 'Perseverance' was produced at the Crow Street Theatre, Dublin. After 1798 we hear no more of him. His son Tommaso worked as a music-teacher in Dublin for thirty years. An opera of 'Antigono' (1773) is in the British Museum, an oratorio, 'Isaac,' was produced in Dublin in 1769, another opera, 'The Siege of Gibraltar,' in the Capel Street Theatre, Dublin, in Dec. 1783, and a list of overtures, songs, concertos, quartets and sonatas is given in Q.-L.

The younger brother, (3) GIUSEPPE (b. Naples, c. 1744; d. Fermo, Jan. 4, 1798), learnt composition at the Conservatorio di Loreto there. In 1771 he brought out his first opera, 'L'asuto in imbroglia,' at Pisa, and in 1772 joined his father and brother in London, producing an opera, 'Il bacio,' there in 1774, a work which achieved such success that it was given until 1782. He joined his elder brother's enterprise in Dublin, and was composer and director of the music until 1782, when he went back to Italy, remaining there for ten years, producing operas, oratorios, etc., in great numbers. In 1791 he went to Fermo as choirmaster at the Duomo. His works include two oratorios, 'La fuga in Egitto' (1775), 'Le tre ore d'agonia di Nostro Signore Gesu Cristo' (performed at Dresden, 1807), a Mass, motets, etc., and five operas, canzonets, overtures, concertos, quartets, etc. (see Q.-L.). A song, 'Let not age,' has preserved its popularity to the present day, and it is probable that the well-known 'Caro mio ben' is by this youngest of the family, who was commonly known as 'Giordanello.' GIORDANO, UMBERTO (b. Foggia, Aug. 27, 1867), composer. His father, who was an artisan, intended to bring up his son to his own trade, but in deference to the arguments of a friend, who had observed the boy's musical temperament, he allowed him to receive such musical instruction as Foggia afforded. Giordano's education was completed at the Conservatoire of Naples, where he studied under Paolo Serrao. He remained at Naples for nine years, and while still in statu pupillari wrote an opera, 'Marina,' which attracted the favourable notice of the publisher Sonzogno. In response to a commission from the latter Giordano wrote 'Mala vita,' the libretto of which was based by Daspuro upon the powerful but singularly repulsive play of that name. This work was produced at Rome in 1892. The fashion for operatic melodrama of the most blood-curdling type was then at its zenith, and 'Mala vite' hit the taste of the day as much perhaps by the so-called 'actuality' of its subject as by any pretension to musical value. Giordano's next opera, 'Regina Diaz' (Naples, 1894), was a failure, but with 'Andrea Chénier' (Milan, 1896) he scored what hitherto has proved to be the greatest success of his career. 'Andrea Chénier' speedily made the round of the Italian theatres, and it was produced at Berlin in 1898. It was given in London by the Carl Rosa Company in an English version at the Camden Theatre, Apr. 16, 1903. In 1897 a revised version of 'Mala vita' was produced under the name of 'Il voto,' and in 1898 'Fedora,' an operatic version of Sardou's famous drama, repeated in a less degree the success of 'Andrea Chénier.' 'Siberia' (Milan, 1904), 'Marcella' (Milan, 1907), 'Mese Mariano' (Palermo, 1910) have been less widely performed, but 'Madame Sans-Gêne' (New York, 1915) had a certain vogue, partly due to the interest of the play (Sardou and Moreau) and partly to the representation of the principal character given by Geraldine Farrar at the first performance. Giordano collaborated with Franchetti in 'Giove a Pompei' (Rome, 1921). 'La cena delle beffe,' founded on the romantic play of Sem Benelli, had a brilliant première at the Scala, Milan (Dec. 20, 1924). Giordano is a typical member of the group of composers who sprang into fame on the skirts of Mascagni, whose methods of workmanship his earlier operas reproduce with singular fidelity. In 'Andrea Chénier' he displayed a more definite individuality of style. Giordano has an exuberant gift of melody and a strong feeling for dramatic effect, but his scores lack solidity, and in his music the usual theatrical tricks for extorting applause too often take the place of a sincere expression of emotion.

GIOVANELLI, RUGGIERO (b. Velletri, near Rome, 1560; d. Jan. 7, 1625).¹ In 1584 we find him maestro di cappella to San Luigi de' Francesi in Rome; from thence he passed to the Chiesa dell' Anima, belonging to the German College; and, Mar. 12, 1594, was appointed Palestrina's successor at St. Peter's, entering on his duties three days later. On Apr. 7, 1599, he was made a member of the Sistine Choir. In 1615 he published the second volume of his new edition of the 'Graduale,' undertaken at the request of Pope Paul V., and magnificently printed at the Medici press, but disfigured by many arbitrary alterations of the text. Proske has inserted a 'Dixit' of Giovannelli in his Musica divina (tom. iii.), and speaks of his works as 'graceful, pure in style, very pleasing in harmony, and able to bear comparison with those of the greatest masters.' Baini's Palestrina also contains many allusions to Giovannelli. Amongst his works preserved in the Pontifical Chapel at Rome, Baini specially mentions a Miserere for 4 and 8 voices, and a Mass, α 8, on Palestrina's madrigal 'Vestiva i colli'; but he does not seem to have known of a particularly fine Mass, α 12, characterised by Proske as full of beauty and imagination. Giovannelli published six books of madrigals, with one of Canzonette and Villanelle, in the years 1585, 1586, 1588, 1589, 1593, 1599 and 1606. Others are to be found in the collections of Scotto and Phalese (Eitner, Sammelwerke). Four madrigals are translated in Morley's 'Madrigals to five voices,' 1598; and three specimens of his work are in Torchi's L'arte musicale in Italia, vol. ii.

GIOVANNI DA CASCIA (JOHANNES DE FLORENTIA) (b. Cascia). From 1329–51 he lived at the court of Mastino II. della Scala, Verona. He is regarded as the originator of the stylistic reform which spread from Florence soon after 1300. He composed madrigals, caccias, canzonets, ballads, etc. (Riemann).

GIOVANNINI (d. 1782), an Italian violinist and composer, a pupil of Leclair, who lived chiefly in Berlin from 1740 until his death.² About 1745 he went to London, and produced, under the pseudonym of the Count of St. Germain, a pasticcio entitled 'L'incostanza delusa' (Haymarket, Apr. 7, 1745),³ in which the airs were much admired. He also published some violin solos under the same name. He contributed to 'The Temple of Apollo,' 1747.⁴ Spitta⁵ tells us further that songs by Giovannini are included in Graef's Odensammlung (1741 and 1743), two of which were since published in Lindner's Geschichte des deutschen Liedes, etc. (1871). These are said to show a strong resemblance to the style of 'Willst du dein Herz mir schenken?', the song described as 'Aria di Giovannini' in the larger of the two music books of Anna Magdalena Bach. Controversy as to the authorship of this song arose from Zelter's conjecture, followed by Rust,⁶ that the song was by J. S. Bach. There seems no longer any reasonable doubt that Giovannini is the real composer.

GIRARDEAU, ISABELLA (called LA ISABELLA), an Italian singer, married to a Frenchman, who performed in the early Italian operas in London. She is, perhaps, the same as the Isabella Calliari mentioned in Quadrio's list among the female singers who flourished in 1700–20. She succeeded 'the Baroness' at the Haymarket, and appeared first in 'Almahide.' She sang in the first and succeeding performances of Handel's 'Rinaldo.' In this, one of her songs, 'Bel piacer,' was wholly unaccompanied. On Dec. 12 of the same year, Gasparini's 'Antiochus' was produced, in which La Isabella took a part, as she did also in the following January in his 'Ambleto.' In the latter she had 'a noisy song for trumpets and hautbois obligato' (Burney), from which it may be inferred that her voice was very strong.

GIRELLI AGUILAR, SIGNORA, an Italian prima donna, who took part in the 'grand dramatic serenata' composed by Mozart (1771) in honour of the nuptials of the Archduke Ferdinand, celebrated at Milan on Oct. 17 of that year.

'The archduke and his bride, not only frequently inclined their heads from their box and applauded the maestro, but encored two airs sung by Manzuoli and Girelli.'

After this, Girelli married a Frenchman named Aguilar, and visited London, succeeding Grassi, and singing the principal rôle in Vento's 'Sophonisba' (1772-73).

GIRELLI, SANTINO (b. Brescia, late 16th cent.), pupil of Lelio Bertani; living at Brescia in 1620. He wrote masses a 5 and a 8 v., op. 3 (1627), and 2 books of psalms, etc., in 1620 and 1626 respectively.

GISMONDI, CELESTE, a mezzo-soprano engaged at the opera in London in 1732-34. She made her first appearance (Dec. 1732) as Lisaura in Handel's 'Alessandro.' She played a small part in 'Orlando' (1733); parts were assigned to her also (1733) in 'Deborah,' 'Tolomeo,' and 'Ottone,' but, after this, she is said by Schoelcher to have assisted in setting up the rival theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. The newspapers of the day (Nov. 3, 1735), however, give another account of her secession, by announcing the death of

'Signora Celeste Gismondi . . . Wife to Mr. Hempson an English Gentleman, on Tuesday [Oct. 28], after a lingering illness. She perform'd in Mr. Handel's Operas for several Winters with great Applause, but did not sing this season on any stage, on Account of her Indisposition.'

GITTERN (GETERNE, GYTHREN, GYTHORN), the mediæval guitar, usually strung with four gut strings and played with a plectrum. One of the earliest illustrations in manuscripts of English workmanship will be found in the late 13th century Ormesby Psalter (Bodl. Lib.). By continental writers it was called chitarra latina, or guitare latine, to distinguish it from the chitarra sarracenic or guitare moresque, which with its long neck, rounded back, and oval-shaped body was introduced by the Moors into Spain. The name gittern is probably a contraction of the word chitarrone, 'a large cither' (cf. chiterna, quinterna, guiterne). According to Praetorius (1618) the strings were tuned in the following ways:

the actual pitch varying with the size of the instrument.

The strings were attached to an ornamental button at the end of the body and passed over a bridge as in the violin: in the front table there was either a large round sound-hole, as in the ordinary guitar, or small curved slits on either side of the bridge. In the earlier form of the instrument the neck, instead of being free from the body as at the present time, was in one piece with it and the depth of the body extended to the peg box: immediately behind the finger-board an oval-shaped hole was pierced, through which the player passed his thumb. An excellent illustration will be found in an early 14th-century manuscript of English workmanship (B.M. Arundel, 83); but, more interesting still, an actual specimen of the gittern is preserved at Warwick Castle. It is said to have been presented by Queen Elizabeth to the Earl of Leicester, and a full description will be found in Engel's Catalogue of the Musical Instruments in the South Kensington Museum, where a facsimile is exhibited. It bears the date of some 16th-century restoration (1578), for the exquisite carving on the body, neck and peg box is of the early 14th century. Unfortunately, at a yet later date it was mistaken for and transformed into an unwieldy violin; but it is undoubtedly a mediæval gittern, played with a plectrum.

Before the introduction into England of the large lute in the 15th century the gittern was the popular accompaniment to the voice. Langland (Piers Plowman, 14th cent.) says of himself that he was no minstrel, one proof being that he could not leap or dance or 'sing with the giterne.' In the 16th century the so-called Spanish guitar appeared in England and, stimulated by the craze for continental fashions in the following century, relegated the old gittern to oblivion. (See GUITAR.) In 1652 John Playford published 'A Book of New Lessons for the Cithren and Gittern,' and a few years later 'Musick's Solace on the Cithren and Gittern': as both cithren and gittern had but four strings, the tablature for the one could be easily used for the other.

GIUGLINI, ANTONIO (b. Fano, 1827; d. Pesaro, Oct. 12, 1865), appeared in London first in 1857 at Her Majesty's Theatre, where on Apr. 11 he made his début under Lumley, as Fernando in 'La favorita,' and afterwards sang as Arturo, Edgardo and Manrico. In 1858 he was re-engaged, and played as Thaddeus on the production, in Italian, of the 'Bohemian Girl,' Ferdinand in Verdi's 'Luisa Miller,' and Raoul at Titiens's début. In 1859 and 1860 he sang under E. T. Smith at Drury Lane and Her Majesty's. In 1861 he sang under Mapleson at the Lyceum, in 1862-64 at Her Majesty's under the same manager. In the autumn of 1864 he was engaged at St. Petersburg, but did not appear owing to incipient madness. In 1865 he returned to England, but had to be confined by his manager in Dr. Tuke's Asylum at Chiswick. In the autumn he was removed to Italy.

GIULIANI, (1) ANDREAS (d. Augsburg, 1771), was Kapellmeister of Augsburg Cathedral at the time of his death. He wrote church music, instrumental overtures, sinfonia for string quartet, trio for 2 vlns. and basso (Q.-L.).

(2) FRANCESCO (called 'il Cerato') of Arzignano in the province of Vincenza, an early 17th-century composer. He wrote 'Celeste ghirlanda di quaranti concerti a voce sola' (1629); 'Sacri concerti a 1-4 voci, op. 1' (1619).

GIZZIELLO, GIOACCHINO CONTI DETTO (b. Arpino, Naples, Feb. 28, 1714; d. Rome, Oct. 25, 1761), so called after his master, D. Gizzi, was one of the greatest singers of the 18th century. He early underwent the preparation for the career of a sopranist. He gained a round, full, sweet voice of great extent and penetrating quality, which was united to a strong natural taste and feeling in music. At the age of 15 he made his début at Rome, with immense success. In 1731 he excited the greatest enthusiasm there by his singing in Vinci's 'Didone' and 'Artaserse.' An anecdote is related of this occasion, showing how much other singers were already affected by his fame. (See FARINELLI.) He sang at Naples in 1732 and 1733 with the same success. Three years later (Apr. 13, 1736), he is announced in the London newspapers as 'expected here in a few days.' This was the critical moment at which the split occurred in Handel's company, and the great master was at a loss for artists to replace those who had seceded. On May 5 he began with 'Ario-dante,' and Gizziello, who then made his first appearance in London,

'met with an uncommon reception; in justice to his voice and judgment, he may be truly esteemed one of the best performers in this kingdom.'¹

In presence of Farinelli, no more could be said of the younger singer, who was still

'so modest and diffident, that when he first heard Farinelli, at a private rehearsal, he burst into tears, and fainted away with despondency.'²

'Atalanta' was brought out May 12, Gizziello again singing the principal man's part, as he did, a little later, in 'Poro.' In 1737 he appeared in 'Arminio,' 'Berenice,' 'Giustino' and 'Partenope.' In 1743 he went to Lisbon, where the improvement in his style, due to the example of Farinelli, was at once perceived. Charles III., King of Naples, engaged both him and Caffarelli to sing in the 'Achille in Sciro' of Pergolesi. Caffarelli came from Poland, and Gizziello from Portugal, and met for the first time. The former sang the first song with splendid effect, and Gizziello thought himself lost, as he listened to the continued applause; but he sang his own song, which followed, with such pathos and expression that he divided the honours of the performance. In 1749 he was invited by Farinelli to sing at Madrid with Mingotti; and stayed there three years. He then returned to Portugal. About the end of 1753 he quitted the stage, and settled at his native place. An excellent mezzotint portrait of him was scraped by Alex. Van Haecken, after a picture by C. Lucy, in 1736, folio. A good impression of it is scarce.

GLADSTONE, DR. FRANCIS EDWARD (b. Summertown, near Oxford, Mar. 2, 1845), organist. He was articled pupil to Dr. S. S. Wesley (1859-64), at Winchester. His posts included Holy Trinity Church, Weston-super-Mare, Llandaff Cathedral (1866), Chichester Cathedral (1870), Brighton (1873-76), St. Mark's, Lewisham, Norwich Cathedral (1877-1881), Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, London (1881-86). He took the degree of Mus.D. in 1879. Having been received into the Roman Catholic Church, he was appointed director of the choir at St. Mary of the Angels, Bayswater, about 1887, and held the post until 1894. He was made honorary member of the R.A.M. and was on the teaching staff of the R.C.M. He published a Treatise on Strict Counterpoint, 1906. He composed much music for his instrument, besides services, anthems, songs and partsongs. His larger choral works include 'Nicodemus' (produced by the Highbury Philharmonic Society, 1880) and 'Philippi, or the Acts of Paul and Silas in Macedonia'—the latter of which was written for the North-Eastern Choirs Association, and produced at Newcastle in July 1883; a cantata, 'Constance of Calais,' performed by the Highbury Philharmonic Society, in 1886; a Mass in E minor (MS.), written for the Brompton Oratory; and a short Mass in E \flat . W. B. S.

GLÄSER, FRANZ (b. Obergeorgenthal, Bohemia, Apr. 19, 1798; d. Aug. 29, 1861), studied the violin at the Conservatorium of Prague in 1813-17. Going to Vienna in the latter year he became conductor at the Leopoldstadt Theatre, in 1822 at the Josephstadt Theatre, in 1827 at the Theatre 'an der Wien,' and in 1830 at the Königstadt Theatre in Berlin. From 1842 to his death he was court conductor at Copenhagen. He wrote a great number of operas, musical comedies, farces, etc., only one of which, 'Des Adlers Horst' (Berlin, 1832), achieved a wide celebrity. M.

GLANNER, KASPAR, was from c. 1566-78 or 1580 court organist at Salzburg. He wrote 'Der erste Theil newer deutscher geistlicher und weltlicher Liedlein mit vier und fünf Stimmen . . .' (1578); 'Der ander Theil newer deutscher . . . Liedlein . . .' (1580); and some pieces in Ochsenkhun's 'Tablature' of 1558 (Q.-L.).

GLAREANUS, HENRICUS (b. Canton of Glarus, June, 1488; d. Freiburg, Mar. 28, 1563), so called because he was born in the Canton of Glarus, his real name being LORIS or, Latinised, LORITUS; a celebrated teacher of music. He is said to have been a shepherd-boy in his youth; but he studied music with Rubellus at Berne, and afterwards under Cochläus at Cologne, where he was crowned poet-laureate in 1512 for a poem in honour of the Emperor, which he composed and sang to his own accompaniment. In 1515 he was teaching mathematics at Basle, and in 1517 was appointed, at the recommendation of Erasmus, professor of philosophy and 'artes liberales' in Paris. He returned in 1522 to Basle, where he is said to have set up a school, and from whence he removed to Freiburg im Breisgau in 1529. Prof. H. Schreiber, in an excellent monograph on Glareanus (Freiburg, 1837), proves that it was not at the University of either Paris, Basle or Freiburg, that he was professor. He was blind in his later years. His friends, Erasmus, Justus Lipsius and Vossius, wrote panegyrics on him. His principal works on the theory of music are Isagoge in musicen Henrici Glareani, etc. (the dedication 'ad Falconem Consulem urbis Aventinensis,' Avignon, is headed 'Basileae, anno Christi 1516, 4to ad idus Martias'), now extremely scarce, containing chapters on solmisation, the intervals, modes, tones, and their treatment; and $\Delta\Omega\Delta\epsilon\kappa\alpha\chi\omicron\pi\alpha\omicron\omicron$ (1547, fol.),¹ a still more important work, the aim of which is to prove that there are twelve church modes, corresponding to the ancient Greek modes, and not eight, as many writers have maintained. The third part contains numerous examples from the works of Okeghem, Obrecht, Josquin des Prés, and other musicians of the 15th and 16th centuries, valuable also as specimens of early music-printing. Wonnegger of Lithuania published an abstract of the DODECACHORDON (q.v.) (Freiburg, 1557), the second edition of which (1559) contains a poem by Glareanus in praise of the thirteen Federal cities of Switzerland, set to music by Manfred Barbarin. The catalogue of Draudius mentions a third treatise De musices divisione ac definitione (Basle, 1549); but as the headings of the chapters are identical with those in the Dodecachordon, it can scarcely be a separate work. In 1888 Peter Bohn made a German translation of the Dodecachordon (Publik. d. Ges. f. Musikforschung), with the examples in modern score, and an abstract of Schreiber's biography. His theory of the twelve church modes, as parallel to the ancient Greek modes, will assure for Glareanus a lasting place among writers on the science of music. F. G.

GLASENAPP, CARL FRIEDRICH (b. Riga, Oct. 3, 1847; d. there, Apr. 14, 1915), studied philology at Dorpat, and lived after 1875 in his native town. He is the author of the authoritative life of Wagner; his book, Richard Wagner, Leben und Wirken, appeared in two volumes in 1876-77, and the second edition, much enlarged, in 1882. In 1894 appeared the first instalment of the third edition, renamed Das Leben Richard Wagners in sechs Büchern dargestellt, dividing the dates of the life as follows: Vol. i. 1813-43, ii. 1843-53, iii. 1853-1862, iv. 1862-72, v. 1872-77, vi. 1877-83. The last part was published in 1911. A translation, with still further amplifications, was made by Wm. Ashton Ellis, the three volumes having appeared in 1900, 1901 and 1903. The fourth and subsequent volumes of Ashton Ellis's work (1904) are independent of Glasenapp.

Glasenapp's other contributions to Wagnerian literature include

GLAZOUNOV, ALEXANDER CONSTANTINOVICH (b. St. Petersburg, Aug. 10, 1865), eminent composer, was the son of a well-known publisher and bookseller.

After leaving the 'Real' or modern school, Glazounov attended some lectures at the University of St. Petersburg as a 'voluntary' or non-attached student. At the age of 9 he began to take lessons in pianoforte and elementary theory, with Elenovsky, and before he was 13 showed a great aptitude for composition. In 1879 he became acquainted with Balakirev, who advised him to continue his general culture, while grounding himself thoroughly in classical music. A year or two later Balakirev, realising his uncommon talent, recommended him to study privately with Rimsky-Korsakov, under whose guidance he completed a course of composition and theory, extending over a year and a half. Glazounov is endowed with prodigious musical memory. He himself has said :

'At home we had a great deal of music, and everything we played remained firmly in my memory, so that, awaking in the night, I could reconstruct, even to the smallest details, all I had heard earlier in the evening.'

His most remarkable feat in this way was the complete reconstruction of the overture to Borodin's opera, 'Prince Igor.' Glazounov's first symphony, composed at 16, was given by Balakirev at one of the concerts of the Free School in 1882. It was re-orchestrated five times before the composer, satisfied with the result, finally published it as op. 5. Almost simultaneously he wrote the quartet in D (op. 1) and the pianoforte suite on the theme S-a-c-h-a (diminutive of his own name Alexander), op. 2. His first overture (on Greek themes, op. 3) was performed at one of the concerts of the Russian Musical Society under the baton of Anton Rubinstein. Thus the leaders of the two opposite musical factions united to forward the interests of this gifted youth.

Thanks in some degree to the friendly appreciation of Liszt, he soon became known outside Russia. His earliest successes abroad date from 1884 (first symphony at Weimar), 1889 (concerts of the Paris Exhibition) and 1897 (fourth symphony at the Philharmonic Society, London, July 1, and fifth symphony at Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts, Jan. 28). Glazounov's activity has been chiefly exercised in the sphere of instrumental music. Unlike so many of his compatriots he has never been attracted to opera, nor is he a prolific composer of songs. Although partly a disciple of the 'new Russian school' he is separated from Balakirev, Rimsky-Korsakov and Moussorgsky by his preference for classical forms in music. From the outset of his career he showed a mastery of technical means such as we are accustomed to associate only with full maturity. Perhaps on account of this facility, some of his earlier works suffer from over-elaboration and a redundancy of accessory ideas. But the tendency of his later compositions is almost always towards greater simplicity and clearness of expression. Glazounov's music is melodious, although his melody is not remarkable for richness or variety. It is usually most characteristic in moods of restrained melancholy. His harmony is far more distinctive and original, and frequently full of picturesque suggestion. As a master of orchestration he stands, with Rimsky-Korsakov, at the head of a school pre-eminently distinguished in this respect. Although Glazounov has made some essays in the sphere of programme music in the symphonic poems 'Stenka Razin,' 'The Forest,' and 'The Kremlin'—and more recently in the suite 'Aus dem Mittelalter'—yet his tendency has remained mainly towards classical forms. At the same time, even when bearing no programme, much of his music is remarkable for a certain descriptive quality.

The last to join the circle of Balakirev, he came at a time when solidarity of opinion was no longer essential to the very existence of the Russian school. It was natural that, more than its earlier members, he should pass under other and cosmopolitan influences. The various phases of his enthusiasm for Western composers are clearly traceable in his works. In one respect Glazounov is unique, since he is the only Russian composer of note who has been seriously dominated by Brahms. But although he has ranged himself with the German master on the side of pure musical form, a very cursory examination of their works suffices to show how much less 'abstract' is the music of the Russian composer than that of Brahms. Even while moving within the limits of conventional form, Glazounov's music is constantly suggesting to the imagination some echo from the world of actuality. It is in this delicate and veiled realism—which in theory he seems to repudiate—that he shows himself linked with the spirit of his age and his country. The strongest manifestation of his national feeling is displayed in the energetic and highly coloured music of the ballet 'Raymonda.' Comparing this work with Tchaikovsky's ballet 'The Sleeping Beauty,' it has been said that while in the latter each dance resembles an elegant statuette, 'bizarre, graceful and delicate,' the former shows us 'colossal groups cast in bronze'; life viewed at moments of supreme tension and violent movement, caught and fixed irrevocably in gleaming metal. It proves that this Russian idealist has moods of affinity with the realism and Oriental splendour of Rimsky-Korsakov and Borodin. The ballet 'Raymonda,' and its musical antithesis the sixth symphony, with its wonderful contrapuntal finale, are probably the most popular of Glazounov's works.

Apart from his art, Glazounov's life has been uneventful. Few composers have made their début under more favourable auspices, or have won appreciation so rapidly. Nor did he in youth ever experience the sting of neglect or the inconvenience of poverty. His life seemed the realisation of a fairy tale set to music until the political troubles of his country threw his life and his art into the shadows.

Glazounov made his first appearance as a conductor at the Paris Exhibition of 1889, and frequently acted in that capacity at the Russian Symphony Concerts, St. Petersburg. In 1900 he was appointed professor at the St. Petersburg Conservatorium, where he took the class for instrumentation and score-reading. In 1906 he became director and held the post with honour until the revolution. His seventh symphony in F, op. 77, was played for the first time in England at the R.C.M., Feb. 17, 1903, and the eighth was given at the Leeds Festival in 1907. The list of his works, mostly published by Belaiev, and unavoidably incomplete as to later details, is as follows :

GLEASON, FREDERICK GRANT (b. Middletown, Conn., Dec. 17, 1848 ; d. Chicago, Dec. 6, 1903), an American composer, organist and teacher. His first musical studies were made under Dudley Buck in Hartford ; later, from 1869, he studied at Leipzig Conservatorium, Berlin and London. After his return to America he occupied several posts as organist in cities of his native state, but from 1877 lived and worked in Chicago, until his death. Among his many compositions were two romantic operas, 'Otto Visconti,' the overture of which was performed in Leipzig in 1892 ; and 'Montezuma,' of which he wrote both text and music ; a symphonic poem, 'Edris,' op. 21 ; the cantatas 'God our Deliverer,' 'The Culprit Fay,' 'Praise Song to Harmony,' and 'Auditorium Festival Ode.'

GLEE (derived from the Anglo-Saxon gligge), a piece of unaccompanied vocal music in at least three parts, and for solo voices, usually those of men.

The glee, though possibly suggested by the madrigal, to which this description partially applies, is separated from it, so far as its origin is concerned, by a long interval of time. (See MADRIGAL.) The first glees are due to the beginning of the 18th century, and the finest specimens of them to the seventy-five years between the middle of that century and the end of the first quarter of the 19th. Vocal compositions by masters of the latter part of the 17th century are sometimes found, in collections printed after their decease, to which the word 'glee' is appended. These are not glees, in the now accepted sense of the word, but simply airs by those masters, harmonised subsequently for three or four voices ; or choruses, mostly from operas, from which the original orchestral parts are simply omitted. Two eminent English composers, Arne and Boyce, wrote each a few pieces which they or their subsequent editors called glees ; but their productions in other styles altogether surpassed these, both in excellence and number. The earliest, possibly the greatest, master of the glee proper is Samuel WEBBE, during whose long life (1740-1816) the best specimens of this class of composition were produced. Webbe actually outlived many of the most eminent practitioners in the school of which he was the founder.

The word 'glee' in no way describes or characterises the kind of composition to which it gives a name. It is simply the Anglo-Saxon gligge—music. A glee is not therefore necessarily of a cheerful character, as the name might seem to imply. That music was in early times commonly associated with cheerfulness is possibly true. The 'Gliggman,' according to Warton, was identical with the 'Joculator.' But the words of a glee may be mournful or sprightly, and the music such as will express them becomingly. The 'serious glee' is no more a misnomer than the 'cheerful.' Both terms have been used by glee composers again and again.

The glee differs from the madrigal, as might be expected from the distance apart of their epochs, in its tonality, which is uniformly of the major and minor modes. Not only so. Whereas the 'subjects' of the madrigal are generally few, always contrapuntally treated, and this often at considerable length, those of the glee are generally many, and only rarely developed at all. Masses of harmony, rare in the madrigal, are common in the glee, and indeed give it some of its best effects. The characteristic figure of modern tonality, the 'perfect cadence,' rarely introduced in the former, is of frequent occurrence in the latter—sometimes indeed of such frequent occurrence as to give to many of these compositions a halting and disconnected character, as though they were continually about to come to an end. Indeed, the short phrases, incessant cadences, frequent changes of rhythm and pace of the average glee, contrast unfavourably with the 'long resounding' phrases of the madrigal, never brought to an end in one part till they are begun in another, overlapping one another, bearing one another up, and never allowing the hearer to anticipate a close till everything that can be done with every subject has been done, and the movement comes to a natural end.

In so far as the glee composer exhibits this power of sustentation, this strength of wing—the highest and the rarest qualification for every kind of polyphonic composition—his productions will be lasting in their attraction. The best glee writers, such as Webbe, Stevens, Calcott, Horsley, have exhibited it frequently as far as the style allows. Stevens's glee, 'Ye spotted Snakes,' is a model of construction, and if not the earliest, is one of the earliest specimens of pure vocal music in 'sonata form.'

The glee proper is wholly independent of instrumental accompaniment. The name, however, is occasionally given to compositions like 'The Chough and Crow,' by Sir Henry Bishop. These would be better entitled accompanied trios, quartets or choruses. The principal glee composers, over and above those already named—without exception Englishmen—are Attwood, Battishill, Cooke, Danby, Hindle, Lord Mornington, Paxton and Spofforth. GLEE CLUB, THE (1783–1857). This club, originating in some meetings at the house of Robert Smith in St. Paul's Churchyard, began in 1783, at which motets, madrigals, glees, canons and catches were sung after dinner. The meetings were subsequently held at Dr. Beever's and other houses until, in 1787, it was resolved to establish a society to be called 'The Glee Club,' the first public meeting of which took place at the Newcastle Coffee House on Sat., Dec. 22, 1787. The original members were:

R. Smith, Dr. Arnold, Dr. Beever, Rev. J. Hinckes, T. S. (afterwards Dr.) Dupuis, J. Roberts, J. Hesel-tine, T. Aylward, C. Wright, T. Gregory, H. Desdier, L. Atterbury and T. Linley. The professional members were: S. Webbe, J. Dyne, P. Hobler, J. W. (afterwards Dr.) Calcott, J. Hindle, J. Bartleman, S. Webbe, jun., and S. Harrison.

In 1788 the Club removed to the Freemasons' Tavern, thence to the Crown and Anchor until Feb. 1790, when it returned to the Freemasons' Tavern, but removed once more, on July 6, 1791, to the Crown and Anchor, and again returned to the Freemasons' Tavern. In 1790 Samuel Webbe composed for the Club his 'Glorious Apollo,' which was ever after sung at the meetings as the opening glee, while Byrd's canon 'Non Nobis' was sung immediately after dinner, often followed by Dr. Cooke's canon 'Amen.' After 'Glorious Apollo' (first sung with three voices to a part and then full) the chairman, vice-chairman, conductor, sub-conductor and secretary each named a glee, and then the members according to seniority. Among the eminent visitors who have contributed to the music of the meetings were Samuel Wesley (who played Bach's fugues upon the pianoforte, or an extemporaneous effusion on some conspicuous passage in a glee recently sung), Moscheles and Mendelssohn. The Club was dissolved in 1857 and the library sold.

The Club must be distinguished from another Glee Club formed in 1793, the original members of which were Shield, Johnstone, Charles Bannister, Inceledon, Dignum, C. Ashley and W. T. Parke, the last of whom¹ states that 'It was held on Sunday evenings at the Garrick's Head Coffee House in Bow Street, Covent Garden, once a fortnight, when we amused ourselves by singing the works of the old and modern masters, after which we sat down to supper.' C. M.

GLEISSNER, FRANZ (b. Neustadt a/d. Wald-nab, 1760), composer of some operas, symphonies, quartets, duets, masses, an oratorio, etc.; better known by his adaptation of Senefelder's lithographic process for music printing. In 1798 he was in partnership with Senefelder, as the title-page of his symphony No. 1 shows. He was also in partnership with the Munich music publisher, Falter, and in 1799 established big litho-printing works for J. A. André at Offenbach. Thence he went to Vienna for similar purposes, and was still living at Munich in 1815. E. v. d. s.

GLEN, an eminent Scottish firm of musical instrument makers. (1) THOMAS MACBEEAN GLEN, the founder (b. Inverkeithing, Fifeshire, May 1804; d. July 12, 1873), began business in the Cowgate, Edinburgh, in 1827; in 1836 removed to North Bank Street. Amongst the instruments invented by him was a wooden opficleide, of which a large number were made, and known as 'Serpenteleides.' The business was carried on from 1866 by his sons (2) JOHN (b. Edinburgh, 1833; d. Nov. 29, 1904) and (3) ROBERT (b. Edinburgh, 1835). The Glens are now chiefly noted for their bagpipes, of which they are the recognised best makers. G.

Another bagpipe firm founded by (4) ALEXANDER GLEN (b. Inverkeithing, 1801), elder brother of the preceding Thomas Macbean (1), is established in Edinburgh. Both firms have issued musical works in connexion with the bagpipe.

John (2) was a high authority on, and possessed a uniquely valuable library of, early Scottish music. His published works are: The Glen Collection of Scottish Dance Music, two books, 1891 and 1895, and Early Scottish Melodies, 1900. All these are full of original research, and contain much biographical and historical matter which the student cannot afford to ignore. (See LIBRARIES, subsection EDINBURGH.)

Robert (3), his younger brother, was an equally great authority on, and collector of, ancient musical instruments and Scottish antiquities. F. K.

GLETLE, JOHANN MELCHIOR (b. Bremgarten, Switzerland; d. before 1684). In 1667 he was Kapellmeister at Augsburg Cathedral. He was a prolific composer of masses, psalms, motets, sonatas, etc., which, for the greater part, exist only in incomplete copies. (See Q.-L.)

GLIERE, REINHOLD MORITZOVICH (b. Kiev, Dec. 30, 1874, O.S.), composer and teacher, was a gold medallist of the Moscow Conservatoire, where he studied from 1894-1900 under Tanciev and Hyppolitov-Ivanov. His published works include: sextet for strings, op. 1; string quartet, op. 2; octet for strings, op. 3. His symphony in E flat, op. 8, composed in 1899, was first performed in Moscow at a concert of the Russian Musical Society in 1902. Later works are a second symphony, C minor, op. 25; a third symphony, 'Ilia Murometz,' op. 42, which has been performed at Bournemouth under Sir Dan Godfrey; several symphonic poems and works of chamber music.

GLINKA, MICHAEL IVANOVITCH (b. Novospasskoi, Govt. of Smolensk, June 2, 1803¹; d. Berlin, Feb. 15, 1857), whom Liszt designated the 'Prophet-Patriarch' of Russian music, was born on the estate of his father, a retired military man.

Glinka's early childhood was spent in the custody of his maternal grandmother, who reared him, physically and morally, in a hot-house atmosphere; thereby laying the seeds of that extreme delicacy of nerves and constitution from which he suffered to the end of his days. From infancy he showed remarkable sensibility to all musical sounds. The first ten years of his life were spent almost exclusively in the country, where he grew up under the influence of the folk-music, which left an indelible impression upon his gifted nature. In his autobiographical notes, Glinka gives the following account of these childish impressions:

'Sometimes my father entertained a large party of friends and relatives; and on these occasions, he would send for my uncle's musicians, a small orchestra drawn from the serfs on his estate, which lay eight versts away from ours. This band generally remained several days at our house, and when the guests had finished dancing, would play other kinds of music. . . . Some of their pieces made a new and indescribable impression upon me, so that for days afterwards I was in a kind of hectic state, or possessed by delicious languor. Once, when the time came for my drawing-lesson, I was so absent-minded that my teacher reproved me because my thoughts were entirely filled with music. "What am I to do?" I replied, "music is my very soul." . . . I often took a violin or piccolo, and tried to join in with the band, keeping of course to the tonic and dominant. . . . During supper Russian national songs were played, arranged for two flutes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. This "meltingly" sad—but to me satisfactory combination—delighted me, especially the horns in the lower registers (I could not endure shrill tones); and perhaps these songs which I heard in my childhood first suggested the idea of making use of our national music.'

Glinka received his earliest instruction on the pianoforte from his governess, Fräulein Klammer. In 1817 he was sent to an aristocratic private school in St. Petersburg, which he left in 1822. During this period he took a short course of piano lessons from the celebrated John Field. When the latter left St. Petersburg, he continued to study the piano under Obmana and Carl Meyer. With the violin he made less progress, although he took lessons from Böhm, an excellent player and distinguished teacher, who frequently remarked to his pupil with pessimistic foreboding: 'Messieu Klinka, fous ne chuezuez chamais du violon.' In 1822 he made his first essays in composition (variations and a valse for piano). Unluckily he never underwent any complete course of theoretical study until much later in life.

In 1823 Glinka travelled in the Caucasus, and was profoundly impressed by the sublime mountain scenery. On his return, he spent some time at his country home at Novospasskoi, devoting himself to the classical masters: Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Cherubini. At this time he composed a few pieces for his uncle's band. In 1824 he entered the Ministry of Ways and Communications, and settled in St. Petersburg. He now worked in a desultory fashion with various masters, and wrote a septet, two overtures, a quartet, etc. He also took singing lessons from an Italian master, Belloli, and many of his early amateurish songs date from this period. None of these early compositions, although possessing grace and attractive melody, can be regarded as more than tentative efforts to express himself in music. During the four years he spent in the government service and lived in the capital, Glinka moved in a distinguished social circle, and enjoyed the friendship of the Counts Wielgorsky, Th. Tolstoi, the singer Ivanov, and the poets Joukovsky, Delvig and Poushkin. His mental growth at this time must have been rapid, and we learn from his contemporaries that he was an excellent linguist, a good mathematician, and fond of natural science, in fact something of a specialist in zoology.

In 1828 he resigned his official position, and, acting on medical advice, went to Italy, where he spent nearly three years in Milan, Rome and Naples. At this time he made the personal acquaintance of Donizetti and Bellini, and went through a phase of idolatry for Italian music. The enchantment was the natural result of his surroundings, and was not permanent. The remembrance of the strong, sad, yet highly-coloured music of his native land awoke suddenly to remind him that the soft and sensuous beauty of Italian melody was in reality alien to his nature. The intention of some day composing a national opera—hitherto a vague and nebulous dream—now began to take a definite form. In 1833 he left Italy and went to Berlin, where he placed himself under the celebrated master Dehn, and at 29 embarked upon his first serious course of theory. Dehn realised the waste of time involved in putting such a pupil through a long and graduated method of instruction. He helped Glinka to reduce to some kind of order his considerable stock of desultory knowledge, and gave him what may be described as a bird's-eye view of harmony, counterpoint, fugue and composition generally. The following year the death of his father compelled Glinka to return to Russia. The idea of composing a national opera was firmly rooted in his mind, and received the warmest encouragement from the literary circles he frequented. The poet Joukovsky first suggested to him the subject of 'Ivan Sousanin' (the hero of 'A Life for the Tsar') as being characteristically Russian. The actual libretto was entrusted to Baron Rozen. But Glinka's ardour, once aroused, soon outstripped that of his librettist, with the result that the latter was frequently obliged to fit words to ready-made music. Glinka himself says, 'The idea of contrasting the national music of Russia and Poland, many of the themes, and even the details, all flashed into my mind at once.' Under these circumstances it is not surprising that the libretto, while excellent as regards dramatic effect, is poor in literary quality. The opera took about two years to complete, and for a considerable time the Intendant of the Imperial Opera refused to accept it. Finally the influence of Glinka's friends prevailed, and the work, under the title of 'A Life for the Tsar,' was performed for the first time, in the presence of the Imperial family, Nov. 27, 1836. The success of the opera was immediate. The public were carried away by the freshness of the music—which with all its novelty did not depart too far from their accepted ideal—and still more touched by the patriotic sentiment of the subject. A few 'aristocrats,' sneering at the national colouring of the work, spoke of it as 'the music of coachmen'; thereby provoking Glinka's sarcastic rejoinder: 'What does it matter, since the men are superior to their masters!' But the more thoughtful critics saw that the opera was new in the best sense of the word, and marked a fresh departure in art—the birth of a genuine school of Russian music.

In 1838 Glinka was sent to Little Russia to discover fine voices for the service of the Imperial Chapel, in which he held the office of choirmaster from 1836-39. He had already composed a few numbers of a second opera upon Poushkin's poem 'Russlan and Lioudmilla,' but the work proceeded slowly; partly because of the multiplicity of librettists who took part in its construction, and partly because of Glinka's failing health and painful domestic dissensions, which led to his separation from his wife. The first performance of 'Russlan and Lioudmilla' did not take place until Nov. 1842, and it soon became evident that this work—the supreme effort of Glinka's genius—was not destined to please the public. 'Russlan,' while lacking the human interest and dramatic movement of 'A Life for the Tsar,' is infinitely superior from the purely musical point of view. As in his first opera, Glinka contrasted the characteristic melody and rhythms of Russia and Poland, so in 'Russlan' he employs—with far greater mastery—the music of the neighbouring East, side by side with that of his native land. Thus we have a chorus based upon a Persian melody; a ballet movement upon a Turkish theme in 6-8 time, and several genuine Tatar airs. Both Glinka's operas practically follow the traditional forms of French grand opera, while showing a certain freedom from conventional limitations which raises them above the fashionable model of the day. Glinka, for all his strong sense of nationality, was an eclectic who assimilated the Italian sense of beauty and respect for the human voice, the audacity and brilliance of the French school as represented by Berlioz, and the solidity—especially as regards technical methods—of the German classical composers.

The failure of 'Russlan and Lioudmilla,' the fruit of his matured convictions, came as a bitter disappointment to Glinka. Suffering in body and discouraged in spirit, he left Russia in 1844 for a prolonged sojourn in France and Spain. In Paris he made the acquaintance of Berlioz, whom he regarded as 'the first composer of the day—in his own line.' A similarity of destinies—both were smarting under the unappreciative attitude of their compatriots—drew Berlioz and Glinka more closely together. In an article in the Journal des Débats in 1845, the French composer spoke very highly of Glinka's music, praising its originality and freshness of inspiration; while Glinka on the other hand did all in his power to forward the interests of Berlioz in Russia. The study of Berlioz's music and of the Paris public had its practical influence upon Glinka. 'I am determined to compose some orchestral concert pieces,' he wrote at this time; 'for I think it would be possible to unite the requirements of art and the demands of the public, and, profiting by the present perfection of instrumentation and execution, to compose works which should satisfy both the connoisseur and the ordinary hearer.' The outcome of this resolve was: 'The Jota Aragonese,' 'Night in Madrid,' 'Kamarinskaya,' etc. Another important work which Glinka composed between 1838-42 was the incidental music to Count Koukolnik's tragedy 'Prince Kholm'sky.' This consisted of an overture, three songs, and four entr'actes, and is considered the finest example of Glinka's symphonic music. 'Many touches in "Prince Kholm'sky,"' wrote Tchaikovsky, 'recall the brush of Beethoven. . . . Each entr'acte which follows the overture is a little picture painted by a master-hand. They are symphonic marvels, which would suffice a second-rate composer for a whole series of long symphonies.' In Spain Glinka collected a great deal of musical material for future use. On his return to Russia he went first to Smolensk and thence to Warsaw, where he remained three years. 'Kamarinskaya' was composed in 1848, 'Night in Madrid' in 1851, and during a second visit to Paris in 1852 he began a symphonic poem on the subject of Gogol's 'Tarass Boulba' which was never finished. On the outbreak of the Crimean War, Glinka was moved by patriotic feelings to return to St. Petersburg. Here he began a new opera on a play by Shakhovsky, but soon tired of it. In 1855 he started to write his autobiography, at the request of his sister Madame Shestakov. During his connexion with the Imperial Chapel, Glinka had composed a few examples of church music; now, after an interval of fourteen years, he once more turned his attention to this branch of his art. Believing that the harmonisation of the old folk-songs was based upon the ecclesiastical modes, he resolved to study the music of the Western Church, and went to Berlin in 1856 in order to go into the matter with Dehn. He was not destined to carry his studies very far. Returning from a concert at which the trio from 'A Life for the Tsar' had been sung, he was seized with a fit, and died at five in the morning. Glinka was buried in Berlin, but a few months later his remains were transported to St. Petersburg, and re-interred in the cemetery of the Alexander Nevsky Monastery.

Glinka's chief claim to be admitted to the first rank of musical genius lies in the fact that he possessed, in an extraordinary degree, both the assimilative and germinal forces. He summed a long series of tentative efforts to create a national opera, and at the same time he laid the foundation of the modern Russian school of music. He did not merely play with local colour, but recast the primitive speech of the folk-song into a new and polished idiom, so that henceforth Russian music was able to take its place among the distinctive schools of Western Europe. His operas must, therefore, be regarded as epoch-making works, even by those who compare the quality of the music unfavourably with the operatic masterpieces of other nations. It is a mistake to suppose that Glinka was lacking in creative power. He rarely uses the folk-tunes in their crude state. Almost invariably he originated his own melodies, although they were penetrated through and through by national sentiment and colour. His harmony is in perfect keeping with this characteristic melody, and he shows himself in many instances to be a skilful contrapuntist. Although he makes no tire-some display of musical erudition, it is impossible to study his scores without realising that he was a master of all technical means. Glinka's orchestral fantasias strike us as extraordinarily fresh and modern, despite the lapse of time. His orchestration, strong without violence, is invariably rich, felicitous and full, though temperate, in colour. He preferred, as far as possible, to get his effects by simple means, and did not crave the aid of 'every modern luxury.' A retarded development, the result of an amateur atmosphere, delicate health, and the comparative indifference of his contemporaries, are all reasons why Glinka did not accomplish all that might have been hoped from the distinguished quality of his genius. But a man's influence on succeeding generations is not always in proportion to the volume of his work. Glinka possessed that initiative faculty which begets a whole school of disciples and leaves an undying influence upon his art.

Glinka's chief works—none of which bear opus numbers—include:

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC ORCHESTRAL

Two Spanish overtures, 'The Jota Aragonese' and 'Night in Madrid'; 'Fantasia "Kamarinskaya"'; 'Incidental music to "Prince Kholm'sky"'; 'Valse-Fantaisie (1856; new edition, 1856).

CHAMBER AND PIANOFORTE MUSIC

String quartet in F (1830); Minuet for string quartet; 'Fæthetic' trio for pianoforte, clarinet and bassoon (1826-27). Sextet for pianoforte and strings (1832-34). For Pianoforte about forty pieces in all, including five valses, seven mazurkas, eight sets of variations, four fugues, polkas, nocturnes, polonaises, etc.

GLISSANDO (Ital., 'sliding'). (1) a direction generally used of pianoforte passages in which the back of the finger is made to slide, producing a very brilliant scale, of course exclusively on the white keys. In the finale of Beethoven's sonata in C, op. 53, there are passages in octaves which were formerly practicable as glissando passages on pianos with a light touch. The parallel passage in Weber's 'Concertstück' can be played thus even on a modern piano. M.

(2) The most important glissando effects of modern music are those of the harp in the orchestra. By means of the pedals a great variety of scale is obtainable on the harp. The introduction into the musical vocabulary of the scale in whole tones has immensely increased the use of the glissando on the harp, which is not amenable to chromatic progression (see HARP). For examples of the notation of these glissandos, see ABBREVIATIONS.

(3) The glissando of the violin family is a prolonged portamento, that is, a slide from one note to another without definition of the connecting intervals.

(4) A glissando of this type is also possible on the trombone, and much used in music of the 'Jazz' type. It was exploited by Arthur Pryor, trombone-player in J. P. Sousa's band.

GLOCKENSPIEL (Fr. carillon; jeu de timbre; Ger. Stahlspiel; Ital. campanetta), the name given to an instrument by means of which a series of tuned bells, or steel bars, can be played by one performer. As used now in the orchestra, steel bars are employed in preference to bells, being more convenient, more easily manipulated, better in tone—being free from the dissonant overtones prominent in small bells—and capable of accurate tuning. The Glockenspiel has sometimes been constructed so as to be played from a keyboard, but the more usual plan is to strike the bars with a couple of wooden hammers. The bars are arranged in two rows, 'natural' notes and 'chromatic.'

The compass extends from  downwards to  or to  in a larger type of instrument. The part is written two octaves below the actual pitch.

According to Gevaert the Glockenspiel originated in a toy-imitation of the Flemish carillons. (See BELL for early use of small chimes in the orchestra.) There is a military band form of the instrument known as the 'Lyra,' the bars being arranged on a lyre-shaped frame, while in Germany a series of inverted metal cups were arranged pyramidally on a support that could be held in the hand. Similar in construction was the 'Turkish Crescent' formerly used in the British Army. (See also CHINESE PAVILION.)

At first only used for special 'bell' effects, the Glockenspiel has become an integral part of the modern symphony and opera orchestras, largely due to Wagner's introduction of it into the scores of the 'Ring' and 'Die Meistersinger.' (See MARIMBA and TUBUPHONE.)

GLORIA. (1) GLORIA IN EXCELSIS, the angelical hymn in the Ordinary of the Mass, is found in the Eastern Church as early as the time of St. Athanasius. (See MASS.) In the second English Prayer Book (1552) it was transferred from its traditional position near the beginning to near the end of the office. (See SERVICE.)

GLOVER, CHARLES W. (b. London, Feb. 1806; d. there, Mar. 23, 1863), was a pupil of T. Cooke. He became a violin-player in the orchestras of Drury Lane and Covent Garden Theatres. In 1832 he was appointed musical director at the Queen's Theatre, Tottenham Street, and continued so for some years. He was the composer of numerous songs and duets, some of which were very popular, as 'Jeannette and Jeannot,' 'Sing not that song to me, sweet bird,' 'Of love, pretty maidens, beware.'

W. H. H.

GLOVER, (1) JOHN WILLIAM (b. Dublin, June 19, 1815; d. Dec. 18, 1899), studied in Dublin, and played in an orchestra from 1830. In 1848 he succeeded Haydn Corri as director of the music in the R.C. Pro-Cathedral, and was appointed professor of vocal music in the Normal Training School of the Irish National Education Board. In 1851 he founded the Choral Institute of Dublin, and for many years was an energetic promoter of choral music in Ireland. He composed two Italian operas by Metastasio, 'St. Patrick at Tara,' a cantata performed at the O'Connell centenary in 1875; 'Erin's Martin Song,' 1873; an ode to Thomas Moore, 'One hundred years ago,' 1879; and an opera on 'The Deserted Village,' 1880, besides church music, songs, concertos, etc. (Brit. Mus. Biog., etc.).

(2) JAMES MACKEY (b. Kingstown, Co. Dublin, June 18, 1861), grandson of the above, was director of music at Drury Lane Theatre, London, from 1893, for 30 years. The son of James Mackey and Mary Jane Glover, he assumed the name Glover in 1880.

His skill in the arrangement of music for innumerable pantomimes and other productions at Drury Lane earned him considerable notoriety. He published hundreds of songs, dances, and other pieces of theatrical music, and two books, Jimmy Glover's hys booke (1911) and Jimmy Glover's Friends (1913).

GLOVER, SARAH ANN (b. Norwich, 1785; d. Malvern, Oct. 20, 1867), was the daughter of a clergyman in Norwich. Her Manual of the Norwich Sol-Fa System was published in 1845, but about four years before that John Curwen discovered the practical excellence of her system, and after various modifications and improvements, devoted himself to its promulgation. In 1850 Miss Glover published a Manual containing a Development of the Tetrachordal System.

GLOVER, STEPHEN RALPH (b. London, Dec. 7, 1813; d. Bayswater, Dec. 7, 1870), teacher and composer. From the year 1840 to nearly 1870 his facile pen produced sacred and sentimental songs, ballads, duets and pianoforte pieces, resulting in a record of some 12-1500 separate compositions, many of them published. The duet 'What are the wild waves saying?' (1850), and the multitude of his ballads, are now justly forgotten, as well as 'Beauty and the Beast,' a chamber opera, 1863. Less popular but more favourable examples of his talent are perhaps contained in a collection of (12) 'Songs from the Holy Scriptures,' published by Jefferys; and his setting of Longfellow's 'Excelsior' is not without merit. L. M. M.

GLOVER, WILLIAM HOWARD (b. Kilburn, London, June 6, 1819; d. New York, Oct. 28, 1875), was a son of Mrs. Glover, the celebrated actress. He was for many years musical critic to the Morning Post. His chief compositions were 'Tam O'Shanter,' a cantata produced by the New Philharmonic Society, July 4, 1855, and performed at the Birmingham Festival of the same year, the operas of 'Ruy Blas,' produced at Covent Garden, Oct. 31, 1861, and 'Aminta,' at the Haymarket Theatre; 'Once too often,' operetta at Drury Lane, Jan. 20, 1862; 'The Coquette'; 'Palomita' (New York); Overtures to 'Manfred' and 'Comala'; numerous songs, romances, etc. He arranged performances of Beethoven's 'Pastoral Symphony,' with pictorial and choregraphical illustrations in 1863, and of 'Israel in Egypt' on a somewhat similar plan in 1865. In 1868 Glover quitted England for New York, where he was conductor of Niblo's orchestra.

GLUCK, CHRISTOPH WILLIBALD, RITTER VON (b. Weidenwang, near Neumarkt, Upper Palatinate, July 2, 1714¹; d. Vienna, Nov. 15, 1787), composer, famous for his reform of the opera in the 18th century.

His father, Alexander, and his mother, Walburga, belonged to the household of Prince Lobkowitz, and it was at his castle of Eisenberg that Christoph passed his early days. At 12 he was sent for six years to the Jesuit school at Komotau in Bohemia, where he studied classics, and had his first lessons in singing, the violin, harpsichord and organ. In 1732 he went to Prague, where he continued his musical education under Czernohorsky, and also learned the violoncello; maintaining himself in the meanwhile by singing in church, playing the violin at the peasants' dances in the neighbouring villages, and giving concerts in the larger towns near Prague.

EARLY OPERAS.—In 1736 he went to Vienna, and at the house of Prince Lobkowitz was fortunate enough to meet Prince Melzi, a distinguished amateur, who engaged him for his private band, took him to Milan, and placed him with G. B. Sammartini to complete his studies in harmony. Gluck soon began to write operas²: 'Artaserse' (Milan), 1741; 'Demetrio' (Venice) and 'Demofonte' (Milan), 1742; 'Artamene' (Crema), in 1743; 'La finta schiava' (in collaboration) (Venice), 'Ipermestra,' 'Sofonisba' (Milan), in 1744; and 'Poro' (Turin), 1744. All these and 'Ippolito' (Milan, Jan. 1745) were well received, and in consequence of their success he was invited in 1745 to London as composer for the opera at the Haymarket. Here he produced 'La caduta de' Giganti' (Jan. 7, 1746), and 'Artamene' (re-written), both without success. It is recorded³ of Handel that he declared the music detestable, and that the composer knew 'no more counterpoint than his cook'—Waltz, who, however, was a fair bass singer. Counterpoint was never Gluck's strong point, but the works just named had not even originality to recommend them. It is also said,⁴ however, that Handel gave Gluck some cynical advice to the effect that he had taken too much trouble for the English. He also appeared on Apr. 23, 1746, at the Haymarket Theatre in the unexpected character of a performer on the musical glasses, accompanied by the orchestra.⁵ (See HARMONICA.)

But his journey to England, mortifying as it was to his vanity, exercised an important influence on Gluck's career, for it forced him to reflect on the nature of his gifts, and eventually led him to change his style. The pasticcio taught him that an air, though effective in the opera for which it was written, may fail to make any impression when transferred to a different situation and set to different words. A visit to Paris shortly after gave him the opportunity of hearing Rameau's operas; and in listening to the French composer's admirably appropriate recitatives, he came to the conclusion that the Italian opera of that time was but a concert, for which, as the Abbé Arnaud happily expressed it, the drama furnished the pretext. Returning to Vienna by way of Hamburg and Dresden, where 'Le nozze d' Ercole e d' Ebe' was produced in June 1747, he applied himself to the study of æsthetics as connected with music, and of the language and literature of various countries, taking care at the same time to frequent the most intellectual society within his reach. 'Semiramide riconosciuta' (Vienna, 1748) is a decided step in advance, and in it may be detected the germ of Gluck's distinctive qualities. About this time the composer fell in love with Marianna Pergin, daughter of a rich merchant, who refused his consent to the marriage. This, accordingly, took place after the father's death on Sept. 15, 1750. His next work was 'Filide,' or 'La Contessa de' Numi' (1749), a serenade, or more properly cantata, in two acts, written at Copenhagen for the birthday of Christian VII. 'Ezio' was given at Prague in 1750, and 'La clemenza di Tito' at Naples 1752; from the latter Gluck borrowed many a page for his French operas 'Armide' and 'Iphigénie en Tauride.' These operas were followed in 1752 by 'Issipile' (Prague), and in 1754 by 'Le Cinesi,' first performed at Schönbrunn, 'La danza' (Laxenburg, 1755), 'L'innocenza giustificata' (Vienna, 1755), and 'Antigono' (Rome, 1756). For this last he was rewarded with the order of the Golden Spur, and henceforth the title of 'Ritter' or 'Chevalier' is added to his name in his published works. From 1755-61 Gluck was permanently in Vienna, and to all appearance failing; he wrote divertissements for the palaces of Laxenburg and Schönbrunn; composed airs for the comedies or comic operettas performed at the court theatre; and produced an opera in three acts, 'Tetide' (1760), of which nothing has survived. The ballet of 'Don Juan' (Vienna, 1761), and a visit to Bologna, were the most prominent events of his career before his definite change of style. The years that he spent in Vienna, far from being wasted, were probably most useful to him, for by these apparently insignificant works he was acquiring flexibility of style, and securing powerful patrons, without losing sight of his ultimate aim. His opera 'Orfeo ed Euridice'¹ (Vienna, Oct. 5, 1762)—the libretto not as heretofore by Metastasio, but by Calzabigi—showed to all capable of forming a judgment what were the aims of the reformer of the lyric stage. After the production of this fine work, however, he returned to Metastasio and to pièces de circonstance for the court theatre—'Il trionfo di Clelia' (1763); 'La Rencontre imprévue,' afterwards produced in German as 'Die Pilgrime von Mekka' (1764); 'Il Parnasso confuso,' 'La Corona' and 'Telemacco,'² first produced in Rome, 1750, and partly rewritten (1765); in fact he was obliged to bend to circumstances, and before all things to please the princes who protected him and sang his music. 'Il Parnasso' was played by four archduchesses, the Archduke Leopold accompanying them on the harpsichord. It was probably between this date and the departure of Marie Antoinette for France (May 1770) that Gluck acted as singing-master to that princess.

REFORM OF THE OPERA.—At length, thinking the time had come for bringing his ideas before the public, and finding in Calzabigi a poet who shared his taste for strong dramatic situations, he produced in Vienna 'Alceste' (Dec. 16, 1767) and 'Paride ed Elena' (1770). The scores of these operas were published in Vienna (1769-1770),³ and dedicated respectively to the Archduchess Leopold and the Duke of Braganza. Each contains a dedicatory epistle, briefly explaining Gluck's views on dramatic music (see below). As far as theory went, his system was not new, as it rested on the outlines already sketched by Benedetto Marcello in his 'Teatro alla moda' (1720); but theory and practice are two different things, and Gluck has the rare merit of showing in his 'Alceste' and 'Paride' that he was both composer and critic, and could not only imagine but produce an opera in which all is consecutive, where the music faithfully interprets each situation, and the interest arises from the perfect adaptation of the ensemble of the music to the whole of the drama. The composition of these two great works did not prevent his writing the intermezzi of 'Le Feste d' Apollo,' 'Bauci e Filemone' and 'Aristeo,' produced at the court theatre of Parma in 1769, but not published.

In spite of the favour he enjoyed at the court of Vienna, and of the incontestable beauties contained in 'Orfeo,' 'Alceste' and 'Paride ed Elena,' Gluck's countrymen criticised his new style in a manner so galling, that, conscious of his own power, and by no means devoid of vanity, he resolved to carry out elsewhere the revolution he had determined to effect in dramatic music. In Bailly du Rollet, an attaché of the French embassy in Vienna, he found an enthusiastic partisan and a valuable auxiliary; they consulted as to drama in which music might be employed for enhancing the expression of the words and the pathos of the situations; and their choice fell upon Racine's 'Iphigénie.' This opera, 'Iphigénie en Aulide,' was written in French in 1772, partially rehearsed at the theatre in Vienna towards the end of the same year, and produced at the Opéra in Paris, Apr. 19, 1774. Gluck left no means untried to ensure success—statements of his views, public announcements,¹ public tributes of respect to J. J. Rousseau, letters to authors whose goodwill it was desirable to propitiate—in short, everything that ability and experience in such matters could suggest. And yet if it had not been for the all-powerful protection of his former pupil, Marie Antoinette, he would in all probability have failed in getting his work performed, so strong was the opposition which his arrival in France had roused, especially amongst those interested in keeping him out of the Académie de Musique. The Dauphiness seems to have been really attached to her old singing-master. In a letter to her sister Marie Christina (May 3, 1777) she calls him 'notre cher Gluck,' and after the success of 'Orphée' she granted him a pension of 6000 francs, and the same sum for every fresh work he should produce on the French stage.

The appearance of 'Iphigénie en Aulide' marks a new era in the history of French opera. This severe and deeply conceived work transports us bodily into Greece; it is pervaded throughout by an antique atmosphere, of the days of Sophocles rather than of Euripides. What a bold innovation is the overture, with the inexorable voice of the oracle making itself heard, and with the striking unison passage, which at once forces the ruling thought of the drama into notice, while it closely connects the symphony with the action on the stage! Then again, how grand, how just, how pathetic is the declamation of all the airs! These airs, it must be confessed, succeed each other too rapidly, and one cannot but regret that the librettist did not perceive how much the action is retarded by making three airs follow each other in one act, a mistake which might easily have been avoided. But how ingenious are the artifices to which Gluck resorts in order to give variety to the recitative and the declamatory passages! How skilfully he brings in his short incisive symphonies, and how much effect he produces by syncopation! How appropriately he introduces the orchestra to emphasise a word, or to point a dramatic antithesis! How graceful is the chorus 'Que d'attraits'! and how startling and attractive are the brilliancy, force and boldness of the harmony in the hymn of triumph 'Chantons, célébrons notre reine'! While listening to the air of Agamemnon, 'Au faite des grandeurs,' the enthusiastic Abbé Arnaud exclaimed, 'With that air one might found a religion.' What a depth of expression is contained in the air 'Par un père cruel à la mort condamnée,' and what heart-rending emotion in the recitative not to speak of the scene in which Clytemnestra faints, the duet between Achille and Iphigénie which gave rise to so many discussions, the quartet or the dance music!

Owing to the support of the court and the pains taken by Gluck to obtain a thoroughly satisfactory performance, 'Iphigénie' was most favourably received.² Its success gave the finishing stroke to the antiquated works of Lully and Rameau, and introduced into grand opera the revolution already effected in opéra-comique by Philidor, Monsigny and Grétry.

'Iphigénie' was speedily followed by 'Orphée et Eurydice,' adapted from the 'Orfeo' already mentioned, and produced at the Académie, Aug. 2, 1774. This opera made a profound impression, although Gluck was compelled to transpose the music of Orpheus to suit Legros, a tenor, as there was no contralto capable of taking the part.

In accordance with a desire expressed by Marie Antoinette, and which Gluck was too good a courtier to refuse, 'Le Poirier' (or 'L'Arbre enchanté'), a comedy by Vadé, which he had composed in 1762, and 'Cythère assiégée,' a piece of Favart's which he had converted into an opera in 1759, were performed at the court theatre at Versailles in 1775. The latter work was also produced in Paris (Aug. 1 of the same year) with a divertissement by P. M. Berton, and with a want of success which compelled Arnaud to admit that 'Hercules was more at home with the club than the distaff.'

For this failure, however, Gluck was consoled by the brilliant success of his 'Alceste,' which he rearranged for the French stage (Apr. 24, 1776), and which created quite as much enthusiasm as 'Orphée' had done, notwithstanding a want of variety in the libretto. It is in this fine work that the oracle of Apollo pronounces its stern decree on a reiterated note which strikingly pictures the immutability of the infernal deities. This touch of deliberate inspiration was not lost on Mozart in 'Don Giovanni,' nor on Ambroise Thomas in 'Hamlet.'

WAR WITH THE PICCINNISTS.—In order to prove that it was not in tragedy alone he excelled, but that he also possessed the descriptive faculty, and could depict scenes of luxury, and express tender and graceful sentiments, Gluck composed 'Armide' (Sept. 23, 1777).³ He had been reproached with having no melody, and with making his singers shriek; this work, which contains many charming passages, and a duet magnificent for passion and tenderness, was his answer. The excitement it aroused is almost incredible. Piccinni had recently arrived in Paris, and, under Marmontel's superintendence, was composing his 'Roland,' to be produced four months after 'Armide.' His admirers, and the partisans of the old Italian music, were furious at Gluck's success, and every one knows the lengths to which the war of the Gluckists and Piccinnists was carried. It was even more violent than the old quarrel of the Bouffons, since the combatants were encouraged by the bodily presence of the rival masters. Marmontel, La Harpe, Ginguené, d'Alembert, the Chevalier de Chastellux, Framery and Coquéau, were among the attacking party, while the chief defenders were Suard and the Abbé Arnaud. Not content with disparaging Gluck's genius in his Essai sur les révolutions de la musique, Marmontel went the length of writing an entire poem, 'Polymnie,' in praise of the Italian school and his favourite Piccinni. Space will not permit us to enumerate the pamphlets, epigrams and satires which emanated from both sides in this contest; nearly all that are of any importance may be found in the memoirs¹ of the Abbé Leblond. The champions of the Italian school accused him of composing operas in which there was 'little melody, little nature, and little elegance or refinement.' They declared that the noise of his orchestra² was necessary to drown his clumsy modulations; that his accompanied recitativo was nothing but an overloaded imitation of the Italian 'recitativo obbligato'; that his choruses were less dramatic than those of Rameau; and that his duets were borrowed, and badly borrowed, from the 'duetti a dialogo' which he had heard in Italy. They could not forgive what Marmontel calls his 'harsh and rugged harmony, the incoherent modulations, mutilations and incongruities contained in his airs,' but they were most offended by his 'want of care in choosing his subjects, in carrying out his designs, and giving completeness and finish to his melodies.' In short, they denied him the possession of any creative genius whatever. They might as well have denied the existence of the sun—but passion invariably blinds its votaries.

³ Comparing it with 'Alceste,' Gluck himself says, 'The two operas are so different that you will hardly believe them to be by the same composer. . . . I have endeavoured to be more of the painter and the poet and less of the musician, and I confess that I should like to finish my career with this opera. In "Armide" there is a delicate quality which is wanting in "Alceste," for I have discovered the method of making the characters express themselves so that you will know at once whether it is Armide who is speaking or one of her followers.' o.

The Abbé Arnaud, on the other hand, met the systematic disparagement of Marmontel and La Harpe with his Profession de foi en musique; an excellent treatise on musical æsthetics, though little more than a paraphrase of the celebrated dedication which Gluck himself had prefixed to the score of 'Alceste.' This statement of the great reformer's principles is well worth transcribing.

'When I undertook to set the opera of "Alceste" to music (he begins), I resolved to avoid all those abuses which had crept into Italian opera through the mistaken vanity of singers and the unwise compliance of composers, and which had rendered it wearisome and ridiculous, instead of being, as it once was, the grandest and most imposing stage of modern times. I endeavoured to reduce music to its proper function, that of seconding poetry by enforcing the expression of the sentiment, and the interest of the situations, without interrupting the action, or weakening it by superfluous ornament. My idea was that the relation of music to poetry was much the same as that of harmonious colouring and well-disposed light and shade to an accurate drawing, which animates the figures without altering their outlines. I have therefore been very careful never to interrupt a singer in the heat of a dialogue in order to introduce a tedious ritornelle, nor to stop him in the middle of a piece either for the purpose of displaying the flexibility of his voice on some favourable vowel, or that the orchestra might give him time to take breath before a long-sustained note.

'Furthermore, I have not thought it right to hurry through the second part of a song if the words happened to be the most important of the whole, in order to repeat the first part regularly four times over; or to finish the air where the sense does not end in order to allow the singer to exhibit his power of varying the passage at pleasure. In fact, my object was to put an end to abuses against which good taste and good sense have long protested in vain.

'My idea was that the overture ought to indicate the subject and prepare the spectators for the character of the piece they are about to see; that the instruments ought to be introduced in proportion to the degree of interest and passion in the words; and that it was necessary above all to avoid making too great a disparity between the recitative and the air of a dialogue, so as not to break the sense of a period or awkwardly interrupt the movement and animation of a scene. I also thought that my chief endeavour should be to attain a grand simplicity, and consequently I have avoided making a parade of difficulties at the cost of clearness; I have set no value on novelty as such, unless it was naturally suggested by the situation and suited to the expression; in short there was no rule which I did not consider myself bound to sacrifice for the sake of effect.'

Gluck followed these precepts in composing his 'Iphigénie en Tauride,' produced in Paris (in four acts) with immense success, May 18, 1779. It is the highest and most complete expression of his genius. Amongst its many beauties must be specified the air of Thous; the airs 'Je t'implore et je tremble' (borrowed from 'Telemaque'), 'O malheureuse Iphigénie' (originally written for 'La clemenza di Tito'), 'Unis dès la plus tendre enfance,' sung by Pylades; and, beyond all, the sleep of Orestes—the heart-breaking remorse of the deceitful parricide, the spirited choruses, and the barbarous Scythian dances. These passages all glow with colour, though the means by which the effect is produced are of the simplest kind. By this chef-d'œuvre Gluck amply vindicated his superiority over Piccinni, whose 'Iphigénie en Tauride' (Jan. 23, 1781) could not make way against that of his rival.

The last work which Gluck composed for the Opéra in Paris was 'Écho et Narcisse' (Sept. 21, 1779). Though not very successful, it was revived in Aug. 1780, and one of the airs, and the 'Hymne à l'Amour,' have since been introduced into 'Orphée.' It was, however, with 'Les Danaïdes' that Gluck intended to close his laborious career; but an apoplectic seizure compelled him to relinquish the task, and he transferred the libretto to his pupil Salieri. He left Paris for Vienna (Mar. 10, 1775), where he passed his last years in the enjoyment of the position secured by his fame and his large fortune, until his death from a second stroke of apoplexy.

Mlle. Pelletan (d. 1876) began a magnificent edition of Gluck's works. The full scores of the two 'Iphigénies,' with a portrait, and preface in three languages, 'Alceste,' 'Armide,' 'Écho et Narcisse,' the 'Prologo' of 1767 and 'Orphée' appeared therein (1873-96). For those who wish to study the physiognomy of this diplomatic composer, impetuous artist and amusingly vain man, there are the engravings of Miger¹ and Sichling from the portrait painted by Duplessis in 1775, Saint Aubin's engraving from Houdon's celebrated bust (see PLATE XXVII.), and Philippeaux's from the picture painted by Houdeville. There is a full-length statue of Gluck by Cavalier in the Opera House in Paris. Under Miger's portrait are the words of Pythagoras, 'He preferred the Muses to the Sirens,' words applied to him by Wieland, and, as such, in striking contrast to the many bitter remarks of earlier German critics.

SUMMARY.—Before summing up our opinion of Gluck's works as a whole, we have only to remark that, according to Fétis, he failed in symphony proper, and was by no means distinguished as a composer of sacred music. A list of extant 'symphonies' (i.e. overtures), trios, sonatas, a concerto and a quartet is given in Q.-L. He wrote a portion of an oratorio, 'Il convito di Baldassare,' and for the Church the psalm 'Domine, Dominus noster' for choir and orchestra, a De profundis for the same (engraved), an Ave Verum and Tantum ergo for four-part choir with organ, and a part of the cantata 'Le Jugement dernier,' completed by Salieri. Seven odes by Klopstock, set for voice and harpsichord accompaniment, were printed in Vienna (1787), Berlin, Copenhagen and elsewhere; the Göttingen Musenalmanach for 1774-75 contains eight songs.

Gluck's fame therefore rests entirely on his dramatic compositions. Padre Martini said that he combined in the musical drama 'all the finest qualities of Italian, and many of those of French music, with the great beauties of the German orchestra'—in other words, he created cosmopolitan music. He was not satisfied with introducing a correct style of declamation, and banishing false and useless ornaments from the stage; and yet if he had merely carried to perfection the work begun by Lully and Rameau; if his efforts had been limited to removing the harpsichord from the orchestra, introducing the harp and trombones, employing the clarinets, scoring with skill and effect, giving more importance and interest to the overture, and employing with such magic effect the artifice of momentary pauses to vary or emphasise speech in music,—if he had done no more than this he would have earned our gratitude, but he would not in that case have been one of the monarchs of art. What then did he accomplish that was so extraordinary? He grasped the idea that the mission of music was not merely to afford gratification to the senses, and he proved that the expression of moral qualities is within her reach. He disdained all such tricks of the trade as do not appeal to the heart—in fact he 'preferred the Muses to the Sirens.' He aimed at depicting historic or legendary characters and antique social life, and in this work of genius he put into the mouth of each of his heroes accents suited to their sentiments, and to the spirit of the times in which they lived. He made use of the orchestra to add to the force of a dramatic situation, or (in one noble instance) to contrast external repose with the internal agitation of a remorseful conscience. In a word, all his French operas show him to have been a noble musician, a true poet, and a deep thinker.

Like Corneille he has endowed France with a series of sublime tragedies; and if the author of 'Le Cid,' 'Les Horaces,' 'Cinna,' 'Polyeucte' and 'Pompée' may be justly reproached with too great a preference for Lucan and Seneca, there is perhaps also cause for regret that Gluck was too much influenced by the declamatory school then prevalent in France. But, like the father of French tragedy, how nobly has he redeemed an occasional inflation or monotony, a few awkward phrases, or trifling inaccuracies of style! There is another point of resemblance between these two men, whose manly genius was reflective rather than spontaneous; all their works have in common the element of grandeur, but they differ from one another in physiognomy, form and character. The influence of such Art as theirs is anything but enervating; on the contrary, it elevates and strengthens the mind, and is thus placed beyond the reach of the caprices of fashion or the attacks of time. a. c., with addns.

The following summary of Gluck's dramatic works, with the dates of first performances, is based upon the catalogue of M. Wotquenne, already mentioned:

- Artaserse, Milan, Dec. 26, 1741.
- Demetrio, Venice, May 1742.
- Demofonte, Milan, Dec. 26, 1742.
- Artamene, Crema, 1743.
- Sofoniba, Milan, Jan. 18, 1744.
- La finta schiava (in collaboration), Venice, May 1744.
- Ipermestra, Turin, Oct. 1744.
- Porc, Turin, Dec. 26, 1744.
- Ippolito, Milan, Jan. 31, 1745.
- La caduta de' Giganti, London, Jan. 7, 1746.
- Artamene (rewritten), London, Mar. 4, 1746.
- Le nozze d' Ercole e d' Ebe, Dresden, June 29, 1747.
- Semiramide riconosciuta, Vienna, May 14, 1748.
- La Contessa de' Nulm, Copenhagen, Apr. 9, 1749.
- Esio, Prague, 1750.
- La clemenza di Tito, Naples, Nov. 4, 1752.
- Isabelle, Prague, 1752.
- Le Cinesi, Schönbrunn, Sept. 24, 1754.
- La danza, Laxenburg, May 5, 1755.
- L'ortano della China (ballet), Vienna, 1755.

 Echo et Narcisse, Paris, Sept. 21, 1779.

A ballet, 'Semiramis, which appeared in 1785, is probably apocryphal.
 Cantata, 'The Last Judgment,' finished by Salieri, is in MS. in the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna. In the same library are eleven symphonies or overtures, and a string quartet.
 Seven Odes of Klopstock for voice and clavier were published in 1787 at Vienna.

A symphony for six instruments, dated Venice, 1746, is in the Court Library at Vienna, where there are also two other symphonies. The Brussels Conservatoire possesses three symphonies, and there is a concerto for flute and strings at Capriute.
 Seven trios for two violins and bass were published in London by Simpson, and six sonatas for the same instruments, by the same publisher, in 1746.

A quartet is in the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna.
 An orchestral march and an unpublished sonata are mentioned in Wotquenne's catalogue.

Among modern editions of Gluck's works should be named the critical edition of Pelletan and Imcke, continued by Saint-Saëns and J. Tietz (B. & H., Leipzig); GEVAERT'S Collection des opéras français de Gluck (Jamoine, Paris), also D.D.T. second series, XIV. (li), and P.T.O., XXII. (li) and XXX. (li).

GNECCO, FRANCESCO (b. Genoa, 1769; d. Milan, 1810¹), became a pupil of Mariani, musical director of the Sistine Chapel and of the Cathedral of Savona. He was, according to Regli and Paloschi, a pupil of Cimarosa. Gnecco composed several operas, both serious and comic, of which two only, we believe, have ever been performed out of Italy, viz. 'Carolina e Filandro,' 1798, at the Italian Opera in the Salle Favart, Paris, Oct. 11, 1817 (Castil Blaze), and 'La prova d'un opera seria,' opera buffa in two acts, libretto by the composer, produced at Milan, 1805, and at the Salle Louvois, Paris, Sept. 4, 1806, with Signora Canavassi and Barilli. This last opera was a great success, and enjoyed considerable popularity. It was thrice revived in Paris, viz. in 1810, in 1831 with Malibran and Lablache; on Oct. 28 of the same year, with Pasta; and on Nov. 20 it was played with the first act of 'Tancredi' on the occasion of Malibran's last appearance in Paris. In 1834 it was reduced to one act. 'La prova' was produced June 23, 1831, at the King's Theatre, with Pasta, Curioni and Lablache, and, thanks to the last-named singer, became popular. It was revived in one act July 3, 1854, with Lablache, Viardot-Garcia, Stigelli and Ronconi, and was last produced on June 18 and 19, 1860, at Her Majesty's, for Ciampi, since which it has disappeared from the stage. A duet from it, 'O guardate che figura,' was highly popular in the concert-room when sung by Viardot and Tamburini, and on one occasion the former made it a vehicle for imitation of the latter's mannerisms, which the gentleman by no means took in good part.² A. GNESSIN, MIKHAIL FARIANOVICH (b. 1883), Russian composer. He was a favourite pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, with whom he studied at the Petrograd Conservatoire. He was living in Moscow in 1925. In his early works he showed a sense of form acquired from his master, combined with Wagnerian influences. Later on he identified himself with the school of vague religious thought which prevailed in Russia shortly before the revolution. He set poems by Balmont and Vyacheslav-Ivanov, and composed a 'Symphonic Dithyramb' in memory of the mystical and fantastic painter Vrubel, to whose art he was attracted by the pantheistic tendencies they shared in common. His 'Symphonic Fragment' (after Shelley), op. 4, was produced in this country by Sir Henry J. Wood at a Promenade Concert, Sept. 19, 1917. His Sonata-Ballade for violoncello and piano was first performed by Casals and Siloti at a Philharmonic Concert in Moscow (1910). Gnessin was regarded as a promising composer of distinct, though not powerful, personality. Little has been heard of his work since the revolution. B. N.

GNOCCCHUS (GNOCCHI), JOANNES BAPTISTA (b. Parma, 16th cent.), composed masses, litanies, sacred songs and motets, published partly between 1597 and 1611 (Walther; Q.-L.).

GOBERT, THOMAS (d. Paris, Sept. 26, 1672), Master of Royal Chapel, Paris, 1646-65; chaplain, 1646; canon of Ste. Chapelle, 1651; retired before 1686; composed 'Paraphrase des Pseaumes,' etc., several editions, 1659-86.

romantic composer, whose fame, however, was short-lived.

He first studied the violin under Richard Hammer, and entered the Conservatoire in 1863, where he studied harmony under Reber: he competed twice for the Prix de Rome, but without success. He began by writing chamber music; he played the viola in several chamber music societies, wrote numerous songs, and a number of pieces for piano. He also orchestrated with much delicacy Schumann's 'Kinderscenen' (produced in this form at the Concerts du Châtelet in 1876), for at the beginning of his career he seemed to be specially inspired by this master both in the concentrated expression of his songs and in the elegant forms of his piano pieces. Of two violin concertos, the second, 'Concerto romantique,' was played at the Concerts Populaires by Mlle. M. Tayau in 1876, and repeated several times both by her and Paul Viardot. In 1878 Godard, bracketed with Th. Dubois, carried off the prize at the musical competition instituted by the municipality of Paris, and his prize composition 'Le Tasse' was performed with much success at the Concerts du Châtelet (Dec. 18, 22 and 29, 1878). This dramatic symphony, with soli and chorus, written on a poem by Grandmougin, both the words and music of which are inspired by the 'Damnation de Faust,' was the work on which Godard's artistic reputation was primarily founded. After the exaggerated success of this very interesting and promising work, Godard produced compositions the good qualities of which were often obscured by too hasty workmanship. In succeeding years many symphonic works were produced in Paris at the Concerts du Châtelet and the Concerts Populaires (see list below). After the retirement of Pasdeloup, who was a firm admirer of Godard's works, and generally allowed him to conduct them himself, the latter formed the idea of reviving the Concerts Populaires under the name of Concerts Modernes, but the undertaking proved impracticable, lasting with great difficulty till the end of its first season (Oct. 1885-Apr. 1886). The suite, 'Lanterne magique,' and many of the graceful if rather superficial songs, are the things by which Godard is best known in England. A one-act opera, 'Les Bijoux de Jeannette,' was given in Paris in 1878; and on Jan. 31, 1884, Godard brought out at Antwerp a grand opera, 'Pedro de Zalamea,' written on a libretto by Silvestre and Détrouyat, but without success. Other operas followed, the successful 'La Vivandière' being produced at the Opéra-Comique, Apr. 1, 1895. This was given in England by the Carl Rosa Company at Liverpool in 1896, and at the Garrick Theatre, London, in 1897.

GODDID, WILLIAM (d. circa 1678), the chief English printer of music from type in the middle of the 17th century. He printed all the musical works published by John Playford between the years 1658 and 1678. Godbid left his widow Anne, and John Playford, jun. (son of the above named, and apparently apprenticed to Godbid), in possession of his printing works in Little Britain.

In 1682 Anne Godbid had died or retired, and J. Playford, jun., alone retained the business until his death in 1686, in which year the plant is advertised as for sale. Godbid and his successor were also particularly noted for general learned and mathematical works in addition to musical publications. Frequently (following the old printers' custom) initials only are used on the imprints, as: 'W. G.' or 'printed by A. G. and J. P.'

GODDARD, ARABELLA (b. St. Servan, St. Malo, Jan. 12, 1836; d. Boulogne, Apr. 6, 1922), a distinguished English pianoforteplayer, of an old Salisbury family, was, at the age of 6, placed under Kalkbrenner in Paris, and afterwards had a few lessons from Mrs. Anderson and from Thalberg in England. She made her first appearance in public at the Grand National Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre, of which Balfe was conductor, on Oct. 23, 1850, where her style and mechanism at once made a great impression. On Thalberg's recommendation she was placed in the hands of J. W. DAVISON (q.v.), who led her to the study of those great compositions many of which she played in England for the first time. On Apr. 14, 1853, she made her début, and at once fixed her position as a classical player, at the concert of the Quartet Association, in Beethoven's pianoforte sonata in B \flat , op. 106. The winter of 1854 and the whole of 1855 were passed by Miss Goddard in Germany and Italy. She carried her classical repertory with her; played inter alia at the Gewandhaus Concert, Oct. 1855; and was received with enthusiasm by some of the best critics of Germany. Returning to England, she made her first appearance at the Philharmonic on June 9, 1856, in Sterndale Bennett's concerto in C minor¹; at the Crystal Palace (in Moscheles' concerto in E) on Mar. 13, 1858, and at the Monday Popular Concerts on Mar. 9, 1859.

In 1857 and 1858 Miss Goddard played in London all the latest sonatas of Beethoven (from op. 101 to 111)—at that time almost absolute novelties to most of her hearers—as well as many other masterpieces by Clementi, Dussek, Mozart, Mendelssohn and other masters, either solo or with accompaniment of stringed instruments, in addition to the classical concertos, trios, sonatas, etc. In 1859 she married Davison, who, as already stated, was her real master and the former of her taste. In 1873 Madame Goddard left England for a lengthened tour through America, Australia and India, returning in the autumn of 1876, and making her first reappearance in two recitals at St. James's Hall on Oct. 12 and 19. She appeared in London at Sims Reeves's benefit concert in Mar. 1882; a benefit concert was given for her on Mar. 9, 1890. She became a Roman Catholic in 1900. G.

GODEFROID, the name of two brothers whose reputation was founded on their skilful harp-playing. The elder, (1) JULES JOSEPH (b. Namur, Feb. 23, 1811; d. Paris, Feb. 27, 1840), wrote pieces for his instrument, as well as two comic operas, 'Le Diadesté' and 'La Chasse royale.' The younger brother, (2) DIEUDONNÉ JOSEPH GUILLAUME FÉLIX (b. Namur, July 24, 1818; d. Villers-sur-Mer, July 8, 1897), was a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, and spent the latter part of his life in Brussels. Besides numerous harp solos, etc., he wrote an oratorio, 'La Fille de Saül,' two operas, 'La Harpe d'or' and 'La Dernière Bataille,' and a great number of drawing-room pieces for the pianoforte, which enjoyed great popularity in their day (Riemann; Baker).

GODFREY. A family of English military bandmasters. (1) CHARLES GODFREY (b. Kingston, Surrey, Nov. 22, 1790; d. Westminster, Dec. 12, 1863), the founder, was a drummer in the First Royal Surrey Militia; in 1813 joined the Coldstreams as a bassoon-player, and in 1825 became bandmaster, a post which he filled with honour till his death, at his house in Vincent Square, Westminster, after fifty years' service. He had been discharged from military engagement in 1834, but remained a civilian bandmaster. He was appointed Musician in Ordinary to the King in 1831, and was one of the Court of Assistants of the Royal Society of Musicians. The first journal of military music published in England, under the name of Jullien's Journal, was arranged by Godfrey. Of his five sons, three were educated at the R.A.M., and held simultaneously positions as bandmasters in Guards regiments.

(2) DANIEL (b. Sept. 4, 1831; d. Beraton, near Nottingham, June 30, 1903), the eldest son, entered the R.A.M. as a student of the flute in 1847, and was bandmaster of the Grenadier Guards from 1856-96, when he formed a band of his own. In 1872 he took his band to the United States—the first visit of an English military band since the Independence. He was well known here and abroad by his waltzes for military band—'Guards,' 'Mabel,' 'Hilda,' etc. He was the first army bandmaster to receive commissioned rank (Honorary 2nd Lieutenant).

(3) ADOLPHUS FREDERICK (b. Westminster, 1837; d. Aug. 28, 1882), the second son, entered the Coldstreams in 1856, and in 1863 succeeded his father as bandmaster of that regiment. He resigned this post in 1880.

(4) CHARLES (b. Jan. 17, 1839; d. 1919), the third son, joined the Scots Fusiliers as bandmaster in 1859 and left that regiment in 1868 for a similar position in the Royal Horse Guards, from which he retired in Jan. 1904. He was professor of military music at the R.C.M. and the G.S.M.

Several of the third generation of Godfreys have won distinction in music. Most conspicuous among them is (5) DANIEL EYERS, L.R.A.M. (b. 1868), son of Daniel (2), known, since his knighthood (1922), as SIR DAN GODFREY.

Educated at King's College School and the R.C.M. (from 1884), he was conductor of the London Military Band in 1890; and after a tour, as conductor of an opera troupe, in South Africa in 1891-92, settled at Bournemouth (q.v.), where he has raised the orchestra of the Winter Gardens to a high pitch of excellence. His performances of the classics and of modern works show him to be a conductor (not merely a bandmaster) of very high rank, and the Symphony Concerts, which he has directed since their foundation in 1894, have an important influence on national as well as on local music. He was appointed resident musical adviser to the Corporation in 1895, and subsequently manager of the Winter Gardens. His book Memories and Music (1924) gives the record of his numerous activities and interests. In 1923 he was made F.R.C.M. in company with a number of other distinguished musicians.

Three sons of Charles (4) have also shown remarkable ability: (6) ARTHUR EUGENE (b. Sept. 28, 1868) was a chorister at St. Paul's Cathedral in 1877-83, studied at the R.A.M. in 1883-89, gaining various prizes, and becoming an associate of the R.A.M.; he has won experience as a theatrical conductor, and a string quartet, songs, etc., give evidence of considerable talent. He has written much incidental music for plays, and his musical comedy, 'Little Miss Nobody,' was produced with great success at the Lyric Theatre, and ran for over six months, from Sept. 1898. He was musical adviser to Messrs. Robert Cocks & Co., and later manager of Messrs. Hopwood & Crew, Ltd. (7) CHARLES GEORGE (b. London, Dec. 1866) was educated at St. Paul's School and the R.A.M., and got his first experience of military music as occasional substitute for his father. He was successively organist of St. John's Church, Wapping; bandmaster to the Corps of Commissionaires (1887); and conductor of the military band at the Crystal Palace, 1889-97. In the seasons of 1897 and 1898 he was conductor at the Pavilion Gardens, Buxton; and at Easter, 1899, was appointed musical director at the Spa, Scarborough, a post which he held with distinction till 1909. He has since been conductor of the Royal Parks Band, Hyde Park (1911-24). He has arranged much music for military band, and has written some orchestral pieces. (8) HERBERT A. (b. 1869) was educated at Christ's Hospital and the Royal School of Art (1884-86); he joined the Crystal Palace Military Band in 1889, solo cornet, and became its conductor in 1897, after obtaining experience as a conductor at Folkestone in 1895 and 1896. His works include marches and pièces d'occasion, as well as a complete ballet, 'The Home of the Butterflies,' 1901. (Information from Brit. Mus. Biog., etc.)

(9) DAN STUART (b. London, May 21, 1893), son of Sir Dan Godfrey (5), was educated at Sherborne and R.A.M. He enlisted in the Coldstream Guards in order to qualify for a military bandmastership. He served in the war and obtained a captaincy in the Dorset regiment. He has since conducted at Harrogate and St. Leonards, and he took part as orchestral conductor in the Bournemouth Musical Festival, 1923. He is director to the British Broadcasting Company's station at Manchester.

GODOWSKY, LEOPOLD (b. Wilna, Russian Poland, Feb. 13, 1870), a distinguished pianist whose father was a physician in Wilna. When but 3 years of age Godowsky began to show signs of rare musical aptitude, so that on its early and rapid development it was decided that he should follow a musical career. Many of his juvenile attempts at original composition, made at this time, have since been utilised by Godowsky. His first public appearance as a pianist occurred in his native town in 1879, his success being so emphatic that a tour through Poland and Germany was there and then decided upon for him. At 13 years of age, by the generosity of a rich Königsberg banker, he was able to enter the Hochschule in Berlin, where his masters were Bargiel and Rudorff. There he remained two years, and in 1884 made his first American tour, in conjunction with Ovide Musin, the violinist. Two years later he returned to Europe and became a pupil in Paris of Saint-Saëns. Then followed a tour in France and a visit to London, in 1887 and 1888, where he was commanded to appear at the British Court. In 1890 he returned to America, where he married in 1901 Frieda Saxe, and returned for a tour to Europe; but subsequently he made his home successively in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago (where he was director of the Conservatoire), and toured through the States and Canada. On Dec. 6, 1900, Godowsky appeared in Berlin, and set the seal upon his fame by a series of fine performances, which placed him in the front rank of contemporary pianists, a position he still continues not only to occupy but to strengthen. From 1909-14 he was professor in the 'Master school' of piano-playing (Akademie der Tonkunst) at Vienna. He then returned to the United States and settled in the West, where he has pursued his art as virtuoso and teacher. He has edited many educational works, notably The Progressive Series of Piano-Lessons (St. Louis). His fifty studies on Chopin's 'Études' are really original compositions, not mere transcriptions, and are full of merit. He has made concert-paraphrases for the piano of several works, notably 'Symphonic Metamorphoses on Joh. Strauss's Waltzes.' He himself has written a number of concert studies—opp. 11, 12 and 14, and sundry smaller works, as the polonaise in C, minuet in F, a couple of concert valses, and some songs; a toccata, op. 13; three pieces, op. 15; and four pieces, op. 16.

GOD SAVE THE KING. So much has been written regarding the origin of our National Anthem, and so many irresponsible statements have been made, that it is difficult to sift the probable from the improbable.

The inquiry was started about the year 1800, and up to the present (1926) nothing tangible has been brought to light respecting the problem.

Here only a very brief summary of the facts can be given.

On Sept. 28, 1745, when the news of the defeat of Sir John Cope's army at Prestonpans became known in London, the National Anthem was sung at Drury Lane and at Covent Garden Theatres for several nights, and this was followed by the other theatres.

T. A. Arne had made the musical arrangement for Drury Lane, and Charles Burney, his pupil, that for Covent Garden.

In the Gentleman's Magazine for Oct. 1745 the piece is given, words and music, as 'A song for two voices, as sung at both playhouses.'

This is the first dated copy of the National Anthem. In what is certainly an earlier publication, Thesaurus musicus, the song is headed 'For Two Voices.' This is the treble :

The words follow thus :

'God save our Lord the King,
Long live our noble King,
God save the King.
Send him victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the King.

O Lord our God arise,
Scatter his enemies,
And make them fall ;
Confound their politicks,
Frustrate their knavish tricks,
On him our hopes are fix'd,
O save us all.'

The date of Thesaurus musicus may be fixed at 1742 or 1743. The Gentleman's Magazine copy has three verses and some verbal differences from the above. It begins with 'Lord save great George our King,' and the third verse is :

'Thy choicest gifts in store
On George be pleas'd to pour,
Long may he reign.
May he defend our laws
And ever give us cause
To say with heart and voice
God save the King.'

On Oct. 6 Marshal Wade left with his army for Scotland, and this occasioned the following verse to be added to subsequent copies :

'Lord, grant that Marshal Wade
May by Thy mighty aid Victory bring.
May he sedition hush,
And like a torrent rush
Rebellious Scots to crush.
God save the King.'

It must be stated that through its life the National Anthem has suffered many verbal alterations, and even in its early days scarcely two copies are alike. The original :

'On him our hopes are fix'd,' gave place to 'On Thee,' etc., thus destroying the original prayer for the King's safety and for the nation's belief in his personal right to reign.

Chappell in his Popular Music of the Olden Time stated that the two verses quoted as from Thesaurus musicus appear in Harmonia Anglicana, and as no copy of this work can be found, it has been rashly assumed that it never existed.

A careful examination of the title-page of Thesaurus musicus will show that a previous title has been present, and that it has been scraped off the plate. This may have been Harmonia Anglicana, as the rest of the wording given by Chappell is the same with Thesaurus musicus.

Nobody appears to have troubled to penetrate the mystery of the origin of the National Anthem until 1796, when George Savile Carey, son of Henry Carey, made a claim that his father was the author of the words and music and sought for a pension or some pecuniary reward.

This claim does not appear to have been seriously considered. He based it upon the following evidence, produced half a century after his father's death: that the elder Carey had a difficulty with the bass and took it to John Christopher Smith to correct; also that a gentleman had said that his father had told him that at a dinner in honour of Admiral Vernon's victory of Porto Bello in 1740, Henry Carey had sung the National Anthem and mentioned it as his own composition. This was confirmed by another gentleman in 1796. This is absolutely the only evidence in Carey's favour that can be adduced. It may be mentioned that Henry Carey wrote at least two songs on Vernon's victory which he was more likely to sing than 'God save the King.' Also that in that wine-bibbing age the gentleman must have been a little uncertain as to what song was sung after the bottles had circulated and at fifty years' distance.

We have now to consider another claim. Dr. William Kitchiner was possessed of a manuscript book that had formerly belonged to Dr. Pepusch. It was a transcript of compositions of Dr. John Bull, and was dated 1619. In this was a lengthy exercise upon four notes named 'God save the King.' It bore no relation to the air we know. At Dr. Kitchiner's death Richard Clark bought the book and it was found to contain an 'Ayre' which it is asserted was the original form of our anthem. Clark played the piece over to William Chappell, who thought it resembled 'God save the King,' but on taking it into his hand he found no likeness.

Clark certainly altered the notes and varnished the leaf. After his death, Clark's widow refused to let it be examined, and it has now disappeared.

Sir George Smart copied the 'Ayre,' but whether after or before Clark's alteration is uncertain.

This is Smart's copy :

Dr. Cummings and others assumed that Bull had a claim.

We now come to a later discovery. In 1916-17, W. Barclay Squire and Fuller Maitland, while preparing a number of Purcell's catches, found one named 'Upon the Duke's Return.' It was published in Playford's 'Catch that Catch Can,' 1685, and at an earlier date, in 1682, references are found. In this catch the words 'God save the King' occur, apparently as a quotation, thus showing that the phrase belonging to a song or hymn was known to Purcell. The Duke in question was afterwards James II.

In The Minstrelsy of England, 1902 (Bayley & Ferguson), edited by the present writer, it is urged that some inquiry should be made as to what hand James Oswald, a Scotch musician, had in the modern putting forth of the National Anthem or its composition. Oswald came to London in 1742 and appears to have been employed as a musical hack to John Simpson, who published all early copies (save that in the Gentleman's Magazine) of 'God save the King.' It is probable that Oswald was the 'Judicious Master' who edited and figured Thesaurus musicus. These sundry reasons for the belief in the Oswald claim are fully dealt with in the book referred to.

Much capital was made by Cummings of a book of words in which there is a Latinised version of the anthem. This book is now in the Leeds Public Library. It is a word-book of an entertainment on the birthday of the Princess of Wales in 1743. There is no evidence that the Latinised version is earlier than the English one.

Putting all this confusing mass to the test, it appears to the present writer that there may have been (as is claimed) a song or hymn in honour of the Stuart family, but of this there is not the slightest trace. That the present 'God save the King' was called forth by the Jacobite faction against the reigning monarch is most likely. It is obviously a fervent prayer on his behalf, before it culminated in the rising of 1745. 'Send him victorious' (that is, George II.); 'victorious over the plotters against him.' 'Long to reign over us'—instead of a Stuart king.

'Scatter his enemies and make them fall.
Confound their politicks,
Frustrate their knavish tricks,
On him [that is, on George] our hopes are fix'd;
O save us all [from a Jacobite government].'

This is certainly not a general hymn, but a personal prayer in a moment of danger.

GOEDICKE, ALEXANDER FEODOROVICH (b. Moscow, Mar. 3, 1877), Russian composer and pianist. He studied under Pabst and Safonov (PF.) at the Moscow Conservatoire (1892-98); gold medalist; winner of the Rubinstein Prize (Vienna, 1900); professor at the above institution from 1907. His chief compositions are:

Opera 'Virinea,' 4 acts (MS.); 4 orchestral pieces, op. 4; 3 symphonies, opp. 15, 16 and 30 (MS.); Improvisations, op. 26; PP. Quintet in C, op. 21 (MS.); PP. Trio in G min., op. 14; Violin Sonata in A, op. 10; Russian folk-songs for voice, PP. and vol.; PP. pieces and songs. R. N.

GÖRNER, (1) JOHANN GOTTLIEB (b. Penig, Saxony, 1697; d. Leipzig, Feb. 15, 1778), organist at the Pauliner church, 1721; at Nicolai, 1729; at St. Thomas, 1729. In 1736 he was director of music at the Pauliner church. He founded a Collegium Musicum in 1723 by which he lured away some of Bach's best singers (see Q.-L.). He composed masses and other church music.

(2) JOHANN VALENTIN, his brother (b. Penig, Harz, Feb. 26, 1702), settled in Hamburg before 1732, and was Kapellmeister at the cathedral in 1752. He composed music to Hagedorn's poems in three parts, published respectively in 1742, 1744, 1752 (several editions). Examples are to be found in Friedländer, Das deutsche Lied im 18. Jahrhundert. E. v. d. s.

GÖROLDT, JOH. HEINRICH (b. Stempeda, Harz, Dec. 13, 1773), was music director at Quedlinburg in 1803, where he still lived in the forties. He composed cantatas, chorales, motets and pianoforte pieces, and wrote theoretical works and instruction books (Q.-L.).

GOES, DAMIÃO DE (b. Alemquer, Feb. 1502; d. Lisbon, Jan. 30, 1574), the famous Portuguese historian and traveller, was also a practical musician and composer. Indeed, one of the charges brought against him by the Inquisition was that he associated with musicians, and invited singers to his house to perform masses and motets. The library of John IV. (destroyed in the Lisbon earthquake) contained a volume of 'Motetes e canções,' in which the name of Damião de Goes appears next to that of Josquin des Prés. Two of these still exist: a motet (3 v.) in the 'Dodecachordon' of Glareanus (Basle, 1547), reproduced by Hawkins, and another (6 v.), printed (according to Vieira's Dictionary) at Augsburg in 1545.

GOETTING (GOETTINGUS), VALENTIN, of Witzenhausen-on-the-Werra, Hesse, a 16th-century musician who wrote 'Compendium musicae . . .,' 1586; Psalmus cxii. melodie suavi 8 voc. . ., 1589 (Q.-L.).

GOETZ, HERMANN (b. Königsberg, Dec. 17, 1840; d. Hottingen, near Zürich, Dec. 3, 1876), showed remarkable musical powers in early life, but was not regularly taught music (he took some lessons from L. Köhler) until he was at the University of Königsberg, when he decided to adopt the career of a musician, and placed himself, in 1860, at the Stern Conservatorium in Berlin, under Bülow for piano, and Ulrich for composition. In 1863 he was appointed organist at Winterthur, and moved to Zürich in 1867, but retained the Winterthur appointment until 1870, when ill-health compelled him to resign the post. He devoted himself to the composition of an opera, the libretto of which was based by J. V. Widmann on The Taming of the Shrew, and called 'Der widerspänstigen Zähmung.' After innumerable disappointments, the composer at last had the good fortune to take his work to Ernst FRANK (q.v.), who saw that the opera had all the elements of success, and it was produced under his direction at Mannheim on Oct. 11, 1874. In Feb. 1875 it was played at Vienna, and made its way to Leipzig, Berlin and the other important German operatic centres. It was published in an English version by Augener & Co. in London, minutely analysed in the Monthly Musical Record in 1878, and produced at a matinée at Drury Lane, Oct. 12, 1878. In 1880 it was revived by the Carl Rosa Company at Her Majesty's Theatre, when, as on many former occasions in Germany, Mlle. Minnie Hauk, who undertook the principal part, substituted, for the finest number of the work, the splendid septet in the last act, an ineffective vocal waltz which the composer had reluctantly consented to write for her.

The fame of the opera brought Goetz's other works into prominence; they were not extensive, but they possess such individuality of conception, and such beauty of style, that they were not long in finding enthusiastic admirers, some of whom went so far as to compare Goetz with Brahms, to the disadvantage of the latter. The most important of the early compositions is the symphony in F, a work of lasting beauty, and one that well deserves a place in every classical repertory. The choral setting of Schiller's 'Nänie,' op. 10, and the (posthumous) setting of Psalm cxxxvii. for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, were the first of Goetz's non-operatic works to make their way in England. The latter was given first here by the London Musical Society, June 27, 1879. The chamber compositions, which include a trio and a quintet for piano and strings (the latter work including a double bass), the piano sonata for four hands and the concerto for piano and orchestra, are marked by very high qualities. Whether from failing health, or from some other cause, Goetz's second opera, 'Francesca da Rimini,' produced at Mannheim, Sept. 30, 1877, after the composer's death, was not on a level with his first. Two of the three acts were finished, and the third sketched, by the composer, at whose request his friend Frank finished the score and directed the performance. Goetz died nearly ten months before its production.

In all, or almost all, of Goetz's compositions we feel that he is at his best in a tenderly elegiac mood: that his music gives a picture of a life full of disappointment, and proceeds from a nature quite unfitted to buffet with the world. It is always refined, and on occasion touches chords of sincere and deep emotion. If the comic side of the Shakespearean play on which his most successful work was based seems altogether beyond him, it must be conceded that the musical characterisation of Katharine is a masterpiece in its way. It may be doubted, however, whether her somewhat querulous accents in the earlier scenes represent Shakespeare's shrew; and, charming as is the scene in which she submits herself and acknowledges her love for Petruchio, the spectator feels that in this introspective melancholy, which is the prominent note of the character, much of the hearty animal spirits of the original has been lost.

The list of his published works is as follows:

Op.

1. Trio, pf. and str., in G minor.
2. Three easy pieces for piano and violin.
3. Three songs.
4. Rispetti, six Italian folk-songs.
5. Three Kinderlieder in Swiss dialect.
6. Quartet, pf. and str., E major.
7. Nine pianoforte pieces, 'Lose Blätter.'
8. Two pianoforte sonatas.
9. Symphony, F major.
10. 'Nänie,' for mixed choir, solos and orch. (words by Schiller).
11. Cantata for male voices and orch. (words by W. Müller).
12. Six songs for soprano or tenor.
13. Genrebilder, six pianoforte pieces.

POSTHUMOUSLY PUBLISHED

14. Pa. cxxxvii. for soprano solo, choir and orch.
15. Frühlingsoverture, for orch.
16. Quintet, pf. and str. (with double bass), in C minor.
17. Sonata, for pianoforte, four hands, in G minor.
18. Concerto for piano, in B flat major.
19. Six songs.
20. Four songs for male voice quartet.
21. Seven songs for four-part chorus.
22. Violin concerto in G major, in one movement.

The two operas above mentioned have no opus numbers.

GOLDBERG, JOHANN GOTTLIEB (THEOPHILUS) (b. Königsberg, c. 1720), a pupil of Sebastian Bach from 1733-46, and one of the most remarkable players on the clavier and organ of the middle of the 18th century. He was brought to Bach from Königsberg by Count Kaiserling, the Russian ambassador, of whose establishment he appears to have been a member. Bach held him up as his cleverest and most industrious pupil, and with reason, for to immense executive power he joined an extraordinary facility of improvisation and of playing the most difficult music at sight. His works (as named by Gerber) are not important, and remain in MS.—a motet and a psalm for voices and orchestra; preludes and fugues; 24 polonaises with variations; 2 concertos; a sonata, and 6 trios for flute, violin and bass—all exhibiting a certain melancholy and strong individuality. During the Seven Years' War (1756–63) he was 'Kammermusikus' to Count Brühl. Bach's Thirty Variations were written for Goldberg at the request of Count Kaiserling (in exchange for a golden goblet and 100 louis d'or), and he was accustomed to play them nightly to the Count to lull him to sleep. They are sometimes known as the Goldberg Variations. G.

GOLDBERG, JOSEPH PASQUALE (b. Vienna, Jan. 1, 1825; d. there, Dec. 20, 1890), a famous singing teacher who began his career as a violinist, as a pupil of Mayseder. At the age of 12 he appeared at the Grand Redoutensaal, and performed a concerto in E minor, with orchestra, of his own composition, dedicated to Spohr. After a few years he left Vienna for Italy, and played at Trieste, Venice, Bergamo, etc. From Italy he went to Paris, and was then urged by Rubini and Meyerbeer to become a singer; he received his vocal instruction from Rubini and Bordogni, and afterwards from the old Lamperti in Italy. At the age of 18 in 1843, he made his début at Padua in Donizetti's 'Regina di Golconda,' and met with a most favourable reception. At Verona and Genoa he sang with his sister, Fanny Goldberg Marini, at that time one of the most celebrated prima donnas of Italy, in 'Maria di Rohan.' In 1847 he came to London to fulfil a six-weeks' engagement with Jullien. From 1850–61 he made several provincial concert tours in England with Grisi, Alboni, Mario, etc., and then settled in London. In 1871 Goldberg was commissioned by Correnti, Minister of Public Instruction, to report upon the Conservatoires of Italy, and to propose reforms in the method of instruction. His proposals were approved by Lauro Rossi, the then Principal of the Naples Conservatorio, and were put in force throughout Italy. In consideration of these services Goldberg was created a Knight of the Crown of Italy. He was the composer of 'La marcia trionfale,' which was played by the military bands when the troops of Victor Emanuel entered Rome for the first time. Goldberg was for many years professor at the R.A.M. G.

GOLDMARK, CARL (b. Keszthely on the Plattensee, Hungary, May 18, 1830¹; d. Vienna, Jan. 2,² 1915), a composer, whose father, a cantor in the Jewish synagogue at Keszthely, was too poor to afford to give him regular musical instruction.

The village schoolmaster taught him the rudiments, and he entered the school of the 'Ödenburger Musik-Verein' in 1842. Here his talents, exhibited on the violin at a concert in the winter of 1843–44, were remarkable enough to warrant his being sent to Vienna to study in earnest; and in 1844–45 he was a pupil of Leopold Janas, entering the Conservatorium in 1847 as a pupil of Böhm for violin, and of Preyer for harmony. The political disturbances of 1848 compelled the authorities to close the institution, and Goldmark was thrown on his own resources. He was engaged in the theatre band at Raab, and on the capitulation of the town to the Government he was actually led out to be shot as a rebel. A friend of his explained the mistake, and his life was spared. In 1850 he returned to Vienna and worked hard for the next seven years, becoming familiar with all the orchestral instruments, and making numerous essays in original composition. These, which consisted of a quartet for piano and strings, an overture, a couple of songs, and a psalm for soli, chorus and orchestra, were performed at a concert on Mar. 20, 1857, when the quartet was the most favourably reviewed of the compositions in the Wiener Zeitung. After a couple of years spent in further study at Pest, where another concert of his works took place in 1859, he returned for good to Vienna in 1860, and set up as a pianoforte teacher. By this time he had completed some of the compositions which have made his name best known throughout the musical world, such as the symphony (or suite) called 'Ländliche Hochzeit' and the 'Sakuntala' and 'Penthesilea' overtures. Some piano pieces, published without opus numbers by Haslinger, date from this time, and, with the works given at the concert of 1857, correspond with the spaces in the list of numbered compositions. The 'Sakuntala' overture, performed at one of the Philharmonic Concerts in Vienna on Dec. 26, 1865, was at once recognised as an important work, and even Hanslick spoke of its wealth of orchestral colouring, and considered that the composer had got over his earlier love of dissonance. Goldmark was for a time a critic too, and expressed himself strongly in the Konstitutionnelle Zeitung in favour of Wagner, whose works he had carefully studied so far as they were at that time accessible.

Almost ten years were devoted to the composition and revision of his first opera, 'Die Königin von Saba,' in four acts, to a libretto by Mosenthal, a work which, produced Mar. 10, 1875, at the Hofoper at Vienna, under Gericke's conductorship, and with a splendid cast, including Materna, Wild and Beck, made an emphatic success. The fine use of Oriental colour, the clever characterisation of the personages, and the brilliant effect of the whole deserve all the recognition they have obtained all over Germany and in many towns in Italy, as well as in New York and Madrid. The Carl Rosa Company gave it for the first time in England at Manchester on Apr. 12, 1910. Another four years, from 1882, were spent in the composition of his second opera, 'Merlin' (libretto by Siegfried Lipiner), produced also at Vienna, Nov. 19, 1886, in which the last act was subjected to thorough revision after the first performance, greatly to its advantage. The list of Goldmark's operas is completed by 'Das Heimchen am Herd' (libretto by Willmers, founded on Dickens's Cricket on the Hearth), produced at Berlin, June 27, 1896; 'Die Kriegsgefangene,' produced at Vienna, Jan. 9, 1899; 'Götz von Berlichingen' (Pest, 1902); 'Ein Wintermärchen' (Vienna, 1908); and 'Der Fremdling.'

Goldmark's main characteristics are his complete mastery over every kind of musical effect, his wealth of melodic invention and skill in manipulating his themes. His orchestral works are always effective and often interesting, and his chamber compositions, notably his two suites for piano and violin—made familiar to English audiences by Sarasate—tell of his early familiarity with the violin.

His principal works are :

- Op.
1-3. Unpublished early works. See above.

GOLDSCHMIDT, ADALBERT VON (b. Vienna, May 5, 1848; d. there, Dec. 21, 1906), composer of music dramas on principles akin to those of Wagner. When 22 years old he composed his first important work, 'Die sieben Todsünden,' an allegorical drama, the text of which is by Robert Hamerling, though containing several contributions from the pen of the composer. This was produced at Berlin in the spring of 1876, a few months before the 'Nibelungen Ring' made its appearance at Bayreuth, so that, although it was not published until later, it cannot have been influenced by the 'Ring.' This circumstance is the more interesting in that there is much internal evidence tending to display the two works as the result of similar waves of musical thought. Goldschmidt's drama was heard in Paris under Lamoureux's conductorship, at Hanover, Leipzig, Königsberg, Fribourg and Vienna, and was received everywhere with acclamations except in the composer's native town, where it was the object of acrimonious attacks from the press. Liszt, to whom the drama is dedicated, thought very highly of it. Another important work, which is available in print, is the music drama, 'Helianthus,' of which he wrote both the text and the music, and which is in many ways a considerable advance on its predecessor. It was produced at Leipzig in 1884. The work, however, which is in all probability his best, remains unpublished: the trilogy, 'Gaea' (1889), of the text of which Catulle Mendès has issued a French translation. His 'Die fromme Helene' was produced at Hamburg in 1897. Besides the works described, he published a symphonic poem and about a hundred songs, many of which attain to a very high level of artistic excellence.

GOLDSCHMIDT, HUGO (b. Breslau, Sept. 19, 1859; d. Wiesbaden, Dec. 26, 1920), is noteworthy for a number of works on singing and the early history of opera.

A pupil of Stockhausen, at Frankfurt (1887-1890), Goldschmidt subsequently devoted himself to historical study. From 1893-1905 he was a co-director of the Scharwenka-Klindworth Conservatorium in Berlin. In 1918 he was made professor. He edited selected operas of Traetta in D.D.T. (2nd series). His principal literary works are :

Die italienische Gesangsmethode des 17. Jahrhunderts. 1890.
Der Vokalismus des neuhochdeutschen Kunstsprachs und der Bühnensprache. 1892.
Handbuch der deutschen Gesangspädagogik, pt. 1. 1896
Studien zu Geschichte der Italienischen Oper im 17. Jahrh. 2 vols. 1904. (Monteverdi's 'L'incoronazione di Poppea' in vol. 2.)
Die Lehre von der vokalen Ornamentik. 1907.
Geschichte der Musikästhetik im 18. Jahrh. 1915.

GOLDSCHMIDT, OTTO (b. Hamburg, Aug. 21, 1829; d. London, Feb. 24, 1907), pianist, composer and conductor, came of a family of Hamburg merchants.

He studied the piano and harmony under Jacob Schmitt and F. W. Grund. At the age of 14 he entered the Leipzig Conservatorium, where, until 1846, he studied the piano and composition as a pupil in Mendelssohn's class. In 1848 he was sent to Paris, with the view of continuing his studies under Chopin, whose acquaintance he made, and was present at the last concert given by him in the Salle Pleyel. He came to England, and played (1849) at the Musical Union, and at a concert of Mlle. Jenny Lind's at Her Majesty's Theatre. In 1851 he went to America, succeeding Benedict as conductor of a series of concerts given by Jenny Lind (q.v.). He married that lady at Boston, U.S.A., on Feb. 5, 1852. From 1852 to Nov. 1855 he and his wife resided at Dresden, and from 1858 lived in or near London. He conducted the festivals held at Düsseldorf and Hamburg in 1863 and 1866 respectively, and in 1863 was appointed Vice-Principal of the R.A.M., then presided over by Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, with whom he edited 'The Chorale Book for England,' a collection of chorales set to translations of German hymns by Miss C. Winkworth (Longmans, 1863). He composed the oratorio 'Ruth' (op. 20) for the Hereford Festival of 1867, and it was subsequently performed in London, Düsseldorf and Hamburg. 'Music' (op. 27), a choral song for soprano solo and female chorus, to words by Sir Lewis Morris, was given at the Leeds Festival of 1898. He introduced into Germany Handel's 'Ode for S. Cecilia's Day,' and in England conducted 'L' Allegro ed Il Penseroso,' for which he wrote additional accompaniments. These works had not been heard in Germany or England in a complete form since Handel's time. In 1875 the Bach Choir, an association of amateurs, was formed under his direction. At its first concert on Apr. 26, 1876, Bach's Mass in B minor, with additional accompaniments by Goldschmidt, was performed complete for the first time in England. The marked success of that performance and the subsequent prosperity of the choir are due in a large measure to the earnestness and devotion of the first conductor. (See BACH CHOIR.) Besides the choral works already mentioned, Goldschmidt published a pianoforte concerto; a trio; pianoforte studies; two duets for two pianos; songs and part songs; two pieces for clarinet (or violin) and piano (op. 26). In 1876 the King of Sweden conferred on him the Royal Order of Wasa; in 1893 the medal 'litteris et artibus' was conferred on him, together with the commandship of the order of the Polar Star. Goldschmidt was a member of the Council of the R.C.M. from its foundation. He died in London and was buried at Malvern (Feb. 28, 1907). An interesting biography appeared in the Musical Herald for May 1896.

A. D. C.

GOLDWIN, JOHN (b. circa 1670; d. Nov. 7, 1719), was a pupil of Dr. William Child, and was in the choir of St. George's, Windsor, in 1690. On Apr. 12, 1697, he was appointed successor to his master as organist of St. George's Chapel; in 1703 he became also master of the choristers. His Service in F is printed in Arnold's Cathedral Music, and Boyce and Page also printed some of his anthems; others remain in MS. in Tudway and at Ely Cathedral, where he is entered as Golding. The largest collection of his compositions, including 21 anthems, motets and services, is at Christ Church.

W. H. H.

GOLINELLI, STEFANO (b. Bologna, Oct. 26, 1818; d. there, July 3, 1891), was taught pianoforte-playing and counterpoint by Benedetto Donelli, and composition by Vaccaj. He was professor at the Liceo of Bologna from 1840-70, having been appointed by Rossini while director. To this composer Golinelli dedicated his 24 preludes for pianoforte, op. 23. He became acquainted with Hiller while on a visit to Bologna in 1842, and dedicated to him his 12 Studies, op. 15. He subsequently made a tour throughout Italy, and acquired a reputation as a composer. He also played in France, Germany and England, appearing in London in 1851 at the Musical Union, playing with Sivori and Piatti. He retired from public life altogether in 1870, and subsequently resided at Bologna or in the country. His compositions, to the number of 200, written exclusively for the piano, include

5 Ronéos, 3 Toccate (opp. 38, 48 and 186); 24 Preludes dedicated to Mlle. Louise Farrenc (op. 69); 24 Preludes 'Ai giovani pianisti' (op. 177), adopted by the Liceo; Album, dedicated to Mercandante; Tarantella, op. 33; Barcarola, op. 35; 'Adele et Virgile,' 2 melodies, op. 34; 'Le violon marmole,' op. 39; Allegretto gioioso, Milan, 1878; operatic fantasias, etc.

A. C.

GOLLMICK, ADOLF (b. Frankfort-on-M., Feb. 5, 1825; d. London, Mar. 7, 1883), received instruction on the pianoforte from his father, Carl Gollmick (1796-1866), writer and composer, and on the violin from Riefstahl and Heinrich Wolf. In 1844 he settled in London, and gave his first concert on Aug. 21 at Pape's Pianoforte Rooms. In 1847 he founded the Réunion des Beaux-Arts, in 1864 the West-bourne Operatic Society, and in 1879 the Kilburn Musical Association. In addition he gave concerts in London and the provinces, and at Hamburg, Frankfort, etc. His compositions include

The operas 'Balthazar,' performed in private at Frankfort, 1860; 'The Oracle,' Bijou Theatre, Baywater, 1864; 'Donna Costanza,' Criterion Theatre, 1876; 'The Hair of Lyons,' operatic cantata, Dublin and St. George's Hall, 1877; 'The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green,' dramatic cantata, London, Birmingham, etc., 1877; a symphony in C minor, MS.; a pianoforte quartet and trio in C minor.

A. C.

GOLTERMANN, GEORG EDUARD (b. Hanover, Aug. 19, 1824; d. Frankfort, Dec. 29, 1898), was the son of an organist, and learnt the violoncello at first from Prell the younger, and afterwards from Menter of Munich, where he studied composition with Lachner. In 1850-52 he made tours as a concert violoncellist, and in 1851 a symphony of his was played at Leipzig, in 1852 he was music director at Würzburg, and in 1853 went to Frankfort as second Kapellmeister at the Stadt Theater, being first conductor from 1874. He celebrated his 25th anniversary as conductor there on May 1, 1878. A violoncello concerto and some other effective pieces for his own instrument obtained popularity.

GOLTERMANN, JOHANN AUGUST JULIUS (b. Hamburg, July 15, 1825; d. Stuttgart, Apr. 4, 1876), violoncellist, held a professorship of the violoncello at Prague from 1850-62, and from the latter date, until his retirement in 1870, was a member of the court band at Stuttgart.

GOMBERT, NICOLAS (b. Bruges), one of the most important and prolific composers of the school of Josquin des Prés, was born at Bruges, as we learn from the title-page of his motets, and was attached to the service of Charles V. He was apparently in the Emperor's chapel from 1520-31, and master of the choristers from 1530-34; in the latter year he was prebend, and subsequently canon, of Tournai. In 1537 he went to Spain with twenty singers, and held an office in the Imperial Chapel at Madrid.¹ That Josquin was his master is testified by Hermann Finck in his Practica Musica, and Fétis has given us the quotation from the copy of this rare work in his possession.

'Nostro vere tempore [the book was published in 1568] novi sunt inventores, in quibus est Nicolaus Gombert, Jusquini plac memoriae discipulus, qui omnibus musicis ostendit viam, imo semitam ad quaerendas fugas ac subtilitatem, ac est auctor musicus plane diversae a superiori. Is enim vitat pauas,² et illius compositio est plena cum concordantiarum tum fugarum.'

Gombert set to music a poem by Avidius on the death of Josquin, which was also set by Benedictus. Burney gives us the music of this, but 'after performing the tedious task of scoring the setting by Gombert, found its chief merit to consist in imitations of his master.' A great merit nevertheless, for Gombert, a mere lad when Josquin died, persevered in his imitations so successfully that he not only came to be looked upon as his master's greatest pupil, but was able in due time, and when his own genius became mature, to engrave his name on a separate link in the chain of musical history. In the hands of his predecessors, in Josquin's especially, contrapuntal skill had already become subservient to the beauty of the music. A further improvement was making itself visible in the art. Composers began more and more to vary the character of their music according to the subject of the words. No one worked with this end more in view than Gombert, and nothing helped him so much as the increasing love for secular chamber music. Musicians of his time, far from looking down upon secular music, were beginning to make it one of their great specialties. It gave them full scope for their fancy, they were hampered by no prescribed forms, they had no prejudices to overcome. It gave them free access and welcome into half the educated homes in Europe. Gombert chooses the prettiest pastoral subjects. His love for nature is apparent in the very titles of his songs—'En ce mois délicieux'; 'Joyeux verger'; 'Le chant des oiseaux'; 'L'été chaud bouilloit'; 'Je m'en vois au vert bois,' etc. His power of description he carries into all the higher forms of his art, and his motets and psalms were not, in their time, surpassed for the wonderful manner in which the noble music blends itself with the ideas the words convey. Either³ mentions nearly 250 of Gombert's compositions, printed in upwards of ninety different collections between 1539 and 1573. In Q.-L. the list of collections is given, as well as the motets, etc., in MS. A single motet, 'In nomine Jesu,' printed 26 years before any of these under the name Gompert in the Motetti B (Venice, Petrucci, 1503), must surely be the work of another composer. J. R. S.-B.

GOMEZ, ANTONIO CARLOS (b. Compinas, July 11, 1839; d. Parà, Sept. 16, 1896), a Portuguese by parentage and a Brazilian by birth, was sent to Europe by the Emperor, and received his musical education at the Conservatorio di Milan. His first work for the stage, 'A noite do castello,' was given at Rio de Janeiro in 1861, and his European début as a composer was made at the Teatro Fossati, Milan, in Jan. 1867, in a little piece called 'Se sa minga,' which had a remarkable success. His next was another 'revue' called 'Nella Luna' (1868), and he established his fame with 'Il Guarany,' produced at La Scala, Mar. 19, 1870, and shortly after brought out at Genoa, Florence and Rome. In England it was first performed on July 13, 1872, at Covent Garden. This was followed by 'Fosca' at La Scala, on Feb. 16, 1873, which was unsuccessful; and that by 'Salvator Rosa' (Genoa, Feb. 21, 1874), a great success there and elsewhere. 'Maria Tudor' was produced at Milan in 1879, 'Lo schiavo' at Rio in 1889, and 'Condor' at Milan in 1891. Besides these operas Gomez composed an ode entitled 'Il saluto del Brasile,' which was performed in the Exhibition Building at Philadelphia on July 19, 1876. Another cantata, 'Colombo,' was written for the Columbus Festival in 1892. Gomez was appointed director of the Conservatorium at Parà in 1895, but he died a few months after reaching Parà (Baker).

GOMEZ CAMARGO, MIGUEL (b. Guadalajara; d. Valladolid, 16th cent.), Spanish church musician, composer of a remarkable and ingenious Hymn to St. James, printed by Eslava (Lira sacro-hispana, vol. 1 Ser. 2). He was for many years choirmaster at Valladolid, at that time capital of Spain. J. B. T.

² The introduction of frequent pauses had become very common in music. Philip Baalron is censured for giving way to this 'fashionable folly' (Burney, vol. II, p. 533).

GOMPERTZ, RICHARD (b. Cologne, Apr. 27, 1859), violinist and teacher. In 1875 Gompertz went to Berlin to study with Joachim, and remained there for three years. His first appearance as a mature artist was at the Gürzenich Concerts, Cologne, where he played on two occasions under Ferdinand Hiller. In 1880 he was invited by Stanford to take up work as a player and teacher in Cambridge, and while there formed the Cambridge string quartet, with which he appeared at many of the Wednesday Popular Concerts there. On the foundation of the R.C.M. in 1883 he became a teacher of the violin, and professor in 1895. In 1884 and 1886 he appeared at the Crystal Palace concerts, and in the winter of 1886 he took part with Mme. Haas and Signor Piatti in a performance of Beethoven's 'Triple Concerto' at the first of Henschel's London Symphony Concerts. In later years he appeared almost exclusively, so far as London concerts were concerned, in the valuable concerts given by his own quartet, in which H. Inwards, E. Kreuz and C. Ould were his companions. In 1899 he left England to live at Dresden. M.

GONDOLIERS, THE, or The Kings of Barataria, a comic opera in 2 acts, by W. S. Gilbert, set to music by Arthur Sullivan; produced Savoy Theatre, Dec. 7, 1889.

GONG (Fr., Ger. and Ital. Tam-tam). This is an Eastern instrument, made of bronze (80 copper to 20 tin); in form, a thin round plate with the edges turned up, like a shallow sieve or tambourine. It is sounded usually with a bass-drumstick, the part being generally written on one line—a clef is, of course, immaterial. An early instance of its use (possibly the first) as an orchestral instrument is in Gossec's funeral music in honour of Mirabeau. Meyerbeer has even used it pianissimo with the orchestra in 'Robert le Diable' (scene of the resurrection of the nuns); and Cherubini has one stroke of it in his Requiem in C minor, absolutely solo ('Dies irae,' bar 7). If a long-continued and loud noise is desired, it should first be struck very gently, and the force of the stroke gradually increased until the effect becomes almost terrific.

It is a remarkable property of the alloys of copper and tin, that they become malleable by being heated and then plunged into cold water. Gongs are thus treated after being cast, and are then hammered. This was a secret in Europe until found out by M. d'Arcet, an eminent French chemist. V. de P.

GONZAGA, GUGLIELMO, Duke of Mantua (1536-89), often quoted in ancient musical publications. Several of his melodies have been used frequently as canti firmi, one of the favourite subjects being his 'Padre che l'ciel,' which led to the discovery of his authorship of a book of madrigals (a 5 v., Venice, 1583). In the same place and year appeared also his 'Sacrae cantiones' (5 v.), both anonymous.

GOODBAN, (1) THOMAS GOODHURST (b. Canterbury, Dec. 21, 1784; d. Canterbury, May 4, 1863). His mother was a vocalist, and his father combined the three qualifications of violinist, lay vicar of the cathedral, and host of the Prince of Orange tavern, where in 1779 he founded the Canterbury Catch Club. At 7 years old Goodban became a chorister of the cathedral under Samuel Porter. After leaving the choir he was placed in a solicitor's office, but on his father's death, about 1798, changed the legal profession for that of music. In 1809 he was appointed a lay-clerk in the cathedral, and in 1810, on the retirement of his cousin, Osmond Saffrey, was made leader and director of the Canterbury Catch Club, the Charter Glee for which he composed. In 1819 the members of the club presented him with a silver bowl and salver as a token of esteem.

Goodban was author of some instruction books for the violin and pianoforte, and of The Rudiments of Music, published about 1825, a work once highly popular. He was also the inventor of a 'Musical Game' for imparting elementary instruction, and of 'Musical Cards' for teaching the theory of music. His three sons were all members of the musical profession. (2) CHARLES, Mus.B. Oxon. (b. Canterbury, Aug. 1812; d. Hove, Aug. 6, 1881). (3) HENRY WILLIAM (b. 1816) wrote an overture which was played at the Crystal Palace in 1885, and was also a violoncellist. (4) THOMAS (b. July 28, 1822) was a violinist. (5) JAMES FREDERICK (d. Harborne, Kent, Feb. 1, 1903), nephew of Thomas (1), was also a violinist, and organist of St. John's, Paddington. W. H. H.

GOODGROOME, JOHN (b. circa 1630; d. June 27, 1704), was a chorister in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. On the accession of Charles II. in 1660 he was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and on Nov. 28, 1664, on the death of Purcell's father, was made Musician in Ordinary to the King. He composed several songs, some of which appeared in 'The Treasury of Musick,' 1669. A JOHN GOODGROOME, probably his son, was organist of St. Peter's, Cornhill, about 1725. THEODORE GOODGROOME, the singing-master of Samuel Pepys and his wife, was probably his brother.

W. H. H.

GOODRICH, JOHN WALLACE (b. Newton, Mass., May 27, 1871), began his career as an organist at the age of 15, and later studied with Rheinberger at Munich and Widor in Paris. In 1897 he settled in Boston, taught the organ at the New England Conservatory, and as organist, conductor of choral societies, etc., has exerted a considerable local influence. His literary work is of wider importance. He has published translations of Pirro's J. S. Bach and his Works for the Organ, and D'Ortigue's Gregorian Accompaniment, has written on The Organ in France (1917), and other essays on theoretical and practical subjects. C.

GOODSON, KATHARINE (b. Watford, Herts, June 18, 1872), after various provincial appearances as a pianist, when only 12 years of age went to the R.A.M., where she studied with Oscar Beringer from 1886-92. She was under Leschetizky in Vienna from 1892-96, and on her return to England in the latter year, made a great success at the Popular Concerts, after which she gave an interesting set of recitals and made a provincial tour in 1897. In that year, and every year since, she played with great success in various parts of the Continent, her début in Berlin taking place in 1899. In Vienna her first appearance was in 1900, when she played at the New Philharmonic Concerts, with the Bohemian Quartet, and at recitals. She played Tchaikovsky's concerto at a Richter Concert in London, 1901, and toured with Kubelik in 1902, 1903 and 1904. She was married to Arthur HINTON (q.v.) in 1903. Her playing is marked by verve and animation. She has a great command of tone-gradation, admirable technical finish, taste and individuality of style. M.

GOODSON, (1) RICHARD (b. 1655; d. Great Tew, Jan. 13, 1718), was appointed organist of New College, Oxford, in 1682, and in the same year succeeded Edward Lowe as organist of Christ Church, and professor of music in the University. It is probable that he received the degree of Mus.B. about this time.¹ Some Odes composed by him for performance at the Acts of Oxford are still extant. He was buried in the south aisle of Christ Church Cathedral. His son, (2) RICHARD, Mus.B. (d. Jan. 9, 1741), was the first organist of Newbury, to which post he was appointed Aug. 24, 1709. He graduated Mus.B. Mar. 1, 1716. On the death of his father he succeeded him in both posts, and was also organist of New College.

GOOSSENS, (1) EUGÈNE (b. Bruges, Feb. 25, 1845; d. Liverpool, Dec. 30, 1906), operatic conductor. He began studying music when 6 years old under Mechelaer, a celebrated choir-master at the church of Notre Dame, Bruges; entered Brussels Conservatoire at the age of 14; and there studied composition under Fétis and violin under Meerts, winning several prizes of distinction. After a useful experience as conductor of various opera companies in Belgium, France and Italy, he came to England in 1873 and began his career as a conductor of comic opera. In 1882 he joined the Carl Rosa Company, and for ten years distinguished himself by his admirable work with that troupe when at the height of its artistic fame and prosperity. He fully maintained the excellence of ensemble reached by its founder, notably in the first English performance of 'Tannhäuser' given at Liverpool in 1882. On Nov. 8, 1892, he also directed a 'command' performance of 'The Daughter of the Regiment' before Queen Victoria at Balmoral. Shortly after this he settled in Liverpool, and, failing in his efforts to form a permanent orchestra there, he founded in 1894 the 'Goossens Male-voice Choir,' which quickly earned fame in the north and was considered one of the finest bodies of the kind in the kingdom. Besides teaching singing he did good work as organist and choirmaster of St. Anne's Roman Catholic Church, Liverpool. He was buried in that city, and over his grave in the Anfield Cemetery stands a memorial cross erected by the Goossens Choir and his old colleagues of the Carl Rosa Opera Company. He married Mlle. Sidonie, a well-known dancer, who appeared for some years at the Alhambra Theatre, London, in the 'eighties.

(2) EUGÈNE (b. Bordeaux, Jan. 28, 1867), son of the above, with whom he came to England in 1873. He was educated at the College of St. Louis, Bruges, and studied music, 1884-86, at the Brussels Conservatoire under Gevaert and Sandré for composition and Cornélis for violin. He worked with the Carl Rosa Opera Company for four years under his father as violinist, 'répétiteur' and sub-conductor; then, in 1891, entered the R.A.M., where he completed his studies in harmony and composition under Davenport. During 1893-1894 he played in the orchestra at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, and subsequently travelled in succession with the Burns-Crotty, the Arthur Rousbey, and the Moody-Manners Opera Companies as principal conductor. He filled a similar position with the Carl Rosa Company from 1899-1915, during which period his abilities as a 'chef-d'orchestre' frequently came under the notice of London audiences and received highly favourable criticism. He also took a prominent part in this capacity in the season given by Beecham at His Majesty's Theatre in 1917, and joined the B.N.O.C. as conductor in 1926. He married a well-known member of the Carl Rosa Company, Miss Annie Cook, daughter of the once-popular basso-cantante, T. Aynsley Cook (q.v.), and has resided for some years as a teacher in Kensington. H. K.

(3) EUGÈNE (b. London, May 26, 1893), conductor and composer, is the son of Eugène Goossens (2). Another son, (4) LÉON, is a famous oboe-player, and two daughters are harpists.

Eugène Goossens (3) entered the Bruges Conservatoire in 1903, and the Liverpool College of Music in 1906, whence a scholarship brought him to the R.C.M. in London. There he studied composition, chiefly with Stanford, and the violin with Rivarde. From 1911-15 he played the violin in the Queen's Hall Orchestra, after which he became associated with Beecham as conductor, until the latter's temporary retirement from musical activities in 1920. For several years he was also a member of the Philharmonic String Quartet. When Stanford's operatic version of 'The Critic' was produced, in Jan. 1916, he conducted the performance in the character of 'Mr. Linley of Bath.' From that time onwards he has been one of the best-known conductors in England, appearing constantly at the opera and with the leading orchestras. In 1921 he formed his own orchestra and gave six symphony concerts of exceptional interest. The first of these programmes was so successful that it was repeated at the following concert, only one work being omitted to make room for one of his own, as he had preferred to appear as conductor only on the first occasion. Towards the end of that year he was conducting the Russian ballet in the 'Sleeping Princess' at the Alhambra in alternation with Fitelberg, and, on the intervening evenings, the Carl Rosa Opera at Covent Garden. In the autumn of 1923 and subsequently he conducted the Symphony Orchestra at Rochester, U.S.A., incidentally appearing in various capacities in New York and elsewhere. He conducted the Diaghilev season of Russian Ballet in London (His Majesty's Theatre) in the summer of 1926.

As a composer his name first became prominent in the early days of the war, when his two trios, opp. 6 and 7, were performed at the War Emergency Concerts, and attracted attention by the novelty of their idiom. Since then his style has undergone many rapid changes. The first landmark is provided by the group of chamber works, opp. 12-15, including the string quartet, of which he dedicated the three movements to his three colleagues in the Philharmonic, and the two well-known 'Sketches.' The next is the two sets of piano pieces, opp. 18 and 20, in which a phase of harmonic experiment is revealed in playful guise. Up to this time critics had frequently urged, not without some justification, that Goossens's music was all 'cold glitter.' Hence the appearance of his violin sonata and piano quintet, revealing emotional warmth and lyrical qualities of a high order, was opportune. 'The Eternal Rhythm' was the next outstanding work, and may be regarded as the culmination of this formative period, or rather succession of phases. From that point onwards Goossens has shown progressive leanings towards a new kind of classicism in which all the skill and experience gained on earlier, sometimes empirical, adventures in composition are being brought to the service of a more mature mode of expression. A striking instance is the first movement of the Sinfonietta, which, with all its richness of texture, is almost severely classical. 'Silence' was performed at the Gloucester Festival of 1922. The string sextet, which was commissioned for the Berkshire (U.S.A.) Festival of 1923, is also classical in feeling. Goossens's music is mostly chromatic, and his melodic invention usually moves freely among the twelve notes, giving only an occasional and transient importance to diatonic passages. Harmonically he makes a skilful use of all kinds of parallels, and of the effects resulting from the meeting of full chords in contrary motion. The notation gives such writing an appearance of complexity which is generally misleading, for Goossens is, for these days, singularly clear. His early and momentary leanings towards the grotesque and exotic were fruitful in that they provided a cloak for writing that might have seemed forced and unnatural but for some such excuse, but he has a fund of genuine musical humour that rises spontaneously to the surface on occasion. Behind all this the controlling force is a desire for polish and elegance that is almost suggestive of the 18th century, and it is doubtless this desire that has been the incentive to his recent classicism.

GOOVAERTS, ALPHONSE JEAN MARIE ANDRÉ (b. Antwerp, May 25, 1847; d. Brussels, Dec. 25, 1922), church composer and littérateur, came of an artistic family, his grandfather being a Flemish poet of some celebrity, and his father an excellent amateur musician. When still a child Goovaerts showed great talent for music, but after some education at the Jesuits' College at Antwerp, owing to family losses he was obliged at the age of 15 to embrace a mercantile career. During this part of his life he studied music with the greatest assiduity, and soon after 1866 (when he obtained a post in the Antwerp Town Library) his sacred motets began to be performed in the churches of his native town. From 1868-74 he published seven small volumes of Flemish songs, to words by Franz Willems, set for three voices and intended for the use of primary Flemish schools. In 1869 his 'Messe solennelle,' for orchestra, chorus and organ, was performed on St. Cecilia's Day with great success, although it was the work of a musician entirely self-taught in harmony, composition and orchestration. It had been preceded by a small Mass a 4 with organ accompaniment, and several Flemish songs, etc.

Goovaerts next began to occupy himself with literature, without, however, neglecting the composition of church music. In 1874 he began the efforts for the reform of church music by which he is best known. Having been appointed musical secretary to the Antwerp Cathedral, he established an amateur Domchor, for which he transcribed 90 motets, etc., by Palestrina, Lasso and the great Flemish and Italian composers. These attempted reforms met with strong opposition, to which Goovaerts replied by articles in the Fédération Artistique and other papers, and by a work on the subject published simultaneously in French and Flemish in 1876, La Musique d'église. Considérations sur son état actuel et histoire abrégée de toutes les écoles de l'Europe. After two journeys in Germany and Holland, to study the work of the Ratisbon school of the former country and the Gregorian Association of the latter, Goovaerts in 1881 became one of the leaders of the Gregorian Association founded by the Belgian bishops in that year, for which he composed a motet, 'Adoramus,' for four equal voices. In 1877 he was crowned by the Belgian Académie, and in 1880 he received the gold medal for his History of Music Printing in the Netherlands. In the same year appeared his valuable work on Abraham Verhoeven, which was translated into Flemish in the following year. Goovaerts, after having been for some time Assistant Librarian at the Antwerp Town Library, was appointed in 1887 keeper of the Archives Royales at Brussels. The following is a list of his principal musical and literary works:

COMPOSITIONS.—Ave Maria; 2 O Salutaris; Flemish Songs; pieces for Piano and Violin; Petite Messe; Messe Solennelle; Drie stemmige Liederen voor de Schoolkinderen; Adoramus; Ave verum; Tantum Ergo; O Jesu, sapientia; Noël (P. V.); Liederen ad Bonam; Choral Music, etc.

GORDIGIANI, LUIGI (b. Modena, June 21, 1806; d. Florence, May 1, 1860), the son of one musician (ANTONIO) and the younger brother of another (GIOVANNI BATTISTA, 1795-1871, a singer and teacher), has been called the Italian Schubert. His musical education was most desultory, but his talent was great, and while still in his teens he had written three cantatas. In 1820 his father died, and he was forced to make a living by writing pianoforte pieces under such German pen-names as Zeuner and Von Fürstenberger. His start in life was due to two Russian princes, Nicholas Demidov and Joseph Poniatovski, the latter of whom not only furnished him with the libretto of an opera, 'Filippo,' but himself acted in it with his wife and brother, in Florence, in 1840. Between the years 1835 and 1849 Gordigiani composed or produced nine other operas, all at different theatres in Florence. But it is by his 'Canzonette' and 'Canti popolari' for voice and piano that he will be remembered—delicious melodies, of a sentimental, usually mournful, cast, in the taste or on the actual melodies of old Italian national tunes, and often set to words of his own. They are more than 300 in number, and were published in parts, usually of eight or ten each, with characteristic titles—'In cima al monte,' 'Le farfalle di Firenze,' 'Mosaico etrusco,' etc. They have been republished in many languages. Among the best known of his compositions are the charming duets for female voices on popular themes. He also published a collection of Tuscan airs with accompaniments in three books. Gordigiani was odd and fantastic in manners and disposition.

GORDON, WILLIAM (b. circa end of 18th cent.), a Swiss of English descent who in 1826 began improvements in the construction of the flute. His modifications were perhaps anticipated, but certainly carried out by Boehm, and resulted in the flute which bears that name. For the controversy in regard to the priority of invention, see C. Welch's History of the Boehm Flute, 3rd ed. (See BOEHM; FLUTE.)

GORGHEGGI, see SOLFEGGIO.

GORIA, ALEXANDRE EDOUARD (b. Paris, Jan. 21, 1823; d. July 6, 1860), was a pupil of the Conservatoire from 1830-39, under Dourlen and Zimmerman. He took the first pianoforte prize in 1835, and had a successful career as a teacher and a writer of popular drawing-room pieces until his death (Baker).

GOSS, JOHN JEREMIAH (b. Salisbury, 1770; d. London, Apr. 25, 1817), received his musical education as a chorister of the cathedral there, of which he subsequently became a lay-vicar. On Nov. 30, 1808, he was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and about the same period obtained the places of vicar choral of St. Paul's Cathedral and lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey. His voice was a pure alto of beautiful quality, and his skill and taste in part-singing remarkable. He was for many years the principal alto at the Meetings of the Three Choirs.

W. H. H.

GOSS, SIR JOHN, Mus.D. (b. Fareham, Hants, Dec. 27, 1800; d. Brixton, May 10, 1880), eminent church musician, was son of Joseph Goss, organist of Fareham.

In 1811 he became one of the children of the Chapel Royal under John Stafford Smith, and on leaving the choir became a pupil of Attwood, under whom he completed his musical education.¹ He became organist of Stockwell Chapel in 1821; in 1824 was appointed organist of the new church of St. Luke, Chelsea, and in 1838 succeeded Attwood as organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. On the death of William Knyvett in 1856 Goss was appointed one of the composers to the Chapel Royal. He was knighted in 1872, and shortly afterwards resigned his appointment at St. Paul's. He graduated as Doctor of Music at Cambridge in 1876.

Goss's compositions consist of services and anthems, chants, psalm-tunes, glees, songs, orchestral pieces, etc. Of his anthems (a list of 27 is given in Brown and Stratton's Brit. Mus. Biog.) the best known are 'If we believe,' written for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington; 'Praise the Lord, O my soul,' composed for the bicentenary festival of the Sons of the Clergy; 'The wilderness'; 'O Saviour of the world'; and 'The Lord is my strength,' composed, together with a Te Deum, for the Thanksgiving for the recovery of the Prince of Wales (Feb. 27, 1872). (See ANTHEM.) Of his glees, published 1826 and 1852, 'There is beauty on the mountain' is a charming specimen of truly graceful composition. In 1827 he edited a collection of hymn-tunes under the title 'Parochial Psalmody.' In 1833 he published An Introduction to Harmony and Thorough-bass, a second edition of which appeared in 1847, and which reached a 13th edition. In 1841 he edited a collection of 'Chants, Ancient and Modern'; and in 1856 the 'Church Psalter and Hymnbook,' in conjunction with the Rev. W. Mercer. He also published 'The Organist's Companion,' a series of voluntaries and interludes, besides other works. His music is always melodious and beautifully written for the voices, and is remarkable for a union of solidity and grace, with a certain unaffected native charm which has ensured it a long life. (See Mus. T., Apr.-June 1901.)

¹ In 1817 he sang as a tenor in the chorus at the first production of 'Don Giovanni' in English.

GOSS-CUSTARD. Two brothers, sons of Walter Goss-Custard, organist, and grand-nephews of Sir John Goss, have achieved distinction as English organists. (1) HENRY (b. St. Leonards-on-Sea, Feb. 7, 1871), after important work in London, which included the honorary organistship of the Royal Philharmonic Society, was elected to the organistship of the new Cathedral at Liverpool (1917). He has devoted himself both to the establishment of the choral traditions of the Cathedral and to work as a recitalist on the magnificent instrument installed under his supervision (see LIVERPOOL).

(2) REGINALD (b. St. Leonards-on-Sea, Mar. 29, 1877) followed Edwin LEMARE as organist of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and carried on his traditions as a brilliant recitalist. Since 1922 he has been organist of St. Michael's, Chester Square, but his reputation is that of a concert organist rather than a church musician. He has made many tours, notably in America (1916).

C.

GOSSEC, (1) FRANÇOIS JOSEPH (b. Vergnies, Belgian Hainault, Jan. 17, 1734; d. Passy, Feb. 16, 1829), the founder of symphonic music in France, and a composer of importance in every branch of the art, was the son of a small farmer whose name is spelt Gossé, Gossez and Gosset, in the registers of his native place.

From early childhood he showed a decided taste for music, and there is a story that while herding the cows he made himself a fiddle out of a sabot with strings of horse-hair. He was always particularly fond of the violin, and studied it specifically after leaving the cathedral of Antwerp, of which he was a chorister till the age of 15. In 1751 he came to Paris with a letter of introduction to Rameau, and through him he became conductor of the private band which was maintained by the Fermier-général La Pouplinière (also spelt La Poplinière) for the express purpose of trying the new works of his protégé and friend, the author of 'Castor et Pollux.' It was for this orchestra that Gossec composed symphonies, the first of which dates from 1754, the year before Haydn's quartets, and five years before the latter's first symphony. That very year Gossec published his first quartets, which became rapidly popular. After La Pouplinière's death he became attached to the household of the Prince de Conti, for whom he had composed his quartets, and until about 1769 was 'intendant' of the music of the Prince de Condé. Under this encouragement he entered upon the departments of sacred and dramatic music, and quickly gained a reputation in both. In his 'Messe des Morts,' first performed in May 1760, then at St. Roch, 1762, he produced an effect which was not only quite new but also very mysterious and impressive, by writing the 'Tuba mirum' for two orchestras, the one of wind instruments concealed outside, while the strings of the other, in the church, are playing an accompaniment pianissimo and tremolo in the upper registers.¹ In his oratorio of 'La Nativité'² he does the same with a chorus of angels, which is sung by an invisible choir at a distance.

In writing for the stage (opéra-comique, and opéra) he was less of an innovator. After a first attempt in 'Le Tonnelier,' with Audinot, he produced successively 'Le Faux Lord' (1765), a 3-act opéra-comique which failed, owing to the inferiority of the libretto; 'Les Pêcheurs' (1766), long and successfully performed; 'Toinon et Toinette' (1767); 'Le Double Déguisement' (1767), withdrawn after the first representation; 'Sabinus' (1774); 'Alexis et Daphné,' produced the same night with 'Philémon et Baucis' (1775); 'Hylas et Sylvie' (1776); 'La Fête de village,' intermezzo (1778); 'Thésée' (1782), reduced to 3 acts, with one of Lully's airs retained and re-scored; 'Rosine' (1786); and 'La Reprise de Toulon' (1796). He also collaborated with Philidor and Botson in 'Berthe' (Brussels, 1775). 'Les Sabots et le cerisier' was given in 1803; 'Le Périgourdin' (or 'La Périgourdine') was performed at the house of the Prince de Conti; 'Nitocris' (MS.) remained unfinished. He composed ballets, 'Les Seythes enchaînés' for Gluck's 'Iphigénie en Tauride'; 'Mirsa' (1779); 'Callisto' (not performed). A number of works were written in honour of the Republic, and in connexion with various revolutionary celebrations; some of the best known are 'Le Chant du 14 Juillet' (1790); 'L'Offrande à la liberté' (Oct. 21, 1792); 'Le Triomphe de la République, ou le Camp de Grandpré' (Jan. 27, 1793).

The ease with which Gossec obtained the representation of his operas at the Comédie Italienne and the Académie de Musique proves how great and legitimate an influence he had acquired. He had in fact founded the Concert des Amateurs in 1770, regenerated the Concert Spirituel in 1773, been second conductor of the Académie in 1780-82, had organised the École de Chant, the predecessor of the Conservatoire de Musique, in 1784, and at the time of the Revolution was conductor of the band of the National Guard. He composed many pieces for the patriotic fêtes of that agitated period, among which the 'Hymne à l'Être suprême' and 'Peuple, réveille-toi,' and the music for the funeral of Mirabeau, in which he introduced the lugubrious sounds of the gong, deserve special mention. On the foundation of the Conservatoire in 1795 Gossec was appointed joint inspector with Cherubini, Lesueur and Méhul, and professor of composition, a post he retained till 1815, Catel being one of his best pupils. He wrote numerous 'solfèges,' and an Exposition des principes de la musique for the classical publications of the Conservatoire. He was a member of the Institut from its foundation (1795), and a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour (1802). He retired from his professorship in 1816, but until 1823 continued to attend the meetings of the Académie des Beaux-Arts, in which he took great interest.

Gossec's works are both numerous and important, and include, besides the compositions already named, symphonies for orchestra (see SYMPHONY), the chronology of which it is difficult to clear. It is safe to say that he composed more than 30 symphonies; op. 4 (Sci sinfonie a piu strumenti) dates from 1759; opp. 5 and 6 contain 12 symphonies. He himself made a list of his instrumental compositions from opp. 1-13. 'La Chasse,' performed at the Concert Spirituel, Mar. 1774, suggested to Méhul his 'Overture du jeune Henri'; 3 symphonies for wind; a symphonie-concertante for 11 instruments; overtures; quartets (12 quartets, opp. 14, 15), trios and other chamber music; masses with full orchestra; a Te Deum, then considered very effective; motets for the Concert Spirituel, including a 'Dixit Dominus' and an 'Exaudiat'; several oratorios, among them 'L'Arche d'alliance,' performed at the Concert Spirituel, and 'Saul,' in which he inserted an O Salutaris for three voices, composed for Rousseau, Lais and Chéron during a country walk; fine choruses for Racine's 'Athalie,' sung at the court in 1786, and Rochefort's 'Électre' (1783); and finally a 'Dernière Messe des Vivants' (1813), and the ballet héroïque of 'Calisto,' neither of which has been engraved; both are in the large collection of his autographs in the library of the Conservatoire.

Gossec exerted a great influence on the development of instrumental music in France; himself influenced by J. Stamitz, he gave the first models of symphony, and introduced horns and clarinets into the Opéra orchestra. He was an artist to whom the French school owes much, though he did not leave any works that have survived their epoch.

An oil-painting of him ornaments one of the rooms in the library of the Conservatoire. There is another small portrait engraved by Frémy after Brun, and a marble bust by Cailloüete, a pupil of Cartellier. The Belgians, always ready to show honour to the illustrious men of their own country, erected at Vergnies a monument to the memory of Gossec, in the form of a quadrangular fountain surmounted by his bust. It was inaugurated Sept. 9, 1877.

In England Gossec is almost entirely unknown, though the British Museum contains many of his works.

GOSSWIN, ANTON, contralto in 1568 in Munich court chapel; in 1580 Kapellmeister to the Bishop of Liège, Hildesheim, Freising, living at the latter town. He composed masses and other church music, and 'Neue teutsche Lieder,' 3 v., adapted mostly from Orlando di Lassus' 5-part songs.

GOSTENA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA DALLA (b. Genoa; d. probably before 1605), pupil of Philippe de Monte, and from 1584-89 maestro di cappella at Genoa cathedral. He probably died before 1605, when his pupil Molinaro succeeded him at the cathedral. He composed a book of madrigals a 4, 1582, and another a 5, 1584; books of canzonette a 4, 1589; 25 fantasias for lute (in Molinaro's 'Intavolatura'), 1599, and several motets, etc., in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

GOSTLING, REV. JOHN (b. circa 1650¹; d. July 17, 1733), was the son of Isaac Gostling, mercer, of East Malling, Kent, and was admitted to St. John's College, Cambridge, from Rochester School, in Oct. 1668, aged 18. He was sworn a gentleman extraordinary of the Chapel Royal on Feb. 25, 1678/9, and three days later was admitted in ordinary, on the death of William Tucker. He is called 'a base from Canterbury, Master of Arts.' He subsequently became a minor canon of Canterbury, vicar of Littlebourn, chaplain to the King, Sub-dean of St. Paul's and Prebendary of Lincoln. He was one of the most famous singers of his time, on account of the volume and compass of his bass voice. He was one of the 'ministers' at the coronations of James II. and of William and Mary. Hawkins² gives an anecdote explaining the origin of Purcell's anthem, 'They that go down to the sea in ships,' a work written to suit Gostling's voice, and at his own request.

GOTTSCHALK, LOUIS MOREAU (b. New Orleans, May 8, 1829; d. Rio de Janeiro, Dec. 18, 1890), who gained a wide but ephemeral reputation as pianist and composer, was the son of an English father, Doctor of Science at Cambridge, Mass., and a French mother, daughter of Count Antoine de Bruslé, colonel of a cavalry regiment and governor of St. Domingo at the time of the insurrection. He studied in Paris under Charles Hallé, Camille Saint-Saëns and Maleden, and made a professional tour in the French provinces, Savoy, Switzerland and Spain, in which last country he had an enormous success (1852). On his return from his travels he began his first tour through America, playing his piano compositions and conducting his orchestral works at monster festivals; a symphony entitled 'La Nuit des tropiques,' a triumphal cantata, an overture, fragments of an unpublished opera, etc., were heard in this way. His two operas, 'Charles IX' and 'Isaura de Salerno,' were never performed; besides the symphony just mentioned, his orchestral works include a second, called 'Montevideo,' a grand march dedicated to the Emperor of Brazil, 'Escenas campestres cubanae,' and 'Gran Tarantella.'³ His success was so great that an American speculator, Max Strakosch, since famous for having brought out Mme. Patti, engaged him to make a tour through the States. From this period Gottschalk's career was one of incessant and successful travel. He died suddenly, at the very time when, tired of his wandering life, he was planning a quiet retreat at Paris.

GOTTSCHED, JOHANN CHRISTOPH (b. Judithenkirch, near Königsberg, Feb. 2, 1700; d. Leipzig, Dec. 12, 1766), deserves mention in this place because of his attitude to opera generally and to Italian opera in particular. His career as a writer, and as professor in the Leipzig University, lay apart from music, but that he took a great interest in music is proved by the fact that his house was a centre of musical activity in the lifetime of Bach, whose pupil, Krebs, was the teacher of Frau Gottsched, a lady of remarkable literary attainments, and an ardent amateur of music. The professor used his great influence on behalf of German opera, and compiled a kind of preparatory catalogue of German plays printed between 1450 and 1750, with and without music, under the title of Nöthiger Vorrath zur Geschichte der deutschen dramatischen Dichtkunst, etc. (Leipzig, 1758; with a continuation published 1765). It seems fairly certain that Gottsched's weekly publication, Die vernünftigen Tadelrinnen, was the original model for J. A. Scheibe's periodical Der critische Musikus, in which systematic attacks were made upon the ridiculous customs of Italian opera as then presented. Whether based upon the opinions held by Gottsched or not, this work of Scheibe's had wide influence in banishing Italian opera from Germany, and in establishing German opera in its stead. (See SCHEIBE.)

GOUDIMEL, CLAUDE (b. Besançon, c. 1505–1510), French composer.

He had probably moved to Paris by 1549, in which year he makes his first appearance as a composer in a book of chansons published by Du Chemin of Paris. On the title-pages of two works published in 1553 and 1555 respectively, his name is printed as joint publisher with Du Chemin. In 1557 Goudimel was living in Metz, in close association with many of the Huguenots there. The exact date of his joining the Protestants is uncertain, but 1557 and 1558 are the years when a Magnificat and 4 Masses appeared—the last music that he composed for the Catholic Church. Moreover, in 1565 he stood godfather to a child in the Protestant church at Metz. Michel Brenet's discovery of the 1551 edition of Goudimel's 'Psaumes en forme de motets' (Claude Goudimel, Essai bio-bibliographique, Besançon, 1898) is interesting, for there is little doubt that Catholics and Huguenots alike made use of the melodies in the Huguenot psalters, until Catholic authority stepped in and forbade the practice. Douen¹ discusses at great length the question as to the authorship of these melodies, and on the whole concludes that Goudimel did not compose them, but added his harmonies to well-known tunes, the melody being nearly always placed in the tenor part. A feeling of uneasiness among the Huguenots in Metz led to large numbers of them leaving between 1565 and 1568 to seek safer quarters; Goudimel returned to his native town Besançon, going later on to Lyons. In the poetical works of Paul Melissus Schedius published at Frankfort in 1574 and 1575 are pieces addressed to Goudimel, and in the later edition are also two letters, written in Latin from Goudimel to Melissus. The first is dated 1570; the second from Lyons, Aug. 23, 1572, was written on his return from Besançon only a few days before his death, for Goudimel perished in the massacre of the Huguenots at Lyons, Aug. 27, 1572. The doubt expressed by Hawkins² as to Goudimel ever having 'past the limits of his own country' is justified by later researches, for Michel Brenet, who in her able essay deals with every available source of information, was unable to discover any trace of Goudimel's residence in Rome, where he is popularly supposed to have founded a school of music, in which Animuccia, Alessandro della Viola, Gio. Maria Nanino, the great Palestrina and others, were pupils. Palestrina's adoption of themes in Goudimel's compositions is sometimes quoted as a proof of their connexion. In his 'Missa brevis' (1570) he borrowed from Goudimel's 'Audi filia' Mass, and in his 'Missa sine nomine' (1570) from Jean Maillard's 'Je suis déshérité' Mass, which had been published together in 1558. But Michel Brenet gives instances of his using other compositions in the same way, and in this he was following the custom of the time. There seems also to be no ground for supposing that Goudimel was a member of the Papal Choir.

Nearly all the principal collections of chansons published in Paris from 1549 onwards contain compositions by Goudimel. There are 32 in the set published by Nicolas Du Chemin beginning with the

and concluding in 1554 with the 'Unziesme livre, contenant XXII chansons,' etc. There are at least 16 in those published by Adrien le Roy and Robert Ballard, from the 'Sixiesme livre de chansons nouvellement composées en musique à quatre parties par bons et excellens musiciens, imprimées en quatre volumes, 1556,' to the 'Vingt-deuxiesme livre de chansons à quatre et cinq parties, 1583.'³ Single songs are also to be found in two books of 'Chansons, nouvellement mises en musique par bons et scavantz musiciens à quatre parties en quatre volumes : Paris, Michel Fezandat, 1556'; and in a 'Premier livre de chansons . . . par bons et excellents auteurs : Paris, Nicolas Du Chemin, 1557.'

Two songs, for five voices, are in the

² 'Mélange de chansons tant des vieux auteurs que des modernes. À cinq, six, sept et huit parties : Paris, Adr. Le Roy et Robt. Ballard, 1572.'

Two more in

the 'Deuxième livre,' 1575, is said to contain seven songs. In Les amours de P. de Ronsard . . . commentées par Marc. Ant. de Muret : Paris, 1553, are four Odes in four-part harmony. They were reprinted by Julien Tiersot, Ronsard et la musique de son temps (see list of reprints below), who gives an interesting appreciation of Goudimel's music; the Ode à Michel de l'Hospital

'est d'une beauté harmonieuse, d'une ampleur de lignes dont on ne trouve pas beaucoup d'autres exemples dans la musique profane du XVI^e siècle,' etc.

Also the 'Chansons spirituelles de Marc-Antoine de Muret mises en musique à quatre parties : Paris, Nicolas Du Chemin, 1555.' Both works are said to contain 4-part music by Goudimel, although at the present time no copy of either book seems to be known. It is thought that the following work, edited by Goudimel, was first published in Lyons in 1572 :

'L'excellence des chansons musicales composées par M. Jacques Arcaudet tant propres à la voix qu'aux instruments, recueillies et revues par Claude Goudimel natif de Besançon. Par Jean de Tournes, imprimeur du roy à Lyon, 1586.'

One composition, 'Par le desert de mes peines' for four voices, rather unexpectedly appears in a quaint little book entitled 'Instruction methodique et fort facile pour apprendre la musique pratique, par Corneille de Montfort, dit de Blockland, 1587, Jean de Tournes à Lyon.' The explanation is given by 'l'imprimeur au lecteur':

'Voyant qu'à la fin de ce petit traité y avoit quelques pages blanches, j'en ay voulu remplir une partie de la dernière chanson à quatre, qu'a composé feu Claude Goudimel, l'un des premiers musiciens de son temps,' etc.

A great number of psalm-books, each containing from six to ten compositions by Goudimel, were published in Paris, at first by Du Chemin, but from 1557 onwards by Adr. Le Roy and Robt. Ballard. Michel Brenet gives the full title of the 1551 edition already alluded to:

'Premier livre, contenant huyct Pseaumes de David, traduits par Clement Marot et mis en musique au long (en forme de motetz) par Claude Goudimel; dont aucuns vers (pour la commodité des musiciens) sont à trois, à quatre, et à cinq parties, et aussi à voix pareilles,' etc.

Later editions appeared in 1557 and 1565. The 'Tiers livre' is of interest, as the dedication is dated from Metz, June 20, 1557. The series was concluded by the 'Huitiesme livre' in 1566. Six psalms set to music by Goudimel were included in 'Le second livre des pseaumes . . . en forme de motetz par divers excellents musiciens. De l'imprimerie de Simon Du Bosc et Guillaume Gueroult,' 1555. The two books, 'du meslange des pseaumes et cantiques à trois parties, recueillis de la musique d'Orlande de Lassus et autres excellens musiciens de nostre temps,' 1577, each contained two of Goudimel's psalms.

'Cinquante pseaumes de David, avec la musique à cinq parties d'Orl. de Lassus, Vingt autres pseaumes à cinq et six parties par divers excellents musiciens. De l'imprimerie de Jerome Commelin, 1597.'

included 'A toy ô Dieu, qui es là-haut' for six voices by Goudimel.

The first complete psalter appeared in 1564:

'Les CL pseaumes de David, nouvellement mis en musique à quatre parties par Claude Goudimel, Paris, Adr. Le Roy et R. Ballard.'

It was re-issued in 1565. In both editions the dedication is dated from Metz. An edition in one volume was published at Geneva: 'par les héritiers de François Jaqui, 1565'; a later edition, also printed at Geneva—'par Pierre de Saint-André, 1580'—was republished by Henry Expert, Les Maîtres musiciens de la Renaissance française, 1895-97.

Lobwasser's German translation of the psalms was first published with Goudimel's music in 1573:

'Der Psalter . . . in deutsche reyme verstendiglich und deutlich gebracht . . . durch Amb. Lobwasser. Und hierüber bey einem jeden Psalmen seine zühörige vier Stimmen,' etc.

Goudimel's music is to be found in nearly all the psalm-books published in various languages during the 17th and 18th centuries. For instance, in those issued at Delft, 1602; Charren-ton, 1607; Geneva, 1667 and 1668; at Hanau, 1612, with both the French and German translations; at Zürich, 1701:

'Die Harpfe des Königs Davids . . . durch J. K. Hardmeyer angestimmt dass sie sowohl in denen gewöhnlichen Wäsen des getreuen Märtyrers Cl. Goudimels, als in denen neuen Gesangweisen gesungen werden können,' etc.

Again the French melodies are used in 'De CL. Psalmen Davids . . . door Petrum Dathenum': Amsterdam, 1620; in 'Ils Psalms da David, suainter la melodia francese, . . . Lurainz Wietzel,' 1733; and in the Italian editions 'Li CL. sacri Salmi di Davide . . . accomodati alle melodie di A. Lobwasser da And. G. Planta,' 1740; and 'Ils Psalmis de David, second melodia de A. Lobwasser,' 1762.

The music in the 'Vierter Theil der Arien . . . ausgegeben von Hein. Alberten,' 1645; No. 33, psalm 19; Siebender Theil, 1648; No. 9, psalm 146; Achter Theil, 1650; No. 7, psalm 125, is 'nach der Weise des berühmten Goudimels.'

There are 5 masses composed by Goudimel; Du Chemin, in 1554, published one, 'Il ne se trouve en amitié,' with 4 motets and 2 Magnificats (first printed in 1553); the four others were published by Adr. Le Roy et R. Ballard in 1558: 'Missae tres a Claudio Goudimel . . . cum quatuor vocibus. Audi filia. Tant plus ie metz. De mes ennuis.' 'Missae tres a Cl. de Sermisy, Joanne Mallard, Claudio Goudimel, cum quatuor vocibus conditae. Le bien que i'ay, Cl. Goudimel.' The last has been edited by Ch. Bordes: Anthologie des maîtres religieux primitifs, vol. II. p. 42, No. 9. There are modern MS. scores of the 5 masses and of one Magnificat in the Munich library.

In other works:

1. Primus liber septemdecim continet 4 et 5 vocum modulus, etc.: Paris, 1551. Motets: 'Quare fremuerunt' for five voices, and 'Domine quid multiplicasti eunt' for four voices; the latter was reprinted in 'Liber quartus eccle. cant. 3 vocum': Antwerp, Tylman Susato, 1568; and in 'Terlia pars magni operis musici': Nuremberg, 1589. There are also MS. copies of it in the British Museum (Add. MS. 11,584), and in the Königsberg library.
2. Anticum Beatae Mariae Virginalis, ex typographia Nicolai Du Chemin et Claudii Goudimel, 1553. Magnificat primo toni, and Magnificat octavi toni, both for four voices.
3. Quartus liber modulorum, 4, 5 et 6 vocum: Paris, Simon Du Bosc et Guillaume Gueroult, 1555. Two motets, first printed in 1554.

GOULDING & CO. (afterwards D'Almaine & Co.), an important London music publishing house, founded by George Goulding about the year 1784.

Goulding's first address was 25 James Street, Covent Garden, from whence he issued songs and minor instrumental publications, one of these being 'Six Sonatines for the harpsichord or pianoforte by a pupil of Giuseppe Haydn'; 'Pupil' being engraved very small and 'Haydn' very large. In or near the year 1787 Goulding's address was 'The Haydn's Head,' 6 James Street, probably due to a renumbering of the street rather than to a change of premises. Shortly after this he had an additional place of business at 17 Great Turnstile, but about 1790 this secondary address gave place to one at 113 Bishopsgate Street.

Early in 1799 Goulding took others into partnership, and removed westward to 45 Pall Mall, the new firm being styled 'Goulding & Co.' or 'Goulding, Phipps & D'Almaine.' They obtained Royal patronage, and became 'music-sellers to the Prince and Princess of Wales.'

In 1803 the firm took over a second place of business at 76 St. James Street, but in 1804/05 they had given up both this and the Pall Mall shop, and removed to 117 New Bond Street, with an agency at 7 Westmorland Street, Dublin (1803-15). In 1808/09 the number in New Bond Street changed to 124, and about this time, Phipps having left the firm to establish one of his own (Phipps & Holloway), it became 'Goulding, D'Almaine & Potter.' In 1811 they established themselves in a fine old mansion at the north-east corner of Soho Square, numbered 20. Messrs. Goulding remained at 20 Soho Square until 1858, and from here they did an enormous trade. About the year 1835 Goulding's name is absent from the name of the firm, which then stood as 'D'Almaine & Co.' In 1838 their catalogue is advertised to contain works from 200,000 engraved plates, and after this year D'Almaine & Co. removed to 104 New Bond Street. In later years the house becomes 'D'Almaine & Mackinlay.'

D'Almaine died in his eighty-third or eighty-fourth year in 1866, and in 1867 the plates and stock were sold by auction.

The earlier publications of George Goulding were of a minor character, being principally books of popular airs for the flute or violin, with tutors for these instruments, a few song sheets and similar class of music. After the removal to Pall Mall the standard of publication became higher, and much of the vocal music of the day, including some operas, was published by the firm. The Soho Square period may, however, be regarded as the golden age of the house, and from here the bulk of Bishop's music was issued, and many volumes of an ornamental character, with Selections of Scottish and Welsh airs, etc. In 'Melodies of Various Nations,' one of their common types of issue, appeared the spurious 'Sicilian air' which afterwards blossomed into 'Home, Sweet Home.' For some years about this time John Parry was their chief musical arranger and editor.

D'Almaine & Co. still maintained the 'popular' character of issue, and in the early 'sixties Quadrilles, Lancers, and other drawing-room music bear their imprint. F. K.

GOUNOD, CHARLES FRANÇOIS (b. Paris, June 17, 1818; d. Saint-Cloud, Oct. 17, 1893), was descended from a family of artists. In the 18th century his ancestors were lodged at the Louvre as the King's 'fourbisseurs.' His father, François Louis (d. 1823), was a painter and obtained the second Grand Prix de Rome for painting in 1783.

Charles received his early musical education from his mother, a distinguished pianist, and having finished his classical studies at the Lycée St. Louis, and taken his degree as Bachelier ès lettres, in 1836 entered the Conservatoire, where he was in Halévy's class for counterpoint, and learned composition from Paër and Lesueur. In 1837 his cantata 'Marie Stuart et Rizzio' obtained the second Prix de Rome, which he shared with the pianist Louis Chollet; and in 1839 he won the Grand Prix de Rome for his cantata 'Fernand.' No artist or literary man can tread the soil of Italy with indifference, and Gounod's residence in Rome exercised an influence on his ardent imagination, of which his whole career bears traces. The years he spent at the Villa Medici as a pensioner of the Académie de France were chiefly occupied with the study of the music of the old masters, especially Palestrina; and his first important compositions were a Mass for three equal voices and full orchestra, performed May 1, 1841, at the Church of San Luigi dei Francesi (the unpublished MS. is in the Library of the Paris Conservatoire), and a Mass for three voices without accompaniment, produced in Vienna in 1842. It was while visiting Austria and Germany on his way back to Paris that he first heard the compositions of Robert Schumann, of which he knew nothing previously; the effect they must have had on the impressionable mind of the young composer may be imagined. In Berlin he made the acquaintance of Mendelssohn. The ideas imbibed in Rome, however, prevailed, he remained faithful to Palestrina, and on reaching Paris became organist and maître de chapelle of the church of the 'Missions étrangères,' rue du Bac.

It was at this period that he attended for two years a course of theology; in 1846 he even became an out-pupil at the 'Séminaire,' and it was generally expected that he would take Orders. Fortunately he perceived the mistake in time, and renounced the idea of the priesthood; but these years of theological study had given him a love of reading, and literary attainments of a kind rarely possessed by musicians. We may believe that he employed the five years of silence (1845-50) in studying the works of Schumann and Berlioz. It was probably during this time that he wrote his 'Messe solennelle' in G, for solos, chorus, orchestra and organ, and which gave him his first appearance before the world—by a strange and almost prophetic chance, in London! Four numbers from that work, included by Hullah in a Concert at S. Martin's Hall, Jan. 15, 1851, formed the text of various articles in the English papers, and especially of one in the Athenæum (Jan. 18) which was reprinted in Paris and elsewhere, and caused much discussion. 'Whatever the ultimate result, here at any rate is a poet and musician of a very high order.'

But the theatre was destined mainly to occupy Gounod for many years. His first opera, 'Sapho,' in three acts, was given at the Opéra, Apr. 16, 1851, with Mme. Viardot in the principal part. It contains many passages rich in colour, though scarcely dramatic; the grand scena of Sapho, 'Héro sur la tour,' her final song, 'O ma lyre immortelle,' and the herdsman's air, have alone survived. In writing the numerous choruses for Ponsard's tragedy of 'Ulysse' (performed Comédie Française, June 18, 1852), Gounod again attempted to produce an antique colouring by means of rhythmical effects and modulations of an obsolete character; but the music, though betraying a master hand, was stigmatised as monotonous, and the charming chorus of the 'Servantes infidèles' was the only piece received with real enthusiasm. In 1852 he became conductor of the Orphéon in Paris; and the eight years he was there engaged in teaching choral singing gave him much valuable experience both of the human voice in itself, and of the various effects to be obtained from large bodies of voices. For the Orphéonistes he composed several choruses, and two masses for four men's voices; but such works as these were not calculated to satisfy the ambition of so exceptionally gifted an artist. Anxious to try his strength in all branches of music, he wrote several symphonies (one in D, a second in E^b), which were performed with success at the concerts of the Association des jeunes Artistes, but are of no importance. In France, however, the stage was the sole avenue to fame and fortune, and accordingly his main efforts were made in that direction. The 'Nonne sanglante' (Oct. 18, 1854), a 5-act opera founded on a weird legend in Lewis's 'Monk,' was given only eleven times, although it contains a second act of a high order of merit as music, and a very striking duet—that of the legend. After this second failure at the Opéra Gounod was compelled to seek success elsewhere, and accordingly produced 'Le Médecin malgré lui,' an opéra-comique arranged by Carré and Barbier from Molière's comedy, at the Théâtre Lyrique (Jan. 15, 1858).¹ The most successful number was the septet of the consultation; as for the charming couplets sung by Sganarelle when in liquor, they are delightful from a musical point of view, and essentially lyric, but contain not a particle of the vis comica. Under the title of the 'Mock Doctor' the piece had a fair success in London. 'Faust,' however, also produced at the Théâtre Lyrique, Mar. 19, 1859,² with Mme. Miolan-Carvalho as Marguerite, placed Gounod at once in the first rank of living composers. The fantastic part of Faust may not be quite satisfactory, and the stronger dramatic situations are perhaps handled with less skill than those which are more elegiac, picturesque or purely lyric, but in spite of such objections the work must be classed among those which reflect high honour on the French school. The Kermesse and the garden-scene would alone be sufficient to immortalise their author. 'Philémon et Baucis,' a one-act opera composed for the theatre at Baden, was rewritten in three acts for the Théâtre Lyrique, and performed Feb. 18, 1860. The score contains some charming passages, and much ingenuity and elegance of detail; but unfortunately the libretto has neither interest, movement nor point, and belongs to no well-defined species of drama. After the immense success of 'Faust,' the doors of the Opéra were naturally again opened to Gounod, but the 'Reine de Saba' (Feb. 28, 1862) did not rise to the general expectation. The libretto, written by Gérard de Nerval, embodies ideas more suitable for a political or a psychological exposition than for a lyric tragedy. Of this great work nothing has survived but the dialogue and chorus between the Jewesses and Sabeans, in the second act, the air of the Queen in the fourth act (afterwards inserted in 'Faust'), the choral march, the choral dance, and, above all, the elegant and picturesque airs de ballet. Under the name of 'Irene' an English version of the opera was occasionally performed in London. The success of 'Mireille' (Théâtre Lyrique, Mar. 19, 1864), a 5-act opera founded on the Provençal poem of F. Mistral, was secured by the cast, especially by the splendid performance of Mme Miolan-Carvalho, whose part contains one of the most remarkable airs of modern times ('Mon cœur'). Mme. Faure-Lefebvre—as Andreioun—and the other artists combined to make an excellent ensemble. Still 'Mireille' is descriptive and lyric rather than dramatic; accordingly by Dec. 15, 1864, it was reduced to 3 acts, in which abridged form it was revived in 1876. Its overture is admirable, and a great favourite in English concert-rooms. This charming pastoral was succeeded by 'La Colombe' (June 7, 1866), originally written for the theatre at Baden (performed there, Aug. 1860), and known in England as the 'Pet Dove,' and by 'Roméo et Juliette' (Théâtre Lyrique, Apr. 27, 1867), a 5-act opera, of which the principal part was again taken by Mme. Miolan. The song of Queen Mab, the valse, the duets, a short chorus in the second act, the page's song, and the duel scene in the third act, are the favourite pieces in this opera.

Gounod wrote incidental music for Legouvé's tragedy 'Les Deux Reines,' and for Jules Barbier's 'Jeanne d'Arc' (Nov. 8, 1873). He also published much church music, besides the 'Messe solennelle' already mentioned, and the second 'Messe des Orphéonistes'; a Stabat Mater with orchestra; the oratorio 'Tobie'; cantata, 'A la Frontière,' performed at the Opéra in 1870; 'Gallia' (Paris, Oct. 29, 1871), a lamentation, for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, produced at the Albert Hall, London, at the opening of the International Exhibition (May 1, 1871); a 'De Profundis'; an 'Ave Verum'; 'Sicut cervus,' and various other hymns and motets, two collections of songs, and many single songs and pieces, such as 'Nazareth,' and 'There is a green hill.' For orchestra a Saltarello in A, and the Funeral March of a Marionette. A jeu de plume, on the propriety of which we will not decide, but which is unquestionably extremely popular, is his 'Meditation' for soprano solo with various obbligato parts on the first Prelude of Bach's 48.

After a stay of some years in England from 1870, during which he appeared in public at the Philharmonic, the Crystal Palace and other concerts, and formed a choir under his own name (which afterwards became the Albert Hall Choral Society, and ultimately the ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY, q.v.), Gounod recollected that he had been elected a member of the Institut de France on the death of Clapisson (1866); and returning to Paris, in 1875 resumed the position to which his genius entitled him. On the 5th of Apr. 1877, he produced 'Cinq Mars' at the Théâtre de l'Opéra-Comique, a work which bears traces of the haste in which it was designed and executed. 'Polyeucte,' produced at the Opéra, Oct. 7, 1878, though containing some fine music, did not add to the fame of the author of 'Faust.'

In spite of its entire failure, he continued to write new works for the Opéra, where, up to the present time, 'Faust,' originally written for another theatre, has alone held its ground, though 'Roméo et Juliette' has enjoyed a second period of great success both in Paris and in London. 'Le Tribut de Zamora' was represented on Apr. 1, 1881, but the opera disappeared from the bills as quickly as 'Polyeucte' had done. He then took up his first opera, 'Sapho,' enlarged it into four acts, added some music, and produced it in this form on Apr. 2, 1884. According to the general opinion the work lost by this treatment, and the only parts which were still pleasing were those in which a certain youthful charm was found in the midst of purely scholastic scoring. The result was not such as the author had wished for, and 'Sapho' was withdrawn after a limited number of representations.

During the last years of his life, Gounod was plunged into a religious mysticism, and devoted himself to the composition of sacred works, especially adapted to the taste of a large section of the English public. The first of these, 'The Redemption,' sketched in 1868, but not finished till 1881, was performed at the Birmingham Festival of 1882, and in Paris, Apr. 3, 1884; the second, 'Mors et Vita,' composed when he was rewriting 'Sapho,' was produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1885, and in Paris, May 22, 1886. This new ideal of dramatic-religious music, which he calls 'music treated in the style of fresco' (Musique plane et peinte à fresque), seems to have first occurred to Gounod when he turned his attention to religious subjects in order to emulate the reputation of Berlioz's 'Enfance du Christ' and Massenet's 'Marie Magdeleine,' and desired to introduce innovations on the work of his rivals. He has made simplicity an absolute rule. The long recitatives on a single note, or rising and descending by semitones, the solo parts proceeding invariably by the intervals of a third, a sixth or an octave, while the choral and orchestral parts adhere to incessant reiterations of the same chords; these impart a monotony and a heaviness to the work which must weary the best disposed audience. The same style predominates in the 'Messe à Sainte Cécile' (performed Paris, Nov. 28, 1858), in the Mass 'Angeli custodes,' and in the 'Messe à Jeanne d'Arc,' which he declared his intention of composing on his knees in the Cathedral of Rheims on the stone on which Joan of Arc knelt at the coronation of Charles VII. This work was first performed in the Cathedral of Rheims, July 24, 1887, and in the church of S. Eustache in Paris Nov. 22, S. Cecilia's Day, 1887. A fourth Messe solennelle and a Te Deum were published in 1888.

Among Gounod's less important works may be mentioned: 'Les Sept Paroles de Jésus';

'Jésus sur la lac de Tiberiade'; a symphony, 'La Reine des Apôtres'; a cantata, 'Le Vin des Gaulois et la danse de l'épée,' various piano-forte pieces, and a method for the cornet-à-pistons. 'Les Dramas sacrés' was performed at the Vaudeville, Paris, in 1893. His posthumous works include two operas—'Maitre Pierre' and 'Georges Dandin'—and a Mass for St. Peter's in Rome. Verdi was made grand officer of the Legion of Honour in Mar. 1880, and Gounod received the same distinction in the following July.

To sum up, Gounod was a great musician and a thorough master of the orchestra. Of too refined a nature to write really comic music, his dramatic compositions seem the work of one hovering between mysticism and voluptuousness. This contrast between two opposing principles may be traced in all his works, sacred or dramatic; in the chords of his orchestra, majestic as those of a cathedral organ, we recognise the mystic—in his soft and original melodies, the man of pleasure. In a word, the lyric element predominates in his work, too often at the expense of variety and dramatic truth.

Gounod wrote the following literary works :

Ascension de Saint-Saëns. (1888.)
Mémoires d'un artiste. (1896; posthumous.)

GOUVY, LOUIS THEODORE (b. Goffontaine, Saarbruck, July 2, 1819; d. Leipzig, Apr. 21, 1898), a prolific composer, born of French parents. His father was a large ironfounder in Goffontaine. He took his degree at the college at Metz, and proceeded to Paris in 1840 to study the law. Hitherto, though possessing an unmistakable talent for music, he had had no instruction in it, and had probably not heard a single classical piece. But being at the Conservatoire he happened to hear Beethoven's seventh symphony. This at once fired his mind, and he wrote home to announce his determination to be a musician. His parents' consent obtained, he placed himself under Elwart for three years, then resided at Berlin, where he published his 'Opus 1,' and thence went for more than a year to Italy. In 1846 he returned to Paris, and made occasional visits to Germany, where his music has been frequently played with success, ultimately taking up his residence at Oberhomburg.

His published and unpublished works (of which a list is given by Fétis and Pougin) extend to op. 88, containing more than 170 numbers, many of them of large dimensions. They include :

Seven symphonies, a sinfonietta, 'Symphonische Paraphrasen' two concert-overtures, an octet for wind, a sextet for flute and strings, a quartet for piano-forte and strings, and one (serenade) for strings alone, five string quartets, five trios, sonatas, and other works for violin and violoncello with piano, and many piano solos, songs, etc.; a 'Missa brevis'; a Requiem; 'Sabbat Mater'; a cantata 'Golgatha'; dramatic scenes: 'Aëleia,' 'Gedipe,' 'Iphigénie en Tauride,' 'Electra,' 'Frühling's Erwachen' for soprano solo, male chorus and orchestra, 'Polyxena,' for the same.

An opera, 'Der Cid,' was accepted in 1863 at Dresden, but never performed. Gouvy was made a member of the Berlin Academy in 1895, and a chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1896.

GOW, a family of Scottish musicians notable during the latter part of the 18th and the beginning of the 19th centuries.

(1) NIEL (b. Inver, near Dunkeld,¹ Mar. 22, 1727; d. there, Mar. 1, 1807). Of humble parentage, he was intended for the trade of a plaid-weaver. At a very early age he showed a taste for music, and at 9 began to play the violin. He was self-instructed until the age of 13, when he received some lessons from John Cameron, a retainer of Sir George Stewart, of Grandtully. He became distinguished by his performance of Scots tunes, particularly strathspeys and reels, in which he has probably never been excelled or equalled. His fame soon reached London, and his assistance was long sought at fashionable balls and assemblies. He had an uncommonly powerful bow hand, particularly in the up stroke. He was ably supported by his brother, (2) DONALD, on the violoncello. Gow had four sons, all distinguished as musicians, and his and their compositions were published in the 'Collections' issued by the Gow family. His fame, however, rests on the performance, rather than the creation, of Scottish reels, etc. His early patron was the Duke of Atholl, whose patronage also extended to his sons.

Niel's portrait was painted by Sir Henry Raeburn, and was reproduced in a mezzotint plate. It is curious to note that the chin is placed on the right side of the tailpiece, showing that Gow retained the habit of the old violinists, first altered by GEMINIANI (q.v.).

(3) NATHANIEL (b. Inver, May 28, 1763; d. Edinburgh, Jan. 19, 1831), the most famous of Niel's sons, came in early life to Edinburgh, and at the age of 16 was appointed one of His Majesty's Trumpeters for Scotland at a salary of £70 or £80 per year. In Edinburgh he took lessons on the violin from the best Scottish violinists, to supplement those given him by his father. In 1791 he succeeded his brother, (4) WILLIAM (1751-91), as leader of the orchestra of the Edinburgh Assembly, and throughout the rest of his life maintained a high position in the Scottish musical world as performer, provider and composer of the dance-music then in use in the northern capital. Whether or not his playing was equal to that of his father, it is certain that he was a more tutored performer, and had, in addition, some skill in composition and theoretical music. In 1796 he entered as partner in a music-selling and publishing business with William Shepherd, an Edinburgh musician and composer, their first place of business being at 41 North Bridge Street, Edinburgh. Nathaniel had, before this, aided his father in the issue (through Corri and Sutherland) of three collections of Strathspey reels. While he was still actively engaged in his ordinary professional work the firm Gow and Shepherd published vast quantities of sheet-music (principally dance-music), and numbers of 'Collections' by the Gow family and others. In or about 1802 Gow and Shepherd removed to 16 Princes Street (which, in 1811, was renumbered 40), and did even a larger business than before. Shepherd having died in 1812 Gow found himself in monetary difficulties, and unable to meet his partnership liabilities with his partner's executors, in spite of the great trade done by the firm and Gow's professional earnings, which were exceptionally large. In 1814 the stock-in-trade was sold off, but in 1818 Nathaniel again entered into the music business, with his son, (5) NIEL (b. circa 1795; d. Edinburgh, Nov. 7, 1823), as a partner at 60 Princes Street. This continued until the son's death. Niel was a musician of excellent talent. His compositions include 'Flora Macdonald's Lament' ('Far over yon hills of the heather so green'), and 'Cam' ye by Athol,' songs equally famous with his father's 'Caller Herrin'.' For eight months Nathaniel Gow was again a partner in the music trade with one Galbraith, but Gow and Galbraith ceased business in 1827, when Gow became bankrupt. About this time he also was attacked with a serious illness, which confined him to his room until his death. In his later years his patrons were not backward in his behalf. A ball for his benefit realised £300, and other three in subsequent years yielded almost as great a sum. He had a pension from George IV. and another of £50 a year from the Caledonian Hunt. He was twice married, and left a family behind him, not distinguished as musicians. For particulars regarding the Gow family the reader is referred to John Glen's Scottish Dance-Music, bk. ii. 1895; and for a contemporary notice to the Georgian Era, vol. iv. 1834. A biographical article on Niel (1) appeared in The Scots' Magazine for Jan. 1809.

The chief composition by which Nathaniel (3) is remembered to-day is 'Caller Herrin', a piece written as one of a series to illustrate the musical street-cries of Edinburgh. The original sheet, which was published about 1798 or 1800, gives the cry of the Newhaven fishwife mingling with 'George St. Bells at practice' and other fishwives entering into the scene. This remained purely as an instrumental tune for more than twenty years, when Lady Nairne, taking the melody, wrote her best lyric to it, and published them together in The Scottish Minstrel, vol. v. circa 1823.

After Nathaniel's bankruptcy Alexander Robertson and Robert Purdie, both Edinburgh music publishers, acquired the rights of publication of the Gow Collections, and added to them 'The Beauties of Niel Gow' (three parts), 'The Vocal Melodies of Scotland' (three parts), and 'The Ancient Curious Collection of Scotland' (one part). As the Gow 'Collections' are of the highest value in the illustration of Scottish National music (many of the airs contained therein being traditional melodies printed for the first time) the following list with the dates of publication is given:

'A Second Collection' (1788); 'A Third' (1792); 'A Fourth' (1800); 'A Fifth' by Niel Gow and Sons (1809); and 'A Sixth' (1822).

'A Complete Repository of Original Scots Slow Strathspeys and Dances' (edited) by Niel Gow and Sons (1799); 'Part Second' (1802); 'Part Third' (1806); 'Part Fourth' (1817). All in folio.

In addition to these there are several collections of airs issued by Nathaniel Gow, being the composition of his pupils or patrons, beside a vast number of single sheets of similar works by the Gow family and others.

F. K.

Other sons of Niel (1) were William (4) (1751-91), (6) ANDREW (1760-1803), and (7) JOHN (1764-Nov. 22, 1826). They were each musicians of average merit as violinists and composers of Strathspeys, etc., some of which appear in the Gow publications.

Before 1788 John and Andrew had settled in London, where they established a music-selling and publishing business at 60 King Street, Golden Square. On the death of Andrew in 1803 John removed to 31 Carnaby Street, Golden Square, and in 1815-16 to 30 Great Marlborough Street. Before 1824 he had taken his son into partnership, and at 162 Regent Street they were 'music-sellers to His Majesty,' issuing much of the then popular quadrille and other sheet dance-music.

GOWARD, MARY ANNE, see KEELEY, MRS.

GRABBE, JOHANN, a 15th-16th century Westphalian musician, court organist of Count Lippe in 1609, but sojourning at Venice, where he published in that year a book of madrigals a 5 v., 2 pavans in Hagius's collective volume of 1616-17, and three instrumental pieces in Simpson's 'Taffel Consort' (Q.-L.).

GRABU, LEWIS (LOUIS GRABU or GREBUS), a French musician, who came to England about 1665, and, finding favour with Charles II., was appointed composer to the King's Musick on Mar. 31 of that year.¹ to the great chagrin of John Banister, then 'Master of the Musick.' He was leader of the band from 1668.² Upon Oct. 1, 1667, he produced at Court an 'English Song upon Peace,' which Pepys, who heard it, criticised very unfavourably, although admitting, at the same time, that 'the instrumental musick he had brought by practice to play very just.' His incapacity both as performer and composer were commented upon by Pelham Humfrey (Pepys, Nov. 15, 1667). His opera, 'Ariadne, or, The Marriage of Bacchus,' originally composed to a French text, was produced at Drury Lane, adapted to English words, in 1674. Its failure apparently led to a loss of favour,¹ but Grabu wrote the music for Shadwell's version of Timon of Athens in 1678; in December of the same year he retired to France, but returned to England in Nov. 1683. In 1679 he contributed a song to Durfey's 'Squire Old Sap' (see Durfey's 'New . . . Songs,' 1683). He was selected to compose the music for Dryden's opera, 'Albion and Albanus,' produced at Dorset Garden, June 6, 1685, at great expense, but performed for six nights only. It has been asserted that its failure was occasioned by the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, the news of which reached London on the last day it was played: the real causes, however, were the innate worthlessness of both drama and music. Both were published (in 1687), and readers may therefore judge for themselves. Dryden, in his preface to the piece, bestowed some extravagant encomiums upon Grabu, extolling him above all English composers, but a few years later changed his tone and awarded the palm to Purcell. A satirical song upon the piece, ridiculing both author and composer, is contained in Hawkins's History.² An account of the piece is in the preface to F. Spence's translation of St. Evremond's Miscellanies, London, 1686. It has been presumed that Grabu lost his court appointment, but in 1690 he composed the instrumental music for Waller's alteration of Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Maid's Tragedy.' A few songs by him are contained in some of the collections of the period.

GRACE, HARVEY (b. Romsey, Jan. 25, 1874), organist and writer on music, has been editor of the Musical Times since 1918. Educated in music under Madeley Richardson at Southwark Cathedral, Grace is essentially practical in his outlook. He was for several years organist of St. Mary Magdalene, Munster Square, where he set himself to produce a singing congregation, and met with considerable success in the task. As a member of the Committee of the Church Music Society and of the Archbishop's Committee on Church Music, as a lecturer and as a judge at competition festivals he has constantly furthered the cause of popular music in the best sense. His book The Complete Organist shows the practicality of his mind, while in The Organ Works of Bach practicality and scholarship go hand in hand. Both books first appeared as a series of articles in the Musical Times, which has exerted an increased influence under his vigorous editorship. Grace is a contributor to the present edition of this Dictionary.

GRACE NOTES (GRACES), the English name for the ORNAMENTS (q.v.) in vocal and instrumental music.

GRADENIGO, PAOLO, 16th-century composer of a book of madrigals a 5 v., Venice, 1574, and some canzones in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

GRADENTHALER, HIERONYMUS (b. Ratisbon, Dec. 27, 1637; d. there, July 22, 1700), a pupil of his father, Augustin, organist of St. Oswald. Hieronymus became organist of the 'New Parish,' and composed several books of sacred songs and psalms, 2 books of instrumental pieces (allemands, sarabands, etc.), and sonatas for violin solo, and 4-stringed instruments (1675, 1676); also a Tutor for elementary harmony and singing (2 editions, 1676 and 1687).

E. v. d. s.

GRADUAL. This term is used in two quite distinct senses. (1) Its original use is to denote the respond sung at Mass in the Roman rite between the Epistle and the Gospel. This particular respond was called responsorium graduale, perhaps out of a fancied similarity to the psalms of degrees (Psalms cxx.-cxxxiv.) or gradual psalms, because the gradual was sung from the steps of the ambo or pulpit in church, and it was thought that the Gradual psalms were so-called, from being similarly sung on the steps of the temple. The so-called 'graduals' of composers from the time of Byrd onward are of quite a different style, even when designed for the same position in the Mass. (See MOTET.)

(2) From this use the term was taken and applied to the book containing such graduals, or, more generally speaking, to the book containing all the Gregorian music of the Mass; and in this sense the word has been used to denote the service-book which is the musical counterpart of the Missal since the later Middle Ages (see ANTIPHONAL). For further particulars as to both these uses of the term see GREGORIAN MUSIC.

GRÄDENER, (1) CARL GEORG PETER (b. Rostock, Jan. 14, 1812; d. Hamburg, June 10, 1883), teacher and composer, received his first musical employment as a violoncellist at Helsingfors. After three years he went to Kiel and was appointed Musikdirector to the University there, a post which he retained for ten years. In 1851 he founded an academy for vocal music at Hamburg, and remained there until, in 1862, he was appointed to teach singing and theory in the Vienna Conservatorium. After three years he returned to Hamburg, where he taught in the Conservatorium, and spent the rest of his life. In 1867 he joined

F. W. Grund in forming the Hamburger Tonkünstlerverein, the presidentship of which he held for some years. His works include an oratorio ('Johannes der Täufer'), two symphonies, an overture ('Fiesco'), a piano concerto, romance for violin and orchestra, an octet, three quartets and a trio for strings, two quintets, two trios for piano and strings, three violin sonatas, a violoncello sonata, besides many pieces for the piano. He also wrote a Harmonielehre (1877), and his contributions to musical literature were collected and published in 1872 as Gesammelte Aufsätze. His son (2) HERMANN THEODOR OTTO (b. Kiel, May 8, 1844) entered the Vienna Conservatorium in 1862; in 1864 was appointed organist at Gumpendorf, and became a member of the court orchestra in Vienna. In 1874 he was appointed teacher of harmony, etc., in the Conservatorium, and in 1882 received the title of Professor. In 1886 he became director of the academical society for orchestral music, and of the academical Gesangverein. In 1899 he succeeded Bruckner as lector for harmony and counterpoint in the Vienna University. His compositions include an orchestral 'Capriccio' and 'Sinfonietta,' a 'Lustspiel-Ouverture,' concertos for violin (D maj.), violoncello (E mi), piano (D mi), an octet and quintet for strings, a quintet, trios, and impromptus for pianoforte and strings, intermezzi for violin and pianoforte, a sonata for two pianos, a set of variations for organ, strings and trumpet, and a violin concerto. The opera 'Die heilige Zita' was produced in Vienna as late as 1918 (Riemann).

GRÄFE, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (b. Brunswick, 1711; d. there, Feb. 8, 1787), ducal private secretary and high post office official, a prolific composer of odes and songs, and editor of odes, etc., by C. P. E. Bach, Graun, Giovannini, etc. He played an important part in the evolution of the German Lied (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GRAENER, PAUL (b. Berlin, Jan. 11, 1872), composer, was admitted to the famous Berlin Domchor when he was 9 years old, but it was not till many years later that he decided upon a musical career. After passing through the Askanisches Gymnasium he obtained, at the age of 16, a scholarship in Veit's Conservatorium, where he studied the piano with Veit himself, the violin with Hasse, and composition with Albert Becker and Benno Horwitz. But owing to his restless and roving temperament he did not stay long there and may be regarded as in the main a self-taught musician. For some years he lived a wandering life, travelling all over Germany, and from time to time holding some definite appointment, such as the conductorship of the theatre orchestras of Königsberg and Bremerhaven. When he was 23 he paid a bold and uninvited visit to Brahms in Vienna, who, after a none too friendly welcome, looked at some of his compositions and, while admiring the talent they displayed, gave him some kindly advice on the need of work and self-discipline and then dismissed him, happy, chastened but much encouraged. In 1896 he settled in London and his wanderings came temporarily to an end. During most of his London time he was conductor of the Haymarket Theatre Orchestra, and for several years was on the teaching staff of the R.A.M. In 1908 he went to Vienna as head of the New Conservatorium, and from 1910-13 was director of the Mozarteum at Salzburg. After living some years in Munich, he was in 1920 appointed professor and composition-teacher at the Leipzig Conservatorium in succession to Max Reger. In 1925 he resigned this post in order to devote all his time to composition.

By both the quality and the variety of his gifts he is one of the most important of contemporary German composers. He is not easy to classify, as his style is highly individual and cannot be obviously traced to any person or group. He might perhaps be roughly defined as a classic-romantic with modern impressionistic tendencies. He has written admirable music in many branches—chamber music, orchestral works, operas and songs, in all of which, as regards the manner, he shows himself to be a complete master of his craft. As regards the substance, if he seldom reaches the highest or deepest, he constantly exhibits a truly poetic imagination, a sure sense of beauty and a sensitive feeling for appropriate expression. He possesses fine lyrical, as well as pictorial, gifts, which are seen at their best in his operas and numerous songs. It is chiefly perhaps by the operas and songs that he has won his popularity, but many of his orchestral and chamber works also reach a high level of distinction. His published compositions are:

ORCHESTRAL: Two pieces, op. 9; Suite 'Aus dem Reiche des Pan,' op. 22 b; three pieces, op. 26; Sinfonietta (for strings and harp), op. 27; Symphony in D miz ('Schmied Schmezt') op. 39; Romanische Phantasie, op. 41; 'Musik am Abend,' three pieces, op. 44; Variations on a Russian Volkslied, op. 55; 'Waldmusik,' op. 60; Divertimento, op. 67, and, without opus number, 'Einnahme Feldwacht, ein Tonbild'; 'Faméla, petite sérénade'; three compositions (for strings).

CHAMBER-MUSIC: 3 Piano Trios, opp. 19, 20 and 61; 8 String Quartets, opp. 33, 64 and 65; 'Rhapsodie,' for FF, string quartet and contralto voice, op. 63; Sonata for vln. and PF, op. 66; Suite for flute and PF, op. 63; Suite for vln. and PF, op. 64; Suite for vcl. and PF, op. 66.

CHORAL: 'Wiebke Pogwisch,' Ballad for soli, chorus and orchestra, op. 24; 'Nocturno,' songs for chorus, op. 37; three Lieder for mixed chorus, op. 68.

SONGS: (101 in all), opp. 3, 4, 6, 11, 12, 15, 16, 21, 29, 30, 40, 43, 45, 46, 47, 49, 60, 57, 62, 70, 71 and (without opus number), 'Trommel des Landsturms.'

PIANO: 'Aus dem Reiche des Pan,' four pieces, op. 22 a; 'Wilhelm Raabe-Musik,' three pieces, op. 58; Romance, op. 69 No. 1, and, without opus number, 'Impressions.'

VIOLIN AND PIANO: Three pieces, op. 9, No. 1 and op. 10 and, without opus number, 'Légende'; 'Sous la fenêtre.' H. B.

GRAETZ, JOSEPH (b. Vohburg, Bavaria, Dec. 2, 1760; d. Munich, July 17, 1826), pupil of Michael Haydn at Salzburg, pianist, composer of operas, masses, etc., which lacked inspiration. As a musical theorist, however, he was highly esteemed, and many composers, Cannabich, Lindpaintner, Lauska, etc., came to him for further studies (Mendel).

GRAF (GRAFF), FRIEDRICH HARTMANN (b. Rudolstadt, 1727; d. Augsburg, Aug. 19, 1795), took part in the Netherlandish campaign as kettle-drummer and was wounded. In 1759 he went to Hamburg, where he gave concerts as flute virtuoso and conducted subscription concerts from 1761–64 or 66. He toured as virtuoso until 1772, when he became Kapellmeister at Augsburg. In 1779 he was invited to Vienna to write an opera for the German theatre. In 1783 he went to London to supervise performances of his compositions at the ANTIEN CONCERTS. He was looked upon as an outstanding composer in his day, and Oxford University bestowed upon him the degree of Mus.D. on Oct. 15, 1789. Gerber gives a list of his numerous works covering all branches of music, but only a comparatively small number of chamber works, a few symphonies, concertos, cantatas, etc., have survived. (See Q.-L.; Mendel.)

GRAFTON, RICHARD (d. circa 1571), a famous early typographer, notable in musical history for having printed some of the first books of English Church service. A citizen of London and a grocer, he went to Paris with Edward Whitchurch about 1537 at the suggestion and by the aid of Thomas Cromwell for the purpose of getting the Bible printed in English. When nearly completed the Inquisition seized the printer whom Grafton and Whitchurch had employed, and the two partners with Coverdale had to fly to England. They afterwards bought a number of the confiscated and condemned copies from a haberdasher, and completed the work in London. In 1539 they obtained from Henry VIII. a patent for the printing of Bibles, and many editions with the Psalter appeared. In 1541 Grafton was printing alone, living in the house of the Gray Friars, just then dissolved. In 1544 Grafton produced Cranmer's Litany under the title, An exhortacion unto praier thought mete by the Kynges Maiestie. . . . Also a Letanie with sufferages to be said or songe in the tyme of the said processions. Imprinted by Richard Grafton . . . the XVI day of Iune . . . 1544, 8vo. In 1550 he reprinted John Merbecke's Booke of Common praier noted. These are both important works in the annals of English Church music and in the history of musical typography. He used as his emblem a woodcut depicting a grafted apple-tree bearing fruit (graft), springing out of the bung-hole of a barrel (tun).

GRAHAM, GEORGE FARQUHAR (b. Edinburgh, Dec. 29, 1789; d. there, Mar. 12, 1867), son of Lieut.-Col. Humphrey Graham, was educated in the High School and University at Edinburgh. He studied music as an amateur, and was to a great extent self-taught. In 1815

he and George Hogarth acted as joint secretaries of the first Edinburgh Musical Festival, and in the next year Graham published An Account of the First Edinburgh Musical Festival, to which is added Some General Observations on Music. He passed some years in Italy in pursuit of musical knowledge. He composed and published some ballads, and contributed the article 'Music' to the 7th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. The article was reprinted separately in 1838, with the addition of an Introduction and Appendix under the title of An Essay on the Theory and Practice of Musical Composition. About the same time he assisted in bringing out the Skene MS., and contributed an interesting paper to the appendix. (See DAUNEY.) He wrote the article 'Organ' for the 8th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. In 1848–49 he furnished historical, biographical and critical notices to The Songs of Scotland, adapted to their appropriate Melodies. W. H. H.

GRAIN, JOHANN (JEAN) DU, composer and singer at the church of St. Mary, Elbing, 1737–1739. In the former year he wrote a 'Passion,' which was regularly performed at Danzig as late as the beginning of the 19th century. After 1739 Du Grain lived at Danzig, but in 1765 Reichardt knew him at Königsberg, and says that in spite of his French name he was a born Prussian. His contemporaries held him in such esteem that they referred to him as musicus celeberrimus. He was very eccentric and secretive, so that it even remained a mystery by what accident he had acquired a wooden leg. His art he held so sacred that he would never compose for gain. G. Döring (Gesch. d. Mus. in Preussen, I.c.) speaks of a 'Jubel-Cantata' of 1737, for which Handel wrote the choruses and arias and Du Grain the recitatives. This has not been found so far. Very few of his compositions are still in existence. (See Q.-L.; Mendel.) E. v. d. s.

GRAINGER, PERCY ALDRIDGE (b. Brighton, Melbourne, Australia, July 8, 1882), pianist and composer, was taught at first by his mother, until he was 10 years of age, when, for a year and a half, he was a pupil of Professor Louis Pabst, who was then at Melbourne.

On the proceeds of several recitals he travelled to Germany with his mother and studied successively under Professor James Kwast and Busoni. In 1900 he came to London, and from the following year onwards he gave recitals and played at many of the most important concerts, including the Philharmonic, the Hallé Concerts at Manchester, the Leeds Festival where, in Oct. 1907, he played the solo part in Grieg's piano concerto, the composer having been under contract to conduct his work, but having died a month before the festival. It was by Grieg's own choice that Grainger was engaged to play, and the young pianist had enjoyed the special esteem and affection of the Norwegian composer for some few years. The latter's love of national music inspired Grainger to throw himself heartily into the movement for recovering English folk-songs. One of the Journals (May, 1908) of the Folk-Song Society includes a large collection of songs found and annotated by him taken down with the aid of a phonograph. As an arranger of folk-song themes Grainger has won special success; his set of four 'Irish Dances' on themes by Stanford, his arrangements of English, Welsh, and Irish tunes for unaccompanied chorus, are all marked by strong individuality and brilliant treatment. His 'Paraphrase' on the Flower-Waltz from Tchaikovsky's 'Casse-noisette' is one of the most effective of modern pianoforte solos, and he has written an arrangement for string quartet of two Irish reel tunes, under the title 'Molly on the Shore.' He has toured with great success through Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. In the winter of 1909 he went on a tour to Scandinavia. He had played in Copenhagen on several occasions, notably at the concert in memory of Grieg, conducted by Svendsen.

The Balfour Gardiner concerts (Queen's Hall, 1912) brought Grainger more prominently before the public as a composer. His pieces for strings or small orchestra, such as the 'Mock Morris' and 'English Dance' showed, beside the rhythmic vitality and whimsical interplay of parts which they had in common with the folk-song pieces, that Grainger had the power to invent a tune for himself. His short pieces, both instrumental and vocal, have had a well deserved popularity. He has never ventured in larger forms. In 1915 Grainger migrated to America, where he has settled and where most of his works have been published. For a fuller list see B. M. S. Ann., 1920.

GRANADOS, ENRIQUE (b. Lérida, July 29, 1867; d. at sea, Mar. 24, 1916), Spanish composer and virtuoso pianist.

The son of an officer in the Spanish army, Granados studied composition with PEDRELL and then PF. with DE BÉRIOT (2) in Paris. He returned to Barcelona in 1889, where he became known as a pianist, playing in various parts of Spain and also in Paris; a concert for 2 pianofortes given by him and Joaquín Malats in Barcelona, greatly increased his reputation. He also appeared with Thibaud, Manén and Casals. His first opera 'María del Carmen,' was performed in Madrid in 1898; in 1900 he founded a 'Sociedad de Conciertos clásicos' in Barcelona, and conducted its performances. His dramatic poem 'Gaziel' was given in Barcelona in 1906.

Granados was above all things a pianist. His earlier compositions show various influences, Chopin, Grieg and Liszt. With the publication of the two books of 'Goyescas,' however, he may be said to have created modern Spanish PF. music. These pieces, named after scenes from the paintings and tapestries of Goya (1746-1828) and episodes from the 'Goyesque' period in Madrid, are an expression in terms of a highly developed PF. technique of forms and rhythms which are definitely Spanish. Granados, indeed, by his work (and also, perhaps, by the tragic circumstances of his death) revealed modern Spanish music to the rest of Europe. In construction the 'Goyescas' show traces of German (i.e. 19th century) influence; they are definitely written in an idiom which belongs to the times before Debussy. But they have an extraordinary grace and charm, a feeling of stateliness and something (e.g. in 'Los Requebros') which might be called a gesture—qualities which made them seem something new in PF. music, and which atoned for their lack of concision. Granados (like Pedrell, Albéniz) was a Catalan by birth; but like Albéniz he succeeded in catching the accent and idiom of the music of other parts of Spain, utterly distinct from Catalonia. 'La Maja y el ruiseñor,' the most beautiful of all his works, has an elegance and a finish which no Spanish composer has surpassed, besides an extraordinary sense of poetry.

The 'Goyescas' were not so successful when worked up into an opera, with a new orchestral intermezzo and a libretto by Fernando Periquet. The work was accepted for performance in Paris in 1914; but owing to the war, the production took place at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York (Jan. 26, 1916). On his way back to Spain, via Liverpool and the English Channel, Granados was on board the Sussex when she was torpedoed by a German submarine, and went down in her. He left a number of PF. pieces, Spanish dances, songs, including tonadillas modelled on the forms of Spanish music in vogue in the 'Goyesque' period and arrangements of some of the sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti for a modern PF. Though the propriety of altering so great a master as Scarlatti may be questioned, the fact is that Scarlatti's works are more usually heard in transcriptions (e.g. Tausig) than in their original forms as given in the complete edition published by Alessandro Longo. Granados, it must be admitted, has made his alterations with extraordinary skill. Like Falla, he seemed to realise that Domenico Scarlatti was the master and model of Spanish PF. composers; though he never himself got so near to Scarlatti in feeling as Falla has done since. He also completed an unfinished PF. piece ('Azulejos') by Albéniz, and re-scored the F minor concerto of Chopin.

An interesting account of Granados, particularly as a teacher of the PF. and explorer of its technical possibilities, is given by his pupil, G. de Boladeres Ibern (Barcelona, Artes y Letras S.A.). The list of compositions given in that work includes amongst others the following:

PIANOFORTE WORKS

GRANCINI (GRANCINO, GRANZINI), MICHEL ANGELO (b. circa 1600; d. circa 1669), organist of S. Sepolcro, Milan, 1628; of the cathedral, 1630-50; maestro di cappella c. 1652. He stood in such high esteem as an artist that he was given special dispensation from the order of Charles Borromaeus, which excluded married men from the latter post. His compositions consist of masses, concerti sacri, madrigals, motets, etc. (Q.-L.; Piccinelli).

GRANCINO, (1) PAOLO (b. Milan), a violin-maker of the second rank. He learnt his art under Nicolo Amati at Cremona. His violins are dated from 1665-90. His son (2) GIOVANNI (1696-1715), who dates 'from the sign of the Crown' in the Contrada Larga of Milan, was a maker of higher merit. His violins, tenors and violoncellos, are usually of a large flat pattern, and present a development of the Amati model analogous to that of Stradivari. His sons (3) GIAMBATTISTA and (4) FRANCESCO carried on his business (1715-46) under the title of 'Fratelli Grancini.'

GRAND DUKE, THE, or The Statutory Duel, a comic opera, in 2 acts; words by Gilbert; music by Sullivan. Produced Savoy Theatre, Mar. 7, 1896.

GRANDI, ALESSANDRO (b. Sicily; d. Bergamo, before July 8, 1637),¹ a composer of motets, concerning whom nothing is definitely known, excepting only what can be gathered from the title-pages of the earlier editions of his works. (See Q.-L.) He seems to have been born in Sicily, was possibly a pupil of Giovanni Gabrieli and certainly maestro in the church of Santo Spirito at Ferrara from 1610-17. In the latter year he went to Venice as a member of the choir of St. Mark's, where he became deputy conductor in 1619. In 1628 he was chief conductor at S. Maria Maggiore in Bergamo. His first book of masses, a 3, appeared in 1630; a second (with a psalm of Giov. Croce in it) in 1636, for two, three and four voices with accompaniment ad libitum; and the 'Messe concertate,' a 8, in 1637. A book of psalms, a 8, was issued in 1629; 'Salmi per i vespri,' a 4, with litanies, etc., in 1707; and various collections of motets, with and without accompaniment, in 1610, 1613, 1614, 1616, 1619, 1620, 1621, 1629 and 1637. Two books of accompanied madrigals appeared in 1616 and 1622; and four books of 'Cantade et Arie a voce sola,' were issued from 1620 onwards, only two of which are now in existence (Q.-L.).

GRANDIOSO (Ital.), in a grand or broad style.

GRANDIS, (1) VINCENZO DE (d. Mar. 18, 1646), singer in the Papal Chapel, 1605-30. He composed psalms, vespers and a motet (1604); 'Sacrae cantiones,' 2-5 v. (1621); 'Aeuni salmi et motetti' (1625), and various numbers in collective volumes. Q.-L. identifies him with the following, which from the difference of time is obviously impossible. E. v. d. s.

(2) VINCENZO DE, maestro di cappella at the Seminary and Church del Gesu, Rome, 1672; maestro di cappella of the Duke of Brunswick, 1675-80²; returned to the court of Modena, but left there, Apr. 21, 1683. He composed several oratorios and motets. Some of the unsigned MSS. in the Estense library (oratorios, operas, etc.) may be attributable to him.

GRANDJANY, MARCEL G. L. (b. Paris, Sept. 3, 1891), harpist and composer. He was a pupil for harp of Hasselmans and Henriette Renie, and at the age of 13 obtained (1905) a brilliant first prize at the Paris Conservatoire ; and, after solid theoretical study with Taudou, Caussade and Paul Vidal, a first prize for harmony (1909) and an accessit for counterpoint (1910).

As a performer he has acquired an enviable reputation both in France and abroad (Central Europe, England, United States). He has written songs, pianoforte pieces, and above all, music for the harp, either alone or in combination with other instruments ('Chansons populaires françaises'; 'Poème symphonique pour harpe, cor et orch.'). GRAND PRIX DE ROME. The Académie des Beaux-Arts, a branch of the Institut de France, holds annual competitive examinations in painting, sculpture, engraving, architecture and music. The successful candidates become pensioners of the government for a period of four years, and as such are sent to Rome, where they reside at the Villa Medici, in the Académie de France founded by Louis XIV. in 1666. Hence the term Grand Prix de Rome is applied to those musicians who have obtained the first prize for composition at the Institut de France. The Prize was established on the reorganisation of the Institut in 1803. In 1864 the procedure was modified by a decree of Napoleon III.: from 1864-71 the works were judged by a special jury composed of nine members drawn by lot from a list chosen by the general superintendent of theatres. Since 1872 the final judgment has been restored to the united sections of the Académie des Beaux-Arts ; and the method of procedure is as follows: The six composers forming the musical section of the Institut, assisted by three composers not belonging to the above-mentioned body, give a preliminary verdict, which the entire Académie has to ratify or veto. The competition takes place in June, and the performance of the prize cantata in October, at the annual public séance of the Académie des Beaux-Arts. The prize composition was originally a cantata for one voice and orchestra ; subsequently for one male and one female voice ; but for the last forty years three characters have been required, and it has now attained to the importance of a one-act opera. The libretto is also furnished by competition, in which distinguished writers often take part ; while the most popular singers take pleasure in performing these first compositions of the young aspirants. In the event of no composition proving worthy of the Prize, it stands over till the next year, when two may be adjudged (see 1805, 1819, etc.)

Below is a complete list of the musicians who have gained this distinction, with the titles of their compositions, 'cantata,' 'lyric scene' or 'dramatic scene' :

1803. Androt. 'Alcyone.'	1862. Bourgault-Ducoudray.

GRANJON, ROBERT (b. Paris, c. beginning of 16th cent.), a type-founder who was one of the first to introduce round notes instead of square and lozenge-shaped ones, and at the same time to suppress the ligatures and signs of proportion, which made the notation of the old music so difficult to read—and thus to simplify the art. His efforts, however, appear to have met with little or no success. His first publications are said to be dated 1523, and the first work printed on his new system, 'Le Premier Trophée de musique,' a collection of chansons, etc., in 1559, at which time he had left Paris for Lyons; he was at Rome in 1582, where he printed the first edition of Guidetti's Directorium, having been called to Rome by the Pope in order to cut the capital letters of a Greek alphabet.

Whether he or BRIARD (q.v.) of Bar-le-duc was the first to make the improvements mentioned above is uncertain. Briard's 'Carpentras' (printed in the new style) was published at Avignon in 1532, but Granjon appears to have made his invention and obtained letters patent for it many years before he had an opportunity of exercising it. G.

GRANOM, LEWIS CHRISTIAN AUSTIN, a composer of the 18th century, who produced many songs and pieces which were popular in their day. His first work was 'Twelve Sonatas or Solos for a German Flute, with a thorough-bass for the Harpsichord, or Violoncello, opera prima,' published about 1741. He afterwards published 'Six Sonatas for two German Flutes and a Bass, being his opera secunda' (1745), and a collection entitled 'The Monthly Miscellany,' consisting of duets for flutes, songs, etc. His 'Second Collection of forty favourite English Songs, with string accompaniments, in score; dedicated to Dr. Boyce,' bears the opus number xiii. Nothing is known of his biography. A trumpet-player of the same name was in London in 1712–16, and advertised a set of concerts in Hickford's Room in 1729.

GRAS, JULIE AIMÉE JOSEPHE DORUS- (family name, Steenkiste) (b. Valenciennes, Sept. 7, 1805; d. Paris, Feb. 6, 1896), operatic singer. DORUS was the name of her mother. She was the daughter of the leader of the band, and educated by her father. At the age of 14 she made a début in a concert with such success as to obtain a subsidy from the authorities to enable her to study at the Conservatoire of Paris. There she was admitted Dec. 21, 1821; and received instruction from Henri and Blangini. With a good voice and much facility of execution, she obtained the first prize in 1822. Paër and Bordogni then helped to finish her education. To the former she owed her appointment as chamber-singer to the king. In 1825 she began her travels, going to Brussels first, where she sang with such success as to receive proposals for the opera. She now gave six months to study for the stage, and made a brilliant début. After the revolution of 1830 she went to the Paris Opéra, and made her first appearance in the 'Comte Ory.' On the retirement of Mme. Damoreau-Cinti from the Opéra in 1835, Mlle. Dorus succeeded to the principal parts. In 1839 she visited London. Having married Gras (b. Amiens, Oct. 29, 1800; d. Étretat, July 9, 1876), one of the principal violins at the Opéra, Apr. 9, 1833, Mlle. Dorus for some years kept her maiden name on the stage. She retired from the Opéra in 1845. She continued, however, to sing occasionally in Paris and in the provinces. In 1847 she reappeared in London, and renewed her former triumphs; as she did again in 1848 and 1849. In 1850–51 Mme. Dorus-Gras remained in Paris, singing in a few concerts; but after that her artistic career came to an end. J. M.

GRASSET, JEAN-JACQUES (b. Paris, c. 1769; d. there, 1839), a distinguished violin-player. He was a pupil of Berthoume, and is reported to have excelled by a clear, though not powerful tone, correct intonation and technique. After having been obliged to serve in the army for several years—which he appears to have spent not without profit for his art in Germany and Italy—he returned to Paris and soon gained a prominent position there. On the death of Gaviniés in 1800 he was appointed professor of the violin at the Conservatoire, after a highly successful competition with a number of eminent performers. Soon afterwards he succeeded Bruni as 'chef d'orchestre' at the Italian Opera, which post he filled with eminent success till 1829, when he retired from public life. He published three concertos for the violin, five books of violin-duos and a sonata for piano and violin, which are not without merit. P. D.

GRASSHOPPER (HOPPER), in a square or upright pianoforte of ordinary London make, is that part of the action known technically as the escapement lever or jack, so constructed with base mortised into the key and backpiece that it may be taken out or replaced with the key without disturbing the rest of the mechanism. There is a regulating screw perforating the jack, tongue or fly, as it is variously called, of the grasshopper, drilled into the backpiece and bearing a leather button, the position of which and the pressure of a spring determine the rake of the jack, and consequently the rise and rebound of the hammer; the rebound being further regulated by a contrivance attached to the jack, when not an independent member, and used for checking or arresting it after the blow. In grand pianofortes, and in upright ones with crank lever actions, the escapement apparatus is less easily detached from the action.

It is not recorded by whom the Grasshopper was introduced, although the escapement part of it existed in Cristofori's 'linguetta mobile'; but the tradition which attributes it to Longman & Broderip, pianoforte makers in London, and predecessors of the firm of Clementi & Collard, may be relied upon. John Geib patented in London in 1786 a square action with the jack, and the setting off button acting upon the key, also, in another form, the screw holding the button perforating the jack—but with the button in front of it. The improved form with which we are acquainted, with the button behind the jack, was adopted by Messrs. Longman & Broderip, and soon became general.

GRASSI, CECILIA (b. 1746), who afterwards became the wife of John Christian Bach ('English Bach'), came to London with Guarducci in 1766, as 'first woman,' and remained in that capacity at the opera for several years. Burney thought her

'inanimate on the stage, and far from beautiful in her person; but there was a truth of intonation, with a plaintive sweetness of voice, and innocence of expression, that gave great pleasure to all hearers who did not expect or want to be surprised.'

She was succeeded in 1772 by Girelli, but remained in England until the death of her husband in 1782, when she returned to Italy, and retired from public singing. J. M.

GRASSINEAU, JAMES (b. London, c. 1715; d. there, 1769), was first employed by Godfrey, the chemist, of Southampton Street, Strand; then became Secretary to Dr. Pepusch, at whose instance he translated the Dictionnaire de musique of Brossard (Paris, 1703), with alterations and additions, some of which are said to be by Pepusch himself: A Musical Dictionary . . . of Terms and Characters, etc., London, 1740, an 8vo of 343 pages, with a recommendation prefixed, signed by Pepusch, Greene and Galliard. Some years afterwards an 'Appendix' of 52 pp. was issued; it is now scarce. A second edition is said to have been published in 1769 by Robson, with an appendix taken from Rousseau. A new edition, enlarged by John Caspar Heck, was published by T. Williams in 1784, entitled Musical Miscellanies. The Dictionarium musica (sic) by John Hoyle, a Yorkshire musician, appeared about 1770, and went into several editions; it is a mere abridgment of Grassineau's dictionary, although it pretends to be an original work.

GRASSINI, JOSEPHINA (as she signed herself) (b. Varese, Lombardy, 1773; d. Milan, Jan. 3, 1850), came of very humble parents. The beauty of her voice and person induced General Belgiojoso to give her the best instruction that could be procured at Milan. She made rapid progress in the school of singing thus opened to her, and soon developed a powerful and extensive contralto, with a power of light and finished execution rarely found with that kind of voice. She had the great advantage of singing in her first operas with such models as Marchesi and Crescentini. Grassini made her débuts at Milan, in the carnival of 1794, in Zingarelli's 'Artaserse' and the 'Demofonte,' of Portogallo. She soon became the first singer in Italy, and appeared in triumph on all the chief Italian stages. In 1796 she returned to Milan, and played in Traetta's 'Apelle e Campaspe,' and with Crescentini and Bianchi in the 'Giulietta e Romeo' of Zingarelli. The year after she excited the greatest enthusiasm at Venice as 'Orazio.' In 1797 she was engaged to sing at Naples during the fêtes held on the marriage of the Prince. In 1800, after Marengo, she sang at Milan in a concert before Buonaparte, and was taken by him to Paris, where she sang (July 22) at the national fête in the Champ de Mars, and in concerts at the Opéra. In 1804 she was engaged to sing in London from March to July for £3000, taking the place of Banti. Here she had to contend with Mrs. Billington in popular favour, though their voices were very different. Lord Mount-Edgumbe speaks in disparaging terms of that of Grassini, though he gives her credit for great beauty, 'a grace peculiarly her own' and the excellence of her acting. Her style was then 'exclusively the cantabile, and bordered a little on the monotonous. She had entirely lost all her upper tones, and possessed little more than one octave of good, natural notes; if she attempted to go higher, she produced only a shriek, quite unnatural, and almost painful to the ear.'

Her first appearance was in 'La Vergine de Sole,' by Mayer (or Andreozzi, according to the contemporary journals), in a part well suited to her. Very different from this was the effect produced by Grassini on other hearers, more intellectual, though less cultivated in music, than Lord Mount-Edgumbe. De Quincey found her voice 'delightful beyond all that he had ever heard.' Sir Charles Bell (1805) thought it was 'only Grassini who conveyed the idea of the united power of music and action. She died not only without being ridiculous, but with an effect equal to Mrs. Siddons. The "O Dio" of Mrs. Billington was a bar of music, but in the strange, almost unnatural voice of Grassini, it went to the soul.'

In 1804 she sang again in Paris; and, after 1806, when she quitted London, continued to sing at the French court for several years, at a very high salary (altogether, about £2600). Here the rôle of 'Didone' was written for her by Paër. After the change of dynasty, Mme. Grassini, whose voice was now seriously impaired, lost her appointment at Paris and returned to Milan, where she sang in two concerts in Apr. 1817. In 1822 she was at Ferrara, Lady Morgan heard her sing in Paris in 1829.

In 1806 a fine portrait of her was scraped in mezzotint (folio) by S. W. Reynolds, after a picture by Mme. Le Brun. It represents her in Turkish dress, as 'Zaira' in Winter's opera.

GRAUN, the name of three brothers, sons of an Excise collector at Wahrenbrück, near Dresden, one of whom (3) made a lasting mark on German music.

The eldest, (1) AUGUST FRIEDRICH (b. Wahrenbrück, Saxony, 1697; d. Merseburg, May 5, 1765), was at the time of his death cantor of Merseburg, where he had passed the greater part of his life since 1720.

(2) JOHANN GOTTLIEB (b. Wahrenbrück, c. 1698; d. Berlin, Oct. 27, 1771) was an eminent violinist, and composer of instrumental music much valued in his day. He was a pupil of Pisendel. After a journey to Italy, where he had instruction from Tartini, he was in the Dresden band until 1726, when he became Konzertmeister at Merseburg, and had Friedemann Bach for some time as his pupil. In 1727 he entered the service of Prince von Waldeck, and in 1728 that of Frederick the Great, then Crown Prince, at Rheinsberg. On the King's accession he went to Berlin, and remained there till his death, as conductor of the royal band. Of his many compositions only a set of violin sonatas, six harpsichord or organ concertos (with Agrell) and eight sonatas (trios) for two flutes and violin were printed. (See Q.-L.) Burney, in his Present State (ii. 229), testifies to the great esteem in which he was held. The excellence of the then Berlin orchestra is generally attributed to him. P. D.

The most celebrated of the three is the youngest, (3) KARL HEINRICH (b. Wahrenbrück, May 7, 1701; d. Berlin, Aug. 8, 1759). He was educated with Johann Gottlieb at the Kreuzschule in Dresden, and having a beautiful soprano voice, was appointed, in 1713, 'Rathsdiscantist,' or treble-singer, to the town council. Grundig the cantor of the school, the court-organist Petzold and the Kapellmeister Joh. Christoph Schmidt were his early musical instructors, and he profited by the friendship of Ulrich König the court-poet, and of Superintendent Löscher, who defended him from the pedantic notions of an inartistic Burgomaster. His career both as a singer and composer was largely influenced by his study of the vocal compositions of Keiser, the then celebrated composer of Hamburg, and of the operas of the Italian composer Lotti, who conducted in person a series of performances in Dresden, with a picked company of Italian singers. Even during this time of study Graun was busily engaged in composing. There still exist a quantity of motets and other sacred vocal pieces, which he wrote for the choir of the Kreuzschule. In particular may be cited a 'Grosse Passions-Cantata,' with the opening chorus 'Lasset uns aufsehen auf Jesum,' which, as the work of a boy of barely 15, is very remarkable. Three other early passion oratorios are mentioned in Q.-L. Upon König's recommendation he was appointed tenor to the opera at Brunswick when Hasse was recalled to Dresden in 1725. The opera chosen for his first appearance was by Schurmann the local Kapellmeister, but Graun being dissatisfied with the music of his part replaced the airs by others of his own composition, which were so successful that he was commissioned to write an opera, and appointed vice-Kapellmeister. This first opera, 'Polliodoro' (1726), was followed by five others: 'Sancio,' 1727, 'Scipio Africano,' 1732, 'Timareta,' 1733, 'Lo specchio della fedeltà' and 'Pharao Tubætes,' 1735; and besides these he composed several cantatas, sacred and secular, two 'Passions-Musiken' and instrumental pieces. His fame was now firmly established.

In 1735 he was invited to Rheinsberg, the residence of the Crown-Prince of Prussia, afterwards Frederick the Great. This powerful amateur continued Graun's friend and patron till his death. Here he composed about fifty Italian cantatas, usually consisting each of two airs with recitatives. They were highly valued at the time, and contain ample materials for an estimate of Graun's style of writing for the voice. Among his instrumental works of this period were flute concertos (unpublished) for his patron. He also wrote 'Trauermusik' for Duke August Wilhelm of Brunswick (1731) and King Frederick William I. (1740). When his patron came to the throne in 1740, he gave Graun the post of Kapellmeister, with a salary of 2000 thalers, and despatched him to Italy to form a company of Italian singers for the opera at Berlin. In Italy he remained more than a year, and his singing was much appreciated. After his return to Berlin with the singers he had engaged, he spent some years of remarkable activity in composing operas. Those of this period amount to twenty-eight in all (a complete list will be found in Q.-L.); 'Rodelinda, Regina di Longobardia' appeared in 1741, and 'Merope,' his last, in 1756. In his operas he gave his chief consideration to the singer, as indeed was the case with all Italian operas at that time. His forte, both in singing and in composition, resided in the power he possessed of executing adagios, and of expressing tenderness and emotion. His operas contain airs which merit the attention of both singers and public, a good instance being 'Mi paventi' from 'Britannico' (1751), with which Mme. Viardot-Garcia used to make a great effect. A collection of airs, duets, terzetts, etc., from Graun's operas was edited by Kirnberger, in 4 vols. (Berlin, 1773). 'Montezuma' was reprinted as vol. xv. of the D.D.T.

Towards the close of his life Graun again devoted himself to church music, and two of the works belonging to this period have carried his name down to posterity; and are indeed those by which he is now almost exclusively known. These are the Te Deum, which he composed for Frederick's victory at Prague (1757)—first performed at Charlottenburg at the close of the Seven Years' War, July 15, 1763—and still more, 'Der Tod Jesu,' or 'Death of Jesus,' a 'Passions-Cantata,' to words by Ramler, a work which enjoyed an unprecedented fame. In Germany the 'Tod Jesu' holds, in some degree, the position which is held by the 'Messiah' in England. It was first executed in the Cathedral of Berlin, Mar. 26, 1755, and was annually performed in Passion-week until quite recently. A centenary performance took place in 1855 in presence of Frederick William IV. It was first performed in England at St. Gabriel's, Pimlico, in Lent, 1877, and at an orchestral concert at the R.A.M., Apr. 1, 1887, under Barnby's direction. Looked at from a purely musical point of view, and apart from considerations of age or taste, the 'Tod Jesu' contains much that is significant. Graun was a master of counterpoint; his harmony—as his biographer, J. A. Hiller, says—was always 'clear and significant, and his modulation well regulated.' His melodies may be wanting in force, but they are always full of expression and emotion. That he possessed real dramatic ability may be seen from his recitatives, and these are the most important parts of the 'Tod Jesu.'

Graun's instrumental compositions, trios, pianoforte concertos, etc., have never been published, and are of little value. (See Q.-L.) He wrote thirty-one solfeggi, which form an excellent singing method, and he invented the so-called 'Da me ne satio'—a putting together of the syllables, da, me, ni, po, tu, la, be, for the practice of solfeggi, which, however has been little used.

GRAUPNER, CHRISTOPH (b. Kirchberg, Saxony, Jan. 13, 1683¹; d. Darmstadt, May 10, 1760), a prolific composer, came early to Leipzig, where he studied nine years at the Thomasschule under cantors Schelle and Kuhna.

He began to study law, but was driven by the Swedish invasion to take refuge in Hamburg, where he passed three years (1706-9) as harpsichord-player at the opera under Keiser. The Landgrave Ernst Ludwig of Hesse Darmstadt, then staying in Hamburg, having appointed him his vice-Kapellmeister, he removed in 1710 to Darmstadt, and in the same year was promoted to the Kapellmeister-ship on the death of Briegel. Here he did much to elevate both sacred and dramatic music, and greatly improved the court performances, the excellence of which is mentioned by Telemann. In 1723 he was proposed, together with Bach and Telemann, for the post of cantor at the Thomasschule (when Bach was elected), but he preferred remaining in Darmstadt. In 1750 he lost his sight.

Graupner worked almost day and night; he even engraved his own pieces for the clavier, many of which are very pleasing. Of his operas the following were produced in Hamburg: 'Dido' (1707), 'Die lustige Hochzeit' (with Keiser, 1708), 'Hercules und Theseus' (1708), 'Antiochus und Stratonice' (1708), 'Bellero-phön' (1708) and 'Simson' (1709). Three operas, written for Darmstadt, are mentioned in Riemann: 'Berenice und Lucio' (1710), 'Telemach' (1711) and 'Beständigkeit besiegt Betrug' (1719). After this he wrote only church and chamber music. Between the years 1719 and 1745 he composed more than 1300 pieces for the service in the Schlosskirche at Darmstadt—figured chorales, pieces for one and more voices and chorales with accompaniment for organ and orchestra. The court library at Darmstadt contains the autograph scores and the separate parts of these, which were printed at the Landgrave's expense; Superintendent Lichtenberg furnished the words. The same library also contains in MS. 50 concertos for different instruments in score; 80 overtures; 116 symphonies; several sonatas and trios for different instruments in various combinations, mostly in score; 6 sonatas for the harpsichord with gígues, preludes and fugues. Of his printed works there also exist 8 'Partien' for the clavier dedicated to Ernst Ludwig of Hesse (1718); 'Monatlíche "avíer-Früchte," consisting of preludes, allemandes, courantes, sarabandes, minuets and gígues (Darmstadt, 1772); and 'Die vier Jahreszeiten,' 4 suites for clavier (Frankfurt, 1733). We must also mention his 'Neu vermehrtes Choralbuch' (Frankfurt, Gerhardt, 1728). Graupner's autobiography is printed in Mattheson's Ehrenspforte, p. 410, and a list of the operas written for Hamburg will be found in the same author's Musik. Patriot.

GRAVES. Two sons of the Rt. Rev. Charles Graves, Bishop of Limerick, have been concerned with musical matters in the course of very varied careers.

(1) ALFRED PERCEVAL (b. Dublin, July 22, 1846), was a school inspector, 1875-1910. He was one of the founders of the Folk-song Society, and of the Irish and Welsh Folk-song Societies. He has written a large number of English lyrics, the most famous of which is 'Father O'Flynn,' to Irish and Welsh folk-tunes, and has translated Irish, Scottish and Welsh poems for music. He collaborated with Stanford in 'Songs of Old Ireland' and 'Songs of Erin,' with Charles Wood in 'Irish Folksongs,' and with Arthur Somervell in 'Welsh Melodies.' His lyrics have been set to original music by these composers, also by Parry and others.

(2) CHARLES LARCOM (b. Dublin, Dec. 15, 1856), assistant editor of the Spectator, 1899-1917, and member of the staff of Punch (from 1902), has written much serious musical criticism in the former and has turned the searchlight of his satirical humour on to musical matters in many articles and verses published in the latter. The Diversions of a Music Lover (1904), Musical Monstrosities (1909) and Post Victorian Music (1911) are the outcome of his journalistic activities. As the intimate friend of Grove, Parry and Stanford, he took an active interest in the R.C.M. from its foundation. He published The Life and Letters of Sir George Grove in 1903, and a life of Hubert Parry (2 vols.) in 1926. His memoir of Grove was written for the second edition of this Dictionary. C.

GRAVICEMBALO, an Italian corruption of the term Clavicembalo, a harpsichord. A. J. H.

GRAY, ALAN (b. York, Dec. 23, 1855), was educated at St. Peter's School, York, and Trinity College, Cambridge. He took the degrees of LL.B. in 1877, LL.M. in 1883, Mus.B. in 1886, and Mus.D. in 1889. He was at first intended for the legal profession, but after studying with Dr. E. G. Monk devoted himself altogether to music. He was appointed musical director at Wellington College, in 1883, and held that post till 1892, when he succeeded Stanford as organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, and conductor of the Cambridge University Musical Society (resigned 1912).

The first of his compositions to obtain an important hearing was 'The Widow of Zarephath,' York Minster, 1888. His cantatas are as follows: 'Arethusa,' Leeds Festival, 1892; 'The Legend of the Rock Buoy Bell,' Hovingham Festival, 1893; 'The Vision of Belshazzar,' Hovingham, 1896; 'A Song of Redemption,' Leeds Festival, 1898. Other works (some still in MS.) are an Easter ode (1892), a Festival Te Deum (1895), a 'Coronation March' (played at Hovingham Festival 1902), an Andante and Allegro for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, a string quartet, a pianoforte quartet, a sonata for pianoforte and violin, songs, partsongs, a cantata, 'Odysseus among the Phæacians,' etc. Dr. Gray's compositions for organ are important—four sonatas, four Idylls, Fantasia in G minor, a Ground, Variations, Adagio and Toccata, and some sets of short preludes and postludes, all alike being distinguished by serious aim and admirable workmanship and effectiveness. He has done important work as one of the editors of the PURCELL SOCIETY (q.v.). M.; addns. H. C.

GRAY & DAVIDSON. Robert Gray established an organ factory in London in 1774, and was succeeded by William Gray (d. 1820) and then by John Gray (d. 1849). In 1837-38 the firm was John Gray & Son, after which John Gray took Frederic Davison into partnership. Amongst the many organs erected by these makers all over the country, we may mention those in the Crystal Palace (Handel orchestra); St. Paul's, Wilton Place, and St. Pancras, London; Magdalen College, Oxford; and the Town Halls of Leeds, Bolton and Glasgow.

In 1876 they took up the business of Robson, and have also a factory at Liverpool, having succeeded Bewshur in that town. V. de P.

GRAZIA, CON; GRAZIOSO (Ital.), 'gracefully.'

GRAZIANI (GRATIANI). BONIFAZIO (b. Marino, 1605; d. June 15, 1664). From 1649 he was maestro di cappella at the Jesuit church and the Roman Seminary. His compositions, oratorios, masses, motets, etc., stood in high esteem, and even after his death were often reprinted, a rare occurrence in those times. Either speaks of a portrait, but does not say where it is. (See Q.-L.)

GRAZIANI, (1) FRANCESCO (b. Fermo, Apr. 16, 1829, a singer who appeared in London first at the Royal Italian Opera in 1855. (He had previously sung in Italy, and in Paris from 1855.) He made his début in the 'Trovatore,' then also produced here for the first time. In this

'the song "Il balen" exhibited to its best advantage one of the most perfect baritone voices ever bestowed on mortal. Such an organ as his is a golden inheritance; one, however, which has tempted many another beside himself to rely too exclusively on Nature.'¹

Graziani continued to sing in London and Paris, with almost undiminished powers, for many years. His voice, though not extensive downwards, had beautiful and luscious tones, reaching as high as G, and even A. He appeared with great effect as Nelusco in the 'Africaine' when that opera was first produced in London in 1865.

His brother, (2) LODOVICO (b. Fermo, Aug. 1823; d. there, May 1885), was a dramatic tenor, for whom the part of Alfredo in 'Traviata' was written. He sang in Paris, London and Vienna in about 1858-60 with great success. J. M.

GRAZIANI (GRATIANI), TOMMASO, of Bagna Cavallo (Roman province) (d. Milan, ? after 1627), a Franciscan monk, and pupil of Cost. Porta; maestro di cappella at San Francesco, Milan, 1587; at Ravenna, 1595; at the Concordia Cathedral, Milan, 1599; at Porto Gruaro, Lombardy, 1601. In 1617 he was acting as maestro di cappella at several churches in Milan, where apparently he died. He composed masses, psalms and other church music (Q.-L.; Riemann).

GRAZIOLI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (b. Venice, c. 1750; d. there, c. 1820), pupil of Bertoni. On May 28, 1782, he became second, and on Jan. 21, 1785, first organist, S. Mark's, Venice. He composed 3 books of fine harpsichord sonatas, opp. 1, 2, 3, some of which have appeared in modern editions. Some sacred songs for 1 and more voices with instruments remained in MS. (See Q.-L.)

GREAT OCTAVE, see STAVELESS NOTATION.

GREATOREX, THOMAS (b. North Wingfield, near Chesterfield, Derbyshire, Oct. 5, 1758; d. July 18, 1831), organist, conductor, etc., son of Anthony Greatorex of Riber Hall, Matlock. In 1772 he became a pupil of Dr. Benjamin Cooke. In 1774, at a performance of sacred music in St. Martin's church, Leicester (of which his sister was then organist), on occasion of the opening of the Leicestershire Infirmary, he had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of the Earl of Sandwich and Joah Bates. The Earl invited him to become an inmate of his house, and in 1774, 1775 and 1776 he assisted at the oratorios which were given at Christmas, under Bates's direction, at his lordship's seat, Hinchinbrook House, near Huntingdon. On the establishment of the Concert of Ancient Music in 1776 Greatorex sang in the chorus. In 1781 he was appointed organist of Carlisle Cathedral, a post which he held until about 1784, when he resigned it and went to reside at Newcastle. In 1786 he went to Italy, returning home through the Netherlands and Holland at the latter end of 1788. At Rome he was introduced to the Pretender, Charles Edward Stuart, with whom he so ingratiated himself as to induce the Prince to bequeath him a large quantity of valuable manuscript music. On his return to England Greatorex established himself in London as a teacher of music, and soon acquired a very extensive practice. On the retirement of Bates in 1793 he was, without solicitation, appointed his successor as conductor of the Concert of Ancient Music. In 1801 he joined W. Knyvett, Harrison and Bartleman in reviving the Vocal Concerts. In 1819 he was chosen to succeed George Ebenezer

Williams as organist of Westminster Abbey. For many years he conducted the triennial musical festivals at Birmingham, and also those at York, Derby and elsewhere. Greatorex published a collection of psalm tunes, harmonised by himself for four voices, and a few glees and harmonised airs. Besides these he arranged and composed orchestral accompaniments to many pieces for the Ancient and Vocal Concerts, which were never published. His knowledge was by no means limited to music; he was well skilled in mathematics, astronomy and natural history, and was a Fellow of the Royal and Linnæan Societies. He was buried in the west cloister of Westminster Abbey.

GREAT ORGAN. This name is given, in modern instruments, to the department that generally has the greater number of stops, and those of the greater power, although occasional exceptions are met with as to one or other of these particulars; as when a Swell of more than proportionate completeness, or a Solo organ, composed of stops of more than the average strength of tone, forms part of the instrument.

The use of the term 'Great Organ' in England can be traced back to 1469. In the Fabrick Rolls of York Minster, under that date, the following entry occurs:

'To brother John for constructing two pair of bellows for the great organ, and repairing the same, 15s. 2d.'

English organs at that period, and for nearly a century and a half afterwards, were invariably single manual instruments. This is clearly intimated in numerous old documents still in existence. Thus the churchwardens' accounts of St. Mary's, Sandwich, contain the following four memoranda:

'1496. Payd for mending of the hytell organys, lijs. ijd.' 'Item, for shepskyn to mend the grete organyse, iijd.' 'More clearly still: -- 1502. Paid for mending of the gret organ bellows and the small organ bellows, vd.' 'Item, for a shepis skyn for both organys, ijd.'

It was no uncommon circumstance for a large or rich church to possess one or even two organs besides the chief one. Thus at Worcester Cathedral there were, besides the 'great organ' in the choir, a 'pair of organs' in the Chapel of St. George, and another 'pair' in that of St. Edmund. At Durham there were two 'great organs,' as well as a smaller one, all in the choir; and an interesting description has been preserved in Davies's Ancient Rites and Monuments of the Monastical and Cathedral Church of Durham, 1672, of the position of two, and the separate use to which these several organs were appropriated:

'One of the fairest pair of the three stood over the quire door, and was only opened and play'd upon on principal feasts.' 'The second pair, — a pair of fair large organs, called the Cryers, — stood on the north side of the choir, being never play'd upon but when the four doctors of the church were read.' 'The third pair were daily used up at ordinary service.'

Reverting to the York records of the 15th century we find express mention of 'the large organ in the choir,' and 'the organ at the altar.'

The 'great' organ was doubtless in all cases a fixture, while the 'small' one was movable; and it is pleasant to notice the authorities of more opulent or fortunate churches helping the custodians of smaller establishments by lending them a 'pair of organs' for use on special anniversaries. An early instance of this custom is mentioned in the York records of 1485:

'To John Hewe for repairing the organ at the altar of B.V.M. in the Cathedral Church, and for carrying the same to the House of the Minorite Brethren, and for bringing back the same to the Cathedral Church. 13s. 9d.'

A 16th-century entry in the old accounts of St. Mary-at-Hill, London, states the occasion for which the loan of the organ was received:

'1519. For bringing the organs from St. Andrew's Church, against St. Barnabas' eve, and bringing them back again, vd.'

We have seen that some of the large churches had two or even three organs in the choir, located in various convenient positions, and employed separately on special occasions. But the idea of placing the small organ close to the large one—in front of and a little below it—with mechanism so adjusted that the two organs could be rendered available for use by the same player and on the same occasion—in fact, of combining them into a two-manual organ—does not seem to have been conceived in England until about the beginning of the 17th century; and among the earliest artists who effected this important improvement appears to stand Thomas DALLAM (q.v.). This builder made an organ for King's College Chapel, Cambridge, the accounts of which—entitled, 'The charges about the organs, etc., from the 22nd of June 1605, to the 7th of August 1606'—are still extant. From the manner in which 'the greate Organ' and 'the greate and litel Organs' are mentioned in these entries, it seems clear that the union of the two was a recent device. Seven years later Dallam built an instrument for Worcester Cathedral, the two departments of which were referred to collectively in the following extract:

'A.D. 1613. All the materials and workmanship of the new double-organ in the Cathedral Church of Worcester by Thomas Dalham, organ-maker, came to £211.'

The name 'Chayre organ' is also given to the smaller one. At length, in the contract for the York Cathedral Organ, dated 1632, we find the word 'great' applied to an organ as a whole—'touchinge the makeinge of a great organ for the said church'—although farther on in the agreement a 'great organ' and 'chaire organ' (in front) are specified.

GREAT STAVE, see NOTATION.

GREAVES, THOMAS, a lutenist, published in 1604, a work entitled:

'Songs of Sundrie Kindes; first Aires to be sung to the Lute and Base Vlioll. Next, Songs of Sadnesse, for the Viols and Voyces. Lastly, Madrigalles for five Voyces.'

It consists of 21 pieces; 15 songs and 6 madrigals. (See ENGLISH MADRIGAL SCHOOL and ENGLISH SCHOOL OF LUTENIST SONG-WRITERS.) On the title-page the composer describes himself as 'Lutenist to Sir Henrie Pierrepont, Knight,' to whom he dedicates his work. Lady Pierpoint was a sister of Sir Charles Cavendish, Wilbye's patron, and a cousin of Michael Cavendish the composer. The first three of the madrigals are of a patriotic character and are of poor quality. But the last piece in the book is an attractive and rather original ballet.

GREBER, JAKOB (b. latter half of 17th cent.), came to London with the singer, Margarita de l'Épine, and produced at the Haymarket Theatre an 'Indian pastoral' called 'The Loves of Ergasto,' Apr. 24,¹ 1705. This had already been composed to an Italian libretto, for the Court Library at Vienna contains a MS. score of 'Gli amori d' Ergasto,' dated (Q.-L.) about 1701. A later opera, 'The Temple of Love,' produced in London in 1706 as the work of Greber, is rightly ascribed by Hawkins to the double-bass player, Saggione.² Various cantatas for solo voice, with accompaniment of various instruments, are in existence in Berlin, Rostock and the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge (Q.-L.).

GRECHANINOV, ALEXANDER TIKHONOVICH (b. Moscow, Oct. 26/13, 1864), composer. He studied the piano under Safonov at the Conservatoire of his native town, but quitted it in 1890, afterwards joining the sister institution at St. Petersburg. Here he completed a course of theory and composition under Rimsky-Korsakov (1893). Grechaninov is a prolific composer of vocal music. His published works include: Nineteen songs with pianoforte accompaniments, opp. 1, 5, 7, 15, 20; a musical picture for bass solo, chorus and orchestra; twelve choruses, opp. 4, 10, 11, 12, 16; pieces for pianoforte and for violin; several sacred works; and a string quartet (No. 1, op. 2), which took the prize of the St. Petersburg Chamber Music Society, 1894. Among his unpublished works are a symphony in B minor, op. 6; a second symphony, op. 27; string quartet (No. 2, op. 14), and another quartet, op. 70; elegy for orchestra, op. 18. Grechaninov has also written two complete Liturgies (opp. 13 and 29), incidental music to several plays and two operas, 'Dobrynya Nikitich' and 'Sœur Béatrice.' The latter was withdrawn from the stage after a few performances on account of its representation of the Blessed Virgin.

GRECO (GRECO or GRIECO), GAETANO (b. Naples c. 1680), pupil of A. Scarlatti, whom he succeeded in 1717 as teacher of composition in the Conservatorio dei Poveri, where he had Pergolesi, Durante and Vinci for his pupils. From thence he passed to the Conservatorio di San Onofrio. None of his music appears to have been printed in his lifetime, and only a very few pieces are known in MS. These are almost entirely for harpsichord, and a selection of them, from a MS. in the British Museum, was edited by J. S. Shedlock, and published by Novello & Co. See the publications of the *Int. GREEK MUSIC. In treating the theory of Ancient Greek Music we shall follow the lines laid down by Aristoxenus, the greatest of Greek theorists, and proceed from the simple musical facts of concords to the complex phenomena of scales, modes, keys, etc.

A. CONCORDS.—The whole material of musical art is supplied by the scales; and a scale is ultimately determined by concords. In the concords, then, we touch the beginnings of all music, and in the scales we have the potentiality of its highest achievement.

A concord contains two elements, a relation and a direction of the relation; that is, in every concord there are two related notes, and one of them is more fundamental, more akin to the tonic than the other. The ancient Greeks recognised as concords or concordant intervals (διαστήματα σύμφωνα) the foundation of a note (1) on its fourth above, (2) on its fifth below, (3) on its octave above, (4) on its octave below. Thirds and sixths were discords (διάφωνα) for the Greek ear.

B. SCALES.—The elementary scale (σύστημα) is the tetrachord which is built on assumption of the following rules: (1) The smallest concord is the fourth (τὸ διὰ τετράρων), with the upper note as tonic; (2) this space cannot be divided by more than two intermediate notes; (3) no interval smaller than a quarter-tone (διεὺς ἐλαχίστη) can be produced or discriminated; (4) in the division of a fourth, when the upper note is tonic, the lowest interval must be equal to or less than the middle, and less than the highest. The recognition of these rules leaves an infinite variety of possible determination of the inner notes of the tetrachord; but three are taken as typical, and the classes represented by these types are called the genera (γέννη) of music, the Enharmonic, the Chromatic, and the Diatonic:

Scheme of the Chromatic Tetrachord Scale of the Tonic A.

Scheme of the Diatonic Tetrachord Scale of the Tonic A.

The sign x signifies that the note to which it is prefixed is sharpened by a quarter-tone. The fixed bounding notes of the scale are denoted by minims, the indeterminate passing notes by crotchets. The three close-lying lower notes, occurring only in the Enharmonic and Chromatic (marked by a bracket in the above example), were called the Pycnum (τὸ πυκνόν). At a later period the Diatonic genus displaced the others. The Enharmonic is no monstrosity, nor is the smallness of its intervals in itself an objection. We cannot appreciate them because we have lost the habit. But its fatal defect is that its notes cannot be determined by the principle of concord (see Plutarch, De musica, cap. 38, 1145 B). Starting from A we can determine ♯A by the series of concords—but xA cannot be thus determined.

The more ample scales are produced by the collocation of two or more of these tetrachords. Tetrachords can be collocated—(1) by conjunctio (συναφή), in which case the highest note of the lower tetrachord coincides with the lowest notes of the upper tetrachord. Hence the Heptachord scale:

HEPTACHORD SCALES IN THE THREE GENERA WITH THE NAMES OF THE INDIVIDUAL NOTES.

The name Hypate signifies the 'highest' chord (i.e. highest in its position on the instrument), Parhypate signifies 'next the highest,' Lichanus 'forefinger,' Mese 'middle,' Trita 'third,'

Paranete 'next the lowest,' Nete 'lowest.'

(2) By disjunction (διάσεισις), in which case a tone separates the several tetrachords from one another. Hence the old Dorian Enharmonic scale (see Aristides Quintilianus, ed. Meibom, p. 21, l. 15)—

(3) By alternate conjunction and disjunction. Hence results a non-modulating scale such as that supplied by the white notes of our keyed instruments. The octachord scales are exemplifications of it—

OCTACHORD SCALES IN THE THREE GENERA WITH THE NAMES OF THE INDIVIDUAL NOTES.

Paramese signifies 'beside the middle.' The last of these methods of collocation practically displaced the others, for it alone was musically satisfactory. The octachord scale alone has a permanent tonic; the others modulate, to use our term, one into the flat, the other into the sharp keys.

Deficient scales are also common, e.g. Terpander's scale (see Aristotle, Probl. xix. 32, and Nicomachus, ed. Meibom, p. 7)— a heptachord scale obtained by omission of one note of the octachord; and the enharmonic scale of Olympus, a trichord obtained by omission of one note of the tetrachord. For other deficient scales see Aristides Quintilianus, ed. Meibom, p. 21.

C. MODES. (a) Form of the Modes.—If in the indefinitely prolonged scale arising from the third method of collocating tetrachords we seek for a segment capable of supplying the notes for the first phrase of 'Voi che sapete' we find it in the segment—

If again we wish to render the opening phrase of 'Deh vieni, non tardar,' we are obliged to abandon that segment, and adopt the following:

Now, since Greek instruments were limited in compass, different instruments or different tunings of the one instrument were necessary in order to obtain such different segments. In this way these segments obtained a certain importance and quasi-independence, and were called modes (ῥόδοι or εἶδη). The schemes and names of the modes were as follows:

(b) Pitch of the Modes.—It is a law of Greek music (see Aristotle, Problems, xix. 20)—and indeed in the absence of harmony a natural necessity—that the Mese or Tonic must be the predominating or constantly recurring note in every melody. Therefore every mode will take its pitch-character from the position the Mese or Tonic occupies in it. Thus the Mixolydian is intrinsically high-pitched because, since its tonic lies near its upper extremity, in any melody written in that mode the upper notes will be predominant. Hence we understand Aristotle's statement (Politics, v. (viii.) 7. 1342 b 20) that certain low-pitched modes suit the failing voices of old men—they would not have to use their higher notes so much as their lower.

From this intrinsic pitch-character arises the relative determination of the pitch of the modes. Since e.g. the Lydian Mese or Tonic (diatonic) is a tone and a half from the top, and four and a half tones from the bottom, of the Lydian mode, while the Dorian Tonic is three and a half tones from the top, and two tones and a half from the bottom, of the Dorian mode, it follows that the Lydian mode is two tones higher than the Dorian.

The following table illustrates the pitch relations of the modes, but it is to be observed that the particular limits of pitch here assumed are arbitrary.

THE SEVEN MODES (IN THE DIATONIC GENUS)

MIXOLYDIAN.

LYDIAN.

PHRYGIAN.

DORIAN.

HYPOLYDIAN.

HYPOPHRYGIAN.

HYPODORIAN.

From this table it appears that the Hypodorian with its tonic F is the lowest of the modes, and the Hypophrygian, Hypolydian, Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian and Mixolydian follow at intervals respectively of a tone, a tone, a semitone, a tone, a tone, a semitone.

D. KEYS.—Developed Art called for a more ample scale than the octachord. This was obtained by the addition of tetrachords above and below, so as to form the following type:

The several tetrachords in it were called respectively Hypatŏn or 'of the highest' strings, i.e. lowest notes, Mesŏn or 'of the middle,' Diazeugmenŏn or 'of the disjunct,' Hyperbolaeŏn or 'of the extreme.' In this scale was further incorporated a tetrachord united by conjunction to the tetrachord Mesŏn at its upper extremity, and called Synemmenŏn or 'of the conjunct,' and the resulting scheme was known as the complete scale (σύστημα τέλειον). The important result of this extension was that the modes (as given in C), being all extended to the same type, their independence of form was thereby cancelled; the modes became mere keys (τόνοι). The subsequent addition of eight keys with their tonics in the spaces left vacant by the tonics of the seven already existing yielded the following complex of scales (see Alpyius, ed. Meibom):

E. PROLEMY'S MODES.—In the scheme of the mathematician Claudius Ptolemaeus (fl. 140-160 A.D.) the fifteen keys were again reduced to seven modes, and a new nomenclature according to position (κατὰ θέσιν as opposed to the old nomenclature κατὰ δυνάμιν 'according to function') was introduced, by which notes took their names from their mere place in any particular mode ; 'g.—

F. TONALITY AND MODALITY.—The most vexed question presented by Ancient Greek Music is that of its tonality or modality. Modern music exhibits two modalities, that of our major and that of our minor mode. The major and the minor scales differ from one another essentially in this, that each admits note-relations that the other excludes. Thus the immediate relation of C \sharp to A—not resolved into any other relations, since A is the tonic—is essential to the scale of A major, but is not to be found in the minor scale. For though C \sharp and A both occur in the minor scale of F \sharp , they are there mediated by the relation of both to F \sharp as tonic. Similarly the immediate relation of C to A, essential to the minor scale of A, is not to be found in the scale of A major. Thus difference of modality means a difference of note-relations. Does, then, Ancient Greek music admit differences of modality? According to the account given above, it does not; and the only modality to be found in it resembles that of our minor scale without the sharpened leading note:

But it has been customary (see the works of Westphal, Bellermann, Marquard, etc.) to take quite another view of the matter. The modes called Lydian, Dorian, Phrygian, etc. (which in the account given above have been distinguished merely by their internal pitch-relation) have been commonly regarded as so many modes differing from one another in such a way as our major and minor modes differ; that is, in respect of the note-relations which they include. On this view, for example, the opening phrases of 'God save the King' would be—with A as tonic.

(b) In the Phrygian Mode.

with G as tonic.

(c) In the Lydian Mode.

with F as tonic.

But apart from its inherent improbability, the following arguments may be adduced against this theory.

(1) There is absolutely no reference in the ancient Greek authorities to any such modal distinction (see Monro, Modes of Ancient Greek Music).

(2) All the analysis of the Greek authorities reduces scales to tetrachords of the form—

(and, of course, its Chromatic and Enharmonic equivalents) in which the extreme notes are determined as notes fixed by concord, while the intermediate notes are variable. Such an analysis would be radically false if modal distinctions in the modern sense existed. Thus any analysis of our major scale of C would be false that failed to recognise C and G as absolutely determined notes.

(3) Distinct ethical character is attributed to the several Greek modes. But it is attributed to them in virtue of their pitch. If now the modes differ in tonality, they cannot differ in pitch. It would be absurd to say that our major scale in general is higher or lower than our minor.

(4) The Greek modes, as we have seen, are regarded as severally suited for voices of different ages. But differences of modality in the modern sense would not account for this. In what way is our major mode more or less adapted to the failing voice of an old man than our minor?

G. ETHOS.—The Greeks had a keen appreciation of the potent effects of music on the ethos or mood, and through this on the character; and they are explicit as to the particular moods evoked by particular kinds of music. Thus (Aristides Quintilianus, ed. Meibom, p. 111) Diatonic music was held to be manly and severe, Chromatic sweet and plaintive, Enharmonic stirring and pleasing; again (see Plato, Republic, iii. 398 E; Aristotle, Politics, v. (viii.) 5. 1340 a 38) high-pitched music was felt to be passionate and expressive of violent grief, low-pitched music to be sentimental and licentious. The moods attributed to the modes depended on the intrinsic pitch of the latter.

H. SINGING AND INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.—Music was pre-eminently song for the Greeks. Instrumental music was mainly accompaniment of the voice. The rise and fall of the melody corresponds in the main to the rise and fall of the spoken words denoted by the accents, which were marks not of stress but of pitch (see Aristoxenus, ed. Meibom, p. 18, l. 14).

Harmony in the modern sense of the term (as the musical relation of notes sounded simultaneously) was rudimentary among the Ancient Greeks, and consisted in an optional, single-part accompaniment above the melody, which latter not only was the predominant tune, but also supplied in itself the unity and foundation which the bass and other parts so frequently supply in modern music.

I. NOTATIONS.—There are two sets of signs, one for the voice (the upper in the Table of keys given in D), the other for the instrument. The first are clearly the letters of the ordinary Ionic alphabet; the second have been explained by Vincent and Bellermann as adapted from the cabalistic signs for the heavenly bodies, but with more plausibility by Westphal as the first fourteen letters of an old Doric alphabet. These fifteen characters (two forms of λ are used), and the letters from which they are taken, are as follows:

Η Η Ε Ι Γ Ρ Ρ F C K Π < Ε Ν Ζ Υ
η ι ε λ γ μ ρ θ κ δ λ β ν ζ α

The three notes of a Pycnum were denoted by the same sign in different positions; thus $\vdash = d$, $\perp = x d$, and $\dashv = \sharp d$. The order in which the several letters are employed has received as yet no satisfactory explanation.

J. REMAINS OF ANCIENT GREEK MUSIC.—The scanty remains of Ancient Greek music are as follows:

(1) Fragments of the music to ll. 338-344 of the 'Orestes' of Euripides. These fragments contain two difficulties of notation, a sign \perp which may signify the end of a bar, and a group of three signs inserted in two places in the text, two of which may signify instrumental notes, while the third (which resembles the first part of the figure 2) may mark a rest. See p. 427 ff. of Musici Scriptores Graeci, edited by von Jan in the Teubner Classics.

(2) The inscription of Sikelus discovered on a column near Tralles by Mr. W. H. Ramsay. (See Musici Scriptores Graeci, p. 450 ff. or Monro's Modes of Ancient Greek Music, pp. 89, 133 ff.)

(3) Several fragments of hymns discovered by the French archaeologists excavating on the site of Delphi. (See Musici Scriptores Graeci, p. 432 ff. or the appendix of Monro's Modes of Ancient Greek Music.)

(4) Three hymns by Mesomedes, a musician in the reign of the Emperor Hadrian. (See Musici Scriptores Graeci, p. 454 ff.)

(5) A few instrumental exercises given by Bellermann in his Anonymous (pp. 94-6).

GREEK PLAYS, INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO.

The great interest which has been taken at the English Universities in the performances of Greek dramas in the original has given opportunity for the composition of choruses and incidental music. As these works are of some importance in the history of English music, a list of them is here appended:

- | | |

| The Agamemnon of Aeschylus; Oxford, June 1880. Music by Walter Parratt. | The Frogs of Aristophanes; Oxford, Feb. 1892. Music by C. H. H. Parry. |
| The Ajax of Sophocles; Cambridge, Nov. 28 to Dec. 2, 1882. Music by C. A. Maclearen. | The Iphigenia in Tauris of Euripides; Cambridge, Nov. 1894. Music by C. Wood. |
| The Birds of Aristophanes; Cambridge, Nov. 27 to Dec. 1, 1883. Music by C. Hubert H. Parry. | The Wasps of Aristophanes; Cambridge, Nov. 1897. Music by T. Tertius Noble. |
| The Eumenides of Aeschylus; Cambridge, Dec. 1 to 5, 1885. Music by C. V. Stanford. | The Agamemnon of Aeschylus; Cambridge, Nov. 16 to 21, 1900. Music by C. H. H. Parry. |
| The Alceides of Euripides; Oxford, May 18 to 24, 1887. Music by C. H. Lloyd. | The Clouds of Aristophanes; Oxford, Mar. 1 to 6, 1905. Music by C. H. H. Parry. |
| The Oedipus Tyrannus of Sophocles; Cambridge, Nov. 22 to 26, 1887. Music by C. V. Stanford. | The Birds of Aristophanes; Cambridge, Nov. 1897. Music by R. Vaughan Williams. |
| The Ion of Euripides; Cambridge, Nov. 1890. Music by C. Wood. | The Acharnians of Aristophanes; Oxford, Feb. 1914. Music by C. H. H. Parry. |

At Bradfield College various Greek plays have been given, generally with music supplied by C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS (q.v.), and of a deliberately archaic style, and more lately with music by Douglas Fox.

GREEN, JAMES, an organist at Hull, edited A Book of Psalm-tunes, with variety of Anthems in four parts, 8vo, which ran through many editions. The fifth appeared in 1724, and in the eighth, published in 1734, the title became A Book of Psalmody, containing Chanting Tunes for the Canticles and the reading Psalms, with eighteen Anthems and a variety of Psalm tunes in four parts. The eleventh appeared in 1751. He lived in London in later life, and was a great bell-ringer, having a belfry of his own at the top of his house.

GREEN, SAMUEL (b. 1740; d. Isleworth, Sept. 14, 1796), a celebrated organ-builder, studied the art of organ-building under the elder Byfield, Jordan and Bridge. After starting business on his own account he erected many instruments in conjunction with the younger Byfield, with whom he was for some years in partnership. Green became the most esteemed organ-builder of his day, his instruments being distinguished by peculiar sweetness and delicacy of tone. There exist more cathedral organs by him than by any other builder; though most of them have been since altered and enlarged. He built those in the cathedrals of Bangor, 1779; Canterbury, 1784; Wells, 1786; Cashel, 1786; Lichfield, 1789; Rochester, 1791; and Salisbury, 1792; in Winchester College chapel, 1780; St. George's chapel, Windsor, 1790; and Trinity College chapel, Dublin; in the following churches, chapels, etc., in London:—St. Botolph, Aldersgate; Broad Street, Islington; St. Catherine-by-the-Tower; Freemasons' Hall; The Magdalen Hospital; St. Mary-at-Hill; St. Michael, Cornhill; St. Olave, Hart Street; and St. Peter-le-Poor; in the following provincial cities and towns:—Aberdeen; Ardwick, near Manchester; Bath; Bolton-le-Moors; Chatham; Cirencester; Cranbourne; Greenwich Hospital; Helston; Leigh; Loughborough; Macclesfield; Nayland; Sleaford; Stockport (St. Peter's); Tamworth; Tunbridge; Walsall; Walton; Wisbech; Wrexham; and Wycombe; at St. Petersburg; and Kingston, Jamaica. He also repaired the organ erected by Dallam in 1632 in York Minster (destroyed by fire in 1829) and that in New College, Oxford.

GREENE, HARRY PLUNKET (b. Old Connaught House, Co. Wicklow, June 24, 1865), singer, son of Richard J. Greene of Dublin, was educated at Clifton College, and intended for the Bar, but his voice was so fine that he determined to enter the musical profession, and studied at Stuttgart (under Hromada from 1883), Florence (under Vannuccini) and London (under J. B. Welsh and Alfred Blume).

His first public appearance took place in 'Messiah' at the People's Palace, Stepney, Jan. 21, 1888; in the following March he sang in Gounod's 'Redemption' at one of Novello's Oratorio Concerts, and was soon engaged at all the most important London concerts. He made his mark most decisively in the recitals which he gave jointly with Leonard BORWICK (q.v.) from the year 1893 onwards, in the course of which his artistic interpretation of such great lyrical masterpieces as Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' and the songs of Brahms was justly admired. In 1890 he appeared at Covent Garden in a few parts, notably as the Commendatore in 'Don Giovanni,' and the Duke of Verona in 'Roméo et Juliette'; and in the autumn of the same year he made his first festival appearance at Worcester. Two years afterwards, at the Gloucester Festival, his creation of the part of Job in the oratorio of that name, by Hubert Parry, made a profound impression, and thenceforward he was associated with most of the first productions of Parry's works. Many of the finest songs of Stanford were written for him, and his remarkable powers of interpretation, and especially the beauty of his diction in singing the English language, have made him one of the leading apostles of English song from the folk-song to the products of modern composers. In recent years he has taught, lectured and written on many subjects connected with his art. His book, Interpretation in Song, contains the essence of his teaching. Greene made successful tours in Germany, America, etc., visiting the latter country for the first time in 1893. Thirty years later he visited Canada for a tour of adjudication at competitive festivals. (See M. and L. vol. iv. No. 4.) M.; addns. c.

GREENE, MAURICE, Mus.D. (b. London, c. 1695¹; d. there Dec. 1, 1755),² one of the two younger sons of the Rev. Thomas Greene, D.D., vicar of the united parishes of St. Olave, Old Jewry and St. Martin, Ironmonger Lane (or Pomary), and grandson of John Greene, Recorder of London. He received his early musical education as a chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral, under Charles King. On the breaking of his voice in 1710 he was articled to Richard Brind, then organist of the cathedral. He soon distinguished himself both at the organ and in composition. In 1716 he obtained (it was said chiefly through the interest of his uncle, Serjeant Green) the appointment of organist to St. Dunstan's in the West, Fleet Street, and, on the death of Daniel PURCELL (q.v.), in 1717, was chosen organist of St. Andrew's, Holborn. He held both those places until the following year, when, on the death of Brind, he became organist of St. Paul's, and in 1727, on the death of Dr. Croft, organist and composer to the Chapel Royal. Greene had a strong admiration for the genius of Handel, and assiduously courted his friendship; and by admitting him to perform on the organ at St. Paul's, for which instrument Handel had an especial liking, had become very intimate with him. Handel, however, discovering that Greene was paying the like court to his rival, Bononcini, cooled in his regard for him, and soon ceased to have any association with him. In 1728 Greene was made the instrument of introducing to the Academy of Ancient Music a madrigal ('In una siepe ombrosa') as a composition of BONONCINI (q.v.). The discovery of the fraud led to the expulsion of Bononcini from the Academy, and Greene, believing, or affecting to believe, that his friend had been unjustly treated, withdrew from it, carrying off with him the St. Paul's boys, and, in conjunction with another friend, Festing, established a rival concert in the great room called 'The Apollo' at the Devil Tavern near Temple Bar; a proceeding which gave rise to the joke, attributed to Handel, that 'Toctor Greene had gone to the devil.' In 1730, on the death of Dr. Tudway, Greene was elected Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, with the degree of Doctor of Music. As his exercise on the occasion he set Pope's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, altered and abbreviated, and with a new stanza introduced, expressly for the occasion, by the poet himself. This composition was performed at Cambridge at the Commencement on Monday, July 6, 1730. (A duct from it is given by Hawkins in his History, chap. 191.) In 1735, on the death of John Eccles, Dr. Greene was appointed his successor as master of the King's band of music, in which capacity he produced many odes for the king's birthday and New Year's Day. In 1743 he published his 'Forty Select Anthems,' the work on which his reputation mainly rests. In 1750 Greene received a considerable accession of fortune by the death of a cousin, a natural son of his uncle, Serjeant Greene, who bequeathed him an estate in Essex worth £700 a year. Being thus raised to affluence he began the execution of a long-meditated project, the formation and publication in score of a collection of the best English cathedral music. By the year 1755 he had amassed a considerable number of services and anthems, which he had reduced into score and collated, when his failing health led him to bequeath by will his materials to his friend, BOYCE (q.v.), with a request that he would complete the work. Greene left an only daughter Katherine, who was married to Dr. Michael Festing, Vicar of Wyke Regis, Dorset, the son of her father's friend the violinist. Greene was buried at St. Olave's, Jewry, and on May 18, 1888, his remains were removed to St. Paul's Cathedral and placed beside those of Boyce. A portrait of him was in the possession of Henry Festing, of Bois Hall, Addlestone, Surrey, in May 1895.

In addition to the before-named compositions, Greene produced a Te Deum in D major, with orchestral accompaniments, composed, it is conjectured, for the thanksgiving for the suppression of the Scottish rebellion in 1745; a service in C, composed 1737 (printed in Arnold's Cathedral Music); numerous anthems—some printed and others still in MS.; 'Jephthah,' oratorio, 1737; 'The Force of Truth,' oratorio, 1744; a paraphrase of part of the Song of Deborah and Barak, 1732; Addison's ode, 'The spacious firmament,' 'Florimel; or, Love's Revenge,' dramatic pastoral, 1737; 'The Judgment of Hercules,' masque, 1740; 'Phœbe,' pastoral opera, 1748; 'The Chaplet,' a collection of twelve English songs; 'Spenser's Amoretti,' a collection of twenty-five sonnets (1739); two books each containing 'A Cantata and four English songs'; 'Catches and Canons for three or four voices, with a collection of Songs for two and three voices'; organ voluntaries, and several sets of harpsichord lessons. (See Q.-L.) Greene was one of the founders of The Society of Musicians. (See FESTING ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.)

GREETING, THOMAS, was a teacher of the flageolet in London in the latter half of the 17th century, when the instrument appears to have been played on by ladies as well as gentlemen, as we gather from Pepys's Diary, which informs us that in 1667 Mrs. Pepys was a pupil of Greeting. He also taught Pepys himself. In 1662 Greeting was appointed a musician in ordinary without fee in the King's private music. (The King's Musick.) Greeting's claim to fame rests principally on his authorship of an important, and now rare, book of instruction in the playing of the flageolet. The date of its first issue is uncertain. The earliest known edition, oblong 8vo, the 'Instructions' printed, the 'Lessons' engraved in a special tablature of 6-line staves, has the following title:

'The Pleasant Companion; or new Lessons and Instructions for the Flageolet. The second edition, with large additions, London. Printed for John Playford, and are to be sold at his shop in the Inner Temple, near the Church, 1673.'

Hawkins gave 1675 as the date of the first edition. A copy of this edition (with, however, the title in facsimile) was in the possession of the late Sir Frederick Bridge. The earliest copy in the British Museum is that of 1682.

GREGOIR, (1) JACQUES MATHIEU JOSEPH (b. Antwerp, Jan. 18, 1817; d. Brussels, Oct. 29, 1876), made his first appearance as a pianist in Dussek's B minor Concerto when only 8 years old. After the revolution of 1830 he was sent to Paris to study under Herz, but his health obliged him to return to his native country after a few years. Subsequently he went with his brother to Biberich, where he studied with Rummel until 1837, when he returned to Antwerp. His success as a performer was very great, and some compositions other than the numerous works written for his own instrument were favourably received. A Lauda Sion, a cantata, 'Faust,' and an opera in three acts, 'Le Gondolier de Venise,' were produced shortly before 1848, in which year he established himself for a time in Brussels. After a year's work as music-teacher in an English school at Bruges, he returned to Brussels. Many successful concert-tours were undertaken by him in Germany, Switzerland and elsewhere. His pianoforte works include a concerto, op. 100, several excellent books of studies, besides fantasias and other drawing-room pieces. He collaborated in several duets for piano and violin with Vieuxtemps and Léonard, and in several for piano and violoncello with Joseph Servais.

His brother, (2) ÉDOUARD GEORGES JACQUES (b. Turnhout, Nov. 7, 1822; d. Wyneghem, near Antwerp, June 28, 1890), was composer and writer on musical subjects. After the journey to Biberich mentioned above, he appeared in London in 1841, with success, and in the following year undertook a concert-tour with the sisters Milanollo; in 1847 and 1849 several of his compositions were produced at Amsterdam and in Paris, and after a short tenure of a musical professorship at the Normal School at Liège in 1850 he settled down at Antwerp, where he exercised a powerful influence in musical matters. He produced a large number of compositions in various forms, among the most prominent of which are the following:

'Les Croisades,' historical symphony (Antwerp, 1846); 'La Vie,' oratorio (Antwerp, Feb. 6, 1849); 'Le Déluge,' symphonic oratorio (Antwerp, Jan. 31, 1849); 'Marguerite d'Aufriche' (Antwerp, 1850); 'De Belgen in 1848,' drama with overture, airs, choruses, etc. (Brussels, 1851); 'La Dernière Nuit du Comte d'Egmont' (Brussels, 1851); 'Leicester,' drama with incidental music (Brussels, Feb. 13, 1854); 'Willem Beukels,' Flemish comic opera (Brussels, July 21, 1856), and 'La Belle Bourgeoise,' comic opera.

Two overtures, many part-songs for male chorus, numerous works for piano, organ and harmonium, to the interests of which last instrument he was particularly devoted, are also among his compositions. His contributions to musical literature are scarcely less abundant than his musical productions (see Riemann). He took an active part in musical journalism, besides writing a number of essays on historical subjects. These latter, though containing much valuable material, are not always trustworthy, as Gregoir was too much given to accepting information from any quarter. Histoire de l'orgue, published at Brussels in 1865, is perhaps the most useful of his literary productions. M.

GREGORI, (1) ANNIBALE (b. Siena, late 16th cent.; d. before 1635), maestro di cappella at Siena cathedral, composed sacred songs, madrigals, 'Ariosi concetti cioè,' the latter published as posthumous, op. 9, by Alberto Gregori, in 1635.

(2) GIOVANNI LORENZO (d. Lucca, 1743), from 1688–1742 violinist in the municipal band of Lucca, composed 3 oratorios, cantatas, arias, concerti grossi, op. 2 (1698), and two instruction books on musical theory (Q.-L.).

GREGORIAN MUSIC is the name given to a large collection of ancient ecclesiastical music, which has been connected with the services and Service-books of the Roman Church ever since early Christian times. It is not the only such collection. Connected with the great Church of Milan there is a similar collection of 'Ambrosian Music,' and in other parts of Western Christendom similar collections formerly existed. Little has survived of African, Celtic or Gallican church music, apart from what has been incorporated into the Gregorian collection; but discoveries are bringing back to light large parts of the ancient Spanish or 'Visigothic' or 'Mozarabic' music and rites, which were all but entirely ousted by the Roman rites and their music before the end of the 11th century, and are showing that the Visigothic formed with the Ambrosian and the Gregorian a third musical dialect of the Western Church.

Each of these collections is of importance for the history of the art of music. A word must first be said as to their mutual relations, and then attention must be devoted to the Gregorian collection, which is by far the most important. The relation subsisting between the three has already been indicated by calling them three dialects; in other words, they are fundamentally alike but superficially different. They are similar, partly because they have to do with three similar series of rites, partly also because the same requirements in detail occur in each rite. Psalms have to be sung to an inflected monotone, and lessons chanted to a simple reading tune. Consequently, simple recitative is much the same in each dialect; and even when it develops into elaborate cadences and exquisite embroidery, the principles of elaboration are much the same in each system. Further, in the case of Gregorian and Ambrosian, there is closer actual similarity, for many texts are common to both collections, and are set to melodies which, in spite of much superficial variation, are at bottom identical. It is more difficult to determine whether these three dialects are united also by a common music-theory; all three were in existence anterior to the system of music-theory which came into vogue in the Middle Ages, and each suffered in more or less degree from being then forcibly conformed to a new and alien system. It is a very delicate matter to try to discover what the earlier and original theory was; and until this is decided it can hardly be determined whether all three dialects shared it. (See MODES.)

The great collection of Gregorian Music must now be described. It falls into two principal divisions—the music of the Mass, with which is grouped that of Baptism and other occasional services, and the music of the daily Hours of Divine Service. The first corresponds in the main with the modern Missal, the second with the modern Breviary. The collection for the Mass comprises over 600 compositions set entirely to scriptural words, which may be roughly classified thus:

At the beginning of the service, and again at the end, a psalm and antiphon were sung. In the former place the piece was known as Introit, or Antiphona ad introitum (called also in England Officium or office); in the latter place it was called Communio or Antiphona ad communionem. The former occupied the time of the celebrant's approach to the altar, the latter the time of the communion of the faithful. About 150 of each of these are provided in the Gregorian collection for the Sundays, fasts, and festivals of the year. Between the Epistle and the Gospel two pieces were sung, normally a Respond called the Gradual and an Alleluia; in Eastertide an Alleluia took the place of the Gradual, and on penitential occasions a Tract superseded the Alleluia. Thus for this point of the service the collection contained 110 Graduals, 100 Alleluias, and 23 Tracts. At the offertory, during the offering and preparation of the elements, an antiphon, with several elaborate verses attached to it, was sung; 102 of these sufficed to cover the ground, there being here, as elsewhere, a certain amount of repetition.

These 630 compositions for the various days of the year form the main bulk of the Gregorian music of the Mass. Besides these there was sung also in the Middle Ages an unvarying series of pieces—the Kyrie, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Creed, the Sanctus and the Agnus Dei—but some of these are late importations to the Mass, brought in after the Gregorian collection was formed. Moreover, they were not, like the Gregorian music, intended for the choir but for the congregation; and each of them had in early days but one simple setting. In the later Middle Ages fresh settings were adapted or composed for these parts of the service, until by the end of the Middle Ages the Creed was the only piece of the group which still had but its one primitive melody, without a rival. These various settings, however, like the tropes and sequences and other late mediæval additions, never acquired a proper canonicity, but went along side by side with the Gregorian collection in a sort of deuterocanonical position.

The main collection is not improperly called Gregorian, for the whole tendency of modern inquiries has been to show that St. Gregory had a personal share, to say the least, in the arrangement of the collection. The biographers of the great pope not only relate that he personally supervised the Roman choir-school, but they describe his editorial work in the revision of the music. The accuracy of these statements and of the continuous tradition that flows from them has been more than once seriously questioned; but fresh researches have shown that the collection attained a final form shortly after St. Gregory's death, and was thenceforward regarded as closed. Moreover, a comparison of Gregorian and Ambrosian versions of the same melody show that a skilful hand has done in the former case exactly the sort of editing which is ascribed to St. Gregory. It may, therefore, be concluded that this Gregorian music of the Mass comes from St. Gregory's hand practically unaltered.

There is less either of fixity or of authenticity in the case of the other great collection of Gregorian music, viz. the music of the Hours of Divine Service. The same great outburst of Roman Song during the 4th, 5th and 6th centuries which gave the Roman Mass its music, gave also its music to the system of Hour Services. But this group of services had only a semi-official position; and when Rome had provided both monks and clergy with music for their rival but similar schemes of service, there was not, as in the case of the Mass, any restraint as to modification or innovation. The Roman chant, however, soon won a supremacy which was due to its inherent excellence; it was universally adopted elsewhere for the Hour Services, and thus it is possible, in the case of these services, though to a less extent than in the case of the Mass, to point to a Gregorian music for the Hours which forms the original nucleus for all subsequent collections. There is not the same literary or internal evidence of its having passed under St. Gregory's revising hand; but, as emanating from the same source, it may without hesitation be also called Gregorian.

The contents of this second collection are less varied; it may roughly be said to consist of some two thousand antiphons and some eight hundred Greater Responsos, exclusive of smaller items such as the Lesser Responsos, Invitatories or Versicles. The Hymns do not form properly part of the collection; the Roman Church rigidly excluded them from its system of Hours until the 9th century; and, though they were incorporated from the very beginning in the monastic system, and were speedily borrowed by the secular office elsewhere than in Rome, they form in reality a separate category. (See HYMN.)

These two great collections suffered much mutilation at the hands of the musicians of the Renaissance. The Gregorian tradition had been carefully preserved in most places through the Middle Ages, especially in England, where a very pure Gregorian tradition was early established by the Roman missions to this country, and retained through the liturgical and musical zeal which distinguished the Anglo-Saxon Church. In the 16th century, however, to a growing carelessness there was added a deliberate policy of alteration. Some musicians of the school of Palestrina took the shears to the collection, and, with amazing effrontery and ignorance, mutilated, almost past recognition, the delicate compositions which had survived the 'dark ages' practically intact. The Medicean edition of the Gregorian chant of the Mass, which resulted from this disastrous handling, was held to be the official edition of the music of the Roman Church from the year 1614 onward; and it is not surprising that it swiftly succeeded in crushing all interest and beauty out of the performance of the music. In the 19th century dissatisfaction with the existing state of things began to grow and ferment, till it culminated in the patient restoration, chiefly through the labours of the Benedictines of the Congregation of France, of the true Gregorian tradition and its proper method of execution. Thus the 20th century has witnessed the dethronement of the evil incubus of the 17th. The editions of SOLESMES (q.v.) were officially recognised, and paved the way for the official Vatican edition, which is restoring the true Gregorian music to the use of the whole Latin Church. (For further information see the Introductions to the Sarum Gradual and the Sarum Antiphonal, both publications of the PLAIN-SONG AND MEDÆVAL MUSIC SOCIETY.)

GREGORIAN TONES. This name is given to the eight groups of chants, corresponding to the eight modes (see MODES), to which the psalms are sung under the Gregorian system of antiphonal psalmody. (See ANTIPHON; and PSALMODY.) When the English Church gave up the Latin service-books, it had to resign for the time, with the Latin texts, the whole of their ancient Gregorian melodies; antiphons and responds disappeared both from the Communion service and from the reformed Hour Services of Matins and Evensong. Some adaptations were made from the new English Kyrie, Sanctus, Agnus, Creed and Gloria in Excelsis, and a praiseworthy attempt to provide some simple plain-song was made by MERBECKE (q.v.). Similarly adaptations were made for the Te Deum and for parts of the funeral service; but on the whole it may be said that nothing survived but the psalm-tones, in their naked simplicity, divorced from the antiphons, apart from which they are a mere fragment.

These Gregorian Tones survived in more or less mutilated forms down to the Rebellion, and were among the traditions restored at the Restoration; but by this time their place had been already taken by the Anglican chant, which had grown up out of the decay of the Tones. (See CHANT.) The Gregorian tones were brought back into use as part of the Church revival of the early part of the 19th century.

GREGORY, WILLIAM (d. St. Clement Dane's, Aug. 20, 1663), a singer in the Chapel Royal, Feb. 2, 1626–49, was during the Commonwealth in Cromwell's service, and one of the signatories of the petition for a National College of Music in 1657. His portrait is in the Music School at Oxford. He wrote songs and harpsichord pieces in various collective volumes. Hawkins speaks of some anthems, two of which enjoyed great popularity (Q.-L.; Hawkins II.).

GREITER, MATTHIAS, was originally a monk and choir-singer in Strassburg Minster, but in 1524 embraced the cause of the Lutheran Reformation and devoted his poetical and musical talents to its furtherance. In 1549 he accepted the Interim of Charles V., and founded a choir-school to provide for the church-service in accordance therewith. He is said to have died of the plague of 1552. To the Strassburger Kirchenamt 1525 and Gesangbuch 1537 he contributed seven Psalm-Lieder (free metrical versions of some Psalms), and probably either invented or adapted the melodies which were sung to them ('O Herre Gott, begnade mich,' 'Da Israel aus Egypten zog,' 'Es sind doch selig alle die,' etc.). Zahn in his exhaustive work on Choral-Melodies attributes six to Greiter. Both hymns and tunes continued for a long time in use in the Lutheran Church. The tune to 'Es sind doch selig' was afterwards transferred to the hymn 'O Mensch, bewein dein Sünde,' and we are familiar with the magnificent treatment of both words and tune in the 'St. Matthew Passion' of Bach. But Greiter's chief contribution to music consists in several four-voice settings of German songs, and one five-voice, in which, as Eitner says, good harmony, warmth of feeling, and contrapuntal art are united in a masterly way, and show him to have been one of the best composers of the time. Of these Kade, in the Beilagen to Ambros, has reprinted 'Ich stund ein einm Morgen,' which is remarkable for its ground-bass and the imitations of it in the soprano and alto (the melody proper being in the tenor). Two others have been reprinted by J. J. Maier in the musical appendix to Liliencron's Historische Volkslieder, 'Es wollt ein Jäger jagen,' and 'Von üppiglichen Dingen.'

GRELL, EDUARD AUGUST (b. Berlin, Nov. 6, 1800; d. Steglitz, near Berlin, Aug. 10, 1886), the son of the organist of the Parochialkirche there, received his musical education from his father, J. C. Kaufmann, Ritschl, and finally from Zelter, on whose recommendation he received the appointment of organist of the Nicolaikirche at the age of 16. In 1817 he entered the Singakademie, with which institution he was connected in one way or another for nearly sixty years. In 1832 he became its vice-director, under Rungenhagen, after whose death he was in 1853 appointed director, a post which he held until 1876. In 1839 he was appointed Hofdomorganist, and in 1841 was made a member of the musical section of the Royal Academy of Arts, with which institution he was connected until 1881. In 1843–45 he was Gesanglehrer of the Domchor. In 1858 he received the title of professor, and in 1864 the order pour le mérite. He was one of the most learned contrapuntists of his day in Germany, and his works show him to have been not only an ingenious theorist, but a richly gifted artist. His greatest work is a Mass in sixteen parts a cappella, besides which he produced psalms in eight and eleven parts, a Te Deum, motets, cantatas, an oratorio entitled 'Die Israeliten in der Wüste,' and many songs and duets.

GRENON, NICOLAS, from 1421-24 a singer at the Cathedral School at Cambray, went to Rome, where he appears in 1425 to have formed a chapel of his own, with which he assisted the Papal Chapel until 1427. A number of sacred and secular songs are in various collective volumes (see Q.-L.). One song is reproduced in Stainer's 'Dufay.' E. v. d. s.

GRESHAM MUSICAL PROFESSORSHIP. In the will of Sir Thomas Gresham, the founder of the college bearing his name in the city of London, provision was made for several professorships, and for the 'salarie' of a person 'mete to rede the lecture of musicke' in the college. Sir Thomas died on Nov. 21, 1579, and his widow on Nov. 3, 1596, upon which the provision for the lectures took effect, the civic authorities requesting the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to nominate persons properly qualified as professors. Dr. John Bull was appointed the first Professor of Music by the special recommendation of Queen Elizabeth. The ordinance adopted concerning the music lecture, according to Stowe (Strype's edition), ran as follows:

'The solemn music lecture is to be read twice every week in manner following: viz.—the theoric part for half an hour, and the practice, by concert of voice or instruments, for the rest of the hour; whereof the first lecture to be in the Latin tongue and the second in the English tongue. The days appointed for the solemn lectures of music are Thursday and Saturday in the afternoon between the hours of three and four; and because at this time Dr. Bull is recommended to the place by the Queen's most excellent Majesty being not able to speak Latin, his lectures are permitted to be altogether in English so long as he shall continue the place of the music lecturer there.'

At first the professors were given apartments in the college and a stipend of £50 a year, but in the 8th of Geo. III. an Act was passed enabling the lecturers to marry, any restriction in Sir Thomas Gresham's will notwithstanding, and also giving them £50 a year in lieu of their apartments. For many years the professors had no knowledge of music, and were utterly unqualified to lecture upon it. The following is a list of the professors, with the date of their appointments:

- (1) John Bull, Mus.D., 1596 (resigned on his marriage).
- (2) Thomas Clayton, Doctor of Medicine, 1607.
- (3) Rev. John Taverner, M.A., 1610, elected at the age of 26, subsequently Rector of Stoke Newington.
- (4) Dr. Richard Knight, physician, 1638.
- (5) Sir W. Petty, Doctor of Medicine, 1650.
- (6) Sir Thomas Baynes, Doctor of Medicine, 1660, ejected from office by a vote of the committee.
- (7) Rev. John Newey, M.A., incumbent of Itching Abbots and Avington, Hants, 1696.
- (8) Rev. Dr. R. Shippen, Principal of Brasenose College, Oxford, and Rector of Whitechapel, 1705.
- (9) Edward Shippen, Doctor of Medicine, 1710.
- (10) John Gordon, barrister-at-law of Gray's Inn, 1723.
- (11) Thomas Browne, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, 1730, elected by an equality of votes, and the committee proceeded to a second election.
- (12) Charles Gardner, 1739.
- (13) Thomas Griffin, 1762.

- (14) Theodore Aylward, assistant director of the Handel Commemoration and organist of St. George's, Windsor, 1771.
- (15) R. J. S. Stevens, the glee composer, 1801.
- (16) Edward Taylor, 1837.
- (17) Henry Wylde, Mus.D., 1863.
- (18) J. F. Bridge, Mus.D., 1890.
- (19) H. Walford Davies, Mus.D., 1924.

In 1832 and for some years after, a medal was given by Miss Maria Hackett (the 'choristers' friend') in commemoration of Sir Thomas Gresham for the best choral work, the judges being the Oxford Professor, Dr. Crotch; the Gresham Professor, Stevens; and Horsley; and the work was sung at a commemoration service at St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, which had been Sir Thomas's parish church. The Music Lectures at the College were for many years given in the evening, but Bridge changed the time to the afternoon and the place to the City of London School. They are now given at Gresham College (6 p.m.) on days announced in the newspapers, and the admission to them is free. For an instance of the manner in which the intentions of the founder were at one time set at naught, see GRIFFIN, Thomas.

GRESNICH (GRESNICK), ANTOINE FRÉDÉRIC (bapt. Liège, Mar. 2, 1755; d. Paris, Oct. 16, 1799), studied at Rome and Naples, paid a short visit to London in 1784; was chef d'orchestre at the Grand Theatre, Lyons, 1791; wrote operas for the Théâtre Louvois, Paris; 17 operas, a 'symphonie concertante' for clarinet and bassoon with orchestra and a harpsichord concerto. E. v. d. s.

GRÉTRY, ANDRÉ ERNEST MODESTE (b. Liège, Feb. 8,¹ 1741; d. near Montmorency, Sept. 24, 1813), eminent composer of operas, was born on the ground-floor of a small house in the Rue des Récollets, now No. 28. His father, François, 1st violin at the church of St. Martin, placed him at 6 years old in the choir of St. Denis; but under the harsh treatment of his master the little chorister showed no aptitude for music, and at 11 was dismissed as incapable. His next master, Loclerc, as gentle as the former had been cruel, made him a good reader; and Renekin, organist, taught him harmony. His taste for music was, however, developed by listening to the operas of Pergolesi, Galuppi, Jommelli, etc., performed by a company of Italian singers with Resta as conductor. After a year spent in this manner an irresistible impulse urged him to compose; in vain the maître de chapelle tried to teach him counterpoint—he longed to give expression to the thoughts that were burning for utterance; and, as his first attempt, produced at Liège in 1758 six small symphonies, and in 1759 a 'Messe solennelle' for 4 voices, none of which have been published. These compositions secured him the protection of the Chanoine du Harlez, who furnished him with the means of going to Rome. Leaving his native city in Mar. 1759, he travelled on foot with a smuggler for his companion.¹ On his arrival at Rome he was received into the 'Collège de Liège,' founded by a Liégeois named Darcis for the benefit of his townsmen, who were permitted to reside there for five years while completing their specific studies. His master for counterpoint and composition was Casali, who dismissed him as hopelessly ignorant. Grétry never did understand the science of harmony; his mission was to enforce the expression of words by melody, and to compose operas. During his stay in Rome he composed a De profundis and some motets² which have not been published, and an intermezzo called 'La Vendemmiatrice' (1765) for the Aliberti theatre. Although the work of a foreigner, this operetta was successful, and might have introduced him to more important theatres; but Grétry, having read the score of Monsigny's 'Rose et Colas,' came to the conclusion that French opéra-comique was his vocation. To get to Paris now became his one idea. He left Rome Jan. 1, 1767, and, having reached Geneva, asked Voltaire to write him a good libretto for an opéra-comique, a task which Voltaire was incapable of performing and had the tact to decline. At Geneva he supported himself for a year by teaching singing; and produced 'Isabelle et Gertrude,' a one-act opera by Favart on a subject suggested by Voltaire, and previously set to music by Blaise.³ At length, by the advice of Voltaire himself, Grétry went to Paris, where he obtained from an amateur the libretto of 'Les Mariages Samnites,' in three acts. This work was not performed at that time, but its public rehearsals procured him the patronage of Count de Creutz, the Swedish ambassador, and, as a consequence of that, a two-act libretto by Marmontel, 'Le Huron,' successfully performed Aug. 20, 1768. This opera was followed by 'Lucile' (1769), which contains the quartet 'Où peut-on être mieux qu'au sein de sa famille?' which became popular and played a singular part on more than one historical occasion⁴; and by 'Le Tableau parlant' (1769), an original and extremely comic piece, and one of Grétry's very best. Grimm was right in proclaiming 'Le Tableau parlant' a real masterpiece.

Grétry now showed his versatility by composing no fewer than three operas: 'Le Sylvain' (1770), of which not even the over-rated duet 'Dans le sein d'un père' survives; 'Les Deux Avides' (1770), which contains a good comic duet, a march and a Janissaries' chorus, still heard with pleasure; and 'L'Amitié à l'épreuve' (1770), an indifferent comedy in two acts, reduced to one in 1775 by Favart, without improving either words or music. The operetta 'Éraste et Lucinde' was also written in 1770. 'Zémire et Azor' (Dec. 16, 1771) at once placed Grétry in the rank of creative artists. His fertility in ideas was marvellous, and he regularly supplied both the Comédie Italienne and the Théâtre Favart, where he produced successively 'L'Ami de la maison,' three acts (Fontainebleau, Oct. 1771, and Paris, Mar. 14, 1772); 'Le Magnifique,' three acts (1773), the overture of which contains the air 'Vive Henri IV' most effectively combined with another subject; 'La Rosière de Salency,' in four acts, afterwards reduced to three (1774), which contains a remarkable duet between two jealous young women, and the pretty melody 'Ma barque légère,' arranged by Dussek for the piano; 'La Fausse Magie,' two acts (1775), with the syllabic duet between the two old men, an excellent piece; 'Les Mariages Samnites' (1776), a work which he rewrote several times but which never became popular, though the march supplied Mozart with a theme for variations; 'Matroco,' a burlesque in four acts, composed for the court theatre at Fontainebleau (1777), and unsuccessfully performed in Paris (1778) against the wish of Grétry; 'Le Jugement de Midas,' three acts (1778), in which he satirised French music of the old style, and especially the manner in which it was rendered by the singers of the Académie; 'L'Amant jaloux,' three acts (1778)—in the second act an exquisite serenade; 'Les Événements imprévus' (1779), in three acts, containing two airs once popular, now forgotten; 'Aucassin et Nicolette,' three acts (1779), in which he endeavoured unsuccessfully to imitate ancient music; 'Thalie au Nouveau Théâtre,' a prologue for the inauguration of the Salle Favart (1783); 'Théodore et Paulin,' lyric comedy in three acts, which failed at first in 1784, and was afterwards given in two acts under the title of 'L'Épreuve villageoise' (June 27, 1784) with marked and well-merited success; 'Richard Cœur de Lion,' three acts (Oct. 21, 1784), the finest of all his works, containing the air 'O Richard, ô mon roi, l'univers t'abandonne' (which became of historic importance at Versailles, Oct. 1, 1789), and 'Une fièvre brûlante,' on which Beethoven wrote variations; 'Les Méprises par ressemblance,' opera in three acts (1786), now justly forgotten; 'Le Comte d'Albert,' two acts (1786), the success of which was secured by Mme. Dugazon; 'La Suite du Comte d'Albert,' one act (1787); 'Le Prisonnier anglais,' three acts (1787), revived in 1793 as 'Clarice et Belton,' without making a more favourable impression; 'Le Rival confident,' opera in two acts (1788), which failed in spite of pleasing arietta and a graceful rondo; 'Raoul Barbe-Bleue,' three acts (1789), a weak production quickly forgotten; 'Pierre le Grand,' three acts (1790), in which the search after local colouring is somewhat too apparent; 'Guillaume Tell,' in three acts (1791), containing a rondo and a quartet, long popular; 'Basile,' one act (1792); 'Les Deux Couvents,' three acts (1792); 'Joseph Barra,' one act (1794), a pièce de circonstance; 'Callias,' one act (1794), a republican piece, of which the so-called Greek music is justly forgotten, though one of Hoffmann's lines has survived:

Lisbeth,' three acts (1797), which contains a romance that has not yet lost its charm; 'Le Barbier de village,' one act (1797); and 'Élisca,' three acts (1799), which was a fiasco.

Long as this list is, it does not include all Grétry's dramatic works. Not content with supplying pieces for the Opéra-Comique, his ambition was to distinguish himself at the Académie de Musique. Here he produced 'Céphale et Procris,' three acts (1775), of which the only number worthy of notice was the duet 'Donne-la moi'; 'Les Trois Âges de l'Opéra' (1778), a prologue received with indifference; 'Andromaque,' three acts (1778), the principal rôle of which is accompanied throughout by three flutes in harmony; 'Émilie' ('La Belle Esclave,' 1781), unsuccessfully introduced as the fifth act of the ballet 'La Fête de Mirza'; 'La Double Épreuve, ou Colinette à la Cour,' three acts (1782), the finale of the first act full of dramatic truth; 'L'Embarras des richesses,' three acts (1782), a complete failure; 'La Caravane du Caire,' three acts (1783), the words by the Comte de Provence, afterwards Louis XVIII.—as complete a success (it was performed no less than 506 times), owing principally to the ballets and the picturesque scene of the bazaar; 'Panurge dans l'île des Lanternes,' three acts (1785), a not very lively comic opera; 'Amphitryon,' three acts (1788), badly received; 'Aspasie,' three acts (1789), a partial success; 'Donys le Tyran' (1794), one act, a pièce de circonstance which the composer did well not to publish; 'La Rosière républicaine' (1793), one act, another pièce de circonstance performed under the title 'La Fête de la raison'—one of the scenes in which represents a church, with an organ on the stage to accompany the sacred choruses; 'Anacréon chez Polycrate,' three acts (1797), containing an air and a trio long favourites; 'Le Casque et les colombes,' one act (1801), performed only three times; and 'Dolphis et Mopsa,' two acts (1803), which met with but little better fate.

The question arises, out of all these fifty operas produced in Paris, how many are there besides 'Le Tableau parlant' which deserve special attention? 'Zémire et Azor,' 'L'Amant jaloux,' 'L'Épreuve villageoise,' and, above all, 'Richard,' of which nearly every number deserves to be specified, are those we should select. In treating subjects of a more ambitious stamp, such as 'Pierre le Grand' and 'Guillaume Tell,' Grétry did violence to his nature. Broad and vigorous conceptions were not within his range, because they require not only sustained effort but a thorough mastery of harmony and instrumentation, and this he did not possess. He scarcely ever wrote for more than two voices, and is manifestly perplexed by the entrance of a third, as a glance at the trio-duet in 'Zémire et Azor' will show. 'You might drive a coach-and-four between the bass and the first fiddle,' was wittily said of his thin harmonies. But though it may be thought necessary at the present day to reinforce his meagre orchestration, his basses are so well chosen, and form such good harmony, that it is often extremely difficult to add complementary parts to the two in the original score.¹ And Grétry's instrumentation, though poor, is not wanting in colour when occasion serves. Moreover, he was aware of his defects as well as of his capacities. 'In the midst of popular applause how dissatisfied an artist often feels with his own work!' he exclaims at the end of his analysis of 'Huron.' Elsewhere, in speaking of his works as a whole, he puts the following words into Gluck's mouth: 'You received from Nature the gift of appropriate melody, but in giving you this talent she withheld that of strict and complicated harmony.' This is true self-knowledge.

The qualities in his music which most excite our admiration are his perfect understanding of the right proportions to be given both to the ensemble and to each separate part of an opera, and his power of connecting and evolving the scenes, faithfully interpreting the words, and tracing the lineaments, so to speak, of his characters by means of this fidelity of expression in the music. While thus taking declamation as his guide, and believing that 'the most skilful musician was he who could best metamorphose declamation into melody,' Grétry little thought that the day would come when Méhul would say of him that 'what he wrote was very clever, but it was not music' ('il faisait de l'esprit et non de la musique'). No doubt he carried his system too far; he did not see that by trying to follow the words too literally a composer may deprive his phrases of ease and charm, and sacrifice the general effect for the sake of obtaining many trifling ones—a most serious fault. But in spite of his weakness for details—the defect of many a painter—Grétry is a model one never wearies of studying. He excelled in the simple pastoral style, in the touching and pathetic, and in comic opera at once comic and not trivial. By means of his rich imagination, thorough acquaintance with stage business, and love for dramatic truth, he created a whole world of characters drawn to the life; and by his great intelligence, and the essentially French bent of his genius, he almost deserves to be called the 'Molière of music,' a title as overwhelming as it is honourable, but one which his passionate admirers have not hesitated to bestow on him. Besides his operas, he wrote a number of sacred compositions, enumerated in Brenet's memoir (1884), but without details; an 'Antifona' a 5, dated 1765, is in the Academy of Bologna; quartets, six symphonies, trios, sonatas, etc., are also mentioned.

A witty and brilliant talker, and a friend of influential literary men, Grétry possessed many powerful patrons at the French court, and was the recipient of pensions and distinctions of all kinds. In 1785 the municipality of Paris named one of the streets near the Comédie Italienne after him, and in the previous year the Prince-Bishop of Liège had made him one of his privy-councillors. On the foundation of the Conservatoire he was appointed an inspector, a post which he resigned in a year. When the Institut was formed at the same time (1795), he was chosen to fill one of the three places reserved for musical composers. Napoleon made him a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour on the institution of the Order in 1802, and also granted him a pension to compensate for his losses by the Revolution.

A career so successful was likely to intoxicate, and it is not to be wondered at that Grétry had a firm belief in his own merits and thought himself almost infallible. He has left us several records of his vanity, both artistic and intellectual. The first is his Mémoires ou essais sur la musique, published in one vol. in 1789 and reprinted in 1797 with two additional vols., said to have been edited by his friend Legrand, a professor of rhetoric. The first part only is interesting, and, as has been aptly said, it should be called 'Essais sur ma musique.' In 1802 he brought out Méthode simple pour apprendre à préluder en peu de temps avec toutes les ressources de l'harmonie, a pamphlet of ninety-five pages with lithograph portrait, in which he exhibits both the insufficiency of his studies and his want of natural talent for harmony. His three vols. De la vérité; ce que nous fâmes, ce que nous sommes, ce que nous devrions être (1803) are simply a pretentious statement of his political and social opinions, with remarks on the feelings and the best means of exciting and expressing them by music.

Grétry had bought 'l'Ermitage,' near Montmorency, formerly the residence of Rousseau, and it was there he died. Three days afterwards (Sept. 27, 1813) Paris honoured his remains with a splendid funeral; touching and eloquent eulogiums were pronounced over his grave by Bouilly on behalf of the dramatic authors, and Méhul in the name of the musicians. A year later, at a special meeting on Oct. 1, 1814, Joachim de Breton, permanent secretary of the Académie des Beaux-Arts, read a 'Notice sur la vie et les ouvrages d'André Ernest Grétry.' Since then many biographies and critiques have been published (see Bibliography below).

There are many portraits of Grétry—one of the best drawn and engraved by 'his friend' Moreau the younger. Another engraving is by Cathelin (1785), from the portrait by Madame Lebrun, with the lines:

'Par des plaisirs réels et de fausses alarmes
Ce puissant Enchanteur calme ou trouble nos sens;
Mais de son amitié peut-on goûter les charmes
Sans égarer au moins son cœur à ses talents?'

Besides these there are Isabey's portrait engraved by P. Simon; that taken by the 'physionotrace' and engraved by Quenedey in 1808; those of Forget and P. Adam; and, finally, Maurin's lithograph from the portrait by Robert Lefèvre. In his youth he is said to have resembled Pergolese both in face and figure. Comte Livry had a statue made of him in marble, and placed it at the entrance of the old Théâtre Feydeau: it is not known what has become of it. The foyer of the present Opéra-Comique contains only a bust of him. In 1842 a statue by Gecfs was inaugurated at Liège; being colossal it is not a good representation, as Grétry was small in stature and of delicate health.

Grétry had three daughters. The second, LUCILE (b. Paris, 1773; d. 1793), was only 13 when her one-act opera 'Le Mariage d'Antonio,' instrumented by her father, was successfully performed at the Opéra-Comique (1786). In 1787 she produced 'Toinette et Louis,' in two acts, which was not well received. This gifted young musician made an unhappy marriage.

We may mention in conclusion that Grétry spent his last years in writing six vols. of Réflexions sur l'art which, however, have not been published. He also left five MS. operas in three acts—'Alcindor et Zaïde'; 'Ziméo'; 'Électre'; 'Diogène et Alexandre'; 'Les Maures d'Espagne'; and 'Zelmar, ou l'Asile,' in one act. A complete edition of Grétry's works (B. & H.) was undertaken by the commission for the publication of music by Belgian masters, under the direction of Gevaert, Radoux, E. Fétis, A. Wotquenne and A. Wouters. The publication of his complete literary works was undertaken by the same commission in 1919. Réflexions d'un solitaire (4 vols.), a hitherto unpublished manuscript, appeared with introduction and notes by Lucien Solway and Ernest Closson (Brussels, Van Oest, 1919–22).

GRIEG,¹ EDVARD HAGERUP (b. Bergen, Norway, June 15, 1843; d. there, Sept. 4, 1907), the composer who did most to develop a Norwegian national style, received his first musical instruction from his mother, a cultivated amateur, began to compose at the age of nine, and, after a meeting with Ole Bull, was sent, on the eminent violinist's recommendation, to the Leipzig Conservatorium, where he remained from 1858-62, studying counterpoint, etc., under Hauptmann and Richter, composition under Rietz and Reinecke, and the piano under Wenzel and Moscheles. On leaving Leipzig, he went to Copenhagen to study under Gade, and in Denmark he came under the influence of Emil Hartmann. The Mendelssohn tradition, still strong at Leipzig, was religiously followed by Gade, and it was not till Grieg returned to Norway and associated with those who were devoting themselves to a distinctively national form of the various arts that he felt his true power. He became intimate with Richard Nordraak, and, until that composer's early death in 1866, the two worked hand in hand with the object of fostering a Norwegian school of music. In 1867 Grieg founded a musical union in Christiania, and remained its conductor until 1880. In 1865 and 1870 he visited Italy, and saw much of Liszt in Rome. Grieg's performance of his own brilliant pianoforte concerto at a Gewandhaus Concert at Leipzig in 1879 brought him before the great public in a more prominent way than heretofore, and with the same charming work he made his first appearance in England at the Philharmonic Concert of May 3, 1888, conducting his op. 34 at the same concert. He had already gained great experience as a conductor during his tenure of the post of director of the Philharmonic Concerts at Christiania. On this first visit to England his wife accompanied him, and her strongly individual way of singing his songs made such an impression in private, that the husband and wife were persuaded to give a joint recital of piano and song on May 16, and to appear together at the Popular Concerts. Early in 1889 they came again to England. In 1894 the composer received the honorary degree of Mus.D. at Cambridge, and in 1896 he once more visited London. Apart from such journeys he lived a secluded life at his country house, a few miles from Bergen.

He died in an hotel, in Bergen, on his way to Christiania.²

Grieg's music owes much of its success to the skill with which he has adapted the classical structure to themes so nearly allied to actual traditional tunes as to be hardly distinguishable from genuine folk-music. His violin sonata in F, op. 8, his piano concerto before mentioned, and many other works, show remarkable individuality of design; for the composer, while setting his themes in such juxtaposition with each other as to bring out their beauties to the fullest extent, has not scrupled to modify the rules of form as it suited him best to do. That he chose but rarely to develop his ideas according to a logical plan, was due to a personal preference, not to any want of skill in the art of development, for this quality is clearly to be seen in the prelude and other movements of his suite 'Aus Holberg's Zeit.' In the smaller, more lyrical forms he is at his best, and his many short pianoforte pieces and his beautiful songs (see the special study given below) show him to far greater advantage than the comparatively few works in which he essayed the regular classical structures.

The music to Ibsen's 'Peer Gynt,' written for a performance of that play, was at first published in the form of a pianoforte duet, and afterwards turned into two orchestral suites of remarkably picturesque character, which are perhaps the most popular of all his works. The strange, haunting harmonies of 'Ase's Death' have an almost magical effect, and in 'Anitra's Dance' there is an oriental character which, appearing again in the fine song 'Dio Odaliske,' is very attractive. It might be contended that the few instances in which a musical colouring other than Norwegian has been employed are those which have the deepest appeal to non-Scandinavian hearers, but it is incontestable that it is by his more 'nationalistic' music that he has won the esteem of musicians at large. His music carries the fragrance of his native pine-woods into the concert-room; and it is only after long familiarity with it that its most prominent mannerisms become a little wearisome. Certain harmonic progressions are used almost too often, and in the structure of his melodies there is one sequence of three descending notes, consisting of the tonic, the leading-note, and the dominant of the key, that can be traced in some form or other in an extraordinarily large number of his compositions, though perhaps nowhere so prominently as in the pianoforte concerto. GRIEG AS SONG WRITER.—Though the songs of Grieg are too markedly individual in style and in touch to remain as a permanent influence in the history of song, the best of them fully deserve the affection and the admiration which have been bestowed upon them.

It is true that they owe much of their popularity to the piquant and expressive melodic idioms which Grieg caught from the folk-songs of his country, and much, too, to the actual novelty and charm of harmonies and harmonic contrasts which were entirely his own. But originality of this kind, however stimulating when it is new, belongs to the inventive faculty, and does not of itself imply real creative power. Fortunately in Grieg's case it was the vehicle for the expression of a highly sensitive, poetical and imaginative nature, incapable of affectation or pose, and as susceptible to poetry which deals with the simple and homely affections, with country scenes and the beauties of nature, as to that in which a tale of romance, tragedy or passion touches the deeper springs of human feeling. In his best moments he penetrates with rare insight into the very heart of a poem, and with a few bold and vivid strokes sets before us a glowing picture, and stamps it indelibly with his own sign and seal on our hearts and minds. It is impossible not to recognise genius in the dramatic intensity of 'Ein Schwan' or 'Ein Freundschaftstück,' in the exaltation of 'Erstes Begegnen,' in the tragic solemnity of 'Auf der Bahro einer jungen Frau,' in the quiet reflective mood of 'Auf der Reise zur Heimath,' in the inimitable charm and delicacy of 'Im Kahne,' or in the tenderness of 'Margareten's Wiegenlied,' and 'Die alte Mutter.' Again, it would be hard in the whole range of ballads to point to examples more directly touching in their beauty, expressiveness and simplicity than 'Die Prinzessin' and 'Es war ein alter König' (this latter not defaced, as in Rubinstein's setting, by sentimental lingering over the last words 'Sie hatten sich viel zu lieb'). 'Der Verwundete,' 'Solveig's Lied' and the slight but charming 'Zwei braune Augen' display other sides of Grieg's genius. Such songs as these, even if he had composed no others, would, of themselves be enough to show that among the minor song composers Grieg had more of the vital qualities which arrest and move than any, and that he holds in virtue of them, as exhibited in his best work, a place which is all his own. At the same time it would be foolish to deny that the style he found for himself had its limitations and weaknesses, which are somewhat acutely felt when his songs are studied as a whole. His love for emphatic harmonic colouring and startling transitions leads to a good deal of work that is reckless and patchy, a point which is further emphasised by his habit of repeating a vocal phrase on a different level, or using the close of it for an instrumental ritornello, so that the melodic line is constantly interrupted, as, for instance, in 'Auf dem Walde' and almost throughout the song 'Mit einer Wasserlilie.'

Nor is the duplication of the melody in the bass, as in 'Ich liebe dich,' 'Spielmannslied,' 'Hoffnung' and other songs, a structurally strong device; third-rate composers have seized upon it with avidity and with disastrous results. Like the drone bass (used effectively by Grieg in 'Solveig's Lied' as by Schubert in 'Der Leiermann'), it needs the justification of special appropriateness, and may easily become a snare. Reference should also be made to his excessive love of chromatics. Though some of his most beautiful effects are derived from them, as in 'Der Verwundete' and 'Herbststimmung,' yet they are often a source of weakness and sentimentality, most conspicuously in 'Mit einer Primula Veris.' To these causes must be attributed the fact that Grieg's masterpieces are mostly short. For longer flights more solidity and breadth of structure are required than Grieg's genius possessed. 'Vom Monte Pincio' and 'Mein Ziel' are, however, fine songs, full of beauty and imagination.

GRIEPENKERL, (1) FRIEDRICH CONRAD (b. Peine, near Hanover, 1782; d. Brunswick, Apr. 6, 1849), professor at the Carolinum College in Brunswick; long tutor in the Fellenberg Institution at Hofwyl in the Canton of Berne. He wrote Lehrbuch der Aesthetik (Brunswick, 1827), in which he applied Herbart's philosophical theory to music; and was the author of the preface to the excellent edition of J. S. Bach's instrumental compositions, edited by himself and Roitzsch, and published by Peters of Leipzig. This work has made his name familiar to many in England.

His son (2) WOLFGANG ROBERT (b. Hofwyl, May 4, 1810; d. Brunswick, Oct. 17, 1868), studied at Brunswick and Leipzig, was also an enthusiastic amateur, and an ardent admirer of Meyerbeer's 'Huguenots' and the later works of Berlioz. He was teacher of literature at the Military School of Brunswick from 1840-47. He wrote Das Musikfest, oder die Beethovenere (1838 and 1841); Ritter Berlioz in Braunschweig (1843); Die Oper der Gegenwart (1847); and two dramas, Robespierre and Die Girondisten, to which Litolf composed overtures. GRIESBACH, JOHN HENRY (b. Windsor, June 20, 1798; d. Kensington, Jan. 9, 1875); was the eldest son of Justin Christian Griesbach, violoncellist in Queen Charlotte's band, and nephew to Friedrich Griesbach, the oboe player. He studied music under his uncle, George Leopold Jacob Griesbach, and at 12 years of age was appointed violoncellist in the Queen's band. He then studied for some years under Kalkbrenner. On the breaking up of Queen Charlotte's band at her death he came to London and appeared at concerts as a pianist. In 1822 he composed a symphony and a capriccio for pianoforte and orchestra, and shortly afterwards a second symphony for the Philharmonic Society. Although he was after this time principally engaged in tuition he found time to produce numerous compositions of various kinds, and also to attain to no mean skill in astronomy, painting in water-colours, entomology and mathematics. His principal compositions were 'Belshazzar's Feast,' an oratorio, written in 1835 with a view to stage representation, but such performances being interdicted he some years afterwards remodelled the work, and it was performed, under the title of 'Daniel,' by the Sacred Harmonic Society on June 30, 1854; overture and music to Shakespeare's Tempest; 'James the First, or, The Royal Captive,' operetta; 'The Goldsmith of West Cheap,' opera; 'Eblis,' opera (unfinished); 'Raby Ruins,' musical drama; several overtures and other instrumental pieces, anthems, songs, cantatas, etc. He also wrote An Analysis of Musical Sounds (published), and The Fundamental Elements of Counterpoint, The Acoustic Laws of Harmony, and Tables showing the Variations of Musical Pitch from the time of Handel to 1859 (unpublished).

GRIESINGER, GEORG AUGUST (d. Leipzig, Apr. 27, 1828), deserves a word of grateful mention for his charming little work on Haydn—Biographische Notizen über Joseph Haydn (126 pages)—which was originally communicated to the A.M.Z. from July to Sept. 1809, and then published by Breitkopf & Härtel in 1810. Griesinger was a 'Legations-Rath' of the Saxon government, and possibly attached to the embassy at Vienna. At any rate he was on intimate terms with Haydn for the last ten years of the life of the latter, and he claims to report directly from his lips, often in his very words. His work was used by Framery for his Notice sur Haydn (Paris, 1810), but Griesinger complains that his statements have often been widely departed from, and in one case an absolute invention introduced.

Whether he was the same Griesinger who founded singing societies and public concerts in Stuttgart ten or twelve years after Haydn's death, is not apparent. G.

GRIFFES, CHARLES TOMLINSON (b. Elmira, New York, Sept. 17, 1884; d. New York, Apr. 8, 1920), an American composer. He studied the pianoforte, composition and theory in Berlin and for a time taught there. In 1907 he returned to America, and till his death taught the elements of music in a boy's school near New York. Almost all his compositions were produced in the brief intervals of leisure that his labours as a schoolmaster gave him in his latter years. He was overworked, and his death is said to have been hastened by the burdensome task of copying at night orchestral parts for his last compositions after his routine duties were done.

The comparatively few works of Griffes that were heard during his lifetime and that have been made known since his death indicate that in him was lost a rare and original talent; one of the finer, more sensitive and fastidious musical natures that the United States has produced. What he did in his thirty-six years was more than a promise, it was a real achievement: but it held a promise of still better things, of true originality and perhaps greatness, if life and opportunity had been spared him.

His compositions hitherto published are as follows :

- * The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan,' orch. Poem, flute and orch.
- Sonata, PF.
- Two Sketches for string quartet, on Indian themes.
- Songs and PF. pieces.
- * These Things Shall Be,' for unison chorus.

Unpublished :

- * The Kairn of Koridwen,' dance drama, with instruments.
- * Senjojo,' Japanese mime play, with instruments.

GRIFFIN, GEORGE EUGENE (b. London, Jan. 8, 1781; d. May 1863), composer. At 16 years of age he made his first appearance as a composer by the production of a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in which the melody of 'The Blue Bell of Scotland' was introduced. He next published a PF. sonata, with ad libitum violin, and an 'Ode to Charity,' inscribed to the supporters of the Patriotic Fund, and published in 1806. His remaining compositions, with the exception of three quartets for stringed instruments, were all for the pianoforte, either alone or in conjunction with other instruments. They comprise two concertos for PF. and orchestra; a quartet for pianoforte and strings; and four sonatas.

W. H. H.

GRIFFIN, THOMAS (d. 1771), an organ-builder, in 1741 erected an organ in St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, and engaged 'to play himself or provide an organist.' He also built organs in other City churches; in St. Mildred, Bread Street, 1744; St. John's, Westminster; St. George's, Botolph Lane; St. Paul's, Deptford; St. Margaret Pattens, 1749; and St. Michael Bassishaw, 1762. On Jan. 11, 1763 (being then a Common Councilman for Langbourn Ward and one of the Gresham Committee), he was appointed professor of music in Gresham College in the room of Charles Gardner, deceased. He seems to have been totally incapable of performing the duties of the office. (See GRESHAM PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.)

GRIFFITH, FREDERICK (b. Swansea, Nov. 12, 1867; d. London, May 1917), a distinguished flute-player. Having gained prizes at a Welsh National Eisteddfod (Merthyr Tydfil) and at Cardiff, Griffith entered the R.A.M. and studied for four years, until 1891, under Olaf Svendsen. Next he went to Paris to study under Paul Taffanel, and on his return to London he gave a number of recitals and became director of the Wind-Instrument Chamber Music Society. He made many tours, notably in the English provinces, with Mme. Melba's party; and, in 1902, with the same party through the Australasian Colonies. He was first flute in the orchestra which played during the performances of Sullivan's 'Ivanhoe,' and in 1895 was appointed to a similar post at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, and was professor of the flute at the R.A.M. He issued a volume of biographies of Notable Welsh Musicians (1896).

GRIGNY, NICOLAS DE (b. Rheims, Feb. 1671; d. there, Nov. 30, 1703), organist of Rheims Cathedral, was the son of Louis de Grigny (c. 1646-1709), also organist at Notre Dame, Rheims.

Nicolas finished his musical studies in Paris, and was organist at the Abbey of Saint-Denis from 1693-95. He then returned to Rheims. His book of 'Pièces d'orgue,' which appeared after his death in 1711, republished by Alex. Guilmant and André Pirro, is the work of a musician—stirring, skilful and profound. J. S. Bach in his youth copied¹ the organ-book of the Rheims master, who thus exercised an undeniable influence on German musicians.

GRIMM, (1) HEINRICH (b. Holzminden, c. 1593; d. Brunswick, July 10, 1637), was cantor at the Catharineum at his death. He was a pupil of Michael Praetorius, and succeeded Michael Weissensee at Magdeburg, where he lost all his possessions at the destruction of the town in 1631. He was a pioneer of the new school of harmony and thorough-bass. A list of his numerous sacred and secular compositions is in Q.-L.

(2) FRIEDRICH MELCHIOR, BARON VON GRIMM (b. Ratisbon, Dec. 26, 1723; d. Gotha, Dec. 19, 1807), the son of a pastor. He lived in Paris from 1750 until the outbreak of the Revolution, and took the part of the Italian opera in the 'guerre des bouffons.' He wrote a number of essays and pamphlets on music, edited the Correspondence littéraire, philosophique et critique, 1753-90, which was circulated only in MS. among a number of European courts, but published between 1877 and 1882 (16 vols.), forming an important source for the history of the opera in Paris. His satire on Joh. Stamitz, Le Petit Prophète de Boemisch-Broda (1753), appeared in many editions, also translated. Other writings are given in Q.-L. Baron von Grimm was one of the central figures of musical life in Paris, though biased and unsound. Riemann gives a list of biographies and essays, etc., on Grimm.

GRIMM, JULIUS OTTO (b. Pernau, Livonia, Mar. 6, 1827; d. Münster, Dec. 7, 1903), a German pianist and composer of some note, a pupil of the Conservatorium of Leipzig. When Grimm had finished the course of instruction there, he found employment at Göttingen, and was appointed in 1860 conductor of the Cäcilienverein at Münster in Westphalia, where he was made director of the Musical Academy. 1878. He published pieces for the pianoforte, songs, and a few orchestral compositions, of which latter his 'Suite in canon-form' for stringed orchestra made the round of German concert rooms successfully, and in point of clever workmanship deserved all the praise it met with. A symphony in D minor and a choral and orchestral ode, 'An die Musik,' deserve mention.

GRISAR, ALBERT (b. Antwerp, Dec. 26, 1808; d. Asnières, June 15, 1869), composer of operas, was intended for commerce, and with that view was placed in a house of business at Liverpool. The love of music was, however, too strong in him, and after a few struggles with his family he ran away to Paris, and reached it only a day or two before the Revolution of July 1830. He began to study under Reicha, but the Revolution spread to Belgium, and Grisar was obliged to join his family in Antwerp. His first public success was 'Le Mariage impossible' at Brussels in the spring of 1833. It attracted the attention of the government, and procured him a grant of 1200 francs towards the completion of his musical education. He returned to Paris and henceforward gave himself up almost entirely to the theatre. His first appearance there was at the Opéra-Comique with 'Sarah' (1836), followed by 'L'an 1000' (1837); 'La Suisse à Trianon' (Variétés, 1838); 'Lady Melvill' and 'L'Eau merveilleuse' (with Plotow, 1838 and 1839); 'Le Naufrage' (1839); 'Les Travostissements' (Opéra-Comique, 1839); 'L'Opéra à la cour' (with Boieldieu, 1840). Though not unsuccessful he was dissatisfied with himself, and in 1840 went to Naples to study composition under Mercadante; and there he remained for several years. In 1848 he was again in Paris, and did not leave it till his death. Nineteen of his comic operas were produced on the stage, and a dozen more remained unperformed. A complete list will be found in Pougin's supplement to Nétis. The most important are the following:

'Gilles Ravisseur' (1848), 'Les Porcherons' (1850), 'Bon soir, Monsieur Pantalon' (1861), 'Le Carillonneur de Bruges' (1862), 'Les Amours du Diable' (1863), 'Le Chien du jardinier' (1865), 'Voyage autour de ma chambre' (1869), 'La Chatte merveilleuse' (1862), 'Bégaiements d'amour' (1864), 'Douce innocente' (1865).

He also published more than fifty melodies and romances. His statue, by Brackeleer, is in the vestibule of the Antwerp Theatre, and a life of him by Pougin was published by Hachette.

GRISELIDIS, opera in a prologue and 3 acts; text by Armand Silvestre and Eugène Morand; music by Massenet. Produced Opéra-Comique, Nov. 20, 1901; New York, Manhattan Opera House, Jan. 19, 1910.

GRISI, GIULIA (b. Milan, July 28, 1811; d. Berlin, Nov. 29, 1869), a famous operatic singer, daughter of Gaetano Grisi, an officer of engineers under Napoleon. She belonged to a family of artists. Her maternal aunt was the celebrated Grassini: her eldest sister, GIUDITTA (b. Milan, July 28, 1805; d. May 1, 1840), was a singer of high merit; and her cousin, CARLOTTA GRISI, originally educated as a singer, became, under the tuition of Perrot, the most charming dancer of her time.

Giulia's earliest instructors were successively her sister Giuditta; Filippo Celli, afterwards resident professor in London; Madame Bocca-badati; and Guglielmi, son of the composer of that name. At the age of 17 she made her first appearance in public as Emma in Rossini's 'Zelmira.' In 1830 C. C. Greville saw her at Florence with David in 'Ricciardo,' and said: 'She is like Pasta in face and figure, but much handsomer. She is only 18.' Rossini took a great interest in the young and promising Giulia, for whom he predicted a brilliant future. One of Giulia's warmest admirers was Bellini, who, composing at Milan the opera of 'Norma' for Pasta, recognised in the young artist all the qualifications for a perfect Adalgisa. Strangely enough, when the opera was first brought out, the first act proved almost a fiasco; and it was not until the duct for Norma and Adalgisa in the second act that the audience began to applaud. Dissatisfied with her engagement at Milan, and unable to get herself released from it by ordinary means, the impulsive Giulia took to flight, and escaping across the frontier reached Paris, where she found her aunt, Madame Grassini, her sister Giuditta, and Rossini,—at that time artistic director of the Théâtre des Italiens. She had no trouble in obtaining an engagement. Rossini, who had not forgotten her performance in 'Zelmira,' offered her the part of Semiramide in his opera of that name; and on Oct. 16, 1832, Grisi made her first appearance at the Italian Opéra of Paris in the character of the Assyrian Queen. Nothing could have been more complete than Grisi's success: and for sixteen consecutive years, from 1832-49, she was engaged at the Théâtre des Italiens. She passed the winter of 1833 at Venice, where Bellini, in 1830, had written and produced 'I Capuleti ed i Montecchi' for the two sisters, Giuditta and Giulia. She did not visit London until 1834, where she made her first appearance, amid general admiration, as Ninetta in 'La gazza ladra' (Apr. 8). Her first great London success, however, was achieved in the part of Anna Bolena. The chief characters in this work—which Donizetti had written for Galli, Rubini and Pasta—became identified in London with Lablache, Rubini and Grisi. When she undertook the part of Semiramide, at the King's Theatre, it was said by every one that Pasta having now retired, her only successor was Grisi. In the year 1835 Bellini wrote 'I Puritani' for Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini and Lablache; that memorable operatic quartet of which she was the last survivor. It is true that after Rubini had been replaced by Mario the quartet was still incomparable; and it was for the new combination—Grisi, Mario, Tamburini and Lablache—that Donizetti, in 1843, composed 'Don Pasquale. Year after year the Mario quartet, like the Rubini quartet, spent the winter in Paris, the summer in London.

When, in 1846, Lumley's company was broken up by the sudden departure of his principal singers, together with Costa, and nearly the whole of the orchestra, the second of the great quartets came to an end. It struggled on for a time in the reduced form of a trio: Grisi, Mario and Tamburini. Then the trio became a duet; but Grisi and Mario still sang the duo concertante which Donizetti had written for them in 'Don Pasquale,' as no other singers could sing it. They were still 'the rose and the nightingale' of Heine's Parisian Letters, 'the rose the nightingale among flowers, the nightingale the rose among birds.'

From the year 1834, when she made her début at the King's Theatre, London, until the year 1861, when she retired from the Royal Italian Opera, Madame Grisi only missed one season in London—that of 1842. And it was a rare thing indeed when she was engaged that illness or any other cause prevented her from appearing. In the year 1854 she made an artistic tour in the United States, in company with Mario. In 1859 she accepted an engagement at Madrid, which was not successful, and was rapidly broken off. In 1861 she signed an agreement with Gye binding her not to appear again in public within a term of five years. Gye thought, no doubt, that in this case five years were as good as fifty. But he had reckoned without his prima donna, who, in the year 1866, to the regret of her friends and to the astonishment of every one, came out at Her Majesty's Theatre in her old part of Lucrezia. After that Madame Grisi still continued from time to time to sing at concerts, and as a concert singer gained much and deserved applause. She had for years made London her headquarters, and on leaving it in 1869 to pay a visit to Berlin, inflammation of the lungs seized her, and after a short attack she died at the Hôtel du Nord, Berlin.

Grisi was married on Apr. 24, 1836, to Count de Melcy, but the union was not a happy one, and was dissolved by law. Later she married Mario, by whom she had three daughters.

GRISWOLD, PUTNAM (b. Minneapolis, Dec. 23, 1875; d. New York, Feb. 26, 1914), operatic baritone. This gifted and promising American artist began his career as a church singer at Oakland, California. His singularly fine organ attracted much attention, and he was sent to London to study at the R.C.M., where he worked with Alberto Randegger from May 7, 1900. His first appearance in opera took place at Covent Garden in 1901, when he played Leonato in the production of Stanford's 'Much Ado About Nothing.' Needing further study, he then worked in turn with Bouhy in Paris and Franz Emerich in Berlin, and gained valuable experience in various German opera-houses. He sang with great success as Rocco in 'Fidelio' (R.C.M. performance) at His Majesty's Theatre, 1902. In 1904–05 he took part in the first English production of 'Parsifal' in America, giving a remarkable rendering of the music of Gurnemann. Reappearing at Covent Garden for the second and last time in 1907, he sang Daland in 'Der fliegende Holländer.' Pagner in 'Die Meistersinger,' and other Wagnerian rôles with entire acceptance.

GRONEMANN (GRONEMANN), JOHANN ALBERT (b. Cologne; d. The Hague, after 1760). He was entered as 'Musicus' at Leyden University, Feb. 15, 1732, where he settled as violinist. In 1750 he was appointed organist at The Hague, which position he held until 1760, when he sank into melancholy, dying soon after. In 1756 he assisted, together with Antoine and Konrad Grimm (brothers?), at the musical society at Arnheim. He composed several books of sonatas and duets for violin (or flute).

GROOTE, ALIANUS DE, poet and composer of sacred plays, chosen (July 12, 1475) as singer at S. Donatien, Bruges. In 1480 he was succentor, i.e. sub-Kapellmeister. On Apr. 28, 1501, he is mentioned as deceased.

GROSHEIM, GEORG CHRISTOPH, Ph.D. (b. Cassels, July 1, 1764; d. there, 1847), composed operas, pianoforte and organ music and songs, and edited a Hessian hymn-book, and a German edition of Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis.' He wrote a number of essays and treatises on musical subjects, and contributed to Schilling's Musical Dictionary and several musical periodicals (Riemann; Q.-L.).

GROSIN (GROSSIN) DE PARISIUS, a composer c. 1400. His sacred and secular songs for one and three voices are in various collections. His 'Va-t'ent, sousprier' (3 v.) is in Stainer's 'Dufay.' Guillaume Grossin, of whom a few songs are known, was evidently another composer who lived towards the end of the century.

GROSSI, CARLO, of Vicenza, calls himself 'cavaliere,' and on a title-page of 1657 'former maestro di cappella of Reggio Cathedral.' In the same year he held a similar position at a church at Vicenza; from 1676 he was singer at S. Mark's, Venice. On Apr. 16, 1687, he was appointed maestro di cappella universale at Mantua. He composed masses, sacri concerti and other church music, including sonatas, operas and secular songs. (See Q.-L.)

GROSSVATER-TANZ, 'grandfather-dance,' a curious old German family dance of the 17th century which was greatly in vogue at weddings. Spohr had to introduce it into the Festival march which he wrote by command for the marriage of Princess Marie of Hesse with the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen in 1825 (Selbstbiog. ii. 165). It consisted of three parts, the first of which was an andante in triple time, sung to the words—

'Und als der Grossvater die Grossmutter nahm, Da war der Grossvater ein Bräutigam,' to which succeeded two quick phrases in 2-4 time—

As this dance usually concluded an evening, it was also called the 'Kehraus' (clear-out). Its chief musical interest arises from the fact that it is the 'air of the 17th century' used by Schumann in his 'Carnaval' to represent the flying 'Philistines' in the 'March of the Davids-bündler.' He also uses it in the finale of his 'Papillons,' op. 2. E. P.

GROTRIAN STEINWEG (abbreviation of Grotrian, Helfferich, Schulz, Th. Steinweg Nachfolger), registered and protected in England 1909. This firm of pianoforte-makers in Brunswick succeeded Theodor Steinweg when he retired in 1865 from the business founded by his father and went to America. His successors in Brunswick since 1886 are exclusively members of the Grotrian family who have enhanced the good reputation of their instruments, which are favoured by many eminent contemporary musicians and were used exclusively by Clara Schumann during her long and brilliant career on the concert platform. A few years ago the firm embodied in their pianos the 'Homogeneous Sound-board,' for which is claimed an increased uniformity of tone-colour throughout the scale.

On Oct. 1, 1925, Messrs. Grotrian Steinweg, Ltd., London, opened the Grotrian Concert Hall, formerly STEINWAY HALL (q.v.), in Wigmore Street, the new auditorium having a seating capacity of over 500. In the building are incorporated the pianoforte showrooms of the Company.

GROTTE, NICOLAS DE LA, chamber musician and organist to Henry III. of France, c. 1565–

1587, composed a book of chansons, to words by Ronsard, Desportes and others (1575); also songs and lute and organ pieces in collective volumes. E. v. d. s.

GROUND BASS (Ital. basso ostinato). The most obvious and easily realisable means of arriving at symmetry and proportion in musical works is by repetition, and a large proportion of the earliest attempts in this direction took the safe side of making the symmetry absolute by repeating the same thing over and over again in the form of variations; and of this order of form a ground bass, which consisted of constant repetition of a phrase in the bass with varied figures and harmonies above it, is a sub-order. This was formerly a very popular device, resorted to alike by Italians, such as Carissimi and Astorga, and by our English Purcell. In the works of Purcell there are a great number of examples, both in his songs in the 'Orpheus Britannicus,' and in his dramatic works (see PURCELL, Henry; subsection LANGUAGE IN SONG). An expansion of the idea was also adopted by him in the 'Music before the play' of King Arthur, in which the figure, after being repeated many times in the bass, is transferred to the upper parts, and also treated by inversion. Bach and Handel both made use of the same device; the former in his passacaglia for clavier with pedals, and the 'Crucifixus' of his Mass in B minor; and the latter in his choruses 'Envy, eldest-born of Hell' in 'Saul,' and 'O Baul, monarch of the skies' in 'Deborah.' In modern times Brahms has produced a fine example in the finale to the Variations on a Theme of Haydn in B_♭ for orchestra. The finale of his fourth symphony, in E minor, is a monumental example of a ground bass that is not absolutely strict.

At the latter part of the 17th century ground basses were known by the names of their authors, as 'Fariuell's Ground,' 'Purcell's Ground,' etc., and extemporising on a ground bass was a very popular amusement with musicians. Christopher Symphon's 'Chelys Minuritionum, or Division Viol' (1665), was intended to teach the practice, which he describes as follows:

'Diminution or division to a Ground is the breaking either of the bass or of any higher part that is applicable thereto. The manner of expressing it is thus:

'A Ground, subject, or bass, call it what you please, is pricked down in two several papers; one for him who is to play the ground upon an organ, harpsichord, or what other instrument may be apt for that purpose; the other for him that plays upon the viol, who, having the said ground before his eyes as his theme or subject, plays such variety of descent, or division in concordance thereto, as his skill and present invention do then suggest unto him.'

A long extract and a specimen of a 'Division on a Ground' are given in Hawkins's History, chap. 149. (See CHACONNE, PASSACAGLIA.)

C. H. H. P.

¹ See an example of a ground bass of four minims only, accompanying a canon 7 in 1, by Bach, in Spitta's Life, Engl. tr. iii. 404

There has been a considerable revival of what may be called the ground bass idea in modern music, beginning with the examples of Brahms named above. Rheinberger wrote one in which the theme appears on successive degrees of the scale, and Arensky devised one of six notes in 5-4 time, so that each note in turn receives the accent. Elgar's 'Carillon' is a good example of the use of the device for a special descriptive purpose, and Cyril Scott's Two Passacaglias for orchestra and Holst's 'Ostinato' (St. Paul's Suite) are further English examples among many which might be named. c.

GROVE, GEORGE (b. Clapham, Aug. 13, 1820; d. Sydenham, May 28, 1900), writer on music, first director of the R.C.M. and editor of the first edition of this work, was born at Thurlow Terrace, Wandsworth Road, Clapham. His father, Thomas Grove, came of a yeoman stock, long resident at Penn, Buckinghamshire, and his mother was a woman of some culture, a lover of music, and a proficient amateur.

George Grove gained his first schooling as a weekly boarder at an establishment on Clapham Common. Thence he migrated to the school started at Stockwell by the Rev. Charles Pritchard, moving with the headmaster, in 1834, to Clapham Grammar School. In 1836 he was articled to Alexander Gordon, a civil engineer in Fludyer Street, Westminster. His musical education began with hearing his mother play from the 'Messiah' to her children out of an old vocal score with voices and figured bass only. From this he advanced to Vincent Novello's Fitzwilliam Music and Bach's 'Forty Eight,' and though never much of an executant he and his brother and sisters used to play and sing a good deal from the oratorios, and regularly attended the concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society in Exeter Hall. In Feb. 1839 Grove was admitted graduate of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and in 1840-41 worked in the pattern and fitting shops of the firm of Robert Napier on the Broomielaw, Glasgow. Towards the close of 1841 he was sent out by Gordon to act as resident engineer during the erection of a cast-iron lighthouse on Morant Point, Jamaica, and after a short stay in England was despatched on a similar errand to Bermuda, whence he returned in Aug. 1846. He subsequently served under Robert Stephenson at Chester and Bangor (during the erection of the Britannia tubular bridge over the Menai Straits), and while at Chester took an active part in starting a singing class. When his engagement at Bangor terminated in 1849 Grove, at the instigation of Brunel, Robert Stephenson, and Sir Charles Barry, stood for the post of Secretary to the Society of Arts, and was appointed to that post in Mar. 1850, continuing, however, to practise as an engineer for a few years longer. In 1851 he married Miss Harriet Bradley, daughter of Rev. Charles Bradley, and sister of the late

Dean of Westminster. As Secretary of the Society of Arts, Grove was brought into close contact with the promoters of the great Exhibition of 1851, and when a company was formed to re-erect the Exhibition buildings at Sydenham, was offered the secretaryship of the Crystal Palace, moving to Sydenham in Oct. 1852. His association with James Fergusson and an introduction to Stanley, then Canon of Canterbury, turned his attention to Biblical research, and led to his co-operating with William Smith in the Dictionary of the Bible, of which he acted as an informal sub-editor, contributing in all upwards of 800 pages out of 3154. This work occupied the bulk of his leisure for nearly seven years, involved two visits to the Holy Land, in 1858 and 1861, and led, as a natural corollary, to the establishment, in 1865, of the Palestine Exploration Fund, in which Grove was 'the head and front of the whole proceeding.'¹

But he contrived to find time to prosecute his musical studies with great zeal from the moment of his settling in London, attending concerts, purchasing scores, and from 1854 onwards taking an active part in the organisation of the musical performances at the Crystal Palace. The famous ANALYTICAL PROGRAMMES (g.v.) grew out of a suggestion of August Manns, who had become chief conductor of the orchestra in 1855, that Grove should contribute a few words in elucidation of a memorial programme of Mozart's music in 1856. For upwards of forty seasons Grove contributed the bulk of these analytical remarks to the programmes of the Saturday Concerts, those of the works of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert and Schumann being, with hardly an exception, from his pen. The analyses of the nine symphonies of Beethoven were eventually expanded into the volume published in 1896, but he rarely allowed any of these commentaries, which can be reckoned by the hundred, to appear twice in the same form. His researches at home or abroad, his conversations with musicians, his general reading were constantly drawn upon to supply fresh and illuminative matter, whether in the shape of musical or literary parallels, details of construction, or anecdotic reminiscences. Grove has frankly admitted that he had forerunners in Thomson, the Professor of Music in Edinburgh in 1840, in John Ella, John Hullah and Dr. Wylde. But Grove brought to bear on his task an infectious enthusiasm as well as a width of culture which lent his commentaries a peculiar charm and value. There have been better analysts, anatomists and dissectors of the organism and structure of the classical masterpieces; there has never been so suggestive and stimulating a commentator upon their beauties. Grove's intimate association with Sir Arthur Sullivan dated from 1862, while his long friendship with Madame Schumann and his devoted championship of her husband's compositions began in 1863. In 1867 he made his memorable journey¹ to Vienna in company with Arthur Sullivan, which resulted in the discovery at Dr. Schneider's of the partbooks of the whole of the music of 'Rosamunde.' Here also he laid the foundation of his long friendship with C. F. Pohl, and made the acquaintance of Brahms. In May 1868 he succeeded Professor David Masson as editor of Macmillan's Magazine, a post which he retained for fifteen years.

Grove, who had in 1860 contributed to The Times the first detailed account of the Oberammergau Passion-play which appeared in the English press, wrote from Italy in 1869 some remarkable letters on the alleged miracle of St. Januarius at Naples to The Times and the Spectator, and till a very few years before his death was a constant contributor on a multiplicity of subjects, mainly musical, to these and other newspapers. He was meantime steadily accumulating illustrative material relating to the symphonies of Beethoven and Mendelssohn, steeping himself in the music of Schumann and Schubert, and in Sept. 1873 announced to his friends that he had resigned the secretaryship of the Crystal Palace in order to edit the Dictionary of Music and Musicians for Messrs. Macmillan. Though he had resigned the secretaryship of the Crystal Palace, Grove maintained his connexion by joining the Board of Directors and continuing to edit the programmes of the Saturday Concerts. On June 29, 1875, the honorary degree of D.C.L. was conferred by the University of Durham, on 'George Grove, the eminent civil engineer, and the present editor of Macmillan's Magazine, for the great services rendered to literature by his writings'; and it is worthy of remark that the speech of Professor Farrar, who presented him for his degree, laid stress on his contributions to Biblical research and geography, but took no account whatever of his services to music. His many-sidedness was happily hit off by Robert Browning in a private letter, a few months later, when he calls him 'Grove the Orientalist, the Schubertian, the Literate in ordinary and extraordinary.' In 1876 he found time, amid his work on the Dictionary, to write an admirable Geography Primer for Messrs. Macmillan's series, published in Jan. 1877; and in 1877 met Wagner at Dannreuther's house in Orme Square, besides assisting to entertain him at the Athenæum Club. That Grove was immensely impressed by Wagner there can be no question, but to the end of his life he remained in imperfect sympathy with the spirit and ethos of the music drama. But he kept his views to himself, and never aired them in public. Almost the only time he ventured to discuss Wagner in public was when, in 1887, the Daily Telegraph had noticed a new opera produced in Pest and more suo praised the composer for not being influenced by Wagner: 'He seems to his credit to have forgotten Wagner's very existence.' Grove promptly wrote to point out that this was incredible. Whatever Wagner's faults, 'that he has made a revolution in the form and structure of opera is admitted by nine-tenths of the musical world.'

In the autumn of 1878 Grove paid a memorable visit to America with Dean Stanley, meeting Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Emerson, Eliot and other leaders of thought, visiting most of the great eastern cities, and getting a glimpse of the South and a run through Canada. The year 1879 was chiefly devoted to accumulating materials for his monograph on Mendelssohn, and in the autumn he visited Berlin and Leipzig to obtain first-hand information from Mendelssohn's family and friends. The first volume of the Dictionary, containing Parts i.-vi.,² had been published in 1879, and the Part containing the article on Mendelssohn appeared in Feb. 1880. In July of the same year Grove was the recipient of a very gratifying testimonial in the shape of a purse of 1000 guineas, and an address emphasising his signal services rendered to Biblical History and Geography, and to Music and Musical Literature. The list of subscribers contained the names of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Dean Stanley, Millais, Leighton, Frederic Harrison, Arthur Balfour, James Paget, and a host of other distinguished men. Archbishop Tait presided: Dean Stanley and Sir Arthur Sullivan eulogised Grove's services to Biblical research and Music respectively. The gathering was a remarkable testimony to Grove's versatility, for, as Dean Bradley said, it came almost as a revelation to those who had associated him chiefly with Biblical research or literature to find him appropriated by musicians and vice versa.

From this time onward, however, his energies were steadily concentrated in the direction of music. He was already hard at work on his article on Schubert, and in the autumn of 1880 paid a special visit to Vienna to gather materials on the spot, and study the MSS. in the possession of the Musikverein. Here he renewed his acquaintance with Brahms, and was greatly assisted in his researches by his devoted friend C. F. Pohl. Schubert proved his chief interest and anodyne in 1881, a year saddened for Grove by the death of Dean Stanley; and in the autumn his theory of the lost 'Gastein' symphony took shape, and his views were embodied in a communication to the Athenæum for Nov. 19, 1881 (p. 675). The theory involved, as its corollary, the renumbering of the C major Symphony No. 10, a course invariably followed in the programme-books of the Crystal Palace concerts. Owing to the entire disappearance of the score, and the continued failure of all efforts to bring it to light, Grove's theory still remains in the category of hypothesis, but his own confidence in the accuracy of his deductions remained unshaken.

Meantime the movement for the establishment of the Royal College of Music was rapidly maturing. A scheme was mooted at a meeting held in Marlborough House in 1878 to effect an amalgamation with the Royal Academy of Music and the National Training School of Music, but the negotiations fell through, so far as the R.A.M. was concerned. The Training School, on the other hand, willingly fell in with the proposal, and in 1880 a draft Charter was completed, for which the Prince of Wales (Edward VII.) undertook to become petitioner to the Privy Council, a special feature of the proposed institution being the raising of a fund to provide not only for the education but in certain cases for the maintenance of those who, having shown themselves by competition worthy of such advantages, were unable to maintain and educate themselves. The Prince of Wales accepted the Presidency of the Council and the late Dukes of Coburg (then Edinburgh) and Albany and Prince Christian took an active part in the movement. Grove in July 1881 was invited to join the Council and Executive Committee of the proposed college, and in Mar. 1882, at the special request of the Prince of Wales, undertook the post of organising financial secretary for a period of six months. Into this campaign he threw himself with the utmost energy, making speeches, delivering addresses, drafting circulars, visiting provincial centres, and, in short, leaving no stone unturned to promote the end in view. In Feb. 1882, at a meeting convened by the Prince of Wales, and held at St. James's Palace, the scheme was formally launched. In the next fourteen months forty-four meetings were held throughout the country, apart from several held at the Mansion House. As a result of these efforts, in which Grove, with the late George Watson as his efficient lieutenant, took a most energetic part, a large sum of money was raised, and the promoters were able to realise a considerable instalment of this plan, by founding fifty scholarships for tuition, several of which included maintenance. In the course of the summer of 1882 the directorship was offered to and accepted by Grove, who at once set to work to select and organise his staff, inducing Madame Lind-Goldschmidt to emerge from her retirement, and enlisting the aid, amongst others, of C. H. H. Parry, Walter Parratt, C. V. Stanford, Ernst Pauer, Franklin Taylor and Arabella Goddard. The R.C.M. was formally opened by the Prince of Wales, the President and Founder, on May 7, 1883, the ceremony, which was attended by Gladstone, then Prime Minister, taking place in the building previously occupied by the National Training School of Music, and presented to the Prince of Wales for the purposes of the R.C.M. by Sir Charles Freake. Four days earlier Gladstone had offered the new director the honour of knighthood, in acknowledgment of the services he had rendered to the Art of Music in England, and in announcing Grove's decoration the Prince of Wales alluded to him as one who, 'eminent in general literature, has specially devoted himself to the preparation and publication of a Dictionary of Music, and has earned our gratitude by the skill and success with which he has worked in the difficult task of organising the Royal College.'

As director of the R.C.M., Grove exercised a remarkably stimulating and fruitful influence on his pupils. Regarding himself first and foremost as the head of a family, he exhibited a truly parental interest in his young charges. Mere ability was no passport to his favour; science, as he put it, is not everything, 'life is better than efficiency,' and he was quick to recognise sterling qualities of character though unaccompanied by talent. Again holding firmly that the arts reacted on each other, and that the better and wider a musician's education the better would be his work in music, he did all that was possible to widen the intellectual range of his students. In conversation—for he was always accessible—in his terminal addresses, on which he spent much time and thought, and in the choice of his staff, he never failed to exemplify his belief in the abiding value of culture. Thus he constantly urged his 'children,' as he called them, to read the best poetry; recommended, lent, or gave them books; and insisted on the vital importance of cultivating some intellectual interest as a resource in later life. It was truly said of him that few qualities in a student excited his displeasure more than a casual manner, a slovenly style, and above all, want of reverence for great men. 'His smallest piece of advice to a student,' says Walford Davies, 'was seasoned with what some great man did or said.' He had his drawbacks, which were chiefly due to the defects of his qualities. He was too enthusiastic always to consult his dignity, he was apt to be irritated by trifles, impatient of Philistinism, and inclined to confound thoughtless levity with disloyalty. His lack of sympathy with athleticism and field sports was a disadvantage in dealing with young men, and he was not able to conceal a very intelligible preference for instrumentalists over singers. But with all deductions, throughout his eleven years' tenure of office he exercised a notable and salutary influence on the best of the students, his interest in whom was by no means bounded by his official relations. Throughout his directorship he was in the habit of inviting select parties of pupils to the Crystal Palace concerts, where he might be seen, Saturday after Saturday throughout the season, in his seat at the back of the gallery, the centre of a group of his 'children,' with a full score in his lap, pointing out his favourite passages, and leading the applause. He also enlisted the aid of generous friends, so that if a deserving pupil was in need of rest or change, an invitation to the country or seaside was generally forthcoming.

Grove's interest in music outside his immediate official duties was manifested in a variety of ways—by frequent contributions to the press, by attendance at concerts and festivals, and by writing prefaces, analytical programmes, etc. He had been specially designated by Stanley to write his Memoir, but was obliged to abandon the task owing to his other engagements. He found time, however, to compile the interesting History of a Phrase which appeared in the Musical World in 1887, and in the autumn of 1889 carried out a thorough exploration of the villages in the environs of Vienna which Beethoven frequented in the summers of the later years of his life. In the spring of 1891 he took an active part in resisting the proposed measure for the Registration of Teachers, which he considered would most injuriously affect the operations of the R.C.M. In the autumn of the same year he initiated the scheme, carried out by Breitkopf & Härtel (Times, Sept. 15), for issuing a facsimile edition of the autograph scores of Beethoven's Symphonies. To the special Beethoven number of the Musical Times (Dec. 15, 1892) he contributed an interesting paper on 'The Birds in the Pastoral Symphony.'

Overwork and advancing years had now begun seriously to impair Grove's health. Visits to Sir Arthur Sullivan's villa near Monte Carlo at Christmas 1892 and to Ragatz in Sept. 1893 only brought him temporary relief, and consciousness of his failing powers impelled him in Oct. 1894 to resign his directorship. In Mar. 1896 he published his valuable and illuminating work, Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies. The Scottish Musical Review for June 1896 contains a sketch of his old friend Madame Schumann, and his contributions to the press continued to the close of 1897. As long as health remained he showed the liveliest interest in the welfare of his old pupils, and attended the meetings of the Royal College Council. Early in 1899 his strength began to fail, and he passed away on May 28, 1900, in the old wooden house at Sydenham which he had inhabited for nearly forty years. He is buried in Ladywell Cemetery, Lewisham.

Grove's achievements are all the more remarkable when it is borne in mind that in the strict sense of the words he was neither a scholar, a linguist, nor a musician. These limitations he was never afraid to acknowledge—see, for example, the preface to his book on Beethoven's Symphonies—and he freely availed himself of the best expert aid to supplement his own shortcomings. As one of his most distinguished pupils said of him, 'he taught one to think of him as pre-eminently an amateur, and I am inclined to think that this pre-eminence, together with his human kindness, formed his best qualification for a great professional post.' Though he was 'no executant' he never missed any opportunity of hearing good music; his memory was retentive, and he could find his way well enough about the full score of a work with which he was familiar. As a critic he was hampered by his temperament; he hated comparisons, 'would rather love than condemn any day in the week,' and was little concerned with niceties of technique in performance. Where he shone was as a commentator, interpreter, or eulogist; in the words of one of his best friends, 'in handling the great poets or musicians, his knowledge of their outer and inner lives, their friends, surroundings, and general circumstances, together with his minute, loving study of every line and note of their works, gave him a clue to the most abstruse and difficult passages which more practical and scientific musicians have rarely attained.' Grove's personal devotion to his musical heroes was quite extraordinary. He came to regard them as companions and friends. 'Schubert is my existence,' he wrote while engaged on the article in this Dictionary, and his feeling for Beethoven, though not so tender, was hardly less strong.

Personally Grove was a most lovable and delightful man, with a genius for friendship with young and old alike, and for utilising all the means by which friendship is kept in good repair. Before concentrating himself on music he had for many years moved in the mid-stream of culture, he had travelled widely, found time to read everything new or important in art or letters, and reckoned amongst his intimates or acquaintances a very large number of the most distinguished of his contemporaries. It was characteristic of the man that he was always ready to communicate and impart the treasures of a mind thus richly stored to those who needed it most. No one could have acted more conscientiously in accordance with the advice he gave to a young friend: 'Get all the education you can, and never fail to lend a helping hand to any one who needs it.' Of his energy and versatility a curiously interesting sketch will be found in the chapter on Types in H. Taine's Notes sur l'Angleterre.¹ Besides the distinctions and honours already mentioned it may be added that Grove was made a C.B. in 1894, that the late Duke of Coburg decorated him with the Cross of the Order of Merit, and that the University of Glasgow conferred on him the honorary degree of LL.D. On his retirement his pupils at the R.C.M. presented him with his bust by Alfred Gilbert, R.A., which he subsequently gave to the College.¹ The teaching staff presented him with his portrait by the late Charles Furse, A.R.A. Other portraits of him were painted by Henry Philips, H. A. Olivier and Felix Moscheles. A George Grove Memorial Scholarship has been founded at the R.C.M.

Besides the works already mentioned Grovle translated Guizot's Études sur les beaux-arts (1853), and contributed a sketch of his visit to Nâblus to Sir Francis Galton's Vacation Tourists and Notes of Travel in 1861 (Macmillan, 1862). He also wrote Prefaces to Otto Jahn's Life of Mozart, Hensel's Mendelssohn Family, W. S. Rockstro's Life of Handel, Novello's Short History of Cheap Music, Amy Fay's Music Study in Germany. The Early Letters of Schumann, translated by May Herbert, and F. G. Edwards's History of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah'. GROVLEZ, GABRIEL MARIE (b. Lille, Nord, Apr. 4, 1879), obtained the first piano-prize at the Paris Conservatoire (Diémer), and taught pianoforte for ten years at the Schola Cantorum; he became director of singing at the Opéra-Comique in 1905, and temporary conductor there. His career as a conductor has included the following appointments: 1910, 1925, at Lisbon (San Carlo); 1921-22, 1925-26, Chicago; 1911-13, Paris, Théâtre des Arts. From 1914 he has conducted at the Opéra. As a composer he is known by his symphonic poem 'Dans le jardin,' 'Madrigal lyrique,' etc., songs, dramatic works, including a ballet 'Maïmouna' (1924) and 'Le Marquis de Caraba' (1925), also pianoforte music. He has contributed to modern editions of older works, notably Rameau's works, and to some collections of French music (Chester, London.) M. L. P.

GRUA, a family of Italian musicians who were renowned in Germany in the 18th century, concerning whose dates very little seems at present to be known with certainty. According to Q.-L. (1) CARL LUGI PIETRO GRUA's name appears in the list of the court musicians at Dresden, as a male alto, in 1691, and he was appointed vice-Kapellmeister in 1693; he was at Düsseldorf in 1697, where an opera, 'Telegono,' was performed. F. Walter, in his Gesch. d. Theaters, refers to (2) GRUA as being Kapellmeister at Heidelberg in 1718, and at Mannheim from 1734 onwards; but as he speaks of him in 1734 as aged 34, thus making the date of his birth 1700, he cannot be the member of the Dresden choir or the composer of 'Telegono.' Another opera, 'Camillo,' is known by an aria preserved at Berlin and Dresden. A Mass and other church compositions are mentioned in Q.-L. (3) PAUL GRUA is mentioned by F. Walter as an organist at Mannheim in 1723, and (4) PETER GRUA as a violinist there in 1763. The former is possibly the Paul Grua whose death is given in Q.-L. as taking place before May 17, 1798. Another (5) PAUL GRUA, son of C. L. P. Grua, was sent at the expense of the Elector Carl Theodor to study with Padre Martini and Traetta, was a member of the Mannheim band, migrated with the band to Munich in 1778, and succeeded Bernasconi in 1784 as court Kapellmeister. His opera 'Telemacco' was performed in Munich, 1780, and a Miserere by him for four voices with orchestra is at Berlin and Darmstadt. It is apparently this Paul Grua whose date of birth is given in Riemann as Feb. 2, 1754, and that of his death as July 5, 1833. A great number of compositions for the Church are ascribed to him in the same book. M.

GRUBER, (1) GEORG WILHELM (b. Nuremberg, Sept. 22, 1729; d. there, Sept. 22, 1796), succeeded Agrell as town Kapellmeister, Feb. 4, 1765; publisher and excellent violinist. He was highly esteemed as a composer of church music, songs, harpsichord concertos and sonatas.

(2) JOHANN SIGMUND (b. Nuremberg, Dec. 4, 1759; d. there, Dec. 3, 1805), son of the former. a lawyer, wrote Biographien einiger Tonkünstler (1786-90), Litteratur der Musik, 1783 (several later editions). E. v. d. s.

GRÜTZMACHER, (1) FRIEDRICH WILHELM LUDWIG (b. Dessau, Mar. 1, 1832; d. Dresden, Feb. 23, 1903), a distinguished violoncellist, son of a musician.

In 1848 he went to Leipzig, where he at once attracted the notice of David, and in 1849, when only 17, became first violoncello and solo player at the Gewandhaus, and a teacher in the Conservatorium. In 1860 he was called to Dresden as 'Kammer-Virtuos' to the King of Saxony. He visited most of the northern capitals of Europe, and was in England in 1867 and 1868, playing at the Philharmonic (May 20, 1867). Musical Union and Crystal Palace. His compositions embrace orchestral and chamber pieces, songs, etc., besides concertos and other compositions for the violoncello. His exercises and studies are specially valuable ('Tägliche Übungen' and 'Technologie des Violoncellspicels,' used in the Leipzig Conservatorium). We are also indebted to him for many careful editions of standard works (Beethoven's sonatas for pianoforte and violoncello, Romberg's concertos, Boccherini's sonatas, etc. etc.), and for the revival of some forgotten works of considerable interest. As a teacher he formed a number of fine players of all the nations of Europe. Of his pupils his brother (2) LEOPOLD (b. Sept. 4, 1834; d. Feb. 26, 1900) was one of the most remarkable. He was for many years first violoncello in the Meiningen orchestra.

GRUND, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (b. Hamburg, Oct. 7, 1791; d. there, Nov. 24, 1874), at first studied the violoncello and pianoforte with the intention of becoming a public performer on both instruments, but after a few successful appearances in his seventeenth year, his right hand became crippled, and he was obliged to abandon his public career. He now took a keen interest in the musical affairs of his native town, where in 1819 he was instrumental in founding the Singakademie. He remained director until 1862, when he also retired from the direction of the Philharmonische Konzerte, with which he had been connected since 1828. In 1867 he took an active part with Grädener in the formation of the Hamburger Tonkünstlerverein. His numerous works include two operas, 'Mathilde' and 'Die Burg Falkenstein,' a cantata 'Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Christi,' an 8-part Mass, symphonies, overtures, and much chamber music. M.

GRUNER, NATHANIEL GOTTFRIED (d. 1795). From the middle of the 18th century to the time of his death he was cantor and director of music at the Gymnasium at Gera, Saxony, and was a highly esteemed composer of psalms, cantatas, arias, songs and especially of harpsichord concertos and sonatas. (See Q.-L.)

GRUNEWALD, GOTTFRIED (b. 1673; buried Darmstadt, Dec. 22, 1739), son-in-law of Joh. Phil. Krieger. In 1703 he was singer at the Hamburg Opera, for which he wrote an opera, 'Germanicus,' which was first performed at Leipzig in 1704, and at Hamburg in 1705 (probably on account of the performance of Handel's 'Almira' in 1704). In 1712 he became vice-Kapellmeister at Darmstadt, and in 1717 he toured in Germany as virtuoso on the pantaleon. E. v. d. S.

GRUPPO, GRUPETTO, the Italian names for TURN (q.v.). Sébastien de Brossard (Dictionnaire de musique) says that the turn is called Groppa (or Gruppo) ascendente and Groppa descendente, according as the last note of the group rises or falls. (See ORNAMENTS.) M.

GUADAGNI, GAETANO (b. Lodi,¹ c. 1725²; d. 1785³ or 1797⁴), was one of the most famous male contraltos of the 18th century.

In 1747 he was singing at Parma; in 1748 he came, very young, to London as 'serious man' in a burletta troupe, with Pertici, Laschi, Frasi, etc. 'His voice attracted the notice of Handel, who assigned him the parts in the "Messiah" and "Samson," which had been originally composed for Mrs. Cibber,⁵ in the studying which parts,' says Burney, 'he applied to me for assistance. During his first residence in England, which was four or five years, he was more noticed in singing English than Italian. He quitted London about 1753.' In 1751-52 he visited Dublin, and sang there with great success. In 1754 he sang at Paris and Versailles, after which he went to Lisbon to sing under Gizziello, and in 1755 narrowly escaped destruction during the earthquake. To Gizziello he owed much of his improvement and refinement of singing. His ideas of acting were derived much earlier from Garrick, who took as much pleasure in forming him as an actor (for 'The Fairies' of Smith) as Gizziello did afterwards in polishing his style of vocalisation. After leaving Portugal he acquired great reputation in all the principal theatres of Italy. There he sang the part of 'Telemacco,' written for him by Gluck, who procured his engagement in 1766 at Vienna as 'Orfeo.' Having excited both admiration and disturbance in that capital, he returned to London in 1769.

'As an actor he seems to have had no equal on any operatic stage in Europe: his figure was uncommonly elegant and noble; his countenance replete with beauty, intelligence, and dignity; and his attitudes and gestures were so full of grace and propriety, that they would have been excellent studies for a statuary. But, though his manner of singing was perfectly delicate, polished, and refined, his voice seemed, at first, to disappoint every hearer, for he had now changed it to a soprano, and extended its compass from six or seven notes to fourteen or fifteen.'

He had strong resentments and high notions of his own importance, which made him many enemies. He sang under J. C. Bach in the Lent of 1770, and later in the same year was heard at Verona by the Electress of Saxe, who brought him to Munich, where he remained in great favour with the Elector till the death of that prince. In 1766 he sang at Potsdam before Frederick II., who gave him a handsome gold snuff-box studded with brilliants—the finest he had ever given. In 1777 he returned to Padua. There Lord Mount-Edgumbe heard him (1784) in a motetto, and found his voice still full and well-toned, and his style excellent. He insisted on Lord Mount-Edgumbe going to his house, where he entertained him with fantoccini, which he exhibited on a little stage, and in which he took great delight. J. M.

GUADAGNINI, a family of Italian violin-makers. The first of these was (1) LORENZO, who worked at Piacenza and died there about 1740. He is one of those who styled himself a pupil of Stradivari, but no proof of this claim has ever been forthcoming. (2) GIOVANNI BATTISTA (c. 1745-90) was son of Lorenzo. There was only one maker of this name, and not two as sometimes stated. It has been said that Lorenzo also was a pupil of Stradivari; be that as it may, both he and his son did their best to copy the Stradivari model for the reason that they recognised it to be the best, and not because they had been his pupils. Lorenzo left but few violins, and his violoncellos are very scarce; some of the violins are meritorious. It was the son, Giovanni Battista, who made the name of Guadagnini famous. As already mentioned, he followed the Stradivari design, and many of his instruments have a rather highly coloured varnish. As a rule he used excellent wood, and his instruments are held in high repute among players. He was a man of erratic temperament and restless disposition, never remaining long in one place. He worked first at Piacenza, then at Milan, then at Parma, and finally at Turin, remaining ten or eleven years in each place. He died at Turin.

Giovanni Battista left a son (3) GIUSEPPE (1780-1800), who was known in Italy as il soldato. His work as a whole is degenerate, and only occasionally did he make an instrument in any way worthy of the family name which he bore. He worked in Como, Pavia and Turin. Later members of this family made guitars and, occasionally, violins, but the earlier traditions were completely lost. The family still survives in Turin, but they know nothing about their ancestors.

GUAITOLI, FRANCESCO MARIA (b. Carpi, 1563; d. there, Jan. 3, 1628), canon and maestro di cappella at S. Maria from 1593; composed psalms, vespers, etc., madrigals, motets, canzonets (Q.-L.).

GUALANDI, see CAMPIOLI.

GUALTERI, (1) ALESSANDRO, organist and maestro di cappella at S. Maria, Verona, 1620; composed masses (8 v., 1620) and motets (1-4 v., 1616).

(2) ANTONIO. From 1608-25 maestro di cappella at the church and college of Monselice, Lombardy; composed 2 books of madrigals, motets and 'Amorosi diletti' (3 v.) (Q.-L.).

GUAMI, (1) FRANCESCO (b. Lucca, c. 1544; d. there, 1601), trombone-player in Munich court chapel, 1568-80; maestro di cappella at S. Marcelliano, Venice, 1593, and at Lucca, 1598-1601. He composed 3 books of madrigals, church music, ricercari (a 2 v.).

(2) GIOSEFFO, brother of Francesco (b. Lucca, c. 1540; d. there, 1611), court organist at Munich, 1568-79; maestro di cappella at the court of Genoa, 1585; second organist at S. Mark, Venice, 1588-91; organist of S. Martino, Lucca, 1591; a highly esteemed composer of church music, madrigals and canzonets; also organ pieces, some of which appeared in modern editions. (See Q.-L.; Riemann.)

GUARDUCCI, TOMMASO (TOSCANO) (b. Montefiascone c. 1720), a pupil of the famous Bernacchi at Bologna, became one of the best singers of his time.

He appeared at most of the chief theatres of Italy with success from 1745-70. In the autumn of 1766 he was brought over by Gordon, one of the managers, to the London Opera as 'first man,' with Grassi. In the spring of 1767, two serious operas, 'Caratacco' by J. C. Bach and Vento's 'Conquista del Messico,' were produced; and in these the two new singers excited more attention, and acquired more applause, than before. Guarducci was, according to Burney,

'tall and awkward in figure, inanimate as an actor, and in countenance ill-favoured and morbid; but a man of great probity and worth in his private character, and one of the most correct singers. His voice was clear, sweet, and flexible. His shake and intonations were perfect, and by long study and practice he had vanquished all the difficulties of his art, and possessed himself of every refinement.'

He was, perhaps, the simplest of all the first class of singers. All his effects were produced by expression and high finish. He sang in the English oratorios at short notice, with very little knowledge of our language. He received, however, £600 for twelve oratorios, a larger sum than was ever given on a like occasion until the time of Miss Linley. In 1771 he retired, and lived with his family, passing the winter at Florence and the summer at Montefiascone, where he had a handsome country-house. J. M.

GUARNIERI, a celebrated family of violin-makers at Cremona. The first of these was (1) ANDREA (b. circa 1626; d. Dec. 7, 1698). He was a fellow-pupil with Stradivari in the workshop of Nicolo Amati, but unlike Stradivari, who developed out of his master's model an entirely original style, Guarneri founded his own instruments on the Amati pattern. Excellent instruments of his make, not very highly finished, but covered with a fine orange varnish, are dated from the sign of 'St. Theresa' in Cremona, where he was succeeded by his younger son, GIUSEPPE.

(2) PIETRO GIOVANNI (b. 1655) was the elder son of Andrea, and is commonly known as 'Peter of Mantua,' to distinguish him from his nephew, 'Peter of Venice.' He was born in Cremona, but settled at Mantua, where, in accordance with the family tradition, he also established himself 'sub signo Sanctae Teresae.' His work was of remarkable originality. 'There is,' says Hart, 'increased breadth between the sound-holes; the sound-hole is rounded and more perpendicular, and the model is more raised.' His varnish is, as a whole, superior to that of his brother Giuseppe. The instruments of 'Peter of Mantua' are highly valued by connoisseurs; some are superb.

(3) GIUSEPPE (b. 1666; d. circa 1739) was the younger son of Andrea, and was described as 'Joseph filius,' to distinguish him from the more famous member of the family, also named Giuseppe, who came to be known as 'del Gesù.' He began by following his father's pattern, but he later developed a style of his own, in which the narrow and rapidly widening waist, the peculiar set of the sound-holes and a more brilliant varnish are prominent features. Some points first traceable in his work were adopted by Giuseppe 'del Gesù.'

(4) PIETRO (b. 1695; d. 1765) is known as 'Peter of Venice' to distinguish him from his uncle 'Peter of Mantua.' He adopted his uncle's methods in a general way and did some good work, but as years passed he was inspired by the environment in which he lived, and has left some very meritorious instruments. He incorporated various features of the Venetian school with his own.

(5) GIUSEPPE (b. 1687; d. 1745) was the greatest of the Guarneri family of violin-makers, and second only to Stradivari among all violin-makers. He came to be known as 'Giuseppe del Gesù' to distinguish him from the son of Andrea, the term being taken from the 'I.H.S.' which is added to his name on his labels. This may perhaps have originated with the vogue in Italy at that time connected with the Jesuit movement, by which the sacred monogram was frequently attached to works of art. Many new and interesting details concerning his parentage and biography will shortly be published by Messrs. Hill, whose tireless researches have brought to light so many new facts concerning him and his entire family. It can only be said here that the statement that he was the son of G. Battista will be found to be an error.

It is sometimes erroneously said that he was a pupil of Stradivari; his work has nothing whatever in common with that of Stradivari. It is more likely that he was a pupil of Joseph, the son of Andrea. His attention seems to have been early diverted from the school of Amati, on which his own relatives, as well as Stradivari himself, founded their style, and his inspiration was drawn from the early Brescian makers, such as Gasparo di Salò and Paolo Maggini. Thus, whereas the Amati family had made a special feature of the development of true geometrical curves coupled with extreme fineness of finish and other features which made for mellowness of tone, Giuseppe Guarneri revived the bold and rugged outline and the masterly carelessness, and with it the massive build and powerful tone, of the earlier Brescian school.

Perfection of form and style had been attained by others; tone was the main quality sought by Giuseppe and the endless variety of his work, in size, in model, and in cutting of sound-holes, gives some indication of the many ways in which he sought it. He was sedulous in the selection of sonorous wood. Many of his instruments were made from a particular piece of pine; the tables of all these violins have a stain or sap-mark running parallel with the finger-board on either side. This special block of wood may well have been regarded by the craftsman as a mine of wealth. Some of the 'del Gesù' violins exhibit a special degree of finish; these finer examples predominate in what has been termed the 'second period' of his work. But throughout his career he worked with no uniformity as to design, size, appearance or degree of finish, and without any guide but his own genius and the principles which he himself wrought out by experiment. It remains to say something about those rough instruments which are sometimes described as 'prison Josephs.' There is no question that these roughly made instruments are his genuine handiwork, but the romantic stories about his imprisonment are not borne out by research. It seems probable that the shakiness of hand and general deterioration of workmanship so conspicuous in these instruments were the effect of dissolute habits, and this explanation is all the more probable when the temporary nature of these lapses is borne in mind.

One of the finest violins by Giuseppe Guarneri is that which Paganini habitually played upon. This instrument was bequeathed by Paganini to his native town, Genoa, and is exhibited in the Sala Rossa of the Municipal Palace. It is said to be the only example of a 'del Gesù' violin in the whole of Italy at the present time. No violoncello by Giuseppe Guarneri has ever been known.

GUDEHUS, HEINRICH (b. Altenhagen, near Celle, Hanover, Mar. 30, 1845; d. Dresden, Oct. 9, 1909), singer, the son of a schoolmaster at Altenhagen. He was at first a schoolmaster himself, and ultimately organist in Goslar. He was taught singing, first at Brunswick by Malwina Schnorr von Carolsfeld, widow of the tenor singer, and in 1870 at Berlin by Gustav Engel. On Jan. 7, 1871, he first appeared on the stage at Berlin as Nadori in a revival of 'Jessonda,' and subsequently as Tamino, and was well received; but feeling the necessity of further study, retired for a time and studied under Fräulein Luise Röss of Berlin from 1872-75. In 1875 he reappeared at Riga, and sang there during the season 1875-76, and afterwards was engaged at Lübeck, Freiburg, Bremen, and in 1880 at Dresden, where he remained till 1890. During these ten years Gudehus played in many operas of Mozart, Weber, Meyerbeer, Wagner, Auber, Méhul, Bellini, Boieldieu, Verdi, etc. On leave of absence he sang with success at Vienna, Frankfurt and Bayreuth, where he made his reputation on July 28, 1882, at the second performance of 'Parsifal,' and in 1884 at Covent Garden, where he made his début

June 4, as Walther ('Meistersinger'). He was very successful in this part, and subsequently as Max, Lohengrin, Tannhäuser and Tristan. On Nov. 10 and 15 of the same year he sang at the Albert Hall at the concert performances of 'Parsifal,' then introduced into England for the first time in its entirety by the Albert Hall Choral Society, under the direction of Sir J. Barnby. He played Parsifal and Tristan at Bayreuth in 1886. In 1890 and 1891 he sang in German Opera in New York, and on his return to Europe was engaged at the Berlin opera.

GUDENIAN, HAIG (b. Caeseria, Asia Minor, May 19, 1886), lived in Constantinople until 1904, when he went to Brussels to study under César Thomson, Matthieu and Crickboom. Proceeding from there to Prague, he completed his studies of violin under Sevcík, and of composition under Novák. From this period he became a musical pilgrim in search of folk-tunes which he collected in the East and in the Balkans. In 1918 he visited America, where he married Miss Katherine Lowe, a distinguished pianist, with whom he has toured America and England.

His compositions arrest attention by means of the unfamiliar and fascinating idiom which is evolved by an emancipation from the orthodox major and minor scales, and by the tuning of the violin to intervals which permit the performance of double-stopping and chords derived from countless Eastern modes. His works include all kinds of folk-songs, dances, religious, poetical and philosophical pieces for drums with the accompaniment of Western instruments.

GUÉDRON (GUESDRON), PIERRE (b. Beauce, Normandy, 1565?), was a chorister in the chapel of Cardinal de Guise and is cited, with other singers, in the 'Concours' of the Puits de Musique et Evreux, 1583. He was a singer in Henri IV.'s chapel in 1590. In 1601 he succeeded Claude Lejeune as composer of the King's music, was appointed to various court posts, such as 'Valet de chambre du roy,' and finally Surintendant de la Musique, an office he held in 1613 under Louis XIII. In co-operation with le Bailly, Mauduit, Bataille and Boësset he composed many ballets for the court from c. 1608–20. This group of composers did much —by securing the favour of the King and court —to bring about the great monodic revolution, in which solo songs displaced the polyphonic compositions that had long been in vogue. Several collections of airs for the court ballets are found in his 4 books of 'Airs de cour à 4 et à 5 parties' (Ballard, 1615–18); also in the series 'Airs de cour de différents auteurs,' 'Airs de cour avec la tablature de luth' (Ballard, 1602–20); in Gabriel Bataille's 'Airs mis en tablature de luth' (Ballard, 1608–13). A selection from these Airs de cour, together with others by Antoine Boësset (who married Guédron's daughter Jeanne), appeared in England under the title: 'French Court Ayres with their ditties englished, of four and five parts, collected, translated, and published by Edward Filmer, Gentl. Dedicated to the Queen' (Henrietta Maria), 1629, in fol.² Guédron's melodies are both simple and graceful, and his modulations are often in advance of his epoch. The form and proportion of his songs are likewise always well balanced. His reputation was very great both during his life and after, as may be gathered from the fact that up to 1668 his compositions were not forgotten. He was a precursor of Boësset and Lambert, and with them paved the way for Lully's action, thus helping to make the latter's production a reality.

GUERRE, (1) MICHEL DE LA (b. Paris; c. 1605; d. there, Nov. 13, 1679). Altogether a Parisian, he was made organist of the Sainte-Chapelle of the Palace, Jan. 1, 1633, in place of La Galle, according to the registers of the proceedings of the Chapter. He remained organist there for the rest of his life, and from 1658 he was given, with his family, free quarters in the precincts of the Palace. At the same time he added to his position as organist that of 'Receveur Général du temporel de la Sainte-Chapelle,' that is to say, 'man of business' to the canons, and this occupation turned him somewhat from his musical activities during the later years of his life. He died in the palace.

None of his compositions have survived, though court-songs of several poets of the mid-17th century became well known through his musical settings.

He probably wrote also motets and organ works. About 1650 he was well known as a composer. His name merits recognition in musical history as the author of the first French opera, a 'Comédie de chansons,' as it was called, 'Le Triomphe de l'Amour sur des bergers et bergères,' written to a libretto of the court poet, Charles de Reys. It was sung at a concert before the King, Jan. 22, 1655, having been performed throughout Dec. 1654. Two years later, Mar. 26, 1657, it was revived at the court, and this time it was produced in a theatre. Of the libretto, which is a short pastoral in one act, there are two editions in quarto, and both appeared to have been published by the composer. The first is of 1654; the other, undated, seems to be of 1661, and it contains also a little collection of verses by various authors which La Guerre is stated to have set to music. This second edition was made with the object of claiming priority in the invention of the 'Comédie française en musique,' which Perrin had attributed without shame to himself, in publishing two years earlier, and then again in 1661, his 'Pastorale d'Issy.'

This pastoral with Cambert's music had been played in 1659. But during those years almost all the composers of court airs tried to compose dramatic music, in imitation of the Italian operas presented under the ægis of Mazarin. They are written as dialogues with music, sometimes on fairly extended lines linked with airs and duets where the employment of recitatives was more or less shunned.

'Le Triomphe de l'Amour' and the 'Pastorale d'Issy' are nothing more than dialogues of this kind. However, they were not sung singly, but as scenes. These are in fact the first attempts at French opera, and the work of La Guerre appeared four years before that of Perrin.

Michel de La Guerre had, by his wife Marguerite Trespagne, ten children, of whom two became organists.

(2) JÉRÔME (b. about 1654) was admitted (1675) as substitute for the 'recette du temporel de la Sainte-Chapelle.' He replaced Michel in this post Mar. 26, 1678, and took charge of the organ likewise from 1679. But on Sept. 20, 1698, with the object of devoting himself entirely to business, he appointed in his place as organist his brother Marin. In the following years, although he had associated in his management his wife, Claude Marguerite de Saizy, and her sister-in-law, Catherine de Saizy, his affairs became imperilled, and he had to abandon the 'recette du temporel' in 1716, with a debt of 11,000 livres, which he had to repay at once. The Chapter registers mention him often at this time and also the subject of the various dwellings which he occupied in the precincts of the palace. Probably he had taken up the organ again in 1704 at the death of his brother, and he was again organist in 1738, having as his successor Pierre Février, author of a book of clavessin pieces.

(3) MARIN (b. Dec. 1, 1658; d. at the palace, July 16, 1704), was in 1686, until the death of his mother, whose certificate he signed, organist of the Jesuit Church in the rue St. Antoine. In 1690 he was also organist of St. Séverin, and in 1698 he took Jérôme's place at the Sainte-Chapelle. He was buried the day after his death in the lower chapel. He had married, probably in 1687, Elisabeth JACQUET (q.v.), the celebrated clavessinist and composer. They had a son who showed great musical gifts and appeared as an infant prodigy, but who died in his 10th year. As in the case of Michel, the works of his two sons have not been preserved.

GUERRERO, (1) FRANCISCO (b. Seville, May 1527; d. there, Nov. 8, 1599), Spanish composer of church music and madrigals. He was the son of Gonzalo Sánchez Guerrero, a painter, and received his first music lessons from his brother, Pedro (2).

He was singing alto in the cathedral choir at Seville in 1542 under FERNANDEZ DE CASTLEJEA, and doubtless learned much from this "master of the Spanish masters," whose few surviving compositions (Seville cathedral) show him to have been a good workman if not altogether an inspired artist. Guerrero tells us that in the absence of his brother he profited by the teaching of Morales, 'who led me far enough on the right road of composition to enter for any post of maestro de capilla.' This statement cannot mean more than that Guerrero was a diligent student of Morales's works; for Morales left Seville before Guerrero was 9 years old. He also had lessons on the lute, harp and various wind instruments. His first appointment was to the cathedral of Jaén (1545);

but three years later he accepted a post of cantor at Seville for a smaller stipend. In 1551 he had some idea of entering for the post of maestro de capilla at Málaga, and sent the Chapter a book of music. The Chapter of Seville, however, were unwilling to lose him. Fernández de Castilleja was placed upon half-pay, retaining the title of maestro: while Guerrero became director of the choir school, with the reversion of the mastership on the death of Fernández de Castilleja, even in the case of his losing his voice and becoming incapacitated through illness. The appointment at Málaga fell to Morales; but three years later, when Morales was dead, Guerrero applied again, and won the post in open competition, though he never actually took up the duties there. In 1556 he paid a visit to Lisbon, to present his first book of Masses to King Sebastian; while in 1557 he sent some music to the Emperor Charles V. in his retirement at Yuste. The Emperor had doubts of Guerrero's originality; his outspoken criticism (¡O hideputa, qué sutil ladrón es ese Guerrero!) is barely translatable. In 1567 Guerrero acted as judge in the competition for the appointment of a maestro de capilla at Córdoba: in 1570 he went with his singers to Santander, accompanying the Archbishop, who was to receive Princess Anna (daughter of the Emperor Maximilian II.), betrothed to Philip II. At last in 1574 Fernández de Castilleja died: and Guerrero's first action on becoming master was to apply for leave of absence. He went to Rome, where he contributed to Soto de Langa's 'Secondo libro de Laudi Spirituali' with a setting of some devotional words by the great dramatist Lope de Vega. The Chapter of Seville treated him with a certain generosity; as is shown by a letter to them from Rome, published (together with one from Victoria) by J. B. Elústiza (Estudios musicales. Seville, 1917). Guerrero was eventually (1586) placed on half-pay, Sebastián de Vivanco being appointed his substitute. In 1588 he was again in Rome, and having obtained permission to go to Venice to make arrangements for the printing of some music (his 'Canciones y villanescas' and the last edition of his motets), and learning that the work would take five months, he asked Zarlinó to correct the proofs, and set out for the Holy Land, which he had had a lifelong desire to visit. He afterwards published an account of his voyage (El viaje de Jerusalem que hizo Francisco Guerrero racionero y maestro de capilla de la santa iglesia de Sevilla), of which some ten editions were printed in the course of the 17th and 18th centuries. The prologue to this work is an autobiography of the composer; it is supplemented by the account given by Pacheco (the father-in-law of Velazquez), who published a portrait of Guerrero in his Libro de descripción de verdaderos retratos de ilustres y memorables varones (1590). The only modern authority for the life of the composer is the late R. Mitjana (Francisco Guerrero: estudio crítico-biográfico. Madrid, 1922).

As a musician, Guerrero was praised by his contemporary Espinel (the 'inventor' of the Spanish guitar) for his artifice and his 'sprightly counterpoint' (gallardo contrapunto); while Cerone considered his music 'grave and devotional,' and (what is of most importance) 'extremely well written for voices.' These estimates remain true. What Guerrero lacked was a strong personality. He could not write tunes like Morales, or set words like Victoria. His writing is always suave and often beautiful; but it leaves on the mind the effect of an exercise in counterpoint. By the testimony of all who knew him he was a man of great charm of character; but all that appears in his music is a gentle religiosity, presented with a technique which is as accomplished as it is unconvincing. He is interesting in his treatment of liturgical melodies which were traditionally Spanish, e.g. the 'Pange lingua' (more hispano), an uplifting tune in triple time against which Guerrero syncopates with a rapturous 6/4 rhythm; and he does not hesitate to use words from the Mozarabic liturgy in his settings of the Mass, e.g. Rex virginum amator, Deus Mariae decus and Paraclite obumbrans corpus Mariae in the Kyries of his masses 'De Beata Virgine.' On the whole he is more interesting as a secular composer, in his Canciones and Villanescas, originally secular madrigalian compositions, in which the Spanish words have been slightly altered to make them suitable for use as 'Laudi spirituali,' though they are, as a rule, too complicated for hearty congregational singing. They seem Italian in feeling rather than Spanish; but one or two, such as the purely secular 'Prado verde y florido' (not included in the printed collection), have an exquisite beauty of their own.

Medinaceli: Madrigals, 'Claros y frescos rios' (3 v.), words by Juan Boscán; 'Huyd, huyd, o ciegos amadores' (4 v.), included in the printed 'Canciones y villancicos'; 'Prado verde y florido' (4 v.); 'Ojos claros serenos' (4 v.), words by Gutierre de Cetina, included in the printed 'Canciones' with the words altered in sensu divino (MS. 13, 230).

(2) PEDRO (b. Seville, early 16th cent.), elder brother of Francisco Guerrero, to whom he gave his first lessons in music. By some he is said to have gone to Italy as a young man and to have remained there for the rest of his life; while others aver that he stayed in Spain, pursued an ecclesiastical career and achieved the dignity of a bishopric. Vincenzo Galilei (father of the astronomer) mentions him in Fronimo (Venice, 1584), praises his work and reproduces one of his profane compositions; others are printed in tablature in the lute-books of FUENLLANA and DAZA (q.v.). The original voice-parts of ten of these works, with Spanish words, are to be found in MS. 13, 230 of the Medinaceli Library at Madrid; two of them are settings of poems by Garcilasso de la Vega. The Cathedral Library at Toledo (MS. 3) possesses a motet on the parable of the Foolish Virgins. J. B. T.

GUGLIELMI, (1) PIETRO (b. Massa-Carrara, May 1727¹; d. Rome, Nov. 19, 1804). His father was an accomplished musician and maestro di cappella to the Duke of Modena. At the age of 18 he was sent to supplement his home training at the Neapolitan Conservatorio di San Loreto, where he had the advantage of the tutorship of Durante and where he composed an opera, 'Chichibio,' in 1739, his twelfth year, if the date given by Baini is to be trusted. As soon as he left the Conservatorio he started on a tour through the principal cities of Italy, beginning with Turin, where he brought out his earliest opera (1755). Everywhere his genius was cordially acknowledged, and his best works met with general applause. He is known, however, to have made a great number of failures, which were probably the result of that careless workmanship to which artists of his self-indulgent and pleasure-loving habits are prone. From Italy he went in 1762 to Dresden, Brunswick, and finally in 1768 to London, whither his wife appears to have accompanied him, and where his success seems to have been checked by the intrigues of a musical cabal. In 1777 he returned to Naples to find that Cimarosa and Paisiello, each in the height of his fame, had eclipsed between them a reputation which his own fifteen years of absence had allowed to wane. It is to his credit that the necessity of struggling against these two younger rivals spurred Guglielmi to unwonted effort, and that the decade during which he divided with them the favour of the Neapolitan public was the culminating epoch of his mental activity. Weary of the stage, Guglielmi finally in 1793 accepted the post of maestro at the Vatican, and died in harness at Rome.

His operas were numerous and their style was varied, and he composed masses, motets, hymns and psalms for the Church, and several oratorios, besides a great deal of important chamber music for the harpsichord, violin and violoncello. Four oratorios are mentioned in Q.-L. as still extant, many motets, etc., and the number of Guglielmi's operas is given, in an article by F. Piovano in the R.M.I. vol. xii. p. 407, as 120. Some are of uncertain authorship, but a careful list is given. Of these by far the greater number would be uninteresting nowadays, but his 'I due gemelli' (1789), 'La serva inammorata' (1790), 'La pastorella nobile' (1785), 'Enca e Lavinia' (1785), 'I viaggiatori' (1772) and 'La bella pescatrice' (1789) will always hold a considerable place in the history of music. A bravura air of Guglielmi's, 'Gratias agimus,' for high soprano, with clarinet obbligato, was long a favourite in English concert programmes. E. H. P.

(2) PIETRO CARLO (sometimes only CARLO; also called GUGLIELMINI) (b. Naples, c. 1763; d. Massa-Carrara, Feb. 28, 1827²), son of Pietro, studied at the conservatorio at Loreto. He went to London in 1810, and on his return he became maestro di cappella of the Grand Duchess of Massa-Carrara. He composed, between 1783-1816, a large number of operas,³ mostly in the style of his father. E. v. d. s.

GUIDETTI, GIOVANNI (b. Bologna, 1532; d. Rome, Nov. 30, 1592), priest; according to Baini came to Rome, and was a pupil of Palestrina. Palestrina, being commissioned by Gregory XIII. to revise the services of the Roman Church, associated his pupil with him in the task, as having an intimate knowledge of the MSS. both in St. Peter's and in the other principal churches of Rome. Thus the real labour of the work, which he himself styles 'opus nullius ingenii, multarum tamen vigiliarum,' fell upon him. It was begun in 1576, and occupied him till 1581. The work was published in 1582—'Directorium chori . . . Opera Joannis Guidetti Bononiensis,' etc., and Guidetti had the right of sale for ten years. His preface makes the respective shares of the labour of himself and Palestrina clear. He had the drudgery, while Palestrina had the final revision and completion of all portions requiring it. The 'Directorium' went through many subsequent editions down to 1737, and was succeeded by 'Cantus ecclesiasticus passionis,' etc. (1586); 'Cantus ecclesiasticus officii majoris,' etc. (1587); and 'Praefationes in cantu firmo,' etc. (1588), all published in Rome. GUIDO D' AREZZO (GUIDO ARETINUS; FRA GUITTONE, GUY OF AREZZO) (b. Arezzo, c. 990), a great teacher and innovator in musical theory and practice at the early part of the 11th century. His life falls into three periods. First, he became a Benedictine monk probably at Pomposa. But owing to troubles, the causes of which are obscure, he travelled northward into France, and possibly even into England, if he is to be identified with the Guido Cantuariensis of whom Engelberg of Admont speaks.¹ His chief centre of activity in France was the Abbey of St. Maur des Fossés, where under Cluniac influence a great musical activity had already begun to display itself. A German abbot, Poncius Teutonicus, had been abbot there in the closing years of the 10th century (997–1001). He was a musician and has the credit of being the source from which Guido took the idea, which he subsequently popularised, of identifying the six notes of the Natural Hexachord by the syllables Ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, in the famous hymn of St. John Baptist's day. (See SOLMISATION.)

A successor of his (1006–30) was Odo, originally a monk of Cluny, but different from the famous St. Odo, abbot of Cluny. He had been choirmaster at Cluny, but had come with Poncius to St. Maur, and had carried on the musical tradition when Poncius retired to Cluny. To such a musical centre Guido was naturally attracted, and for some time Odo and Guido worked hand in hand. They refer to one another in their several works as collaborators. Those of the abbot (see ODO) seem to belong to the period of Guido's stay at St. Maur. The travels of Guido appear to have taken him not only to Canterbury but also to Bremen.

The third period of his life opens with his return to Italy, not apparently to Pomposa, but to his native town Arezzo, where the bishop placed him in control of the choir school and charged him to write his most famous work, MICROLOGUS (q.v.), probably about the year 1025. The fame of his work twice brought him a summons to visit Rome, where he expounded his theories and teaching to the Papal Court; an urgent invitation also came from the Abbot of Pomposa, but this he declined for the time and returned to Arezzo. Fresh troubles arose there and he left, perhaps to be abbot of the monastery at Avellana; but ultimately he moved back to Pomposa, where he ended his brilliant but troublous career about the middle of the century.

The work of Guido was not primarily concerned with theory. He was a teacher and a choir-trainer; and his propaganda and his writings developed out of his practical work. Three special facilities and improvements owe their diffusion to him, though he probably was not the originator of them.

(1) By adopting the syllables Ut, re, etc., for the notes of the hexachord, and so creating solmisation, he greatly simplified the process of mutation. The old Greek names of the notes were extremely cumbersome: the alphabetical names belonged to the diatonic or full octave and had in themselves no musical significance, for the octave A-a was quite unlike the octave B-b: and so on. But, taking a hexachord, which had the following intervals T T S T T, the series in any position was represented by Ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la: and with the use of the B_♭ even the hexachord on F fell into line. Thus any notes of the whole gamut (including those at the extreme top which Guido maintained) could be accurately discerned by a proper use of mutation from one hexachord to another; and the description of the proper mutation was easily made in terms of a movable Ut, just as in modern tonic solfa it is made by the movable Do. (See MUTATION; SOLMISATION.)

(2) The 'Guidonian Hand' was essentially a teacher's device for securing a right understanding of the Hand given here with the table given at HEXACHORD, p. 625.

(3) Guido's reputation, however, rests principally on the claim that he invented the stave. In this respect too he was probably a populariser, rather than an inventor. The neumatic notation proper suffered from the fact that the neums represented the phrasing group and general curve of the chant, but did not represent the exact intervals. In the south of France this difficulty was being met by breaking up the compound neums into their component points and disposing these above the words, spacing them more or less accurately, so that the distances between them represented the musical intervals. In time this spacing was made more accurate by drawing dry lines across the part which the music occupied, like the dry lines which the scribes drew to mark off the margin of the page or to keep the lines of script parallel. Guido would not have found this method in use at St. Maur, but he may have seen it there or elsewhere. At any rate he applied the idea of spacing not to the broken up points of the Aquitanian notation, but to the neums themselves. Thus the neum-form was preserved, but the intervals required were accurately designated. This work of Guido was most likely subsequent to his return to Italy. For his method was to draw a yellow line for C, a red line for F, and a green line if B_♭ was needed; and this use of coloured lines is specially characteristic of Italian MSS.

It then only remained to draw in black the remaining lines needed and the principle of the stave was established. Thenceforward such lines would be drawn as the pitch of the music required, and as many or few of them as its compass needed. It is sometimes said that Guido invented the clefs. But with his system or coloured lines clefs were hardly necessary. So it is more likely that the lines were first marked F, C, G and the like by scribes who used no ink at all or black ink for their lines.

These three are the chief points of Guido's teaching. His earlier writings were short and seem to have been written by way of preface to his editions of the Chant. Later he wrote in his Micrologus a fuller account of his methods, and in his tracts De ignoto cantu he commented upon Vulgar Errors. But these points do not exhaust the interest of his works: for he has important things to say about methods of composition, rhythm and the like. A great school of followers carried on his work and commented on his writings.

His works are to be found in the Scriptores of Gerbert and of Coussemaker; the Micrologus was edited afresh by Amelli (Milan, 1880). The fullest recent information is in Gastoué's life, Dictionnaire d'archéologie sub voc. (Paris, 1924).

GUIGNON, JEAN-PIERRE (or GIOVANNI PIETRI GHIGNONE) (b. Turin, Feb. 10, 1702; d. Versailles, Jan. 30, 1774¹), the last man who bore the title of 'Roi des violons.' He was still very young when he went to Paris and began to study the violoncello, which, however, he soon exchanged for the violin. He is said to have excelled by a fine tone and great facility of bowing, and to have been a formidable rival of Lécclair. In 1733 he entered the King's service, was appointed musical instructor of the Dauphin, and in 1741 obtained the revival in his favour of the antique title of 'Roi des violons et ménétriers.' He further endeavoured to revive certain obsolete regulations by which all professional musicians in France were compelled to become members of the guild of minstrels (confrérie des ménétriers) on payment of a fee to him. This, however, raised universal opposition; and the case was brought before the Parlement, and decided against him. The official account of the case appeared in 1751. In 1773 Guignon dropped his unprofitable title and retired from public life. He published several books of concertos, sonatas and duos. (See ROI DES VIOLONS.) P. D.

GUILAIN, a Paris organist, contemporary of Louis Marchand, had a brilliant reputation as a player at the beginning of the 18th century. His 'Suite du premier ton' appeared in 1706, and was dedicated to Marchand, which leads one to suppose that Guilain may have been the pupil or substitute of the celebrated organist of the Cordeliers. The work is full of vivid interest; it was re-edited by Guilman and Pirro in the 'Archives des maîtres de l'orgue.'

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC, THE, was projected by some members of an orchestral and choral society which gave occasional concerts in the Guildhall, London, in 1879, and who were also members of the Court of Common Council. On their recommendation in Sept. 1880, the Corporation established the Guildhall School of Music in rooms in a warehouse in Aldermanbury, with Weist-Hill as principal, and C. P. Smith as secretary. There were at the beginning 62 students, their number reaching 216 by the end of the year. There were 29 professors. In July 1885, the success of the undertaking having been abundantly proved in the great increase of pupils, the first stone of a new building was laid in Tallis Street, close to the Thames Embankment. This building was opened in 1887, and in July 1898 a large extension of the building was made available for the students. In 1892, Weist-Hill was succeeded as principal by Sir Joseph Barnby, who held the post until his death in 1896, when he was succeeded by Dr. W. H. Cummings, F.S.A., who resigned the principalship in 1910, when Landon Ronald was appointed. In 1901, H. Saxe Wyndham was appointed secretary. Many famous musicians have been on the staff of professors, including Stainer, Benedict, Cusins, Sainton, Sims Reeves, J. T. Carrodus, Prout.

Cowen, Ernst Pauer and Mme. Viard-Louis. One of the main objects of the school is the diffusion of musical knowledge throughout the people at large, not merely the special training of public performers. A theatre is attached to the school, where operas are performed from time to time. These have been under the direction of various musicians, such as Ernest Ford, Georges Jacobi, Sir F. Cowen and Julius Harrison.

GUILD OF SINGERS AND PLAYERS.

This society was formed in London in 1921 by a number of professional musicians, who by giving concerts collectively thereby reduced the individual cost and risk of financial loss. A small proportion of the profits of concert-giving goes to the funds of the Guild, which is otherwise supported by an annual subscription from members (professional musicians) and associates (non-performing members). Any loss is of course borne by the artists concerned. The first concert took place at the Steinway Hall on May 4, 1921. Lily Henkel is the honorary secretary of the Guild.

GUILLAUME TELL, opera in 4 acts, libretto by Bis and Jouy ; music by Rossini. Produced Paris Opéra, Aug. 3, 1829; in London, in English, as 'Hofer the Tell of the Tyrol,' 'arranged' by Bishop, words by Planché, Drury Lane, May 1, 1830, and as 'Guillaume Tell' at the same house, Dec. 3, 1838; in Italian, as 'Guglielmo Tell,' Her Majesty's, July 11, 1839; in New York in 1857. It is usually much curtailed, but in 1856 was performed entire in Paris, and lasted from 7 till 1.

GUILLEMAIN, GABRIEL (b. Paris, Nov. 15, 1705; d. Oct. 1, 1770), an excellent violinist, in 1738 a member of the Chapel Royal. He wrote several books of violin sonatas, trio and duet sonatas, string quartets, harpsichord pieces, etc.; one violin sonata is in D. Alard's 'Maîtres classiques.' (See Riemann; Q.-L.) He died by his own hand on a journey from Paris to Versailles.

GUILMANT, FÉLIX ALEXANDRE (b. Boulogne, Mar. 12, 1837; d. Meudon, Mar. 29, 1911), organist, son of an organist of Boulogne.

He took to the instrument at an early age, and before he was 16 was made organist of St. Joseph, in 1857 maître de chapelle of St. Nicolas, and shortly after professor of solfeggio in the local École communale. In 1860 he became for some months a pupil of Lemmens, who heard him play and was struck by his ability. In 1871 he removed from Boulogne to Paris, and was appointed organist of the church of the Trinité, a post which he held until 1901. He was one of the finest organ-players of his time, and his reputation extended far beyond his native country, owing to brilliantly successful tours in England, America and various parts of the Continent. With Charles BORDES and Vincent d'INDY he founded the Schola Cantorum in Paris, where he was organ professor. He held a similar post at the Paris Conservatoire, where among other pupils who have since become famous were Dupré, Bonnet, Jacob and Cellier.

His compositions for the organ were numerous—two symphonies for organ and orchestra, eight sonatas and twenty-five sets of pieces, besides much music for liturgical use. His organ works gained a wide vogue, chiefly owing to their immediately attractive quality, and above all to his own performance of them as a recitalist. Of late years, however, the bulk of his output has failed to hold its own against the more original and distinguished work of the French school of organ composition founded by Franck and Saint-Saëns. Guilmant did much valuable work as an editor. In his École classique de l'orgue, and Archives des maîtres de l'orgue (the latter in collaboration with André Pirro), he rescued and adapted to the modern instrument a great mass of long-forgotten organ music, especially that of early French composers.

GUIRAUD, ERNEST (b. New Orleans, June 23, 1837; d. Paris, May 6, 1892), composer, son of a French musician, was brought up amongst music, and saw his first opera, 'Roi David,' on the stage when only 15.

He then came to Europe and entered the Paris Conservatoire, where he obtained various distinctions, ending with the Grand Prix de Rome in 1859 for his 'Bajazet et le joueur de flûte.' His first appearance before the European public was made with a one-act opera, 'Sylvie,' which he wrote while in Rome, and which was brought out at the Opéra-Comique, May 11, 1864. This was followed after a long interval by 'En prison,' also in one act (Théâtre Lyrique, Mar. 5, 1869) and 'Le Kobold' (July 2, 1870). Guiraud served during the war, and was in two engagements. Subsequent operas were 'Madame Turlupin' (1872), 'Piccolino' (1876), 'Gretina Green,' a ballet (1873). He also composed two suites for orchestra, the second of which was performed at the Concerts Populaires, Jan. 28, 1872. In Nov. 1874 Guiraud was chosen professor of harmony and accompaniment at the Conservatoire, in the room of Baptiste, deceased. In July 1878 he was decorated with the Legion of Honour, and 1880-92 was professor of advanced composition at the Conservatoire, replacing Victor Massé elected honorary professor. In 1879 his 'Piccolino' was given by Carl Rosa at Her Majesty's Theatre in London. A new opera in three acts, entitled 'Galante Adventure,' failed at the Opéra-Comique (Mar. 23, 1882); but he always retained an honourable position in concerts, where he produced selections from an unpublished opera, 'Le Feu' (Concerts du Châtelet, Mar. 9, 1879, and Nov. 7, 1880), an overture, 'Arteveld' (do., Jan. 15, 1882), a caprice for violin and orchestra, played by Sarasate (do., Apr. 6, 1884), an orchestral suite in four movements (do., Dec. 27, 1885), and lastly a 'Chasse fantastique,' suggested by a passage in Victor Hugo's 'Beau Pécopin' (Concerts Lamoureux, Feb. 6, 1887). All are cleverly written for a composer who, while lacking inventive genius, yet as a professor showed an eclecticism and moderation worthy of all commendation. A five-act opera, 'Frédégonde,' finished by Saint-Saëns, was produced with moderate success at the Opéra, Dec. 18, 1895, and a treatise on instrumentation was left by the composer. A. J.

GUITAR (Fr. guitare, obsolete guiterne; Ger. Guitarre, obsolete Gittern, Githtern, and Gythorn; Ital. chitarra; Span. guitarra).

The Spanish guitar is the most generally known modern representative of the numerous family which includes also the lutes and cithers. The identity of the name with the Greek κithára is not to be mistaken, but the resemblance of the Spanish and ancient Greek instruments is too remote to imply derivation. Both name and instrument reached Europe through the Moors in Spain. The guitar is at once known by its flat back, the sides curving inwards after the pattern of violins and other bow instruments, and suggesting its descent from some instrument with which a bow was used. The shape has, however, varied according to fashion or the fancy of the maker. The woods commonly used for the sides and back are maple, ash, service or cherry-tree, not unfrequently adorned with inlays of rosewood or fancy woods. Old instruments of the 17th century are often highly ornamented with ivory, ebony, tortoiseshell and mother-of-pearl. The sound-board or face is of deal and has a sound-hole, which shares in the general decoration. (See PLATE XLV.) Hard woods, such as ebony, beech or pear-tree, are employed for the neck and finger-board. The bridge should be of ebony, and has an ivory or metal 'nut' above the fastenings of the strings, similar to the nut of the finger-board, the open strings vibrating between. Modern guitars have six strings, three of gut and three of silk spun over with silver wire, tuned as (a)

The lowest is said to have been a German addition dating about 1790. The written notation is an octave higher, as (b). Metal screws are now used for tuning, instead of the ebony pegs of the true Spanish instrument. The semitones are marked off by metal frets upon the finger-board, and transposition to the more remote keys is effected by a capo tasto or cejuela. (See FRETTS; CAPO TASTO.) Old instruments had often ten, twelve or more strings, arranged in sets of two, tuned in unison. The Spanish guitar is always played with the fingers. The deepest strings are made to sound by the thumb, the three highest by the first, second and third fingers, the little finger resting upon the sound-board. Two kinds of technique are distinguished: punteado, melodic and contrapuntal playing, and rasgado, thrumming chords. The influence of the Spanish guitar is noticeable in several of the works of Domenico SCARLATTI, both in harmonic and rhythmic effects, and his use of a single or double 'internal pedal.'

The guitar and its kindred were derived from the East. In the famous Gate of Glory of Master Mateo, to the church of Santiago de Compostela in Spain, a cast of which is in the Victoria and Albert Museum, among several musical instruments may be seen one guitar-shaped, which may be assumed to represent the original VIHUELA (q.v.), the old Spanish viol or guitar. The sides are curved, but there is no bow held by the player; still this is no proof that a bow was not used, since the sculptor may have omitted it. The date of this masterpiece is 1188. A hundred years later than this date there were several kinds of vihuela, to some of which the bow was certainly not used. (See PLATES XXVIII. and XLVI.)

In the 14th century two kinds of guitar were in use in Spain—guitarra latina and guitarra morisca. They are mentioned several times in the poems of the Archpriest of Hita (1283 ?–1350), and were known in France in 1349. The guitarra Saracénica is mentioned as early as 1300. FÜENLLANA (q.v.) included compositions for a four-stringed guitar in his book of tablature, published at Seville in 1554. The guitar was called 'Spanish' when it regularly began to be made with five strings. The 'inventor' of this instrument was for long believed to be Vicente Espinel, author of the picaresque Spanish novel, The Life of Marcus Obregon, Esquire, which Le Sage afterwards rewrote as The Adventures of Gil Blas. The chief authority for attributing this invention to him is the dramatist Lope de Vega; and his statement is borne out by DOIST DE VELASCO (1640) and Gaspar SANZ (1684) in their treatises on the Spanish guitar. Against Espinel is the fact that, eleven years before his birth, BERMUDO, writing in 1544, speaks of a guitar with five strings. Espinel, however, if not the inventor of the Spanish guitar, may have been the man who made it a popular instrument with the upper as well as with the lower classes in Spain. By the end of the 16th century, as contrapuntal music went out the Spanish guitar came in. Not that it was, or is, incapable of contrapuntal effects; Fuenllana's guitar-accompaniment to the old ballad 'Ay, mi Alhama' is a beautiful piece of contrapuntal workmanship; and a good modern guitar-player, by slightly altering the tuning of his instrument (as described under VIHUELA), can play the most complicated fantasias of the Spanish vihuelistas (lutenists). The earliest treatise on the Spanish guitar is that of Juan Carlos AMAT (q.v.), published at Barcelona (1586 and later editions). The instrument soon became known in Italy. The 'Intavolatura di chitarra alla spagnuola' of G. A. Colonna appeared in 1620 (Brit. Mus., reprinted by Chilesotti). In France the method of Luis de BRIZEÑO (q.v.) was published in 1626 (Paris: Pierre Ballard). Numerous other works appeared in Spain, France and Italy during the 17th century.¹

At the close of the 18th century and beginning of the 19th the Spanish guitar became a fashionable instrument on the Continent. Ferdinand Sor, a Spaniard, after the Peninsular War, brought it into great notice in England, and composing for it with success banished the English guitar or citra (Fr. cistre; Ger. Zither; Ital. cetera). This was an instrument of different shape, a wire-strung CITHAR, with six open notes, two being single spun strings, and four of iron wire in pairs tuned in unison. The scale of the English guitar thus strung was written in real pitch an octave lower.

The technique of the instrument was of the simplest, the thumb and first finger only being employed, if not a plectrum; while the technical difficulties of the Spanish guitar, in the hands of a serious performer, rival those of the lute.

Sor's most distinguished rival was an Italian, Mauro Giuliani, who composed a concerto with band accompaniment for the 'terz chitarra' or third-guitar, an instrument with a shorter neck, tuned a minor third higher. This concerto, published by Diabelli, Vienna, was transcribed by Hummel for the pianoforte. He also composed for guitar and flute. Other popular composers were Legnani, Kreutzer, Nüske, Regondi, and that wayward genius Leonard Schulz. Berlioz and Paganini were both guitarists; indeed the influence of the guitar on Berlioz can be seen in his spacing of chords.² Paganini's quartets for guitar and strings show that he realised the possibilities of colour obtained from combining the guitar with the viola.

The guitar still survives in Spain, where it is not only the possession of blind beggars, but a thoroughly serious instrument, with an advanced technique and great possibilities for modern music. To those who have heard the performance of a fine player like Miguel Llobet (or Andrés Segovia), it will always remain a mystery why lute-music of the 16th century is not now habitually played on the modern guitar. The instrument, also, has had great influence on the harmonic and rhythmical feeling of the best Spanish composers, and FALLA (q.v.) has written for it one of his most serious and deeply felt works, his elegy 'Pour le tombeau de Claude Debussy.'

There is also an octave guitar, the little Portuguese MACHETE, with four strings, tuned or by guitar-players often .

In Madeira, after work in the vineyards is done for the day, the country people return playing the Machete, perhaps twenty together, with occasionally a larger five-stringed one accompanying. A. J. H.; rev. with addns. J. B. T.

THE GUITAR IN ENGLAND

After the cithern had gone out of favour (it had never possessed much), long before the close of the 17th century, no instrument of the guitar type appears to have been in common use in England until the middle of the 18th century, for the various kinds of lutes supplied all needs for song accompaniments.

About 1756-58 there was introduced from the Continent the Italian form of cetera referred to as the English guitar. (See PLATE XXXI. 2). Robert Bremner, the Edinburgh and London music publisher, issued in 1758, before he left the former place (and afterwards reprinted in London) the earliest treatise known to the writer on playing the English form of the instrument. Bremner in this speaks of the guitar as 'but lately introduced into Britain.' Other early instruction books are those published by Johnson of Bow Church Yard, c. 1759-60; Thompson & Son, c. 1760; James Longman & Co., c. 1767, and others of later dates.

In spite of its feeble quality the English wire-strung guitar had considerable popularity, being the feminine substitute for the German flute, then in such favour with the male amateur. The Spanish variety, introduced 1813-15, gradually displaced it, but this was not at its highest point of favour until the thirties. The wire-strung English guitars are found by several London makers, Longman & Broderip's and Preston's occurring most frequently. Those by Preston (among his later makes) have an ingenious ratchet arrangement for tuning, worked by a removable key.

As mentioned under GITTERN, instruments of the guitar type had, in the 16th and 17th centuries, no very definite nomenclature, hence much confusion in exactly identifying them from contemporary literary references. The gittern and the guitar appear to have frequently exchanged names. In one of the early dictionaries, The English Expositor improv'd, 10th ed., 1707, we find: 'Ghiitar, an instrument like a citteron, but the strings are guts.' The gut-stringed gittern and the guitar would of course be practically identical. F. K.

GULBRANSON, ELLEN (b. Stockholm, Mar. 4, 1863), operatic soprano. This artist may be said to have belonged to the second generation of Bayreuth singers. It was exactly twenty years after the opening of the Bühnenfestspielhaus when she appeared there first in 1896, robust in voice and figure, a conscientious but not inspired singer, to continue the direct line of the great Brünnhildes. She helped to fill a growing gap, and, comparisons apart, did extremely well both in 'The Ring' and in 'Parsifal.' Her admirable declamation she acquired in the first instance from her French training, having studied two years in Paris with Mme. Marchesi. Then, after a concert début in her native city (1886), she took to the lyric stage and sang Araneris in 'Aida' at the new opera-house with a success that definitely decided her career. Later on she appeared at Paris, Moscow and Amsterdam; and in 1907-08 was the Brünnhilde at Covent Garden under Richter in two memorable revivals of the 'Ring.' H. K.

GULLÌ, LUIGI (b. Scilla, Calabria, June 17, 1859), pianist, is noteworthy for his formation of a chamber-music society in Rome. At the age of 11 he was sent to the Real Collegio di Musica in Naples, where he studied for nine years under Beniamino Cesi. On leaving Naples he established himself in Rome as a teacher of the pianoforte. His principal success as a performer has been won in connexion with the quintet of musicians whose ensemble performances became one of the chief features of the Roman season in 1896 and subsequent years. To this Società del Quintetto Gullì the founder devoted assiduous attention with such happy results that its renderings of classical and modern chamber music have been received with remarkable favour in Berlin, Paris, Copenhagen, Christiania and other continental cities. H. A. W.

GUMPELTZHAIMER, ADAM (b. Trostberg, Upper Bavaria, c. 1560; d. Nov. 1625), was instructed in music by Father Jodocus Enzmüller of the convent of S. Ulrich, Augsburg; in 1575 he went into the service of the Duke of Würtemberg as musician, and gained considerable reputation as composer of songs both sacred and secular. In 1581 he was appointed cantor at St. Anna, Augsburg, retaining the post till 1621. His sacred songs or hymns, generally for several voices, sometimes as many as eight, are considered almost equal to those of Lassus. He also wrote Compendium musicae latinum-germanicum, Augsburg, 1591, of which, up to 1675, twelve editions were published. His Neue teutsche geistliche Lieder, for three voices, was printed at Augsburg, 1591, and a series of similar things for four voices in 1594. A Contrapunctus for four and five voices appeared in 1595, Sacrorum concentuum lib. 1 in 1601, lib. 2 in 1614, Ps. li. a 8 in 1619, and hymn-books at various dates. (See Q.-L.)

GUNG'LI, (1) JOSEPH (b. Zsàmbék, Hungary, Dec. 1, 1810; d. Weimar, Jan. 31, 1889), popular composer of dance music, son of a stocking-weaver, began life as a schoolmaster. He received his first instruction in music from Semann in Buda, and having enlisted in the Austrian army, was first oboist and then bandmaster to the fourth regiment of artillery. His Hungarian March, op. 1, was the first of a long series of marches and dance music. Up to 1843 Gung'li made concert-tours with his regimental band to Munich, Augsburg, Nuremberg, Würzburg and Frankfort, performing chiefly his own pieces, but in that year he established a band of his own at Berlin. On his return from America, in 1849, he was appointed Musikdirektor to the King of Prussia, and in 1858 Kapellmeister to the Emperor of Austria. In the meantime he and his band had visited nearly every capital on the Continent. Gung'li lived at Munich from 1864 until 1876, when he went to live at Frankfort. His works are very numerous. It is stated that down to the end of 1873 he had composed 300 dances and marches, for the most part distinguished by charming melody and marked rhythm.

His daughter (2) VIRGINIA, an opera-singer of merit, made her first appearance at Berlin in 1871.

His nephew (3) JOHANN (b. Zsàmbék, Mar. 5, 1828; d. Fünfkirchen, Hungary, Nov. 27, 1883), also well known as a composer of dance music, like his uncle, made professional tours to every capital in Europe. He retired in 1862, and lived at Fünfkirchen. F. G.

GUNN, (1) BARNABAS (b. circa 1680; d. circa 1743), noted for his extempore playing, was organist of St. Philip's, Birmingham, which he quitted in 1730 to succeed Hine as organist of Gloucester Cathedral. A Te Deum and Jubilate in D of his composition are extant in MS. He published 'Sonatas for the Harpsichord,' and in 1736, at Gloucester, a thin 4to volume containing 'Two Cantatas and Six Songs,' the music printed on one side of the leaf only, and prefaced by a poetical address 'To all Lovers of Musick,' and a remarkable list of 464 subscribers (including Handel and most of the principal musicians of the day), subscribing for 617 copies. Two sets of solos, one for the violoncello, the other for violin or violoncello, were published in London and at Birmingham respectively. He was succeeded by Martin Smith in 1740. He was the subject of a bitter pamphlet-attack by William Hayes (afterwards the Oxford professor), who, himself a native of Gloucester, and an articulated pupil of Hine, was no doubt galled that Gunn succeeded to the organ at the Cathedral. The pamphlet satirically accused Gunn of merely spurring ink-dots over music-paper and adding tails! Gunn good-naturedly replied with a folio music book, published by Johnson of Cheapside, 'for the author,' with the title Twelve English Songs serious and humorous by the newly invented method of composition with the Spruzzarino (Taphouse Library).

(2) BARNABY, probably a relation of the above, was organist of Chelsea Hospital from Apr. 16, 1730, until early in 1753.

GUNN, (1) JOHN (b. Edinburgh c. 1765; d. circa 1824), taught the violoncello at Cambridge; in 1790 established himself in London as professor of the violoncello and flute, and whilst there published 'Forty Scotch Airs arranged as trios for flute, violin and violoncello'; The Theory and Practice of Fingering the Violoncello, 1793, with a dissertation on stringed instruments; and The Art of Playing the German Flute on new Principles. In 1795 he returned to Edinburgh. In 1801 he published an Essay Theoretical and Practical, on the Application of Harmony, Thorough-bass, and Modulation to the Violoncello. In 1807 he brought out his most important work, viz. An Historical Inquiry respecting the Performance on the Harp in the Highlands of Scotland from the earliest Times until it was discontinued about the Year 1734, written at the request of the National Society of Scotland. His wife, (2) ANNE (before her marriage Anne Young), was an eminent pianist. She wrote a work entitled An Introduction to Music . . . illustrated by Musical Games and Apparatus and fully and familiarly explained (Edinburgh, about 1803). The games and apparatus were of her invention. A second edition appeared in 1820, and a third (posthumous) in 1827.

GUNTRAM, opera in 3 acts, by Richard Strauss; produced Weimar, May 10, 1894.

GURA, EUGEN (b. Pressern, near Saatz, Bohemia, Nov. 8, 1842; d. Aufkirchen, Bavaria, Aug. 26, 1906), famous Wagnerian singer, was the son of a small schoolmaster.

He received a good technical education at the Polytechnicum, Vienna, and afterwards studied art at the Vienna Academy, and at a School of Painting under Professor Anschütz (a pupil of Cornelius) at Munich. He was finally advised to adopt a musical career, and for that purpose studied singing at the Munich Conservatorium under Professor Joseph Herger, and finally, in Apr. 1865, made his début there at the Opera as Count Liebenau in the 'Waffenschmied' (Lortzing), with such success that he obtained a two years' engagement. In 1867-70 he was engaged at Breslau, and in 1870-76 at Leipzig, where he made his reputation, both in opera and concerts, as one of the best German baritone singers of the day. He played both Donner and Gunther in the first complete performance of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' in 1876 at Bayreuth. From 1876-83 he was engaged at Hamburg. In 1882, as a member of that company, he sang in German at Drury Lane in all the operas then performed, viz. the Minister ('Fidelio'); Lysiart on revival of 'Euryanthe,' June 13; 'Der fliegende Holländer,' in which he made his début, May 20; Wolfram; as Hans Sachs and King Marke on the respective productions of 'Meistersinger' and 'Tristan und Isolde,' May 30 and June 20. He made a great impression at the time, and his Hans Sachs will not readily be forgotten by those who saw it. From 1883 until his retirement from the stage in 1895 he was engaged at Munich, where on June 15, 1890, he celebrated the 25th anniversary of his first appearance on the stage, and played the title part in Cornelius's 'Barber of Bagdad.' He published his Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben in 1905.

GURIDI, JESÚS (b. Vitoria, Sept. 25, 1886), Spanish Basque composer. He studied at the Schola Cantorum, Paris, and afterwards worked with Jongen in Brussels and Neitzel in Cologne. Guridi makes a point of employing native Basque themes, and has done so with perhaps more success than any of his predecessors. His settings of Basque popular songs (4 to 8 v.) show that they are the work of a composer who knows how to write for voices; his dramatic works include 'Mirentxu' and 'Amaya,' the latter produced at Bilbao in 1920. He has also written for orchestra and organ.

J. B. T.

GURLITT, CORNELIUS (b. Altona, Feb. 10, 1820; d. there, June 17, 1901), was a pupil of the elder Reinecke, became organist of the principal church at Altona in 1864, and was made Kgl. Musikdirektor in 1874. His compositions include two operettas and a four-act opera, 'Scheik Hassan'; but his name is more generally known in England as the composer of endless pianoforte pieces, mostly of an educational kind, written with great facility, but possessing little individuality.

M.

GURLITT, WILLIBALD (b. Dresden, Mar. 1, 1889), was a student under Riemann in Leipzig, and contributed to the 8th edition of the latter's Lexikon. His career in musical research was interrupted by the war (1914-18). He was wounded on the Marne and a prisoner in French hands until 1919. In the autumn of that year he was appointed lecturer in musical history and research (Musikwissenschaft) to the University of Freiburg, where he has prepared an edition of works by Dufay and Binchois.

GURNEY, IVOR (b. Gloucester, Aug. 28, 1890), was educated as a chorister of Gloucester Cathedral and won a scholarship at the R.C.M., where he studied under Stanford, Vaughan Williams and others. Though latterly much impeded by ill-health, Gurney has achieved a distinct position as a song-writer. His early songs showed at once the song-writer's instinct for the vocal line and his sensitiveness to the influence of the text. His cycle 'Ludlow and Teme' (tenor voice and string quartet) represents his work at its best, and received an award from the Carnegie Trust in 1924. A second cycle, 'The Western Playland' (baritone, strings and P.F.), appeared under the same auspices (1926). The words of both are by A. R. Housman. For other works by Gurney see B. M. S. Ann., 1920. C.

GUSIKOW, MICHAEL JOSEPH (b. Sklow, Poland, Sept. 2, 1806; d. Aix-la-Chapelle, Oct. 21, 1837), an artist of rare musical faculty—'a true genius,' says Mendelssohn—born of poor Jewish parents and of a family which had produced musicians for more than a century. He first played the flute and tympanon, a kind of dulcimer. At the age of 17 he married, and a few years after discovered that weakness of the chest would not allow him to continue playing the flute. He thereupon took up the 'Stroh-fiedel,' an instrument of the dulcimer kind, composed of strips of fir on a framework of straws, which he improved and increased in compass. (See XYLOPHONE.) Upon this he attained extraordinary facility and power. In 1832 he and four of his relatives began a long tour, through Odessa—where he was heard by Lamartine; Kiev—where he was much encouraged by Lipinski; Moscow; and thence to south and north Germany, Paris and Brussels. He travelled in the dress and guise of a Polish Jew—long board, thin, pale, sad, expressive features—and excited the greatest applause by his astonishing execution and the expression which he threw into his unlikely instrument. Mendelssohn heard him at Leipzig, and called him

'a real phenomenon, a killing fellow (Mordkerl); who is inferior to no player on earth in style and execution, and delights me more on his odd instrument than many do on their pianos, just because it is so thankless. . . . I have not enjoyed a concert so much for a long time.'

(See the rest—Letter, Feb. 18, 1836.) But it wore him out; he was laid up at Brussels for long, and died at Aix-la-Chapelle. (See Fétis, who saw much of him.) G.

GUSSAGO, CESARIO (b. Ostia, province of Rome, c. 1604–12), organist at S. Maria della Grazia, Brescia, composed a book of 8-part sacred songs, a book of psalms and vespers

(8 v.), a book of 'Sacrae laudes' (3 v.), a book of 'Sonate a quattro, sei, et otto, con alcuni concerti a 8,' etc.—of interest as early instrumental compositions; also some songs, etc., in collective volumes (Q.-L.). He has been confused by several biographers with another composer of that name (b. Brescia, c. 1530), who composed a book of motets, published Venice, 1560. E. v. d. s.

GUSTAVE III, OU LE BAL MASQUÉ, opera in 5 acts; words by Scribe, music by Auber. Produced Académie, Feb. 27, 1833; in an English adaptation by Planché, Covent Garden, Nov. 13, 1833; on Apr. 15, 1850, Princess's Theatre; in Italian, Her Majesty's, Mar. 29, 1851. The subject is identical with that of Verdi's BALLO IN MASCHERA. G.

GUTMANN, ADOLPH (b. Heidelberg, Jan. 12, 1819; d. Spezia, Oct. 27, 1882), was a successful pianist and a prolific composer of pianoforte music of a rather ephemeral kind. The most valuable of his compositions is a set of ten Études caractéristiques. His chief claim to be remembered rests on his having been the pupil and intimate friend of Chopin. M.

GUYOT, JEAN (called CASTILETTI) (b. Châtelet, near Liège, c. 1512; d. there), was at Louvain c. 1534, and in the same year (?) pupil of the college at Lys; in 1537 Lic. Art., and later M.A. He then went to Liège, and became Kapellmeister to Charles the Bold. From Nov. 1563 to Nov. 1564 he was third Kapellmeister at the Imperial court at Vienna. He returned to Liège, where he died as canon of St. Lambert. His chansons and motets were published by Susato (Antwerp, 1546, 1549), Berg (Nuremberg, 1558) and Joacelli (Venice, 1568); a theoretical treatise, Minervalia artium, appeared at Maastricht in 1554. GUZLA, a kind of rebab, a bowed instrument with one string only, used in Illyria and Serbia. The name was adopted by Prosper Mérimée as the title of a volume of Serbian poems. In its primitive form, as in many savage instruments, the back is round, the belly is made of skin or parchment, and the string is of horse-hair. G.

GWENDOLINE, opera in 3 acts, words by Catulle Mendès, music by Chabrier. Produced Brussels, Apr. 10, 1886; and Opéra, Paris, Dec. 27, 1893.

GYE, FREDERICK (b. 1809; d. Dytechley, Dec. 4, 1878), the son of a tea-merchant in the city of London. He entered upon his career as an operatic manager and impresario in 1849, after the secession of Costa from Covent Garden, and remained in possession of the same theatre until 1877, when the management was handed over to his son Ernest Gye, the husband of Mme. ALBANI (q.v.). He died while staying at Dytechley, the seat of Viscount Dillon, from the effects of a gun accident, and was buried at Norwood on the 9th of the month. M.

GYMEL (GIMEL) (Lat. gemellum, literally 'twin-song'), two-part vocal harmony formed by a chain of thirds, the melody being in the higher voice, contrary to the usual mediæval practice except in FAUXBOURDON (q.v.). According to evidence which, though slender, is accepted by the majority of scholars to-day, Gymel was a traditional mode of part-singing in the British Isles from very early days, at least before the Norman Conquest, and its origin may quite well be Celtic. Written MSS. of so simple a system are, of course, not to be looked for.

According to the theoretical writers the two parts began and ended in unison. Guilielmus Monachus, writing at Venice 'de modis Anglicorum' somewhere about 1400, describes a more elaborate form of Gymel, in three parts, a 'contratenor bassus' accompanying the two upper gymel parts: the treble, it will be noticed, ornaments its melody.

Other examples may be seen in Cxf. Hist. Mus. vol. ii. pp. 119, 120, 123.

The term is also used in 15th- and 16th-century polyphony in the sense of the modern 'divisi': when the two voices are replaced by one, the direction is cancelled by the word semellum, single.

GYROWETZ, ADALBERT (b. Budweis, Bohemia, Feb. 19, 1763¹; d. Vienna, Mar. 22, 1850), prolific composer. His father was a choirmaster, and taught him music at an early age; and on leaving school he studied law at Prague, though still working hard at music and composing much. A long illness left him destitute, and compelled him to take the post of private secretary to Count Franz von Fünfkirchen. The Count insisted on all his household being musical, so Gyrowetz had abundant opportunity not only of composing, but of having his compositions performed. The reception they met with induced him to visit Italy and complete his education there. Passing through Vienna, about 1786² he made the acquaintance of Mozart, who had one of his symphonies performed, and himself led Gyrowetz before the applauding audience. In Naples he studied for two years under Sala, maintaining himself by his compositions, among which were a number of concerted pieces for the lyre, written for the king, with whom it was a favourite instrument. He next went to Paris, and established his claim to the authorship of several symphonies, hitherto performed as Haydn's. In consequence the publishers bought his other compositions at high prices. The Revolution was rapidly approaching, and Gyrowetz went to on London, arriving in Oct. 1789. His reception was an honourable one; both the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cumberland paid him marked attention; the Professional Concerts and Salomon placed his name in their programmes, and the latter engaged him as composer at the same time with Haydn. He wrote industriously and met with liberal publishers; but he was most pleased by the arrival of Haydn, whom he warmly welcomed. Gyrowetz was also engaged to write an opera, in which Mme. Mara and Pacchierotti were to have sung at the Pantheon, then recently turned into an opera-house during the rebuilding of the King's Theatre. After two or three rehearsals, however, the Pantheon was burnt down (Jan. 13, 1792) and the score of 'Semiramis' perished in the flames. On Feb. 9 he gave a benefit concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, which was brilliantly attended; but the climate disagreed with him, and he shortly after left London for Vienna. On his return, after seven years, he received an appointment in the War Department. In 1804 Baron Braun, Intendant of the two court theatres, offered him the Kapellmeister-ship, which he retained till 1831, producing a great number of operas, Singspiele, and operettas, besides music for melodramas and ballets. Gyrowetz was wonderfully industrious in all branches of composition, and his works, though now forgotten, were long popular. His symphonies and quartets were successful imitations of Haydn's, but still they were imitations, and were therefore bound to disappear. In 1843 his artist friends, pitying the poverty to which he was reduced—for his pension afforded him a bare subsistence—arranged a concert for his benefit, at which his 'Dorfschule' was played by Staudigl and the choristers. This really comic cantata was repeated with great success in the following year at the last concert he himself ever arranged. Shortly before his death he published his autobiography, an interesting book in many respects (Vienna, 1847).¹

Gyrowetz composed about thirty operas large and small (see the list in the Q.-L.), operettas, and Singspiele; and more than forty ballets. His first opera was 'Selico' (1804). The most successful were 'Agnes Sorel' (1806); 'Der Augenarzt' (1811); 'Robert, oder die Prüfung'

(1813), approved by Beethoven himself; 'Helene' (1816), and 'Felix und Adele' (1831). Of his operettas and Singspiele, generally in one act, 'Die Junggesellen Wirthschaft' (1807), 'Der Sammtrock' (1809), 'Aladin' (1819) and 'Das Ständchen' (1823) were long favourites; of the melodramas 'Mirina' (1806) was most liked. Besides 'Semiramis,' he wrote four grand Italian operas for Vienna and Milan, of which 'Federica e Adolfo' (Vienna, 1812) was especially well received. 'Die Hochzeit der Thetis' was his most successful ballet. He composed cantatas, choruses for women's and boys' voices, Italian and German canzonets, and several songs for one and more voices. He wrote his nineteenth Mass at the age of 84.

Of his instrumental music there are over sixty symphonies (see SYMPHONY), a quantity of serenades, overtures, marches, dance-music (for the Redoutensaal); three quintets; and about sixty string-quartets, most of them published in Vienna, Augsburg, Offenbach, Paris or London. For the pianoforte and violin he wrote about forty sonatas; thirteen books of trios, sixteen Nocturnes, for various combinations of instruments with piano, much dance-music, and many smaller pieces of different kinds. None of his works, either for the concert-room or the stage, have survived. 'Der Augenarzt' kept the boards longer than the others. C. F. P.

HAACK, (1) KARL (b. Potsdam, Feb. 18, 1751; d. there, Sept. 28, 1819), a pupil of Franz Benda who handed on his master's art to modern times through his pupils Maurer, Möser and Seiler. He entered the chapel of the Prince of Prussia, on whose accession as William II. in 1796 he was appointed Konzertmeister. In 1810 he gave his last concert in Berlin, and was pensioned in 1811. He composed concertos and sonatas for violin, etc.

(2) FRIEDRICH (b. Potsdam, c. 1760), brother of Karl, was a prodigy on the violin and became a member of the Prince of Prussia's private chapel. In 1779 he went as organist to Stargardt, Pomerania, and was appointed director of music at Stettin in 1793. His symphonies and choral works are spoken of by Rochlitz in terms of highest praise. HAAS, ALMA (née HOLLAENDER) (b. Ratibor, Silesia, Jan. 31, 1847), pianist, studied at the age of 10 in Wandelt's music school at Breslau. At 14 years old, Frl. Hollaender appeared, with orchestra, in Mendelssohn's G minor concerto; and soon afterwards was sent to Berlin to study with Kullak, who gave her gratuitous instruction, 1862-68. On Dec. 3 of the latter year she made her first appearance at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipzig, and shortly afterwards appeared with success in various German towns. In 1870 she came to London for the season, playing at one of Arditi's concerts in Hanover Square Rooms. In 1871 she again visited England, and on Jan. 1, 1872, was married to Dr. Ernst Haas, assistant in the Printed Book Department in the British Museum, and Professor of Sanskrit at University College, London. After his death in 1882, she took up her profession again, appearing at the Popular Concerts, at Franke's Chamber Concerts, and with the Heckmann Quartet; she played with the latter party in many British and foreign towns. In 1886, at the first of Henschel's London Symphony Concerts, she took part with Gompertz and Piatti in Beethoven's triple concerto. Besides many appearances in the provinces and London, with the Elderhorst and other organisations, Mme. Haas gave interesting recitals and chamber concerts in 1889 and 1890, and later was associated with Mrs. Hutchinson in recitals for voice and piano. She taught at Bedford College in 1876-86; in 1887 she had an appointment at the R.C.M., which she shortly afterwards resigned; and in 1886 she began a most useful work at the head of the musical department in King's College, London. Her playing, distinguished by high artistic qualities, won her the admiration of cultivated musicians. M.

HAAS, JOSEPH (b. Mähningen, Bavaria, Mar. 19, 1879), was a pupil of Reger in Munich and later went to the Conservatory in Leipzig. In 1911 he was nominated teacher of composition in Stuttgart and in 1921 he was called to the Akademie der Tonkunst in Vienna. His first compositions show a clear influence of his first master, Reger, but later he broke away from it and wrote in a post-romantic style with much musical humour. This industrious and prolific composer has written chiefly for the piano, though he has also composed many chamber works for many combinations. His works consist of:

HAAS, ROBERT MARIA (b. Prague, Aug. 15, 1886), studied in Prague, Berlin and Vienna (graduated D.Ph. in Prague 1908) and has devoted the greater part of his career to musical research and editorship. He became assistant to Guido Adler in Vienna, and secretary to the Commission for the publication of the D.T.Ö. For his editorship in this connexion see DENKMÄLER. In 1920 he became director of the musical department of the State Library in VIENNA (q.v.). C.

HABA, ALOIS, composer (b. Vyzovice, Moravia, June 21, 1893). As a boy he joined a band, consisting of accordion, flute, clarinet, violin, double-bass, which played in the Moravian villages. He thus acquired an early affection first for Moravian and then for Slovakian folk-song. It is said also that these experiences were the first incentive to his studies in the smaller divisions of the tone (♯ and ♭ tones), for already then he was endeavouring to reproduce on his violin the inflections with which the peasants embroidered their songs. In later years he collected phonographic records of folk-songs, giving special attention to this feature. Meanwhile he entered the Prague Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Novák. He afterwards became a pupil of Schreker, first in Vienna (Akademie) and then in Berlin (Hochschule). There he also took a course in acoustics at the university, which led to a more systematic investigation of the intervals which had aroused his interest, and of their harmonic and contrapuntal possibilities. Before, however, embarking upon the practical application of the results thus achieved he had written variations on a theme by Schumann, op. 1; two pieces, op. 2; a sonata in D minor, op. 3; six pieces, op. 6, for piano solo; a string quartet, op. 4; an overture for orchestra, op. 5; and a symphonic phantasy for piano and orchestra. From then onwards his compositions are in the tone system which has become closely associated with his name. Those in the $\frac{1}{2}$ -tone system comprise two pieces for violin alone ('Phantasie' and 'Musik'); three string quartets; symphonic music for chamber orchestra; a choral suite; five suites and five phantasies for a new $\frac{1}{2}$ -tone pianoforte; and seven compositions for $\frac{1}{2}$ -tone harmonium. Finally, he has composed a string quartet in the $\frac{1}{2}$ -tone system. Several of these works are published or in course of publication. He has also lectured and written copiously on the subject in its historical aspect and on its importance in the future development of musical technique. Apart from this special aspect Haba's idiom shows in moderate degree the influence of Schreker, but in later works there are interesting formal innovations attributed to Slovakian folk-song, which has a quasi-oriental abundance of melodic phrases. Thus, instead of thematic development, the first movement of the second $\frac{1}{2}$ -tone quartet shows five extended sentences without repetition or recapitulation. Haba has become especially adverse from employing such devices as the sequence as means for continuing the flow of musical thought, preferring constant amplification and the recourse to new material. His weakness is a certain reluctance, when composing, to detach himself from preconceived theories. In his latest stage he is applying himself to music-drama and to films, which he plans to accompany with an orchestra composed of a $\frac{1}{2}$ -tone piano, string quartet, two clarinets and two harps tuned a $\frac{1}{2}$ tone apart. HABANERA. A Spanish song and dance, of an older origin than its name implies, having been introduced into Cuba from Africa by the negroes, whence it was very naturally imported into Spain. It is sometimes called 'contradanza criolla' (Creole country-dance). The rhythm, which is distinctive, has been familiarised to the rest of the world by Bizet, who wrote one in the first act of 'Carmen,' but the following bars from elsewhere will serve as a good example:

An 'Habanera' usually consists of a short introduction and two parts of eight or sixteen bars, of which the second, should the first be in a minor key, will be in the major, and will answer the purpose of a refrain; but these rules are by no means strictly adhered to. There are many forms of the melody, a marked feature being that two triplets of semiquavers, or one such triplet and two semiquavers, are often written against the figure which occupies one whole bar in the bass of the above example. The performers opposite to each other, one of either sex, generally dance to the introduction, and accompany their singing of several 'coplas' (stanzas) with gestures, and the whole of the music is repeated for the final dance, which is slow and stately, and of a decidedly oriental character, the feet being scarcely lifted from the ground (though an occasional pirouette is sometimes introduced), while the most voluptuous movements of the arms, hips, head, and eyes are employed to lure and fascinate each other and—the spectator. The dance, if well done, can be extremely graceful; but even in its most classic form is bound to be indecent, vividly recalling the 'Danse du Ventre' of the Algerian Café. H. V. H.

HABENECK, FRANÇOIS ANTOINE (b. Mézières, Jan. 23, 1781; d. Paris, Feb. 8, 1849), violinist and conductor, eldest of three brothers (the others being named JOSEPH and CORENTIN), violinists, sons of a German musician in a French regimental band. He was a pupil of Baillot, obtained the first violin prize at the Conservatoire in 1804, and soon showed remarkable aptitude as a conductor—his real vocation. He was successively appointed assistant professor at the Conservatoire (1808–1816), solo violin at the Opéra (1815), director of the Académie de Musique (1821–24), conductor of the Théâtre de l'Opéra, conjointly with Valentino from 1824–31, and alone from 1831–37. In 1825 a special violin class was formed for him at the Conservatoire, which he retained till Oct. 1848. About the year 1835 Habeneck published a 'Méthode théorique et pratique de violon' (Canaux, Paris), very little known but important since it reproduced in facsimile some MS. fragments of a 'Méthode de violon' begun by Viotti. Among his pupils may be mentioned Cuvillon, Alard, Clapisson, Léonard, Maurin, Prume, Sainton and Deldevez. Habeneck has the merit of having founded (1828) and conducted for twenty years the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire. He was also the first to introduce Beethoven's symphonies in France, steadily persevering against all opposition, and at length executing them with a force, sentiment and delicacy which were very remarkable. As a conductor he was exacting, and unmerciful to singers who did not keep strict time. Out of respect to Cherubini he never exercised his office of 'Inspecteur général des classes du Conservatoire,' but he was an energetic director of Louis Philippe's concerts at the Tuileries. He composed violin music (two concertos, three duos, a nocturne, caprices and a polonaise), variations for string quartet and for orchestra, several pieces for 'Aladin' (1822) and a ballet 'Le Page inconstant' (1823). He received the Legion of Honour in 1822. For many curious anecdotes of Habeneck, see the Mémoires of Berlioz. There is a bust of him by P. J. Chardigny, and at the Opéra a medallion by Borrel (1864). G. c.; addns. M. P.

HABERBIER, ERNST (b. Königsberg, Oct. 5, 1813; d. Bergen, Mar. 12, 1869), pianist, was taught the pianoforte by his father, an organist, and in 1832 set up in St. Petersburg as a pianist and teacher. In 1847 he became court pianist, and in 1850 undertook extended concert tours, playing in London with success. After perfecting a method of his own, which depended greatly on the division of passages between the two hands, he played at Copenhagen, Kiel and Hamburg, and created a sensation in Paris in 1852. He also appeared in Russia and Germany, and settled at Bergen in Norway in 1866. He died suddenly while playing at a concert in Bergen. His compositions are mostly ephemeral works for piano, and include a set of 'Études poésies' (Baker).

HABERL, FRANZ XAVIER (b. Ober Ellenbach, Bavaria, Apr. 12, 1840; d. Regensburg, Sept. 5, 1910), was editor of the complete works of Palestrina, etc., and a great student of church music.

His father was a schoolmaster. He was educated at Passau, where, after his ordination (in 1862), he was appointed Kapellmeister of the Cathedral and musical director of both Seminaries. In 1867 he went to Rome, and for three years was choirmaster and organist at the church of S. Maria dell' Anima. In 1871 he was appointed successor to Joseph Schrems as choirmaster and inspector of the 'Dompräbends' at Ratisbon, holding both posts until 1882. In 1874 he founded at Ratisbon the well-known school of Ecclesiastical Music, which he directed. In 1879 Pius IX. appointed him Honorary Canon of the Cathedral of Palestrina. In the same year he founded a Palestrina Society to carry on the publication of the complete works of Palestrina which had been begun in 1862 by T. de Witt, J. N. Rauch, F. Espagne and F. Commer. The completion of this work in 33 volumes in 1894 (with Supplement, 1907), to which is due the recovery of much music by the great Roman composer that had been previously lost, was mainly owing to his untiring energy. Haberl contributed much valuable matter to the Bausteine zur Musikgeschichte, the Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte, and especially to the Cäcilien-Kalender (published under this name from 1876 to 1885 and since carried on as the Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch). His Magister Choralis, passed through twelve editions since its first issue in 1865, was translated into Italian, French, Spanish, Polish and Hungarian. After the death of Joseph Schrems, Haberl completed the Musica divina, and in 1868 he succeeded de Witt as editor of Musica sacra (subsequently the Fliegende Blätter für Katholische Kirchenmusik). On the completion of his great edition of Palestrina, he projected a similar issue of the works of Orlando di Lasso, published with the assistance of Professor Sandberger. He was also the editor of the Catalogues of the Cäcilien-Verein and (in conjunction with Hanisch) published an organ accompaniment to the Ordinary of the Mass, the Gradual and the Vespers. Among his other publications may be mentioned Lieder-Rosenkranz (1866), an edition of Bertalotti's Solfeggi (1880), a selection of Frescobaldi's organ works (1889), the Officium Hebdomadae Sanctae (1887), and the Psalterium vespertinum (1888). His valuable thematic Catalogue of the Archives of the Sistine Choir appeared in Eitner's Monatshefte, in 1888. Haberl received the Honorary degree of Dr. Theol. from the University of Würzburg in 1889. He was a member of the Papal Commission appointed by Pius IX. for the revision of the official choral-books, a member of the Roman Academy of St. Cecilia and of the Prussian Commission for the publication of D.D.T., and from 1899 was President of various Cäcilien-Vereine. In 1907 he was made Domestic Prelate to the Pope. W. B. S.

HACK, GEORG ALEXANDER, court musician at Munich in 1672, composed 'Musikalisch-Marianische-Schatzkammer' (Augsburg, 1695) containing 58 airs and motets; also 14 Christmas songs.

HACKBRETT, see DULCIMER.

HACKER, BENEDIKT (b. Deggendorf, Bavaria, May 30, 1769; d. Salzburg, 1829), a pupil of Michael Haydn and Leopold Mozart. He was violinist in the chapel of the Salzburg nunnery, and established a music business in 1802. His songs enjoyed a long period of popularity. His comic opera 'List gegen List,' for male voices only, was also successful. He composed 7 masses and a Requiem (Mendel; Q.-L.).

HACKETT, MARIA, see CHORISTER.

HACQUART (HAKART), CAROLUS (b. Bruges,¹ c. 1649; d. The Hague, 1730), lived first at Amsterdam, but settled in 1679 at The Hague, where he started Saturday evening concerts in 1693. He was a great friend of Huygens, who speaks of him as 'ce grand maitre de Musique.'² He composed 'Cantiones sacrae,' 2-7 parts 'for voices as well as instruments,' op. 1 (1674); 'De triomfeerende Min,' operetta (1680); 'Harmonia Parnassia,' 10 sonatas for 3 and 4 instruments, op. 3 (1686); Deus misereatur, 3 v. and 3 instruments in MS. Walther (Music Dict.) mentions more works, probably lost.

HADDOCK, a family of Leeds musicians. (1) THOMAS (b. Leeds, 1812; d. Sept. 22, 1893) became a violoncellist of ability, and settled in Liverpool, where for a number of years he was principal violoncellist of the Philharmonic Society there. His brother, (2) GEORGE (b. Killingbeck, Leeds, July 24, 1824; d. Leeds, Sept. 12, 1907), violinist, was a pupil (1846) of Viextemps and Molique. He established a large teaching connexion in Leeds which was ultimately developed by his two sons into the Leeds College of Music. He published a Practical School for the Violin, 3 vols., and other works, and was a collector of old violins and violoncellos.

The two sons of George, (3) EDGAR AUGUSTUS (b. Leeds, Nov. 23, 1859; d. Aug. 9, 1926), violinist, and (4) GEORGE PERCY (b. Leeds, Oct. 10, 1860), pianist, violoncellist and organist, began together in 1885 a series of 'Musical Evenings,' which acquired some importance in Leeds. They also started an orchestra (1898) which was largely amateur. The brothers were directors and founders of the Leeds College of Music, and the elder wrote a number of technical studies, compositions and arrangements for the violin.

HADDON HALL, romantic opera in 3 acts; libretto by Sydney Grundy; music by Sullivan; produced Savoy Theatre, Sept. 24, 1892.

HADLEY, HENRY (b. Somerville, Mass., U.S.A., Dec. 20, 1871), American conductor and composer. As a boy he studied piano and violin with his father; later at the New England Conservatory he was a pupil of Emery and Chadwick, and in 1894-95 he studied counterpoint with Mandyzewski at Vienna.

His activities as conductor have been extensive. As early as 1893 he toured with the Schirmer-Mapleson Opera Company in that capacity; in 1908-09 he conducted at the Stadt-Theater at Mayence and there produced, under his own direction, his opera 'Safie.' In 1909 he became conductor of the Seattle (Wash.) Symphony Orchestra; in 1911-15 he conducted the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra; and since 1920 he has been associate conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York. In 1924 he was conductor of the Worcester (Mass.) Festival. He has also made frequent appearances as guest-conductor with various European orchestras and with the major orchestras of the United States.

As composer Hadley's activities are represented by works in nearly every form, large and small. Under his own direction his three-act opera 'Azora' was produced by the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago and in New York in 1917, and his one-act opera 'Bianca' by the Society of American Singers in New York in 1918. 'Cleopatra's Night' (two acts) was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, in 1919. Besides these operas his more important compositions include:

Symphony No. 1, 'Youth and Life,' op. 25.
Symphony No. 2, 'The Four Seasons,' op. 30.
Symphony No. 3, B minor, op. 60.
Symphony No. 4, 'North, East, South, West,' op. 64.
Overture, 'In Bohemia,' op. 28.
Overture, 'Othello,' op. 98.
Overture to 'Herod,' op. 31.
Symphonic Fantasia, op. 46.
Tone-Poem, 'Salome,' op. 55.
Tone-Poem, 'Lucifer,' op. 66.
Tone-Poem, 'The Ocean,' op. 99.
An Ode: Music, chorus, soli and orchestra, op. 78.
Ode, 'The New Earth,' chorus, soli and orchestra, op. 85.
'Rougrum,' chorus, soli and orchestra, op. 98.
Cantatas, concerted pieces, chamber music, pianoforte pieces, a church service, anthems, songs, etc. W. S. S.

HADOW, SIR WILLIAM HENRY (b. Ebrington, Gloucestershire, Dec. 27, 1859), distinguished as an educationist, writer and lecturer on musical subjects, was educated at Malvern College, and Worcester College, Oxford. He was a scholar of the latter in 1878; gained the Barnes Scholarship in 1879, a first class in Moderations, 1880, the same in 'Litterae Humaniores,' 1882. In that year he took the degree of B.A.; that of M.A. followed in 1885, when he was appointed lecturer at Worcester College, where he was elected a Fellow and Tutor in 1888. In 1890 he took the Mus B. degree, and in the same year lectured on musical form, for the Professor of music, Sir John Stainer. His lectures on music were a feature of the musical life of Oxford until 1899, when Stainer was succeeded by Parry. In 1897 he was appointed Proctor, and from 1899 till 1901 was University Examiner in Litt. Hum.

Hadow's practical education in music began at Darmstadt in 1882, and was continued under C. H. Lloyd in 1884-85. In the years immediately following he produced a number of concerted chamber works, including a string quartet in E flat (played by the Heckmann Quartet at Cologne in 1887), a trio, PF. and str. in G minor (played at the Musical Artists' Society in London, 1900), and sonatas, most of which were written for, and originally performed by one or other of the Oxford Societies for chamber music. His songs (published in four Albums by Acott, Oxford) show the hand of a poetical musician, and some of them, for example 'Bright is the ring of words' (Stevenson), are surpassed in beauty by very few modern English lyrics.

Hadow's fame in the musical world, however, is chiefly based upon his writings on the art and its history, in which rare literary skill and finish are combined with thorough knowledge, the fruits of deep research, and a style that illuminates many branches of a subject generally treated too drily. The first of his literary works was a series of Studies in Modern Music (first series, 1892; second, 1894). Berlioz, Schumann and Wagner were the subjects of the first series, and not only did these essays set a new standard for English writers of musical biography, but the essay on Music and Musical Criticism—a Discourse on Method broke through the prejudices created by a narrow ring of professed music critics and opened the door to a wider treatment of the subject. The second series contained equally important essays on Chopin, Dvořák and Brahms. A Primer of Sonata Form was published in 1896, and a small volume on Haydn, under the title of A Croatian Composer, in 1897. This last assembled for English readers the conclusions of Kuhač's research by which the Slavonic origin of Haydn's melody was established (see HAYDN). Hadow next undertook the general editorship of the Oxford History of Music (see HISTORIES), and wrote the fifth volume himself, on The Viennese Period (1904). He contributed important articles to the second edition of this Dictionary.

In 1909 he left Oxford to become Principal of Armstrong College, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The University of Oxford then made him Doctor of Music, honoris causa. He remained Principal at Newcastle till 1919, but in 1918, in which year he was knighted, he became Director of Education (for Y.M.C.A.) on the lines of communication in France. He was appointed Vice-Chancellor of Sheffield University in 1919, the post he still (1926) holds. These strenuous activities have prevented the pursuit of research in music, but Hadow has found time to further by his advocacy innumerable institutions for the advance of popular music. In 1924 he published a small volume, Music, for the Home University Library. M.; addns. c.

HAEFFNER, JOHANN CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (b. Oberschöna, Co. Henneberg, Mar. 2, 1759; d. Upsala, May 28, 1833), a pupil of Vierling at Schmalkalden. In 1776 he was a student at Leipzig and proof-reader to Breitkopf, the music publisher. He became conductor of a travelling theatrical company, with whom he went to Hamburg, and thence in 1780 to Stockholm as organist at the German church, and assistant choirmaster at the opera, where he succeeded Abbé Vogler as Kapellmeister in 1794. In 1808 he was appointed director of music at Upsala, and 1826 organist of the cathedral there. He composed 3 operas for Stockholm and revived Swedish national music by restoring the original melodies of the ancient Swedish hymns, with preludes in the olden style, in which style he wrote also a Swedish Mass. In addition to composing original songs he arranged a number of Swedish folk-songs in 4-part harmony. E. v. d. s.

HÄNDEL-GESELLSCHAFT, see HANDEL.

HÄNSEL, PETER (b. Leppa, Silesia, Nov. 29, 1770; d. Vienna, Sept. 18, 1831), studied the violin under an uncle at Warsaw, and was a member of Prince Potemkin's orchestra under Sarti at St. Petersburg in 1787. In 1791 he was Konzertmeister to Princess Lubomirski at Vienna, where he studied composition under Haydn. From 1802–03 he lived in Paris, returning at the end of that time to Vienna. He was a prolific composer of chamber music (55 string quartets, 3 quartets for wind instruments, 4 quintets, 6 string trios, 15 violin duets, violin solos, pianoforte pieces, etc.) (Riemann; Q.-L.).

HÄNSEL UND GRÉTEL, fairy play in 3 tableaux; words by Adelheid Wette; music by Humperdinck, produced Weimar, Dec. 23, 1893; in English (translated by Constance Bache) (Carl Rosa Co.), Daly's Theatre, London, Dec. 26, 1894; in German, Drury Lane, June 24, 1895.

HAESER, AUGUST FERDINAND (b. Leipzig, Oct. 15, 1779; d. Weimar, Nov. 1, 1844), was educated at the Thomasschule, and in 1797 appointed professor and cantor at Lemgo. From 1806–13 he travelled in Italy in company with his sister, a singer, then returned to Germany, and settled in 1817 at Weimar, where he was music-master in the Duke's family, and taught mathematics and Italian at the gymnasium. He was also chorus-master at the theatre, and director of music at the principal church (1829). He composed an oratorio, 'Der Glaube,' translated by W. Ball as 'The Triumph of Faith' and performed at the Birmingham Festival¹ of 1837; masses, motets and other church music; an opera, 'Die Mohren'; overtures: PF. music for two and four hands; a capriccio for PF. with string quartet; and eighteen songs. Two motets, in plain counterpoint throughout, melodious and finely harmonised though somewhat chromatic, are included in Hullah's Vocal Scores. He published Versuch einer systematischen Übersicht der Gesanglehre (Breitkopf & Härtel, 1820); and Chorgesangschule (Schott, 1831), translated into French by Jelensperger; and contributed to various musical periodicals. HAESSLER, JOHANN WILHELM (b. Erfurt, Mar. 29,¹ 1747; d. Moscow, Mar. 29, 1822), received his first musical instruction from his uncle, the organist Kittel, who had been a pupil of Sebastian Bach. At the age of 14 he was appointed organist of the Barfüsserkirche. His father, who was a cap-maker, insisted on apprenticing him to his own trade, and on his commercial travels he became acquainted with the great musicians of his time, besides giving lessons and concerts. In 1780 he started winter concerts in Erfurt, and at the same time gave up his business. From 1790-94 he spent his time in concert tours, being especially successful in London and St. Petersburg. In the former he played a concerto by Mozart on May 30, 1792. In 1794 he took up his residence in Moscow. Many compositions for pianoforte and organ, as well as songs, are mentioned by Gerber in his Lexicon, and a complete list is given in Q.-L. After having published many works in Germany (sonatas for PF. 1776, 1779, 1780, 1786, 1790, etc., and PF. and vocal pieces in 1782 and 1786), he began to use opus numbers for the works published after he lived in Moscow, and the list reaches to op. 49. The work by which his name is best known to modern pianists is a 'grande gigue' in D minor, op. 31, a piece of remarkable power and originality.

HÄUSER, JOHANN ERNST (b. Dittchenroda, near Quedlinburg, 1803), deserves mention as author of a Musikalisches Lexicon (Meissen, 1828; 2nd edn. enlarged, 1833), a useful work in two small volumes. His other works are Der musikalische Gesellschafter (Meissen, 1830), a collection of anecdotes; Neue Pianoforte Schule (Halberstadt, 1832; 2nd edn., Quedlinburg, 1836); Musikalisches Jahrbüchlein (Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1833); and Geschichte des . . . Kirchengesanges (Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1834), one vol. with examples. M. C. C.

HÄUSLER, ERNST (b. Stuttgart, c. 1761²; d. Augsburg, Feb. 20, 1837), pupil at the famous Karlschule; an excellent violoncellist and composer. He was the last cantor of St. Anne's, Augsburg, 1800-37, and as a singer developed his falsetto to such an extent that he appeared in public as a soprano. From 1814 he styles himself Royal Bavarian director of music. He composed a large number of cantatas, songs and some chamber music works. (See Q.-L.; also E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello.)

HAFFNER, JOHANN ULRICH (d. 1767), a lutenist at Nuremberg who established a music publishing business there in 1758. He composed 6 flute sonatas, but his chief claim to posterity lies in his publication of a large collection in several volumes of sonatas by 18th-century composers. (See list in Q.-L.)

HAGIUS, KONRAD (VON HAGEN) (b. Rinteln, Westphalia, c. 1550).³ About 1589 he was musician at the court of the music-loving Elector, Johann Wilhelm, at Düsseldorf, went with the Elector Palatine to Heidelberg (c. 1604), was Kapellmeister at the court of the Count of Holstein-Schwanenburg, etc., and retired in 1615 as court composer to Rinteln. He composed psalms, magnificats and a number of sacred and secular songs, and a book of instrumental pieces, with some by other composers, including Thos. Simpson. (List in Q.-L.)

HAGUE. (1) CHARLES, Mus.D. (b. Tadcaster, May 4, 1769; d. Cambridge, June 18, 1821), studied at Cambridge under Manini for the violin, and Hellendaal, sen., for thorough-bass and composition, and in London with Salomon and Cooke. In 1794 he took the degree of Mus.B. at Cambridge, composing as his exercise an anthem with orchestral accompaniments, 'By the waters of Babylon,' which he soon afterwards published in score. In 1799 he was elected professor of music in the University. In 1801 he proceeded doctor of music. At the installation of the Duke of Gloucester as Chancellor of the University, June 29, 1811, Hague produced an ode written by Professor William Smyth, which was greatly admired. His other compositions were two collections of glees, rounds and canons, some songs, and arrangements of Haydn's twelve grand symphonies as quintets. His eldest daughter, (2) HARRIET (b. 1793; d. 1816), was an accomplished pianist, and the composer of a collection of 'Six Songs with an Accompaniment for the Pianoforte,' published in 1814. W. H. H.

HAHN, BERNHARD (b. Leubus on Oder, Dec. 17, 1780; d. Breslau, Nov. 22, 1852). He was choirboy at Breslau in 1791, then violinist to Count Natushka. In 1815 he became teacher of singing at the Catholic 'Gymnasium' at Breslau and did a great deal to raise the standard of singing in schools. In 1831 he was appointed Kapellmeister at Breslau Cathedral, and in 1843 he retired from his position as singing-master. Apart from a handbook for school-singing, he wrote a considerable number of masses and other church music which remained largely in MS. at Breslau Cathedral.

HAHN, REYNALDO (b. Caracas, Venezuela, Aug. 9, 1874), composer, showed at a very early age a decided taste for music. His father, a business man, entered him at the Conservatoire in Paris at the age of 11. Here he studied solfège with Grandjany, piano with Descombes, later, harmony with Théodore Dubois and Lavignac, and composition with Massenet, who took a particular interest in Hahn. At 14 he published his first composition; and in Mar. 1898 his first dramatic work, 'L'Île de rêve,' was given at the Opéra-Comique, his symphonic poem, 'Nuit d'Amour Bergamesque' having been given by Colonne's orchestra a few months before. On Dec. 16, 1902, his opera, 'La Carmélite,' was given at the Opéra-Comique.

Hahn has written much incidental music for the theatre from 1890 ('L'Obstacle') onward, including 'Les Deux Courtisanes' (1902), 'Esther' (1905, Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt), 'Le Bois sacré' (E. Rostand), 'Méduse' (Monte Carlo, 1911) and 'Mozart' (Paris, 1925). As a conductor he has specialised in Mozart's operas and has conducted 'Don Giovanni' at Salzburg. From 1919 he has been conductor at the Cannes Casino. His later compositions for the stage further include two ballets produced in Paris, 'La Fête chez Thérèse' (Opéra, 1910) and 'Le Dieu bleu' (Châtelet, 1912); 'La Colombe de Bouddha' (Cannes, 1921), an opéra-comique 'Nausicaa' (Monte Carlo, 1919; Opéra-Comique Paris, 1923), and an operetta 'Ciboulette' (Th. des Variétés, 1923). A dramatic work in 5 acts, 'Le Pauvre d'Assise,' is said to be in preparation (1925). Among several works for soli, choir and orchestra a lyric ode, 'Prométhée,' produced at the Lamoureux Concerts must be mentioned. He has also written chamber music and piano works, but the most popular side of his art is found among his numerous songs ('Chansons grises,' 'Chansons latines,' 'Chansons espagnoles,' etc.). Hahn took part in preparing the modern edition of Rameau's works. W. R. C.; addns. M. L. P.

HAHN (GALLUS), ULRICH (b. Ingolstadt, early 15th cent.; d. Rome, 1478), settled in Rome as a music printer, and was the first who printed a Missal with the Roman choral-notes (square notes on red lines.) (See Riemann.)

HAIDEN (HEIDEN), HANS, 'the Elder' (b. Nuremberg, 16th-17th cent.), was the inventor of a bowed claviers instrument about which he wrote two essays in 1605 and 1610, which were republished in 1716, prefaced by a panegyric by Hans Leo Hassler. E. v. d. s.

HAIDEN, HANS CHRISTOPH, a 16-17th century Nuremberg composer, wrote the words and music of two books of 4-part dance-songs for voices or instruments (1601, 1614). (See Q. L.)

HAIGH, THOMAS (b. London, 1769; d. there, Apr. 1808),¹ violinist, pianist and composer; studied composition under Haydn in 1791 and 1792. He shortly afterwards went to reside at Manchester, but returned to London in 1801. His compositions comprise a concerto for the violin, twelve sonatas for piano and violin, sonatas and other pieces for the piano, and a few songs. His arrangements of Haydn's symphonies, and music by other composers, are very numerous. W. H. H.

HAINL, FRANÇOIS (alias George) (b. Issoire, Puy de Dôme, Nov. 16, 1807²; d. Paris, June 2, 1873), entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1829, and gained the first violoncello prize in 1830. He became in 1841 conductor of the large theatre at Lyons, where he remained till his appointment in 1863 as conductor at the Opéra till 1872. From Jan. 1864-72 he also conducted the Société des Concerts at the Conservatoire, and directed the court concerts (with the title of Imperial Conductor) and the court performances at the Paris Exhibition of 1867. He was no great musician, but as a conductor he had fire, a firm hand and a quick eye, and possessed in an eminent degree the art of controlling large masses of performers. Hainl composed some fantasias for the violoncello, among them a fantasy for v'cl. and orch. on themes from 'William Tell.' He was a generous man, and bequeathed an annual sum of 1000 francs to the winner of the first violoncello prize at the Conservatoire. He wrote De la musique à Lyon depuis 1713 jusqu'à 1852 (published in 1852); Discours de réception prononcé en séance publique de l'académie de Lyon (1852). G. C.; rev. M. L. P.

His wife, MARIE ADELAÏDE AUGUSTINE POITEVIN (b. Belleville, Mar. 15, 1855), whom he married in 1889, a pianist, won the first pianoforte prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1874. César Franck dedicated to her his 'Prelude, Choral and Fugue' (1884).

HAITZINGER, ANTON (b. Wilfersdorf, Lichtenstein, Austria, Mar. 14, 1796; d. Vienna, Dec. 31, 1869), tenor singer, began life as a teacher in Vienna. He took lessons in harmony from Wolkert, while his tenor voice was developing. Having received some instructions from Mozzati, the master of Mme. Schröder-Devrient, he decided to give up his profession for that of a public singer. He was first engaged at the Theatre 'an der Wien' in 1821 as primo tenore, and made triumphant débuts as Gianetto ('Gazza ladra'), Don Ottavio ('Don Giovanni'), and Lindoro ('L'Italiana in Algeri'). His studies were continued under Salieri. His reputation becoming general, several new rôles were written for him, among others that of Adolar in 'Euryanthe'; and he paid successful visits to Prague, Presburg, Frankfort, Carlsruhe, etc. The last-named place became his headquarters until his retirement in 1850, when he returned to Vienna.

In 1831 and 1832 he created a deep impression at Paris with Mme. Schröder-Devrient, in 'Fidelio,' 'Oberon' and 'Euryanthe.' In 1832 he appeared in London, with the German company conducted by Chelard. His voice, described by Lord Mount-Edgumbe as 'very beautiful, and almost equal to Tramezzani's,' seemed 'throaty and disagreeable' to Chorley.¹ Haitzinger sang here again in 1833 and also in 1841, and in 1835 at St. Petersburg.

There is a song by him, 'Vergiss mein nicht,' published by Fischer of Frankfurt. He published a Lehrgang bei dem Gesangunterricht in Musikschulen in 1843. He married Mme. Neumann, an actress of reputation, at Carlsruhe, and established a school of dramatic singing there, from which some good pupils came forth, including his daughter. J. M.

HAKE (HACKE), ? EDWARD (1st half of 16th cent.), English composer of church music. An Edward Hake was employed in some capacity in the Chapel Royal at Windsor, and is 'heard of in connexion with the proceedings against Testwood and Merbecke' (Davey, Hist. Eng. Mus.). Hake contributed 17 settings to 'The whole psalmes in foure parts,' published by John Day (q.v.) in 1563, and a 4-part Mass by him is in B.M. Add. MSS. 17,802-5. J. M.

HAKENBERGER (HACKENBERGER), ANDREAS (b. Pommern), was musician at the Polish court before 1608. From 1608-25 he was Kapellmeister at St. Mary's, Danzig. He composed a book of 8-part sacred songs for voices or instruments, or both together (1615); a book of 3-part sacred songs (1628), a book of motets for 6-10, and 12 v. (1617); and a book of secular songs for 5 and 8 v. (1610) (Q.-L.).

HALE (HALLE), ADAM DE LA (Le bossu or boiteux d'Arras) (b. ? Arras, c. 1230; d. Naples, before 1288), one of the most prominent figures in the long line of Trouvères who contributed to the formation of the French language in the 12th and 13th centuries. Tradition asserts that he owed his surname, Le Bossu, to a personal deformity; but he himself writes: 'On m'appelle bochu, mais je ne le suis mie.' His father, Maître Henri, a well-to-do burgher, sent him to the Abbey of Vauxcelles, near Cambrai, to be educated for holy orders; but, falling desperately in love with a 'jeune demoiselle' named Marie, he evaded the tonsure and made her his wife. He soon effected a separation, however, and retired, in 1263, to Douai,² where he appears to have resumed the ecclesiastical habit. After this we hear little more of him, until the year 1282, when, by command of Philippe le Hardi, Robert II. Comte d'Artois accompanied the Duc d'Alençon to Naples, to aid the Duc d'Anjou in taking revenge for the Vêpres Siciliennes. Adam de la Hale, having entered Count Robert's service, accompanied him on this expedition, and wrote some of his most important works for the entertainment of the French court in the Two Sicilies. The story of his death at Naples, between 1285 and 1288, is told by his contemporary, Jean Bodel d'Arras, in Le Gieus du Pelerin; the statement in the Dict. Hist. of Prud'homme, that he returned to France and became a monk at Vauxcelles, is therefore incorrect.

The first of the compositions which are held to have been the beginning of opéra-comique was 'Le Jeu Adam, ou de la feuillée,' performed at Arras about 1262; it is a piece³ of considerable freedom, not to say licence, and the author had to learn a more seemly deportment before his most interesting work. This was a Dramatic Pastoral, entitled 'Le Jeu de Robin et Marion,' written for the French court at Naples, and first performed in 1275 or 1285. Eleven personages appear in the piece, which is written in dialogue, divided into scenes, and interspersed—after the manner of an opéra-comique—with airs, couplets and duos dialogués, or pieces in which two voices sing alternately, but never together. The work was first printed by the Société des Bibliophiles de Paris, in 1822 (thirty copies only), from a MS. in the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale; and one of the airs is given in Kiesewetter's 'Schicksal und Beschaffenheit des weltlichen Gesanges' (Leipzig, 1841). In 1872 the works of Adam de la Hale were published by Coussemaker; and in June 1896 a performance of 'Le Jeu de Robin et Marion' was given at Arras in connexion with the fêtes in honour of the composer.⁴ The authentic text was edited by Ernest Langlois in 1896, and Julien Tiersot edited the complete work, adding accompaniments to the songs.

Adam de la Hale was a distinguished master of the chanson, of which he usually wrote both the words and the music. A MS.⁵ of the 14th century, in the Paris Library, contains sixteen of his chansons a 3, in rondeau form; and six motets, written on a canto fermo, with florid counterpoint in the other parts. Combarieu speaks of seven motets; other poetical and musical works of his are found in MSS. at Paris, Arras, Montpellier, Aix, Cambrai, Rome, Oxford and Siena. Kiesewetter printed one of them, and also one of the motets a 3, in the work mentioned. (See also Q.-L. under Adam.)

HALÉVY, (1) JACQUES FRANÇOIS FROMENTAL ELIAS, a Jew, whose real name was LÉVY (b. Paris, May 27, 1799; d. Nice, Mar. 17, 1862), eminent composer of operas, entered the Conservatoire 1809, gained a prize in solfège 1810, and the second prize for harmony 1811.

From Berton's class he passed to that of Cherubini, who put him through a severe course of counterpoint, fugue and composition. In 1816 he competed for the Grand Prix de Rome, and gained the second prize for his cantata 'Les Derniers Moments du Tasse'; in the following year the second Grand Prix de Rome for 'La Mort d'Adonis,' and in 1819 his 'Hermione' carried off the Grand Prix de Rome itself. Before leaving for Rome, he composed a funeral march and De Profundis in Hebrew, on the death of the Duc de Berry (Feb. 14, 1820), for three voices and orchestra, with an Italian translation; it was dedicated to Cherubini, and performed Mar. 24, 1820, at the synagogue in the Rue St. Avoys, and published. During his stay in Italy Halévy studied hard, and in addition not only wrote an opera, and some sacred works still in MS., but found time to learn Italian.

On his return to France he encountered the usual difficulties in obtaining a hearing. 'Les Bohémiennes' and 'Pygmalion,' which he offered to the Opéra, and 'Les Deux Pavillons,' opéra-comique, remained on his hands in spite of all his efforts; but in 1827 'L'Artisan,' which contains some pretty couplets and an interesting chorus, was produced at the Théâtre Feydeau. This was followed in 1828 by 'Le Roi et le bâtelier,' a little pièce de circonstance, composed conjointly with his friend Rifaut for the fête of Charles X. A month later, Dec. 9, 1828, he produced 'Clari,' three acts, at the Théâtre Italien, with Malibran in the principal part. It contains some remarkable music. 'Le Dilettante d'Avignon' (Nov. 7, 1829), a clever satire on the poverty of Italian librettos, was very successful, and the chorus 'Vive, vive l'Italie' speedily became popular. 'Attendre et courir,' and an unperformed ballet, 'Yella,' date from 1830, and the ballet 'Manon Lescaut' (May 3, 1830) had a well-merited success at the Opéra, and was published for the piano. 'La Langue musicale' (1831) was less well received, owing to its poor libretto. 'La Tentation' (June 20, 1832), a ballet-opera in five acts written conjointly with Casimir Gide (1804-68), contains two fine choruses which were well received.

In spite of so many proofs of talent, Halévy still accepted any work likely to bring him into notice; and on Mar. 4, 1833, brought out 'Les Souvenirs de Lafleur,' a one-act comic opera written for the farewell appearances of Martin the baritone; and on May 16 of the same year 'Ludovic,' a lyric drama in two acts which had been begun by Hérold. At length, however, his opportunity arrived. To produce successfully within the space of ten months two works of such ability and in such opposite styles as 'La Juive' (Feb. 23) and 'L'Éclair' (Dec. 16, 1835), the one a grand opera in five acts, and the other a musical comedy without choruses, for two tenors and two sopranos only, was indeed a marvellous feat. They procured him an entrance into the Institut, where he succeeded Reicha (1836), and were followed by a large number of dramatic works, of which the following is a complete list:

'Guido et Ginevra,' 5 acts (Mar. 5, 1838). 'Les Trolchs,' 3 acts (Apr. 19), and 'Le Shérif,' 3 acts (Sept. 2, 1839). 'Le Drapier,' 3 acts (Jan. 6, 1840). 'Le Guittarrero,' 3 acts (Jan. 21), and 'La Reine de Chypre,' 5 acts (Dec. 22, 1841). 'Charles VI,' 6 acts (Mar. 15, 1843). 'Le Lazzarone,' 2 acts (Mar. 29, 1844). 'Les Mousquetaires de la reine,' 5 acts (Feb. 3, 1845). 'Les Premiers Pas' (with Adam, Aubert and Carafa, 1847). 'Le Val d'Audorre,' 3 acts (Nov. 11, 1848). Incidental music for 'Prométhée enchaîné' (Mar. 18), a translation by Léon Halévy of the tragedy of Æschylus; and 'La Fée aux roses,' 2 acts (Oct. 1, 1849). 'Le Temple,' 5 acts, Italian opera, produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, June 8, 1850, and in Paris, Feb. 25, 1851. 'La Dame de Pique,' 3 acts (Dec. 28, 1850). 'Le Juif errant,' 5 acts (Apr. 29, 1852). 'Le Nabab,' 8 acts (Sept. 1, 1853). 'L'Inconnu de l'Indienne,' 3 acts (May 14, 1855). 'L'Inconnu de l'Inde' (1855). 'Valentine d'Auligny,' 3 acts (1856). 'La Magicienne,' 6 acts (Mar. 17, 1858). 'Vanina d'Ornano' and 'Noé,' left unfinished at Halévy's death, were completed by Bizet. 'Les Plages du Nil,' a cantata with orchestra and chorus; 'Italie,' 1859.

By devoting his life to the production of such varied works, Halévy proved his versatility; but the fact remains that throughout his long and meritorious career he wrote nothing finer than 'La Juive' or more charming than 'L'Éclair.' He was, unfortunately, too easily influenced, and the immense success of 'The Huguenots' (Feb. 29, 1836) had an undue effect upon him. Instead of following in the direction of Hérold, giving his imagination full play, husbanding his resources, and accepting none but interesting and poetic dramas, he over-exhausted himself, took any libretto offered him, no matter how melancholy and tedious, wrote in a hurry and carelessly, and assimilated his style to that of Meyerbeer. It must be acknowledged also that in 'Guido et Ginevra,' 'La Reine de Chypre' and 'Charles VI,' side by side with scenes of ideal beauty, there are passages so obscure that they seem impenetrable to light or air. In spite, however, of such mistakes, and of much inexcusable negligence, even in his most important works, his music as a whole compels our admiration, and impresses us with a very high idea of his powers. Everywhere we see traces of a superior intellect, almost Oriental in character. He excelled in stage pageantry—the entrance of a cortège, or the march of a procession; and in the midst of this stage pomp his characters are always sharply defined. We are indebted to him for a perfect gallery of portraits, drawn to the life and never to be forgotten. The man who created such a variety of such typical characters, and succeeded in giving expression to such opposite sentiments, and portraying so many shades of passion, must have been a true poet.

Not content with supplying the repertoires of three great lyric theatres, Halévy also found time to become one of the first professors at the Conservatoire. As early as 1816 he was teaching solfège, while completing his own studies; and in 1827 was appointed professor of harmony and accompaniment, while filling at the same time the post of maestro al cembalo at the Italian Opera, a post he left three years later in order to become 'chef de chant' at the Opéra. In 1833 he was appointed professor of counterpoint and fugue, and in 1840 professor of composition. His lessons were learned and interesting, but he wanted method. Among his pupils may be mentioned Gounod, Victor Massé, Bazin, Deldevez, Eugène Gautier, Déffès, Henri Duvernoy, Bazille, Ch. Delioux, A. Hignard, Gastinel, Mathias, Samuel David and Georges Bizet, who married his daughter. With Cherubini he maintained to the last an intimate and affectionate friendship which does credit to both, though sometimes put rudely to the proof. See a good story in Hiller's Cherubini (Macmillan's Magazine, July 1875). Halévy's only didactic work was an elementary book called Leçons de lecture musicale (Paris, Léon Escudier, 1857).

We have mentioned Halévy's entrance into the Institut in 1836; in 1854 he was elected permanent secretary of the Académie des Beaux-Arts, and in this capacity had to pronounce eulogiums, which he published with some musical critiques in a volume entitled Souvenirs et portraits, études sur les beaux-arts (1861). A second series (Derniers Souvenirs, etc.) appeared in 1863. These essays are pleasant reading; they secured Halévy reputation as a writer, which, however, he did not long enjoy, as he died of consumption in 1862. His remains were brought to Paris, and interred on March 24. G. C.

(2) His brother, LÉON (b. Paris, Jan. 14, 1802; d. St. Germain-en-laye, Sept. 2, 1883), writer and dramatist, wrote the libretto of 'Le Dilettante d'Avignon' (1829), music by F. Halévy; also other libretti of vaudevilles, opéras-bouffes, etc.

(3) LUDOVIC, son of the above (b. Paris, Jan. 1, 1834; d. there, May 8, 1908), dramatist. HALFFTER ESCRICHE, ERNESTO (b. Madrid, Jan. 16, 1905). Spanish composer, conductor of the Orquesta Bética de Cámara, a chamber orchestra which devotes itself to the performance of contemporary music, and has given a series of performances in Spain of FALLA's puppet-opera, 'El Retablo de Maese Pedro.' Halffter's own compositions, which show striking originality, include 2 string quartets (1923) a suite ancienne for wind instruments, 'Dos Retratos,' and 'Dos bocetos' for orchestra. J. B. T.

HALIR, KARL (b. Hohenelbe, Bohemia, Feb. 1, 1859; d. Berlin, Dec. 21, 1909), violinist, was a member of the JOACHIM QUARTET (q.v.). He was educated at the Prague Conservatorium, and completed his studies under Joachim (1874–1876) at Berlin, where he received his first engagement as principal violin in Bilse's orchestra (1876–79). He held the appointment of Konzertmeister successively at Königsberg (1879), Mannheim (1881), and Weimar (1884–94). On the death of De Ahna, in 1894, he was appointed leader at the Berlin Court Opera, and professor at the Hochschule. In 1896–97 he visited the United States, and upon his return joined the Joachim Quartet. Besides taking part in the numerous concerts given by the Joachim Quartet, he led a Quartet of his own (Halir, Eener, Müller, Dechert), and was known all over the continent as a soloist of distinction. He helped to win from the public tardy acceptance of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto, and introduced other compositions for the first time. He was married in 1888 to Thérèse Zerbst, a vocalist of distinction. W. W. C.

HALL (1), HENRY (b. New Windsor, c. 1655; d. Mar. 30, 1707), son of Capt. Henry Hall of New Windsor, was a chorister of the Chapel

Royal under Capt. Cooke. He is said to have studied under Dr. Blow, but this is doubtful. In 1674 he succeeded Theodore Coleby as organist of Exeter Cathedral, an appointment which he resigned on becoming organist and vicar choral of Hereford Cathedral in 1688. It is said that in 1698 Hall took deacon's Orders to qualify himself for some preferment in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. He composed a Te Deum in E flat, a Benedicite in C minor, and a Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur in B flat, all which, together with five anthems, are included in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MSS. 7340 and 7342), and other anthems of considerable merit. The Te Deum has been printed with a Jubilate by William Hine, and an Evening Service by Dr. W. Hayes. Some songs and duets by Hall are included in The-saurus musicus, 1693; and Deliciae musicae, 1695; and some catches in The Monthly Masks of Vocal Music for 1704 and 1707. Hall cultivated poetry as well as music; commendatory verses of some merit by him are prefixed to both books of Purcell's Orpheus Britannicus, 1698 and 1702, and to Blow's Amphion Anglicus, 1700. He was buried in the cloister of the vicars' college at Hereford.

His son, (2) HENRY (d. Jan. 22, 1713), succeeded his father as organist and vicar choral of Hereford. He does not appear to have been a composer, but in poetical ability he excelled his father. Many of his poems, among them a once well-known ballad, 'All in the land of cyder,' are included in The Grove, 1721. He was buried near his father in the cloister of the vicars' college.

HALL, MARIE (b. Newcastle-on-Tyne, Apr. 8, 1884), received her first lesson from her father, a harpist, then engaged in the orchestra of the Carl Rosa Opera Company. He urged her to take up the harp, but her predilection for the violin was so great, that his wishes were fortunately over-ruled, and with the further help of a local teacher, Miss Hildegard Werner, her proficiency on the instrument of her choice was already considerable by the time she had arrived at the age of 9, when Émile Sauret heard her play, and pressed her parents to send her to the R.A.M. This was not done, but she received from time to time instruction from many professors of distinction; from Edward Elgar in Malvern in 1894, from Professor Wilhelmj in London in 1896 (for three months), from Max Mossel at the Midland Institute in Birmingham in 1898, and from Professor Kruse in 1900. The year before going to the last-mentioned teacher, she won a scholarship at the R.A.M. against forty competitors, but was unable to take it up. Her career, however, was much advanced through the friendship and help of P. Napier MILES (q.v.). In 1901 she played to Kubelik, and through his advice went to Prague to study under Sevcik, whose teaching she enjoyed at intervals between Sept. 1901 and the summer of 1903, altogether about two years. She played for the first time at Prague in Nov. 1902, at Vienna in Jan. 1903, and at St. James's Hall, London, on Feb. 16, 1903, scoring immediate success at all these musical centres. Since then she has made numerous provincial and colonial tours. In the course of her more recent and occasional London appearances she has introduced several new works for violin to the public, among them 'The Lark ascending,' by Vaughan Williams, which she played with the London Philharmonic orchestra; sonatas by Rutland Boughton and Percy Sherwood; and a Suite by Gordon Bryan. In 1911 she married Edward Baring, and has since lived at Cheltenham. She holds her own as one of the best woman violinists now before the public.

W. W. C.

HALL, WILLIAM (d. 1700). On his tombstone at Richmond, Surrey, he is called a 'superior violinist.' He was a member of the King's band from 1692-1700; 'Tripla Concordia' contains some Airs by him, and a Courant for harpsichord is in Locke's 'Melothesia' (1673).

E. V. D. S.

HALLÉ, SIR CHARLES (originally Carl Halle) (b. Hagen in Westphalia, Apr. 11, 1819; d. Greenheys Lane, Manchester, Oct. 25, 1895), was famous as pianist and conductor.

His father, Friedrich Halle, was organist of the principal church in Hagen. His musical talents were not long in showing themselves; at the age of 4 he performed on the piano in public, and from that time was allowed occasionally to appear at concerts, in order that the townspeople might observe his progress. In 1828, at a concert at Cassel, he attracted the notice of Spohr, and, in 1835, went to Darmstadt to study with Rinck and Gottfried Weber. In 1836 he settled in Paris, taking some lessons of Kalkbrenner, but passing most of his time in the company of such men as Chopin, Liszt, Thalberg, Berlioz and Cherubini. In 1843 he came to England for the first time, playing at a concert given by Sivori in Hanover Square Rooms on June 16, and giving one of his own a fortnight afterwards. In 1846 he started a series of concerts in Paris with Alard and Franchomme, at which, during the next few years, many masterpieces of chamber music were brought forward. In 1848, the disturbances caused by the Revolution of February drove him to England, and within a very short time of his arrival he made MANCHESTER (q.v.) his headquarters, being made conductor of the Gentlemen's Concerts in 1850, and of the St. Cecilia Society from its foundation in 1852, and conducting operas in 1854-55. The orchestra, with which his name is so closely identified, was formed in connexion with the Exhibition of 1857, and gave regular concerts from Jan. 1858 onwards. In London Hallé was always best known and most warmly appreciated as a pianist. He played the solo part of Beethoven's E flat concerto at an orchestral concert at Covent Garden, as early as May 12, 1848; and appeared in the same season at the Musical Union. His first appearance at the Philharmonic was on Mar. 15, 1852. By that time he had established, in a very modest way, at his own house, the form of concert which afterwards became popular as 'Hallé's Pianoforte Recitals,' such entertainments being at that time unknown in England. For several years they were carried on in this semi-private way, and in 1861 the first series was given at St. James's Hall, with a performance of Beethoven's sonatas, occupying eight recitals. The undertaking was so successful that the series of sonatas, as well as the analyses in the programmes by J. W. Davison, were repeated for two more seasons. In these early days of the Popular Concerts, and indeed throughout their career, Hallé was a frequent performer. He conducted a series of operatic performances at Her Majesty's Theatre in the winter of 1860-61, and from 1868 onwards conducted the Reid Concert in Edinburgh. He was conductor of the Bristol Festival, 1873-93; 1882-85 he conducted the Sacred Harmonic Society in London, and the Liverpool Philharmonic Society. He succeeded Max Bruch as conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society in 1883. In 1880, when he received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Edinburgh, he gave a complete performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' at Manchester (see FAUST). He did more than any one else in England to encourage the taste for Berlioz's music, and especially for this work, which was long in taking hold of the British public. On several occasions he brought his Manchester orchestra to London, with the special object of performing important works of Berlioz. The last three series of these concerts, beginning in the autumns of 1889, 1890 and 1891, were so ill-supported that the eminent conductor was obliged to abandon them. In 1888 he had received the honour of knighthood, and in the same year married, as his second wife, Mme. Norman NERUDA (q.v.), with whom he undertook two professional visits to Australia in 1890 and 1891. In 1895 they went to give concerts in South Africa. In 1893 the Royal College of Music, Manchester, having been founded mainly through Hallé's energy, he was appointed its first Principal. He died at his house, Greenheys Lane, and was buried in the Roman Catholic cemetery at Salford.

Those who only knew him as a pianist, and only heard him in public, generally received the impression that he was a cold, not to say a dry, player; his technique was always above criticism, but it is only fair to say that in public he did not always let his individuality of temperament come out. In private, the humour of his nature, and the vivacity of his character, which he preserved all his life under a somewhat solemn aspect, gave to his performances a life and intellectual beauty which could not be forgotten by any who heard him then. In particular his performance of favourite things of Chopin was most remarkable for its complete sympathy with the music. As a conductor, Hallé was in the first rank; his beat was decisive, and though his manner was free from exaggeration, he imposed his own readings on his players with an amount of will-force that was unsuspected by the London public at large. He was a fine influence in musical education and it is hardly possible to exaggerate the importance of the work he did in this way. His compilations, a Pianoforte School (begun 1873) and Musical Library (begun 1876), were carefully edited. A very interesting memoir, Life and Letters of Sir Charles Hallé, partly autobiographical, was published in 1896, by his son and daughter, C. E. Hallé, the well-known painter, and Marie Hallé. It contains a reproduction of the best portrait of Sir Charles Hallé, an oil-painting by Victor Mottez (1850). An excellent article appeared in the D.N.B. (supplement, vol. ii.), from which, together with the memoir, many of the above facts are taken.

HALLÉ CONCERTS, see MANCHESTER.

HALLING, the most characteristic dance of Norway, deriving its origin and name from the Hallingdal, between Christiania and Bergen. It is thus described in Frederika Bremer's Strid og Frid ('Strife and Peace') as translated by Mary Howitt:

'Perhaps there is no dance which expresses more than the Halling the temper of the people who originated it. It begins, as it were, upon the ground, amid jogging little hops, accompanied by movements of the arms, in which, as it were, a great strength plays negligently. It is somewhat bear-like, indolent, clumsy, half-dreaming. But it wakes, it becomes earnest. Then the dancers rise up and dance, and display themselves in expressions of power, in which strength and dexterity seem to divert themselves by playing with indolence and clumsiness, or to overcome them. The same person who just before seemed fettered to the earth, springs aloft, throws himself around in the air as though he had wings. Then, after many breakneck movements and evolutions, before which the unaccustomed spectator grows dizzy, the dance suddenly assumes again its first quiet, careless, somewhat heavy character, closes as it began, sunk upon the earth.'

The Halling is generally danced by single dancers, or at most by two or three dancing in competition. It is accompanied on the Hardanger fiddle ('Hardangerfelen'), a violin strung with four stopped and four sympathetic strings. The music is generally written in 2-4 time, in a major key, and is played allegretto or allegro moderato, but a few examples are found in triple time. Many of the most popular Halling tunes were composed by Maliser-Knud, a celebrated performer on the Hardangerfelen who flourished about 1840. The following is a traditional and characteristic example :

W. B. S.

HALLSTRÖM, IVAR (b. Stockholm, June 5, 1826 ; d. there, Apr. 21, 1901), a Swedish composer and pianist, was a pupil of Passy and the German pianist Stein. In 1845 he was an undergraduate at Upsala, where he took his degree of Bachelor-at-Law in 1849. In the University town he belonged to the intimate circle of Prince Gustaf, a distinguished musician, and they jointly composed 'The White Lady of Drottningholm,' an opera in two acts, produced at the Royal Theatre, Stockholm, in 1847. After the death of the Prince, Hallström became Librarian to Prince Oscar, afterwards King Oscar II., and made his home in Stockholm the same year. He started first by giving piano lessons, until in 1861 he took over the leadership of A. F. Lindblad's music school. He was elected a member of the Academy of Music in 1861.

Hallström gained a reputation as a composer of opera and produced works of permanent value. His best-known composition is the opera 'Den Bergtagna' ('The Captive of the Hill'), produced in Stockholm in 1874, afterwards in Munich, Copenhagen and Hamburg. Mention must also be made of the operas 'Duke Magnus and the Mermaid,' 'The Vikings,' and 'Neaga'; the ballets 'A Dream,' 'An Adventure in Scotland,' 'Per Svinaherde,' a saga-play, and several songs and cantatas. Among his many friends was Queen Elisabeth of Rumania (Carmen Sylva), who wrote the libretto for his opera 'Neaga.' Hallström's operas possess great richness of melody, resembling the French style in elegance and grace. The real Swedish element in some of his operas has with some justification given him the name of Sweden's most 'national' scenic composer. Instrumentation was not his strong point, and he solicited, especially at first, help from Conrad Nordquist.

A detailed list of his compositions is given in L. Lagerbielke's Svenska Jonsättare, Stockholm, 1908, pp. 138-44. C. A. S.

HALVORSEN, JOHAN (b. Drammen, Norway, Mar. 15, 1864), was a pupil of Lindberg (violin) and Nordquist (theory) at the Stockholm Conservatory. In 1887 he became concert-master in Bergen, where he spent some time, then proceeded to Leipzig to study violin under Brodsky; he once more interrupted his training by taking the post of leader in Aberdeen and teacher of music in Helsingfors, whence he proceeded to Berlin, studying composition under Albert Becker. Later he went to Liège to complete his study of the violin under César Thomson. He made his début in a recital in Berlin 1902, and was called to Bergen as conductor of the Symphony Concerts, and subsequently became conductor of the National Theatre, Christiania. His compositions are strongly influenced by Grieg, whose niece he married. They reveal the particular charm of the Northern tunes and the lyrical romanticism that is so delightful in the works of Grieg.

His works include a violin concerto, 3 suites for PF. and violin; incidental music to 'Vasantasena' and to Bjørnson's 'The King'; a symphonic poem, 'Über die Kraft'; a cantata for the coronation of King Haakon; a Passacaglia; and some less important works.

HAMBOURG. Three brothers of this name, the sons of Michael Hambourg, have made their names as instrumentalists.

(1) MARK (b. Bogutchar, Russia, June 1, 1879) is a famous pianist. A favourite pupil of Leschetizky, he made his first appearance at Moscow in 1888 and soon secured engagements as a concerto player in all the chief cities of Europe. Latterly he has devoted himself primarily to recital giving, and has toured all over the world.

(2) JAN (b. Voronez, Russia, Aug. 27, 1882), after study with a variety of masters (Wilhelmj, Sevcik, Ysaÿe) appeared as a finished violinist in Berlin (1905).

(3) BORIS (b. Voronez, 1884) studied the violoncello under Herbert Walenn (London), and Becker. He has toured widely and successfully. C.

HAMBOYS (HANBOYS), JOHN, Mus.D.,¹ a distinguished musician, flourished about 1470. He was author of a Latin treatise, Summa super musicam continuam et discretam, preserved in B.M. Add. MSS. 8866, and printed in Coussemaker's Scriptorum de musica medii aevi, i. 416. Another MS. treatise, Quatuor principalia totius artis musicae, contained in the same volume as the above, of which there is another MS., in the Bodleian Library, has been ascribed to Hamboys, but is believed to be the work of Simon Tunstede. W. H. H.

The former treatise appears to be a commentary on the works of FRANCO (q.v.), and is chiefly interesting as giving an account of the musical notation of the time. Hamboys divides the notes into Larga, Duplex Longa, Longa, Brevis, Semibrevis, Minor, Seminor, Minima; each of which is in its turn subdivided into perfect and imperfect notes, the former being equal in value to three of the next denomination below it, the latter to two. (See MUSICA MENSURATA.) Hamboys abolishes the name crotchets used by Franco. This MS. cannot have been written much later than the middle of the 15th century, though Holinshed enumerates John Hamboys among the writers of Edward IV.'s reign, describing him as 'an excellent musician, and for his notable cunning therein made Doctor of Music.' He also appears to have written a book Cantionum artificialium diversi generis which has been lost. Hamboys was an ecclesiastic, if we may judge from the epithet 'reverendus,' which is given to him at the end of his treatise. A. H.-H.

HAMBURG. Once the leading city in the German musical world, Hamburg continues to hold a front place to-day. Its musical history is of interest in that it was the scene of the first regular German opera (1678-1738), the roots of which lay perhaps in its age-long church-music traditions. Hamburg with its many fine churches of cathedral dimensions had long been famous for its organ music when Scheide-mann, a pupil of Sweelinck, came to the St. Katharinen Kirche in 1625. He was succeeded there by Reincken, the founder of the Hamburg opera, in 1678. Jakob Thiele was teaching in Hamburg from 1646-1724. Mattheson, at one time the friend and benefactor of Handel, was director of church music from 1715-28, and died as Domcanonicus in 1764. Vincent Lübeck was organist at the St. Nikolaikirche from 1702-40, the friend of Bach and Buxtehude. Handel, who came to Hamburg as violinist and cembalist, in 1703 wrote music for the Hamburg organists. Bach visited Reincken in 1702; he had previously been tried for the post of organist in the St. Jakobi-kirche, but had not been successful. Telemann was director of church music and chief Kapellmeister in 1757, and he was succeeded by Philipp Emmanuel Bach in 1788. Schröter (or Schröder as it is sometimes spelt) was in Hamburg from 1771-80.

The Hamburg German opera was established in 1678 by Reincken in a theatre (no longer existing) in the Gänsemarkt. Reincken opened with Jakob Thiele's opera 'Adam und Eva.' Cousser came from Brunswick to assist him in 1674 and remained till 1678. The opera was at the summit of its vitality in the era of R. Keiser, who directed it from 1695-1706. During this period he wrote 116 (some historians say 126) operas for it. The German opera of Hamburg lasted till 1738. The Italian opera was introduced in 1740.

The present municipal Hamburger Stadt-theater was rebuilt in 1874 and completely remodelled in 1926. It has room for about 1750 spectators. Among its general music directors have been Gustav Mahler (1891-97) and Korngold (1919). The present Generalmusikdirektor is Egon Pollack. The Hamburg opera, which is subsidised by the Free City, maintains a very high standard in its productions. Lortzing's 'Undine' (1845) and Korngold's 'Die Tote Stadt' (1920) were first produced by the Hamburg opera. There is a Volksoper, under the direction of C. Richter, an Operettenhaus, and at Altona a Stadttheater (produces opera occasionally) run by a limited company on a co-operative basis.

The orchestra of the Hamburger Stadt-theater gives during the winter season regular symphony concerts and 'opera evenings.' The concert life of Hamburg, however, is mainly centred upon the Verein Hamburger Musikfreunde (Hamburg Association of the Friends of Music) founded in 1896, afterwards renamed the Hamburg Philharmonic Society. Under this society the Philharmonic concerts (Karl Muck) often in co-operation with the Singakademie, the Symphony Concerts (Eugen Papst) and the choir concerts (A. Sittard) are held in regular series throughout the winter. Orchestral concerts in Hamburg have a long history dating back to Keiser, who gave his first series of winter concerts in 1708, and even beyond, since there is mention of a 'Ratsmusikdirektor' (Director of Music to the Council) in the early 17th century. The Hamburger Orchesterverein (Emil Leichsenring) also gives regular symphony concerts and at the Hamburg Wednesday concerts some enterprise is shown in the presentation of new works. The Altona Orchestra (Woynsch) gives occasional symphony concerts, and others are from time to time organised by the Richard Wagner Verein of Hamburg. Chamber concerts are a regular feature of Hamburg's musical life. The principal concert halls are the Musik-halle (presented to the city by H. Lacisz and completed in 1908) with a large hall and a smaller hall for chamber concerts, the Convent Garten (two halls) and the Curiohaus.

With its long tradition of church music, Hamburg has also several fine secular choirs among its 82 societies (29 mixed, 47 male voice, 6 women's), chief among them being the Singakademie (E. Papst) and the Cäcilienverein (J. Spengel). Six at least of Hamburg's great churches, with their grand organs, are centres of choral singing. That with the longest consecutive history is the St. Katharinen Kirche. Its organ, originally built in 1543, is used in conjunction with the free recitals given by the United Hamburg church choirs under the direction of the organist, W. Böhmer. The organ of St. Michael Kirche (built by Walcker of Ludwigsburg), of which A. Sittard (conductor of the Hamburger Verein's choral concerts) is organist, is said to be one of the largest church organs in the world. It has five manuals and pedal organ, and the pipes number 12,173, with 207 stops. Others of importance are the St. Nicolai Kirche (A. Kleinpaul), the St.

Jacobikirche (K. Mohrkens), the organ of which, originally constructed in the early 17th century, was completely rebuilt in 1895, and the St. Petrikirche (G. Knack) second only to the St. Michael's organ in size and its superior in sweetness of tone. The St. Georgskirche choir (Karl Paulke) gives concerts in the church on a more ambitious scale, generally with the assistance of well-known singers.

The principal establishments for musical education in Hamburg are the Hamburger Musikakademie und Musikwissenschaftliches Institut (Karl Riemecke) and the Krüss-Färber Konservatorium, founded 1908 (Albert Mayer-Reinach and Friedrich Färber) with operatic, instrumental and composition schools. There are some half a dozen other private music schools. The library of music in the Hamburg city library, with its many rare MSS., is one of the richest in Germany. H. G. D.

HAMELLE, JACQUES (d. 1917), music publisher, acquired, in 1877, the publishing firm founded by J. Mabo in 1855. His children are his successors. The principal composers whose works have been published by this firm are: Saint-Saëns, G. Fauré, César Franck, Le Coupey, Widor, V. d'Indy, G. Pierné and Letorey. J. G. P.

HAMERIK (originally HAMMERICH), ASGER (b. Apr. 8, 1843; d. Frederiksburg, Denmark, July 13, 1923), composer, Copenhagen, displayed in early youth great aptitude for music, and studied under Gade and Haberbier. In 1860 he was sent to Berlin to perfect himself as a pianist under Bülow, but he persisted in spending so much time on composition, that in despair of making a virtuoso of him, the great pianist advised him to let his studies take the direction he so evidently preferred. In 1863 he went to Paris and learned orchestration from Berlioz, with whom he remained nearly seven years, and whose only pupil he claimed to have been. Berlioz had such confidence in him, that he often sent him to direct performances of his own works, when unable to attend personally. From 1872-98 he resided in America as head of the musical section of the Peabody Institute at Baltimore, where he formed an excellent orchestra, and gave a long series of symphony concerts which were remarkable for their progressiveness. He was knighted by the King of Denmark in 1890. His works comprise 6 symphonies: 1. 'poétique,' 2. 'tragique,' 3. 'lyrique,' 4. 'majestueuse,' 5. 'sérieuse,' and 6. 'spirituelle,' the last named being for strings only. Further, two choral trilogies, one on Hebrew subjects, and one on Christian, a Requiem, four operas: 'Tovelille,' 'Hjalmar and Ingeborg,' 'La Vendetta' (Milan, 1870) and 'Der Reisende'; five 'Northern Suites' for orchestra, highly characteristic in style, and a large number of works of smaller dimensions.

Hamertk's music shares many of the qualities and defects of his great teacher. He is not always convincing in his grander manner, and indeed ventures at times dangerously near to bombast, but he is very attractive in the lyrical vein, and possesses an unusually rich fund of that rare attribute, genuine musical humour, spontaneous and free from roughness or vulgarity. E. E.

HAMERTON, WILLIAM HENRY (b. Nottingham, 1795), of Irish parentage, was placed as a chorister at Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, in 1805. In 1812 he came to London, and studied singing under Thomas Vaughan. In 1814 he returned to Dublin and established himself as a teacher. In 1815, on the resignation of John Elliott, he was appointed master of the choristers of Christ Church Cathedral, and in 1823 gentleman of the Chapel Royal, Dublin. In 1829 he resigned his appointments and went to Calcutta, where he resided until his death. Hamerton's compositions comprise some anthems and chants; an opera, entitled 'St. Arabin,' performed at Dublin in 1826, and a few songs and duets. He was also author of an elementary work published in 1824, entitled Vocal Instructions, combined with the Theory and Practice of Pianoforte Accompaniment.

HAMILTON, JAMES ALEXANDER (b. London, 1785; d. London, Aug. 2, 1845), was the son of a dealer in old books, and was self-educated. Music became his particular study—the theory rather than the practice. He wrote many elementary works, including a long series of useful catechisms on musical instruments and subjects, many of which have passed through numerous editions. He also translated and edited Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue, Baillot's Method for the Violin, and other important treatises. W. H. H.

HAMLET, opera in 5 acts; words by Barbier and Carré after Shakespeare; music by Ambroise Thomas. Produced Paris Opéra, Mar. 9, 1868; in Italian, as 'Amleto,' Covent Garden, June 19, 1869; New York, Academy of Music, Mar. 22, 1892. G.

HAMMER (Fr. marteau; Ger. Hammer; Ital. martello). The sound of a pianoforte is produced by hammers. In this the pianoforte resembles the dulcimer, from which we may regard it as developed by contrivance of keys and intermediate mechanism, rendering the pianoforte a sensitive instrument of touch. The pianoforte hammer consists of head and shank like any other hammer; the shank is either glued into a butt that forms its axis, or is widened out and centred or hinged with the same intention; and the blow is given and controlled by leverage more or less ingenious, and varying with the shape of the instrument and the ideas of the makers. (For illustrations of actions see PIANOFORTE.)

Both head and shank must be elastic: English makers use mahogany for the former, on which are glued thicknesses of sole or buffalo leather and specially prepared felt. Of late years single coverings of very thick felt have been successfully employed. Cedar was formerly used for the hammer shanks; the woods now employed are pear-tree, birch or hickory. The hammers gradually diminish in size and weight from bass to treble.

HAMMER, FRANZ XAYER (b. Oettingen, c. mid-18th cent.; d. circa 1813), violoncellist and viola da gambist. From 1771-78 he was in Prince Esterhazy's orchestra at Eisenstadt; from 1776 a member of the Vienna Tonkünstler Societät; in 1782 in the chapel of Prince Bathyany at Pressburg; and from 1785 in the court orchestra at Schwerin-Mecklenburg. He wrote sonatas for viola da gamba and violoncello or bass which show him in a favourable light as composer. A sonata for violoncello and basso continuo is mentioned in Q.-L., and a concerto for violoncello is given by Fétis, without particulars.

HAMMERICH, ANGUL (b. Copenhagen, Nov. 25, 1858), brother of Asger HAMERIK (q.v.), studied at the University, joining the editorial staff of Nationaltidende (daily newspaper) in 1880. Having specialised in musical history, he published several able brochures dealing with ancient Danish music, and was accorded the degree of Ph.D. at the University of Copenhagen, being also appointed Professor-extraordinary in musical history (1896). His important work Medieval Musical Relics of Denmark, in an excellent English translation, appeared in 1912, but his monumental volume as a 'musicologist' is: Dansk Musik Historie ind til c. 1700, published in 1921.

HAMMERKLAVIER, i.e. pianoforte. Beethoven's Sonata, op. 106, composed 1816-17 was superscribed by him 'Grosse Sonate für das Hammerklavier.' So is op. 101, only at that time the German fit was not so strongly on Beethoven, and he gives the Italian name as well. By op. 109 he has returned to the Italian name alone.

G.

HAMMERSCHMIDT, ANDREAS (b. Brüx, Bohemia, 1612; d. Zittau, Oct. 29 O.S., Nov. 8 N.S., 1675), composer.

His father was a saddler in good circumstances, who, being a Protestant, was obliged in 1626, on account of the Thirty Years' War, to migrate from Brüx to Freiberg in Saxony. It was at Freiberg that Hammerschmidt received his musical education from Stephen Otto. His first appointment was that of organist in the service of the Count von Büнау, at Schloss Weesenstein, 1633, in which capacity he published his first known composition, a thanksgiving piece a 8 for the victory of the Saxon army at Liegnitz, 1634. In 1635 he became organist at Freiberg, and in 1639 exchanged that post for a similar one at Zittau, where he remained till his death. His epitaph describes him as

'that noble swan who has ceased to sing here below, but now increases the choir of angels round God's throne; the Amphion of Germany, Zittau's Orpheus.'

Though his outward life was uneventful, his very numerous works made him renowned as a musician over the whole of Northern Germany, and he was on terms of intimacy with many of the most important men of his day. Among musicians he owed most to Heinrich Schütz, but he very early struck out a line of his own, which makes him of considerable importance historically, in connexion with the development of the Lutheran Church Music up to Sebastian Bach. A general list of his works in chronological order, with brief notes on the more important, will serve to illustrate his position in musical history.

1. His first work, 1634, has already been mentioned.

2. In 1638, appeared two sets of dance-pieces, 'Erster Fleiss, allerhand neuer Padvanen, Galliarden, Balletten, Mascharaden, Arden Concerten und Sarabanden' for viola a 5. Either remarks on the indications of tempo and expression occurring in this work unusual for the time.

3. 'Musicalische Andachten' (Musical Devotions), part I, 1638, with the sub-title 'Geistliche Concerten,' indicating their character as written in the Italian concerted style for solo voices with basso continuo. This work contains twenty-one settings of German sacred words for one to four voices.

4. 'Musicalische Andachten,' part II, 1641, with the sub-title 'Geistliche Madrigalien,' indicating their character as written in the choral madrigal style, in which a basso continuo is unnecessary. This work contains thirty-four pieces, 12 a 4, 18 a 5, 4 a 6.

5. 'Musicalische Andachten,' part III, with the sub-title 'Geistliche Symphonien,' 1642, containing thirty-one pieces for one and two voices, with obbligato parts for two violins and viola besides basso continuo. In these works Hammerschmidt takes Schütz as his model. Winterfeld says of them, that if he is inferior to Schütz in grandeur of conception, he surpasses him in a certain elegance and grace, and in the smoothness of his part-writing.

6. 'Weltliche Oden oder Liebesgesänge,' part I, and II, 1642-43, secular pieces for one to three voices, with instrumental accompaniment.

7. and 8. 'Dialogi oder Gespräche zwischen Gott und einer gläubigen Seele' (Dialogues between God and a faithful soul). Two parts. Dresden, 1646.

This work opened a new vein in sacred composition. Bible or chorale texts are so chosen as to give occasion to a certain dramatic contrast of the voices, thus for instance, texts of prayer or complaint, sung by one or two voices, are immediately followed or accompanied by answering texts of promise or comfort, sung by another voice. We are familiar with the later use of this device in the church cantatas of Sebastian Bach. It must be admitted that in Hammerschmidt there is little contrast of musical expression, and the musical development is but slight, but there is enough of quiet devotional expression. Some of the pieces are introduced by short instrumental symphonies (two violins with trombone and basso continuo). The first part of these 'Dialogues' contains twenty-two pieces, 10 a 2, 10 a 3 and 2 a 4; some with Latin words (D.T.Ö. viii.). The second part consists of twelve settings of Opitz's verse translations from the Song of Solomon, for one and two voices, with accompaniment of two violins and bass, followed by three so-called arias, not arias in the later sense, but in the sense in which Bach uses the word as in his motet 'Komm, Jesu, komm.'

9. 'Musicalische Andachten,' part iv, 1646, with the sub-title 'Geistliche Motetten und Concerten,' implying that the instruments indicated may be used for the most part ad libitum. This work contains forty pieces, 4 a 5, 8 a 6, 5 a 7, 15 a 8, 3 a 9, 3 a 10, 3 a 12.

10. In 1648 appeared a third part of Odes and Madrigals, sacred and secular, for one to five voices, with basso continuo.

11. Twenty Latin motets for one and two voices, with accompaniment. 1649.

12. 'Musicalische Andachten,' part v, 1652-53, with the sub-title 'Chor-musik,' contains thirty-one pieces a 5 and 6 'in Madrigal-manner.'

13. 'Musicalische Gespräche über die Sonntags- und Fest-Evangelia.' Dresden, 1655-56. This work takes up again the form of the Dialogi of 1645, and makes much use of the interweaving of 'chorale and Biblical texts. It is in two parts, and contains altogether sixty-one pieces for four to seven voices, with an increased instrumental accompaniment (flutes and trumpets occasionally employed).

14. 'Fest-Buss- und Dank-Lieder,' 1658. Thirty-two hymns for five voices and five instrumental parts ad libitum.

From this work come most of the simple chorale-tunes by Hammerschmidt, still in use in the Lutheran Church, such as 'Meinen Jesum lass ich nicht,' 'Hosianna David's Sohn,' 'Meine Seele Gott erhebet,' etc. Besides these he had already provided thirty-eight tunes for Johann Rist's 'Katechismus-Andachten,' and ten others for Rist's 'Himmliche Lieder,' which, however, never came into general use.

15. 'Kirchen- und Tafel-Musik' ('Church and Chamber-Music') darinnen 1, 2, 3 Vocal und 4, 5, 6 Instrumental-stimmen enthalten,' Zittau, 1662. Contains twenty-two pieces, including three so-called sonatas, two of them on chorales, the third written for two alto voices in unison accompanied by two trumpets and four trombones.

16. xlvii. Missa sacrae 5 ad 12 usque vocibus et instrumentis. Dresden, 1663. These masses consist only of the Kyrie and Gloria, the so-called Missa Brevis of the Lutheran church.

17. 'Sechsstimmige Fest- und Zeit-Andachten.' Dresden, 1671. Contains thirty-eight settings a 6 in motet style, but with comparative simplicity of contrapuntal treatment. One piece from this work, 'Schaff in mir Gott ein reines Herz' ('Make me a clean heart, O God'), has been reprinted in Schlegel's Musica sacra, No. 41. Several others have been reprinted by F. Conner.

18. Vopellus's Gesangbuch, 1682, contains seven four-part settings of hymn-tunes by Hammerschmidt.

HAMMERSTEIN, OSCAR (b. Berlin, Germany, 1847; d. New York, Aug. 1, 1919), German-American impresario. An unique and romantic figure in the annals of American opera, he is to be remembered for his introduction to that continent, of numerous singers of genius and of some of the best of modern operas, as well as for his stimulating effect upon his rivals. Having come to New York a penniless immigrant in 1863, after some years of lesser activities he opened, on Dec. 3, 1906, the second and better-known Manhattan Opera House, which at once became a serious rival of the Metropolitan. In April 1910 the Hammerstein interests were bought by the Metropolitan, with the stipulation that he should not produce opera in the United States for 10 years. He then came to London, built the London Opera House in Kingsway, and opened it under his own management on Nov. 13, 1911. His venture in England, however, failed. Shortly before his death Hammerstein announced that he would resume the production of opera in the United States in 1920. W. S. S.

HAMPEL, ANTON JOSEPH (d. Dresden, Mar. 30, 1771), was in Dresden court chapel from 1737. He was a famous horn virtuoso and inventor of the crooks which change the fundamental note of the HORN (q.v.). The instruments called 'Inventions horn' were made under his direction by Joh. Werner, Dresden. Punte was Hampel's most prominent pupil.

HAMPTON, JOHN, a 15th-century composer. A Salve Regina of his is in the Eton College MS. (temp. Hy. VII.). Henry Davey (Hist. Eng. Mus., p. 100) considers him identical with the Hampton of Worcester who received 20s. from Henry VII. in 1495 'for the making of Balades,' and according to West he was organist at Worcester Cathedral. (See also Q.-L.)

HANARD (HENART), MARTIN, canon and maître de chapelle at Cambrai in 1477. He is said to have been a pupil of Wm. Dufay, and Jo. Tinctoris dedicates to him his treatise 'de notis ac pautis,' giving the above date. As the spelling of names was very arbitrary in those times it is as yet uncertain how many of the works by Henart, Hemart, Haneart, Heniart, etc., are his or those of other composers. (See Q.-L.)

HANBOYS, see HAMBOYS.

HANCOCK, organ-builder. (See CRANG & HANCOCK.)

HAND BASSEL, a bowed, stringed instrument supposed by some to be a small violoncello similar to the alto violoncello of Boccherini's scores (see VIOLIN FAMILY); but Rühlman (Die Geschichte der Bogeninstrumente, 1882) states that it was a small form of double bass (Halb-violone) used for dance music, and popularly known as the 'Bierbass.'

HAND BELLS are small bells fitted with clappers and springs, and provided with leather loops as handles, which allow of their being held in the hand and struck by an upward or downward movement. They are used for the practising of change-ringing methods and also for tune-playing. In England, especially the north, there are many bands of hand-bell ringers who play music in several parts and manipulate with great dexterity chromatic sets of bells 5 octaves in compass.

HANDEL,¹ GEORGE FREDERIC (b. Halle, Lower Saxony, Feb. 23, 1685; d. London, Apr. 14, 1759). His father, Georg, was a barber-surgeon. The boy was born when his father was 63 years old and had married twice. His second wife, George Frederic's mother, was Dorothea, daughter of Georg Taust, Pastor of Giebichenstein in the neighbourhood of Halle. George Frederic's father was a hard business man, intent on making as good a living as could be obtained by watchful care over what entered and left his purse. At the same time he realised that such a procedure was worthless if not supported by sure knowledge of worldly affairs, and it was this, more than any dislike of art as such, that caused him so persistently to shut out any possibility of his son's following so uncertain a path. At 7 years of age the young Handel was sent to the Grammar School. During this period he must often have accompanied his father to Weissenfels on visits occasioned by the latter's position there as court surgeon. (The tale that on one visit the child begged to go to Weissenfels, was refused permission, ran behind the coach, and had to be taken up into it, is vouched for by Mainwaring, who is followed by Chrysander, Schoelcher, Rockstro and Streatfeild, but not by Flower or Leichtentritt.)

While at Weissenfels the boy had the opportunity of trying the chapel organ. The Duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, noticing his ability, made representations to the father in favour of George Frederic being given a musical education. The elder Handel so far altered his original plan as to arrange that his son should take lessons with Zachau, the organist of the Liebfrauenkirche at Halle, these lessons to run concurrently with his general education at the Grammar School. (Chrysander's opinion of Zachau is small, but the rightness of that judgment has been brought into question by Leichtentritt.) With Zachau George Frederic started in 1693, and during the next three years learnt from him all that he could teach of counterpoint and harmony, the organ, harpsichord, violin and oboe.

In 1696 Handel visited Berlin, where, at the court of the Electress Sophia Charlotte, he had the chance of hearing Italian music and musicians. It is not easy to see how or why the elder Handel allowed his son to pay this visit to a riotous court. While there the question arose of his being sent to Italy at the wish of the Princess, but his father's plans for a well-grounded general education were to undergo no further alteration. The boy returned to Halle in time for the death of his father.

In 1697 he became assistant organist at the Domkirche in Halle under J. C. Leporin. In Feb. 1702 he entered the University and finished the study of Law, to which his father had set him. On March 13 of the same year he was appointed organist of the Domkirche, at a yearly salary of 50 thalers and lodging, in succession to Leporin, who had been dismissed for reasons of conduct. It was at this point in his career that Handel first came under the notice of Telemann, whom he was to meet more closely later. In 1703 he left the University, gave up his organistship, and left Halle for Hamburg.

At Hamburg he attached himself to the opera, and at the opera-house, under the direction of Rheinhardt Keiser, he was given employment, first as 'violino di ripieno' and later as harpsichordist. During this time he met Mattheson, who probably used his influence to secure him pupils, and in whose company he paid a visit to Lübeck, where Handel played the organ and Mattheson the clavicembal as competitors for the post of organist, which Buxtehude was then giving up. In the liberal, licentious atmosphere of the Hamburg opera Handel found a great contrast to the life of Halle. He seems to have applied himself with quiet energy to the completing of his musical training, for which the new surroundings gave great openings. As a harpsichordist he was able to hold his own, and it was in the year following the visit to Lübeck (1704) that Mattheson, a man of great talent and pride, found that the young Handel was not easily to be pushed aside. The result of an attempt by Mattheson to dispossess Handel of his place at the harpsichord during certain moments in Mattheson's 'Cleopatra' was a duel outside the theatre after the performance. Both combatants escaped, Handel, as the story goes (Mainwaring and others following Mattheson's account in the 'Ehrenpforte'), through the agency of a waistcoat-button.

In Jan. 1705 Handel's first opera, 'Almira,' was produced at Hamburg. In the same year a second opera, 'Nero,' was produced. The music of this latter has never come to light. By this time Gaston de' Medici, husband of Princess Anna Maria of Saxe-Lauenburg,¹ brother of the Grand-Duke Ferdinand of Tuscany, had come into contact with Handel. It was on his suggestion that Handel turned his thoughts towards Italy. The legend that Gaston de' Medici paid the expenses of the journey has been disproved. The whole question of how Handel succeeded in getting across Europe is difficult to elucidate. It is certain that Gaston de' Medici was not in a financial position to render assistance, and it is difficult to believe that Handel himself had saved sufficient from his work in Hamburg to see him through so large an undertaking. It is known that at that time he was subsidising his mother, so that no help would be likely to come from that quarter. Before leaving Hamburg, Handel completed two operas, 'Florindo' and 'Dafne.' These were in reality the two halves of a large opera written at the request of Sauerbey, and divided thus for purposes of easier performance. Besides these operas, an oratorio to German words by Postel on the Passion according to St. John was composed. In 1706 Handel left Hamburg. (Chrysander says that he spent Christmas 1706 at Halle. Leichtentritt accepts this. Flower, basing his assertion on a document which seems to point to Handel's being in Rome by Jan. 14, 1707, discountenances the idea.)

The question of the route by which Handel reached Italy is as uncertain as that of the provenance of the financial means by which he was able to make the journey. Mattheson mentions a Herr v. Binitz as affording the necessary money. Leichentritt is unable to accept this tale. Handel first stayed in Florence at the palace of Ferdinand de' Medici, and during this first visit he composed a number of cantatas to Italian words, probably with the idea of rendering himself thoroughly acquainted with the methods of his Italian contemporaries, Carissimi, Leo, Alessandro Scarlatti and others. He also rearranged the overture to 'Almira,' and added some dances, the whole to be used a few months later as the overture to 'Rodrigo.'

Early in 1707 he moved on to Rome, where he does not appear to have found any especial outlet for his talent. The influence of Carissimi, one which showed itself in the new form of the oratorio then being experimented with, and in the manner of treating voice-parts in cantatas, may at this time have begun to make itself felt with Handel. But this first visit was only a preparation for what was to come later. To this time in Rome the two Latin Psalms 'Dixit Dominus' and 'Nisi Dominus' and a 'Laudate Pueri' are ascribed.

In July 1707 Handel returned to Florence and, during his second visit there, succeeded in impressing the Florentines with his powers as executant and composer. His opera 'Rodrigo' was performed in Florence with great success. As to whether the production took place during his first or his second visit is uncertain, the last page of the manuscript score on which the date most probably once stood is missing. It is, however, hardly likely that he would have gone to Rome if the opera was finished during his first Florentine visit (Flower). It was during the second stay in Florence that the love affair with a singer is supposed, according to Mainwaring, to have taken place. Chrysander's suggestion that the singer in question was Vittoria Tesi has been proved to be untenable by Ademollo and Streatfeild. It is possible that Vittoria Tarquini filled the part, but the whole history of the episode is vague.

At the end of the year (Rockstro has Jan. 1708) Handel went to Venice, where, either then or on a later visit, he met Domenico Scarlatti. The story that he was first discovered by Scarlatti at a masked ball in Venice, where his playing on the harpsichord attracted attention and the remark, 'That must either be the famous Saxon or the Devil himself,' is quoted from Mainwaring by Leichentritt and Rockstro, but discredited by Flower.

Early in 1708 Handel journeyed to Rome. This time the impressions he made and received were stronger than at the first visit. He was introduced into the cultured and musical society of which Cardinal Pietro Ottobuoni and the Marquis di Ruspoli were the leaders, with both of whom he stayed. He also attended meetings of the 'Arcadia' (see E. J. Dent, Scarlatti, and Leichentritt), though, being a foreigner, he was excluded from full membership. Compositions belonging to this period are the oratorios, 'La Resurrezione' and 'Il Trionfo del Tempo e del Disinganno,' the first to a poem of Sigismondo Capecce, the second to one by Cardinal Benedetto Panfilii. Also a 'Gloria Patri' for double choir and two orchestras. Here he will have met Corelli, Alessandro Scarlatti and probably Pasquini.

In June 1708 he went to Naples, where he stayed for nearly a year. On his arrival he at once started on the composition of the serenata 'Aci, Galatea e Polifemo,' in which is the famous bass aria, sung by Boschi, that has a compass of two octaves and a sixth. In the early months of 1709 he returned to Rome, when he first met the Abbé Steffani (Shedlock). He stayed until the autumn, and then journeyed again to Venice, where the opera 'Agripina,' written in Naples, was produced on Dec. 26 with very great success, being played for 27 nights running. Here he probably became acquainted with Prince Ernst August, younger brother of the Elector of Hanover, and an invitation to Hanover reached him from that quarter. The Duke of Manchester, English ambassador to the Venetian court, struck with Handel's abilities, discussed with him the possibility of his coming to London.

On Jan. 16, 1710, Handel, having left Italy, took up the appointment of Kapellmeister to the Elector George of Hanover at a yearly salary of one thousand thalers. The post had been vacated by Steffani. Before taking up the position Handel was able to enter into an arrangement with his employer that leave should be granted him for a visit to England. After only a few weeks at Hanover he went to Halle, to find one sister but lately dead and to attend the marriage of another. From there he went to London, making a short stay in Düsseldorf.

EARLY WORKS. — The operas 'Almira,' 'Nero,' 'Florindo' and 'Dafne,' and the Passion according to St. John, which Handel wrote while at Hamburg, are the work of a period when his talent was still being exercised in the preparation of unexplored ground. When his age is taken into account, the works can be accepted as a precocious expression of feeling and technical accomplishment. The Passion alone is a remarkable work for a composer's nineteenth year. The success of his work at this point may be taken as earnest of the fact that from early years he possessed an ability for assimilating quickly the style of the surroundings in which he moved. This can be seen in reference to the next works, those that were composed in Italy.

The chamber cantatas of the Italian period are modelled on those of contemporaries, such is the elder Scarlatti, and on the old Madrigal writers. The 'Dixit Dominus' and the 'Nisi Dominus' show the influence of Leo and Carissimi. The 'Laudate Pueri' is thought by some (Leichtentritt, Chrysander, Rockstro) to have been composed when Handel was still at Halle, and to have been transposed and arranged for performance in Rome. In 'La Resurrezione,' the vocal and orchestral technique of the Roman composers of the period is employed. As to whether this oratorio or the opera 'Agrippina' was written first is, according to Leichtentritt, uncertain. In both works there are arias that are ressemblant, and in the oratorio the part written for Lucifer has a striking likeness to the large-compassed Polifemo part in the seronata 'Aci, Galatea e Polifemo.' 'Rodrigo,' Handel's first Italian opera, shows still some of the influence from the Hamburg days of Keiser, and in the overture and the hero's first aria material from 'Almira' is used again. The 'Trionfo del Tempo' is the earliest form of that work, which was altered for performance in London in 1737, and yet again, translated into English and much added to, in 1757. 'Aci, Galatea e Polifemo,' dating from 1708, when Handel was at Naples, is likewise the forerunner of a version performed in England in 1732. 'Agrippina' is an advance on 'Rodrigo' in the assurance with which the dramatic situations are dealt with, and in the increased freedom of vocal and orchestral writing. It points the way to the first London opera, linking the early with the more mature works. A 'Gloria Patri' has lately been found in the collection of the Rev. E. Goddard (from where it passed into the possession of W. H. Cummings, and is now in the British Museum). The MS. is a copy dating from the Roman visits, the original having been lost by fire in 1860.

VISIT TO LONDON.—Music in London, when Handel arrived there in 1710, was under the influence, new and strong at the time, of Italian opera. Purcell had been dead for fifteen years, and his master, Blow, who outlived him, did not possess sufficient power to carry on the succession. Composers then living, were lacking in just that brilliance and effectiveness which the aristocrats of Anne's reign looked for and found in Italian opera. Handel at once set to work on the libretto of 'Rinaldo,' which he completed in fourteen days, one of the first instances of his speed of composition and his harrying of librettists. The opera was produced in great style by Aaron Hill at the Queen's Theatre in the Haymarket. Its success was great. Steele's and Addison's satires (Spectator, Tatler) on the production are interesting commentaries, as well as useful sources of information as to contemporary operatic stage-technique. It was during this visit that Handel used to arrange to be locked in with the fourteen-year-old Maurice Greene at St.

Paul's Cathedral, and stay playing the organ there by the hour (Burney). After six months Handel returned to Hanover, making another short stay at Düsseldorf. During this second Hanoverian period are placed the chamber duets, the nine German songs, some harpsichord music and the oboe concertos. In the autumn Handel went again to Halle for the baptism of a niece. After that he remained in Hanover until the spring of 1712, when he left once more for England.

The chamber duets which Handel wrote for use at the Hanoverian court were modelled on that form already introduced there by STEFFANI (q.v.). Of the twelve German songs included by Chrysander in the Händelgesellschaft edition, three date from Halle. (Seiffert thinks that the words of these three songs, as well as those of a Funeral Ode for Handel's father, are by the composer himself.) The nine that remain have been placed by Seiffert in the year 1729, thus correcting Chrysander's date of 1711-16. The question of the date of the six oboe concertos is as yet unsettled. Chrysander places them in this period. Rockstro feels that they belong to the Cannons days, Leichtentritt that they are rearrangements of youthful work from Halle.

A few weeks after reaching London Handel finished a new opera, 'Il Pastor Fido,' which Rossi, librettist of 'Rinaldo,' had made up for him. His successes during the former visit were not forgotten, and he did not lack patrons and friends, chief among them being the Earl of Burlington, with whom he stayed. For the celebrations of the peace of Utrecht he wrote the Utrecht Te Deum for production on July 7, 1713, thus bringing himself to the near notice of Queen Anne, whose birthday Ode he had already produced on Feb. 6, and who now settled on him a yearly pension of two hundred pounds. 'Il Pastor Fido' was not a success, and in 1714 Handel produced 'Teseo,' which had better fortune. In that same year the Queen died, and the Elector of Hanover succeeded her.

Handel's second journey to London cannot be called a visit. He overstayed his leave, and before he had decided to return his master came to the English throne, and Handel stayed on for all time. In May 1715 he wrote the opera 'Amadigi,' and at this time the reconciliation with King George must have taken place. The question of the Water Music has been much discussed. All authorities, from Mainwaring onwards, have repeated the tale. Prof. Michael (Englische Geschichte im 18. Jahrhundert) on the authority of a diplomatist's letter written in 1717 describing a journey of the King down the river for which he had invited Handel to compose some music, has cast some doubt on the probability of the tale. However, Leichtentritt, correcting the date of Handel's compositions for the King's water-party, thinks it likely that some sort of reconciliation must have taken place before 1717, and is willing to accept Mainwaring's original account. Barclay Squire tended to agree with Prof. Michael's choice of the later date.¹

The 'Water-Music' is made up of pieces written at different times and only collected for publication in 1740, and there may well have been included some numbers that had been written for a river-party in 1715. (Flower emphasises strongly the idea started by Prof. Michael.) In any case Handel was received back into favour by George I., and the pension he had enjoyed under Anne was confirmed and doubled. In Jan. 1716 he went with the King to Hanover. He visited Halle, and was accompanied on his return to England by J. C. Schmidt of Anspach, a friend of his university days, who, with his son, was to serve Handel to the end of his career. Handel's last work on a German text, a Passion to a poem of Brockes, which was set by Keiser, Telemann and Mattheson also (see PASSION MUSIC), was composed during this period in Hanover.

OPERA IN LONDON.—On returning to London early in 1717 Handel succeeded Pepusch as Kapellmeister to the Duke of Chandos, and at his palace at Cannons were composed the Chandos Anthems (1719), the pastoral 'Acis and Galatea' (1720), and the first form of the oratorio 'Esther' (1720), under its original title of 'Hamman and Mordecai, a Masque.' At the same time he interested himself in musical events in London, and became a director with Giovanni Maria Bononcini and Attilio Ariosti of the new opera venture, the Royal Academy of Music, started in 1719 with the support of the King and such noble amateurs as Burlington and the Duke of Newcastle. Handel left England in search of singers, and came into touch with an Italian company at Dresden, among them being Senesino, Boschi and Dura-tanti, whence he was able to supply the needs of the King's Theatre venture. It was while at Halle on this journey that he narrowly missed a meeting with J. S. Bach.

The first season of the Royal Academy in 1720 was a success, artistically and financially. By then Handel had severed his connexion with Cannons, and was securely started on the long course of operas which was to keep him at work for the next twenty-one years. But jealousy of his own success was beginning to make itself felt. A party of rivals was forming, and after the first Handel opera of the season, 'Radamisto,' it was maliciously arranged that the plot of 'Muzio Scaevola' should be used as a trial piece, Act 1 being composed by Filippo Mattei (Pipo), Act 2 by Bononcini, and Act 3 by Handel. Matters were not eased by this kind of procedure.

The second season (Nov. 1719–July 1721), during which 'Muzio Scaevola' was produced, was taken up otherwise by works of the remaining two directors. The third season opened on Dec. 9, 1721, with Handel's 'Floridante.' For the fourth season the famous soprano, Cuzzoni, was engaged, and Handel continued to produce operas, gradually winning an ascendancy in the popular esteem over Bononcini, who, ever since the opening of the Academy, had allowed himself to be set up as a rival. In the fifth season (Nov. 1723–June 1724) Handel held the stage. But the high fees of Cuzzoni, Senesino and the like were weakening the exchequer.

In the seventh season (Nov. 1725–Jan. 1726) the directors had the temerity to engage Faustina Bordoni (see HASSE), a move which caused endless trouble, the jealousy between her and Cuzzoni being made the excuse for intense expressions of party feeling, which soon degenerated into rowdiness, and at length emptied the opera-house of all decent-minded audiences. Addison's outburst at the performance of 'Rinaldo' was now surpassed by the lampoons and epigrams in a press less polished than the Spectator. The battle between Handel and Bononcini continued, added to by that between Faustina and Cuzzoni and between the rival factions of the King and the Prince of Wales. Through all this Handel continued to produce opera after opera. But the Academy was not to last. In Feb. 1726 Handel took out naturalisation papers. The end of the eighth season came in June 1727. In Oct. George I. died. For the Coronation of George II. Handel wrote the four Coronation Anthems, the first of which is 'Zadok the Priest.' In Jan. 1728 the 'Beggars' Opera' was first performed, and its success was instantaneous. In June of that year the ninth and last season of the opera ended, and the venture collapsed under a large deficit.

Handel was not seriously affected by the bankruptcy of the Academy. Indeed, he had enough money to be able to start a fresh venture with Heidegger at the King's Theatre. He went to Italy for singers, found time to pay a visit to his aged mother at Halle, and returned to London in time to prepare 'Lotario' for the first night of the new season (Dec. 2). The opera was a failure. Public taste had been drawn away from the Italian style, and the success of the 'Beggars' Opera' had strengthened that tendency. This Handel chose to ignore, and continued to write works that were artistically excellent, but had very little appeal for the public. 'Acis and Galatea' and 'Esther,' however, had a certain amount of success. They were performed in costume, but without action. A revival of 'Rinaldo' in 1731, following successful performances of 'Poros,' helped matters temporarily.

The first performance of the oratorio 'Deborah' took place on Mar. 17, 1733. In July of that year Handel conducted his works at Oxford, and refused the proffered doctorate. During this summer he had quarrelled with Senesino, his most popular and able castrato, and thus matters were made no easier for himself and Heidegger in their burden of making the King's Theatre venture financially sound. In the meantime a new opera company had been set going, sponsored by the Prince of Wales and his friends, as a deliberate counterblast to Handel and, through him, to his patron the King. The venture was housed in the Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre, and chiefly for political reasons attracted fair audiences, at least larger ones than did Handel and Heidegger. This 'Opera of the Nobility' commissioned the best singers, and was able to secure such attractions as Farinelli, Boschi and Cuzzoni, besides others lured away from the King's Theatre. In July 1734 Heidegger and Handel gave up the partnership. At once the 'Opera of the Nobility' stepped in and leased the King's Theatre. There was nothing left for Handel but to move into the one just vacated in Lincoln's Inn Fields.

On Oct. 5, 1734, he opened a new season, sole head of this undertaking, with 'Ariadne.' On Dec. 18 he started a fresh season, this time at Covent Garden, with 'Ariodante.' From then onwards through the next three years he worked continuously, producing a succession of operas, refusing to pander to the public taste, mastering a grave illness (1735), seeking relief by visits to Tunbridge Wells (1735 and 1736), and obtaining a great, if momentary, success with the oratorio 'Alexander's Feast,' in which the tenor, Beard, one of his greatest discoveries, first appeared. In 1737 he was forced to close the theatre and to go into bankruptcy. He was enabled to come to an arrangement with his creditors for payment at a future date, a promise which he scrupulously kept. He then left for Aix-la-Chapelle to seek a cure for the paralysis which had been attacking him persistently through the strenuous times of the last year.

HANDEL'S STYLE IN OPERA.—From 1711–37 Handel worked unceasingly at the composition of operas. After 1737 material considerations caused him to turn his attention to oratorios. The opinion that has had highest currency during the last century is that the most representative Handelian utterance is to be found in the work of these later years. Modern research and performance tend to show that in this mass of operatic creation there exists an indubitable and real expression of Handel's character and of his genius, and that the emphasis that has always been laid on the oratorios, and on the 'Messiah' in particular, has resulted in a one-sided appreciation of his powers, doing insufficient justice to his creative effort as a whole.

The operas show the influence of his surroundings in a marked degree. In the early works, from 'Almira' to 'Rodrigo,' it is the work of Keiser which he studied and lived amongst at Hamburg that served him as model. The Venetian school of Caldara, Legrenzi and Lotti that he came into contact with in 1707 affected the composition of 'Agrippina.' In the first London operas, 'Rinaldo,' 'Pastor Fido' and others, the influence of his friend of the Italian days, Alessandro Scarlatti, and his predecessor at Hanover, Steffani, is noticeable. The effective writing for voices which Handel had learnt from them both was put to use in these early works, where the conventions of the stage rendered it necessary to employ solo voices much and often, and in such later operas as 'Atalanta,' 'Poro,' 'Orlando' and 'Tamerlano,' where duets and trios were introduced. (In 'Rinaldo,' for example, the whole opera consists of recitative and aria, with the exception of the last chorus, which cannot truthfully be called such, but is a four-part concerted number, in which all six characters join for the expected happy ending.)

It was not until the later works, such as 'Orlando,' 'Giulio Cesare' and 'Tamerlano,' that Handel began to enlarge the scope of the operatic conventions and endeavoured to vitalise the stereotyped methods of procedure. The characterisation of the protagonists is drawn as clearly and deeply as the circumstances of singer and song would allow. Orchestral colour is used with increasing effect (the sleep scene in 'Semele'; 'Giulio Cesare,' Act ii.). The recitatives are made the vehicle of greatest expressiveness and the means of urging on the action. ('Tamerlano,' last act; 'Giulio Cesare,' third act; 'Orlando,' second act.)¹ These attempts thus to better the state of opera could not, in the nature of the case, be other than sporadic. The depressing financial considerations that filled Handel's career during his period of management (1728–37) made it necessary to work at greater speed than was compatible with careful attention to detail, and incidentally may have caused him to indulge increasingly in those broad effects of characterisation which were so successful in the oratorios, and which seem, now, to be the very essence of his style.

The librettists who served Handel with opera texts were little more than scribes. With a complete absence of poetic feeling and with a very rudimentary dramatic sense, they strung together couplet after couplet, seemingly overwhelmed by the realisation that their words could only be tolerated as pegs on which to hang tunes. Addison's sarcastic allusions to the Rossi libretto of 'Rinaldo' cannot be withstood, though 'Angelletti che cantate,' the aria on which he fixed for his most biting comment, is really a poetic conceit of a higher order than most of those employed by the writers of these texts. It is evident that Handel's favourite librettists were Nicola Haym, Paolo Rolli and Metastasio. Haym wrote words for several operas, among them the two successful productions 'Giulio Cesare' and 'Tamerlano.' Rolli was employed for a series of five operas, including the popular 'Scipio.' At a later date Handel set his 'Deidamia,' the last opera, after a gap of thirteen years since the previous Rolli text, 'Riccardo I.' Metastasio alone among the libretto-makers was a poet with a real sense of the stage. His libretti for the three operas of Handel, 'Siroe,' 'Poro' and 'Ezio,' are full of imagery that is sufficiently simple to be practicable of realisation in arias and duets, and yet arresting enough to have some dramatic significance, helping the action instead of obstructing it, as was the case with so many other librettists. Handel set these three texts between 1728 and 1732. Had he been able to give them the attention of careful application that they demand, his success would have been great. But he was starting on a period of strenuous labour against petty difficulties, and had to take the Metastasio tales in his stride. For all that he altered and disfigured the libretto of 'Ezio,' Chrysander compares his setting favourably with the later setting by Gluck. It was 'Poro' that revived the prospects of the Handel-Heidegger partnership in 1731.

The operas can be divided, according to the subjects treated, into three sections: those that deal (i.) with historical subjects, (ii.) with classical myths, and (iii.) with romantic subjects. In the first section there are such operas as 'Giulio Cesare.' A sketch of the plot of this opera will serve as example for all three classes noted above, since the general formation of scenario is similar for them all, regardless of which section they may be placed in from the point of view of subject.

The scene is laid in Egypt at the time when Caesar has just triumphed over Pompey. He is heard promising Pompey's wife pardon for her husband and family, when there enters Achilles, sent by Ptolemy and bearing Pompey's head, which Ptolemy had taken the chance of securing when he intercepted Pompey's flight. The scene closes with Cornelia's sorrow and Sextus, her son's, cry of revenge. The next scene shows Cleopatra preparing herself to meet Caesar. She hopes to persuade him to debar Ptolemy from the throne of Egypt. Caesar promises her his aid, and then Cleopatra, learning that Sextus is bent on revenging on Ptolemy the death of his father, finds opportunity to help on that project. In the next scene Ptolemy is entertaining Caesar in his palace. Sextus enters, challenges Ptolemy to a duel, but is taken prisoner with his mother by the guards. The second and third acts are prolonged, with a bewildering variation of plot and counterplot, through the history of an attempted assassination of Caesar, another of Ptolemy by Sextus (both failures), the battle between Cleopatra and Ptolemy, in which the former is made prisoner, the eventual death of Ptolemy at Sextus's hand, and the rejoicings of all that are left. For all its involution, such a plot gives opportunity for dramatic characterisation. In such a place as Act i. sc. 1, when Cornelia is mourning her dead Pompey, Sextus planning revenge on Ptolemy, Caesar standing stricken with the awful tragedy, and Achilles, the bearer of the head, remaining aloof and unmoved, Handel places one of his most dramatic concerted numbers. The same applies to the scene between Caesar and Cleopatra when the murderers approach, and to that where, on the seashore, Caesar intervenes between the dying Achilles and Sextus. In this opera, as in all, there are certain moments of great and effective beauty. The weak point lies in the wire-drawn plot, which makes any clarity of portrayal practically impossible. As an example of the opera tale founded on classical mythology, 'Admetus' may be instanced. 'Floridante,' 'Tamerlano' and 'Orlando' all belong to that class of opera that is based on a romantic legend.

Apart from these there stands the English pastoral 'Acis and Galatea,' differing from them all in freshness of presentation, surpassed by none of them in technical brilliance. The action goes forward with the least possible interruption. The balance between musical and dramatic interest is perfectly held. The choral writing is simple in context and boldly outlined, and the chorus itself plays a natural and important part in the action of the tale.

HARPSICHORD MUSIC.—In 1720 Handel, who held the post of music-master to the Princesses Anne and Caroline, daughters of George II., published the first set of suites 'pour le clavecin,' the second set being published in 1733. In the first book there are eight suites, and the same number in the second. This second volume was published by Walsh without Handel's permission. A third collection of short suite movements, many of them placed together unconnectedly, appeared at a later date. In 1735 six fugues for the harpsichord were published. In addition to this there is in vol. 48 of the Gesellschaft edition a 'Klavier-Buch aus der Jugendzeit,' a collection of early pieces of more historical than artistic worth. All Handel's music written for the harpsichord or clavichord suffers from one defect. In comparison with J. S. Bach, Domenico Scarlatti, Couperin or Rameau, it is angular without gaining character, hard without brilliance. It is probable that his own playing, which is known to have been of the highest order of technical accomplishment, was largely improvisational. This would account, in part, for the bareness of his published keyboard works, and for their harmonic paucity. In performance the cold succession of tonic and dominant in the variations would have been clothed in ornamentation and the sharpness of the melodic declivities rounded by appoggiature. The reason for the printing and publishing of all the books of suites is harder to account for. Probably only the first book was ever meant by Handel to be made public. That and the second book contain the best of the works. The first book shows more signs of careful preparation than the second, though the very opening Prelude of the first suite (in A major) is left in a sketchy state, which presupposes an improvisation at performance. In this book there is a set of variations in E major that has been labelled the 'Harmonious Blacksmith,' and around which a tale has grown up which has since been proved spurious. Here, too, there is to be found the Passacaille in G minor (7th suite), a work in which Handel approaches most nearly to the monumental style of his choral writing. This whole suite has a homogeneity that raises it above the rest. The movements are bound together by something stronger than kinship of key. They have an affinity of feeling, as, for instance, between the Andante and the Sarabande, the Allegro and the Passacaille, which itself balances the stately overture. In the second book of suites there are less signs of preparation for the publisher. The Aria in B flat major of Suite I. is that which was used by Brahms as the theme for his Variations for piano, opus 24.

LATER YEARS.—Handel returned from Aix-la-Chapelle cured of his paralytic affection in time to compose the anthem for the funeral of Queen Caroline on Nov. 20, 1737. Heidegger, once more in possession of the King's Theatre, produced, between now and 1741, the remainder of Handel's operas. But Handel's thoughts were turning with increasing frequency to the possibilities that lay in oratorio. On Mar. 28, 1738, he was persuaded to hold a benefit concert. With the thousand pounds procured by this means he was able financially to clear himself of debt. On May 7, in the same year, Roubillac's statue¹ was unveiled in Vauxhall Gardens, for which place it had been commissioned by Jonathan Tyers, owner of the gardens.

In 1739 'Saul' and 'Israel in Egypt' were performed. In 1740 'L' Allegro, il Penseroso e il Moderato,' a resetting, by Charles Jennens, of Milton, was produced. (Burney says that the double bassoon, for which there is a distinctive part in this oratorio, was first made at Handel's suggestion for the coronation of George II., but was not used then.)

The invitation to Ireland came from the Lord-Lieutenant (the Duke of Devonshire) and the Governors of three charitable institutions. In Dublin he gave a series of concerts, repeating 'Il Penseroso,' 'Alexander's Feast' and 'Imeneo,' and eventually producing the 'Messiah,' which had been written down in the 23 days between the previous Aug. 22 and Sept. 14² on Apr. 13, 1742. The success of all this was instantaneous. The 'Messiah' was received with fervour. In spite of that, however, when he returned to London in the spring of 1743, the work, produced after eight successful performances of 'Samson,' fell flat. Not until the Foundling Hospital performances of 1750 onwards did it attract the English people. Since then there has been no dearth of performances.

After the first performances of the 'Messiah' in London Handel fell ill, and had to have recourse again to the cure at Tunbridge Wells. On Nov. 27, 1743, the Dettingen Te Deum was performed in the Chapel Royal in commemoration of the victory of the English troops. In 1744 Handel produced 'Joseph' (Mar. 2) and 'Semele' (spring); in 1745 'Herakles' (Jan. 5) (Rockstro says this was written in 1750 and produced in 1751) and 'Belshazzar' (Mar. 27). But the hostility of the aristocratic Londoners broke out once again, and his evening concerts at the King's Theatre became the scene of rowdy demonstrations. His audiences dwindled and at the end of his second season in 1745 he was again bankrupt and again broken in health. He retired to Tunbridge Wells, and did not return until August. The Stuart rising called forth the 'Occasional Oratorio,' which was produced in Feb. 1746. 'Judas Maccabæus,' written in commemoration of Culloden, was finished ready for performance on Apr. 1, 1747. In that year he was visited by Gluck.

On Mar. 9, 1748, 'Alexander Balus' was produced, and, on the 23rd of the same month, 'Joshua.' On Feb. 10, 1749, 'Susanna,' on Mar. 17 'Solomon,' and on Apr. 27 the Firework music were performed. On Mar. 16, 1750, the production of 'Theodora' took place, and in July Handel left England for Germany, travelling through Holland, where he suffered a severe carriage accident. He visited Halle.

During 1751 he worked on 'Jephtha,' which was produced on Feb. 26, 1752, and the first sensations of weakness of the eyes were felt. He took some precautions, and eventually underwent three operations for quinta serena. By 1753 he had completely lost his sight.³

The long list of Handel's oratorios stretches from the German Passion according to St. John in 1704 to 'Jephtha' in 1751. From 'Hamman and Mordecai, a Masque' (1720), which, seeing that it was also the original version of 'Esther,' was the first oratorio to an English text, until the performance of the later form of that work (1732), he was engaged on the production of the operas. 'Esther' may be said to begin the succession of oratorios, followed in the next year by 'Athalia,' and then in 1738 by 'Saul,' after which the spaces between the appearances of the oratorios grow smaller up to the time when two were made public in each of the years 1744 and 1745, 1748 and 1749, with the 'Occasional Oratorio' in 1746, 'Judas Macabæus' in 1747 and 'Theodora' in 1750.

HANDEL'S STYLE IN ORATORIO.—The history of the oratorio may be said to begin with the Florentine Emilio de' Cavalieri in 1600. A century later Carissimi in Rome set the standard of the new type of choral writing, and it was his declamatory and rhythmic choruses that Handel took as model for his own early oratorios. With Handel the form took on a new significance. If in opera he effected little reformation of any extended effectiveness, in oratorio he brought the level of artistry to a higher plane than his contemporaries. The difference between the work of Carissimi and that of the later Handel is more than one of technicalities only. Where Carissimi in 'Jephtha,' faithful to his Italian antecedents, softens the outlines and smooths the declivities, bringing the whole within the confines of a sympathetic suavity, Handel, guided by the operatic experience of his past years, does not hesitate to draw his characters incisively, especially where the main part of the action takes place in the chorus. In 'Israel in Egypt' the chorus is the protagonist. There Handel has exerted his ingenuity in solving the problem of a rational use of the chorus as a dramatic medium. The result is not wholly successful because of the comparative rigidity of that medium. But the work remains as a starting-point for so much of his own and of later composers that on that count it must be adjudged worthy.

The 'Messiah' is more balanced in architecture. The contrast between aria, recitative and chorus is made definite use of. The three divisions of the work follow on one from the other with an inevitable impetus. There is a feeling of philosophic calm present in even the most emotional moments which precludes that sentimentality which the subject might in other minds have engendered.

As 'Acis and Galatea' stands apart from the other operas (and it is so operatic in intention that there is difficulty in classing it among the oratorios) so does 'Semele' differ from the oratorios that are contemporary with it. The two works are the links that join the separate aspects of Handel's creative effort. 'Semele' is too cumbersome to stage well under present-day conditions.¹ It is, as well, too long for performance as an oratorio before the average modern audience. Thus it suffers from lack of support on both sides. And yet the work is one of the most finely proportioned that Handel ever wrote. It is a mature expression of his philosophy. Also it contains such airs as 'Where'er you walk' and scenes such as the sleep scene, than which he wrote few more satisfying pieces of sustained dramatisation. The words, by Congreve, were first written with the idea of operatic performance in 1707, and were set by Eccles. Handel altered and set them in their present form in 1743.

Of the librettists that Handel employed for the texts of the oratorios a certain interest attaches to Charles Jennens, who bowdlerised Milton's 'L' Allegro,' adding his own 'L' Moderato,' and who was librettist of 'Saul,' 'Belshazzar' and the 'Messiah.' The text of the last-named is made up, with some skill and a moderate feeling for the words, from the Scriptures. Flower holds that the actual choice of passages was made by a secretary, Poole. Congreve's words to 'Semele' contain some excellent lines, and much that is poorly fabricated. Dryden's 'Alexander's Feast' is uniformly good, and gave Handel the opportunity for some of his best descriptive music. 'Samson' was put together by Newburgh Hamilton from Milton's Samson Agonistes. Morrell made up the texts of 'Alexander Balus,' 'Joshua,' 'Solomon,' 'Theodora' and 'Jephtha.'

The circumstances in which the later oratorios were composed were in one respect more favourable than in the operatic period. Though financial worries were not absent, and though the aristocracy still pursued Handel with malicious intent, he was freed from the continual burden of an unruly band of singers. The soloists whom he gathered round him were for the most part native artists; some of them had been trained by him from early times, and nearly all were willing servants on whose good faith he could rely.

CONCERTOS.—By this time Handel had added to the attractions of his oratorio concerts by the performance of organ concertos. These compositions differ from the work of contemporary writers for the instrument in one important direction, that of their undoubted secularity. It must be remembered, when considering this point, that they were destined, in the first place, as show pieces in which the virtuoso could exhibit his powers and those of his instrument. In the next place, they were inserted between sections of oratorio with the definite purpose of providing relaxation, and in order that a lighter atmosphere might pervade the audience. They did not attempt to add anything to the interpretation of the oratorio in the middle of which they were set. There are certainly some concertos in which echoes of other works can be heard (for example, the third concerto of the second book which opens with the phrase of the 'Hallelujah' chorus). But this cannot be taken as sufficient proof that the concertos were written for performance with definite oratorios.

The first collection of organ concertos was published by Walsh in 1738, and consisted of six concertos numbered opus 4. The second set appeared in 1740, a third was published after Handel's death in 1760, and a fourth was included in Arnold's edition in 1797. It is difficult to gather from the concertos any idea of Handel's powers as an organ player. As harpsichord music (the title-page of the first set has 'for the harpsichord or organ') they possess the brilliance which is native to that instrument. As organ music they show an unwonted tendency away from the gravity that has always been associated therewith.

Pedal organs had not been introduced into England at that date (see article ORGAN), and Handel's concertos are printed on two staves. Handel will have understood the use and realised the effectiveness of pedals, for continental organs on which he played had employed them long since. It is probable that the direction 'Pedalo' (placed at a solo passage in the first movement of the first concerto, second set) and the direction 'Organo a 2 Clav. e Pedale' in the second movement of the same concerto should be taken as evidence that this work was written for performance on a continental organ, during one of Handel's visits abroad. Rockstro argues, from the existence of these directions for the use of pedals, that since the concerto in which they appear must have been played somewhere in England, therefore the date of the introduction of pedal organs into the country must be placed earlier than is generally done. But it is difficult to believe that pedals were of much assistance in Handel's concertos since, in many solo passages, the groups of semi-quavers are so rapid that the rattle of the pedal trackers alone would have taken away from the delicacy of the ornamentation, which seems rather to demand the clarity and precision of manual work. The production of these concertos in a theatre must have meant a much smaller instrument than those used in cathedrals and churches.

Among the purely instrumental works the Twelve Grand Concertos (1739) are noteworthy. A seven-part string orchestra (three parts for the concertino, four for the concerto grosso) is used, and there is a figured bass for the accompanying harpsichord. Handel arranged his score with the concertino placed together at the top of the page. Chrysander, in the Gesellschaft edition, placed the solo violoncello part with that of the concerto grosso to facilitate reading. The instrumentation is of the straightforward type of the overtures with effects of orchestral colour introduced, when at all, broadly. The works are uniformly mature and unhesitatingly effective. They range from the deep melancholy of the sixth¹ to the humour and gaiety of its neighbour the seventh.

During 1753 Handel gave a series of concerts with the aid of Christopher Smith, son of his old amanuensis. At these concerts he played the organ concertos from memory and extemporised on the organ. During the ensuing years he continued to conduct performances of his works from the organ. In 1757 he reset 'Il Trionfo' for the third time to a translation of Panfil's text. The work showed no signs of weakening powers and drew large audiences. On Apr. 6, 1759, he presided at the organ at a performance of the 'Messiah' at Covent Garden. On the 14th he died in his house in Brook Street, Grosvenor Square. He was buried at eight in the evening of Apr. 20 in Westminster Abbey. The Gentlemen of the Chapel Royal and the choirs of the Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral sang Croft's Funeral Anthem at the ceremony.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS.—Handel was a magnificent opportunist. In the days of his youth it gave him pleasure to take what material lay ready to his hand and to fashion it into the finest art-forms. Later in life, stern necessity so arranged things that what had once been an enthralling game became a hard reality. He never was able to confine his activities. All his ventures were large and extended, requiring the service and management of many people under the guidance of a commanding personality. Leaving to Heidigger the financial side of the partnership, he made himself responsible for the more difficult task of placating Senesino, keeping Faustina and Cuzzoni from doing physical injury to each other, and getting good work out of all parties in spite of their jarring personalities. With such material to deal with, he was in no position to succeed through any other than strong action.

He took what was ready to his hand and worked with and by means of that. But for this infrangible adaptability it is doubtful if he could have accomplished either the amount and quality of work he did or have overcome the difficulties with which the whole of his career was encumbered. The one outstanding example of stubbornness or failure to grasp the import of the moment, that point in his career when, in 1728, he steadily refused to pander to or cater for the public taste as exemplified in the 'Boggar's Opera,' and as steadily continued to produce opera after opera in a style that had already tired the London audiences and which they did not take the trouble to come and hear, that curious momentary inability to foresee the trend of events is the more noteworthy for the usually sharp perceptiveness that guided his actions with regard to the public and the fare he placed before them. Probably the lapse was due to exhaustion after the Bononcini struggles which engendered bitterness of temper and a corresponding blindness to realities.

The tales that are chronicled in Mainwaring and other authorities as to his personal characteristics are generally kind to his memory. His manners and tastes during the middle years are said to have been gross, and the tale of Goupy and the dozen of Burgundy, if true, illustrates this side of his nature. Goupy's caricature, published directly after the visit, is bitter and in as bad taste as any behaviour of Handel's. His general heartiness of bearing was matched by a kindness of heart that showed itself in a multitude of good deeds. The most noticeable of these was his generosity to the Foundling Hospital, to which institution, in 1749, he gave an organ, from 1750 onwards, yearly concerts of the 'Messiah,' which drew large well-paying audiences, and in his will, a substantial bequest. This outward sign of his natural charity-ableness may be taken as earnest of a number of unseen acts of generous aid. He who had undergone so much financial turmoil realised the value of a certified existence. And it must have given him pleasure in his old age when, between 1747 and 1751, from the time when his oratorio performances began to bring him in money until the day when his sight failed, he was able to live in quiet with the two Smiths, enjoying the contemplation of the Rembrandts and other pictures that he still had by him. In the society of Mrs. Delaney, who had known him since 1710, and of Mrs. Cibber, whom he had seen through the disturbing episodes of her husband's law-suits, he liked to spend the hours that could be spared from his unceasing work.

His work and his life show the same characteristics of boldness in attack and unflinching staunchness in action. What was coarse in his mentality was held in check by a simplicity which, though it allowed him sometimes to be led to excesses of temper or appetite, yet always survived those regrettable moments. The general tone of his life was high, especially in comparison with that of his age. He was honourable in his dealings, and the unadorned straightforwardness that informs his great choruses is a manifestation of his own philosophy of life.

The question of the methods that Handel employed in borrowing from the works of other composers has already received much attention. In Sedley Taylor's book, The Indebtedness of Handel, the whole field is covered exhaustively. The most noticeable case is that of 'Israel in Egypt.' To this oratorio some twenty-seven bars of a serenata by Stradella were transferred in toto. The chorus 'Egypt was glad' is a complete transference of an organ canzona by J. C. Kerl. (This canzona is to be found in Hawkins, chapter 124.) In the Royal Library at the British Museum there is a Magnificat of which six movements have been placed in 'Israel in Egypt.' This MS. (Add. MS. 31, 573) is defective, but a copy which exists in the library of the R.C.M. (185) is complete, and from the fact that this latter is headed 'Magnificat del Rd. Sigr. Erba' it is generally considered that Handel must again be accused of filching. The Dettingen Te Deum contains nine movements, and 'Saul' six from a Te Deum by Fr. Urio. With regard to these works by Erba and Urio, Percy Robinson has come forward with a number of theories, the result of close research (Handel and his Orbit). His main contention, that Erba and Urio are the names of two places visited by Handel on his return from Italy in 1710, can only receive bare mention here. But no survey of the question would be complete without reference to his valuable work. His conclusions are mentioned favourably by Leichtentritt.

Mention has already been made of the Cambridge performances of 'Semele.' The revival of interest in Handel's operas dates from the performances of 'Rodelinda' (1920) and 'Otto' (1921) at Göttingen and of a stage setting of 'Saul' at Münster (1923).

PORTRAITS.—The Handel portraits can be placed in three sections: (1) Busts, (2) Paintings and (3) Miscellaneous.

(1) Roubillac did four sculptures. One is in Windsor Castle (having been originally presented by the younger Smith to George III.). Another was made for Vauxhall Gardens, and is now in the possession of Messrs. Novello and Co. A third was placed in the Foundling Hospital. The fourth found its way into the collection of the late Mr. Alfred Morrison. The monument in Westminster Abbey is also by Roubillac, and is said to have been copied from the death-mask which was taken by that sculptor.

There is a marble medallion in the private chapel of Belton House, Lincs, author unknown. At Halle there stands Heidel's monument, unveiled in 1857.

The Mus. T. of Dec. 1905 gives a reproduction of a relief in the Soane Museum, remarkable for its vitality.

(2) Hudson's portraits are five in number. Two are in the collection of the Worshipful Company of Musicians. A third is in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. A fourth belongs to Lord Howe and is at Gopsall. A replica of this last, differing slightly, is in Buckingham Palace, and another version of the same in the National Portrait Gallery. Mr. Arthur Hill possesses a copy of the Gopsall portrait. A fifth portrait (oval) by Hudson was acquired by the late Dr. Cummings. According to Förstemann (Händel's Stammbaum, 1844, p. 12) there was at Halle a Hudson portrait in the possession of descendants of Johanna Friderica Flörchen, Handel's niece. The authenticity of this portrait, however, is questioned. An old copy after Hudson, once in the possession of Lord Mayor Chitty, is now owned by Dr. Davan Wetton.

Denner painted Handel once. This work came into the possession of Mr. Alfred Littleton. There is a portrait of a man by Denner belonging to Lord Sackville at Knowle, which is now generally considered not to be of Handel (see article Handel, D.N.B.).

G. A. Wolfgang's portrait was sold in 1879 to a certain Mr. Clark.

Lord Malmesbury has at Heron Court a fine portrait by Ph. Mercier. A copy of this by a Miss Benson was put up for sale twice at Christie's (July 1872 and Jan. 1873). It eventually found its way to Bonn.

In the collection of the late Dr. Cummings there are portraits by Reynolds and Dahl.

W. Barclay Squire possessed portraits by van der Myn and by Kyte (see PLATE XXIX.), now in the National Portrait Gallery.

There exists a three-quarter portrait by van der Bank in the collection of Mr. Felix Cobbold (1909).

The Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge possesses a portrait of Handel seated at an organ by Sir James Thornhill. This is said to be the one that was painted for the Duke of Chandos. The evidence for this assertion, however, is scanty. The Fitzwilliam also has an oval by Grafoni and a portrait once ascribed to Hogarth and now attributed to Bartholomew Dandridge.

Forkel (ii. 63) mentions a portrait by Tischbein.

(3) There is an oval (head and shoulders) in the Music School Collection at Oxford.

In the State Apartments at Kensington Palace there is a large head framed in a laurel wreath.

Mr. Arthur Hill possesses an enamel.

At Windsor Castle there are two miniatures.

A miniature by Zincke was in the collection of the late H. Barrett Lennard.

The miniature mentioned by Rockstro (p. 423) as being sold in 1879 is probably the same as the above.

The Goupy caricature (pastel) was in the collection of the late Dr. Cummings.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—The mass of Handel literature is very great. The following in no way attempts to cover the ground, but is intended to give place to the most outstanding works which should be looked into by students:

- MAINWARING: Memoirs. (1780.)
 MATTHEWSON: Grundriss einer Handports. (1740.)
 HAWKINS: History. (1776.)
 BURNBY: History.

The Royal Library of Handel autographs, once in Buckingham Palace, now housed in the British Museum, was arranged there by the late W. Barclay Squire. Since coming to the Museum the manuscripts have been carefully repaired and some of the volumes broken up and rebound in a more practicable disposition. The whole collection now consists of 97 volumes of autographs. S. G.

HÄNDEL-GESELLSCHAFT: a society for the publication of a critical and uniform edition of the whole of Handel's works in full score, with pianoforte arrangement and German translation of the text. The Prospectus is dated Aug. 15, 1856, and has thirty-five names appended to it, including those of Chrysander, Dehn, Franz, Gervinus, Hauptmann, Hiller, Jahn, Liszt, Meyerbeer, Moscheles, Neukomm and Rietz. A second Prospectus announcing the first year's issue is dated Leipzig, June 1, 1859, and signed by the Directorium, viz. Rietz, Hauptmann, Chrysander, Gervinus, Breitkopf & Härtel. Dr. Friedrich Chrysander was sole active editor from the beginning, having had for some few years the little more than nominal co-operation from Rietz, Hauptmann and Gervinus. Vols. 1-18 of this edition were issued by Breitkopf & Härtel of Leipzig; but in the year 1864 the editor terminated this arrangement, and engaged engravers and printers to work under his immediate control on his own premises at Bergedorf near Hamburg. All the volumes from vol. 19 were thus produced.

The English Oratorios, Anthems, and other vocal works, are provided with a German version, by Gervinus, and after his death by the editor; and the few German vocal works have an English translation added.

After the completion of the edition, a series of 'Suppléments' was issued, consisting of certain works from which Handel took ideas and whole sections. A list of these supplements is given under CHRYSANDER.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, see BOSTON.

HANDEL COMMEMORATION. Early in 1783 three musical amateurs, Viscount Fitzwilliam, Sir Watkin Williams Wynn and Joah Bates, conceived the idea of celebrating the centenary of the birth of Handel (1684-85) by performing some of his works on a scale then unprecedented in England. The scheme being supported by the leading musical professors and the directors of the Concert of Ancient Music (who undertook the arrangement of the performances), and warmly entered into by the King, it was determined to carry it into effect by giving two performances in Westminster Abbey (where Handel was buried), and one at the Pantheon. The first performance was given in the Abbey on Wednesday morning, May 26, 1784; it consisted of The Dettingen Te Deum, one of the Coronation Anthems, one of the Chandos Anthems, part of the Funeral Anthem and a few other fragments. The second was on Thursday evening, May 27, at the Pantheon, and comprised various songs and choruses, sacred and secular, four concertos and an overture. The third was at the Abbey on Saturday morning, May 29, when 'Messiah' was given. These performances were so attractive as to lead to a repetition of the first day's music, with some little variations, at the Abbey, on Thursday morning, June 3, and of 'Messiah,' at the same place, on Saturday morning, June 5. The orchestra (erected at the west end of the nave, and surmounted by an organ built for the occasion by Green) contained 525 performers, viz.:

59 sopranos, 48 altos, 83 tenors and 84 basses; 48 first and 47 second violins, 26 violas, 21 violoncellos, 15 double basses, 6 flutes, 26 oboes, 26 bassoons, 1 double bassoon, 12 trumpets, 12 horns, 6 trombones, 4 drums, and the conductor (at the organ), Joah Bates.

The principal vocalists who are included in the above enumeration, were:

Madame Mara, Miss Harwood, Miss Cantelo, Miss Abrams, Miss Theodosia Abrams and Signor Bartolini; Rev. Mr. Clerk, Dyne and Knyvett, altos; Harrison, Norris and Corfe, tenors; Bellamy, Champness, Reinhold, Matthews and Tasca, basses.

The orchestra at the Pantheon consisted of 200 performers selected from those at the Abbey, and also included Signor Pacchierotti among the principal sopranos. The total receipts were £12,736:12:10, and the total expenses £5450:6:4, leaving a surplus of £7286:6:6, which, after retaining £286:6:6, to meet subsequent demands, was divided between the Royal Society of Musicians (£6000) and the Westminster Hospital (£1000). A mural tablet recording the event was placed in the Abbey above Handel's monument.

In 1785 Dr. Burney published An Account of the Musical Performances in Westminster-Abbey and the Pantheon in Commemoration of Handel, a quarto volume containing a Sketch of the Life of Handel, and plates, one of which represents his monument. In this the inscription is altered to support the assertion in the Life (made upon the alleged authority of Dr. Warren, who is asserted to have attended Handel in his last illness), that Handel died on Good Friday, Apr. 13, and not on Saturday, Apr. 14, 1759. Assuming Burney to have believed the unsupported statement of Dr. Warren, made twenty-five years after the event, in preference to the unanimous contemporary testimony to the contrary, still he could not but have been conscious that in putting forth that engraving of the monument he was circulating a misrepresentation. The matter is important, as Burney's date was for a time widely accepted. The evidence proving Saturday, Apr. 14, to be the true date is fully dealt with in the Introduction to the Word-Book of the Handel Festival, 1862, Notes and Queries, third series, iii. 421, and in Rockstro's Life of Handel, pp. 362-4.

The Commemoration of 1784 was followed by similar meetings at the Abbey, with more performers, in 1785, 1786, 1787 and 1791. In the latter year the performers are said to have numbered 1068, but that number was probably made up by inserting the names of persons who performed alternately with others, so that the numbers engaged in any one performance did not much exceed those on the former occasions. HANDEL FESTIVAL. This festival originated in the idea, suggested by R. K. Bowley (treasurer of the SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY (q.v.)), of commemorating the centenary of Handel's death by performances of some of his music on a very large scale. There was no hall in London large enough for such a scheme, but the central transept of the Crystal Palace had already been successfully tested as a place for musical performance when the exhibition was opened in 1851. A preliminary festival was therefore given there in 1857, with a large organ specially built for the purpose, and this was followed by the commemoration festival itself in 1859. The success of these two undertakings was such that it was decided to hold further festivals at a three years' interval, and they were so given from 1862 to 1883, and from 1885, a year sooner, so as to celebrate the bicentenary of Handel's birth, until 1912. The first post-war festival was held in 1920, followed by others in 1923 and 1926. The first performances were undertaken by the SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY (q.v.), the choir and orchestra being augmented by picked performers from London and the provinces, and numbering at first 2396. In 1874 the numbers had risen to over 3500 and in 1923 to 4000. In 1926 the orchestra was much augmented and the orchestration revised by Henry J. Wood.

The actual dates of the first performances were June 15, 17 and 19, 1857, and the programme consisted of 'Messiah,' 'Judas Maccabaeus' and 'Israel in Egypt.' Costa conducted till 1880, Manns conducted from 1883 till 1900, Cowen 1903-23, Wood in 1926. The programmes have varied little, the plan adopted in 1859 of 'Messiah' and 'Israel in Egypt' for the first and third days, with a smaller work and selections on the second day being followed until 1906, when 'Judas Maccabaeus' was revived. In 1909 the scheme was altered to commemorate the birth centenary of Mendelssohn, 'Elijah' and 'Hymn of Praise' being included, reverting to Handel only in 1912. N. C. G.

HANDEL SOCIETY, THE (1) (1843-48). A society formed in 1843 'for the production of a superior and standard edition of the works of Handel.' It was suggested by Macfarren, who, however, died on Apr. 24, immediately after the first meeting convened by him. The Prospectus was signed by George A. Macfarren as Secretary, on behalf of the Council, and was issued from his residence 73 Berners Street, June 16, 1843. The Council for the first year consisted of:

R. Addison, Treasurer; W. Sterndale Bennett; Sir H. R. Bishop; Dr. Crotch; J. W. Davison; E. J. Hopkins; G. A. Macfarren, Secretary; I. Moscheles; T. M. Mudie; E. F. Rimbault; Sir George Smart and Henry Smart.

The annual subscription was a guinea, and the Society began operations with 1000 members. The publications—in large folio, full score, each with PF. arrangement and editor's preface—were issued by Cramer, Addison & Beale, who continued the publication of the volumes, after the dissolution of the Society in Jan. 1848, until 1855, when the number of volumes reached twelve. G.

(2) This Society, consisting of an amateur chorus and orchestra, was founded in 1882 for the purpose of reviving the less well-known works of Handel, and the practice and performance of classical music. The first conductor was F. A. W. Docker, who retired in 1892. His successors have been August Manns (1892-95), J. S. Liddle (1895-1904), Coleridge Taylor (1904-12), George Henschel (1912-14), Norman O'Neill and Lennox Clayton (1914-15), Vaughan Williams (1919-21), Eugène Goossens (1921-25); Julius Harrison (1925). The successive presidents have been Sir Julius Benedict, Sir John Stainer, Sir Hubert Parry and the Earl of Balfour. P. G. L. Webb has acted as Honorary Secretary since the foundation of the Society, and among the other amateur musicians who have taken a specially active part in its work may be mentioned William Austen Leigh, R. A. Streetfeild, Sir Edward Thesiger and J. E. Talbot.

The Society has revived all the oratorios of Handel with the exception of 'Esther' and 'Joseph'; and has introduced to London audiences many interesting works by other composers, including Henschel's Requiem, Coleridge Taylor's 'Kubla Khan,' Mozart's unfinished Mass in C minor, N. C. Gatty's 'Three Short Odes,' Walford Davies's 'Ode on Time,' Wolfrum's 'Weihnachtsmysterium' and Goossens's 'Silence.' P. G. L. W.

HÄNDL (HÄNDL, HÄRNEL), JACOB (b. Krain — or Carniola — July 31, 1550; d. Prague, July 18, 1591), an old German master whose name, after the punning fashion of those days, was latinised into GALLUS.¹ He was Kapellmeister about 1579 to Stanislas Pawlowski, Bishop of Olmütz, and afterwards cantor in the church of St. Johann am Ufer in Prague, where he died much respected and bewailed. In 1580 four books of masses, sixteen in all, were published in Prague, and Gallus had a special privilege from the Emperor to publish Händl Jac. musici operis, harmoniarum 4, 5, 6, 8, et plurium vocum (Prague, four vols. 1586, 1587, 1590), a collection of the greatest value. His Epicedion harmonicum appeared in 1589, and Moralia in 1596. His well-known motet (a 4) 'Ecce quomodo moritur justus' (which Handel borrowed for his Funeral Anthem), is contained in the collection just named, and is also printed (with eighteen others by him for five, six and eight voices) in Bodenschatz's Florilegium Portense. Proske's Musica divina contains eleven motets, three Responsoria, a Miserere, a 'Christus factus est' and a Te Deum, all by him. His works have been republished in the following volumes of D.T.O., vi. (with biography), xii. (i.), xv., xx. (i.), xxiv. and xxvi.

HANDLO, ROBERT DE, the author of a treatise entitled Regulae cum maximis Magistri Franconis, cum additionibus aliorum musicorum, printed in the first volume of Coussemaker's Scriptores, and dated 1326. It is an elementary treatise, dealing only with notation, time-values and the modes of rhythm, but is of interest as showing the unsettled state of notation at this period for notes of less value than the breve. The author, following Johannes de Garlandia, describes four kinds of semibreves. The semibrevis major and minor are respectively two-thirds and one-third of a perfect breve: the semibrevis minorata and minima are respectively two-thirds and one-third of a semibrevis minor. Two signs, \diamond and ∇ , serve to represent these four values, and it would seem, though the matter is not clear, that the sign \diamond was used for the minor and minima, and ∇ for the major and minorata. No note of less value than the semibrevis minima, corresponding to the modern minim, is recognised. This throws some light on the dark saying of Johannes de Garlandia that any number of semibreves from three to nine may be counted to the breve. The 'other musicians' cited in the treatise are Petrus de Cruce, Petrus le Viser, Johannes de Garlandia, Admetus de Aureliana and Jacobus de Navernia. Handlo always places the name of the author (Franco, or whoever it may be) before the passages that he quotes from others, and similarly places his own name before his own original contributions; an arrangement which has given rise to the erroneous assertion by Hawkins, recently repeated by Ambros, that the treatise is in dialogue form.

Thomas Morley includes Robert de Handlo, misspelt 'Haulo,' among the 'late writers' in the list of authorities appended to his Introduction to Practicall Musicke (1597), and in his Annotations he quotes the opening maxims of the treatise itself, describing it as 'an old treatise of musike written in vellim above an hundred yeares ago.' The manuscript he refers to was undoubtedly 'Tiberius B. ix.' of the Cottonian Library, which included, besides Handlo's treatise, the Quatuor Principalia and several other tracts on music. It was 'burnt to a crust' in the disastrous fire at Ashburnham House on Oct. 23, 1731, but fortunately a transcript of the musical portions had previously been made for Dr. Pepusch. This afterwards came into the possession of Sir John Hawkins, by whom it was presented to the British Museum. It was from this copy (now B.M. Add. MSS. 4909) that Coussemaker printed not only Handlo's treatise, but also the three valuable anonymous tracts (iv., v. and vi.) included in his first volume.

The family of De Handlo, with which our author was probably connected, produced several distinguished men in the 13th and 14th centuries. They took their name from the manor of Handlo, now Hadlow, near Tonbridge, Kent. Sir John de Handlo (d. 1344) was twice summoned to Parliament as Knight of the Shire, filled several offices of state, and owned broad acres in Buckinghamshire and Leicestershire as well as in Kent. HANKE, KARL (b. Rosswalde, near Troppau, 1754; d. Hamburg, 1835), was Kapellmeister from 1775-79 to Count Hoditz-Rosswalde, where he married the singer Stormkin, with whom he took engagements in various continental towns. In 1786 he went as court Kapellmeister to Schleswig, where his wife died. In 1789 he married the singer Berwald and went to Flensburg, where he opened a school for singing, and became director of music at that town, and finally at Hamburg. He was a prolific composer of operas, ballets, interludes, symphonies, church music, etc., little of which has survived (Riemann; Q.-L.).

HANLEY FESTIVAL. The North Staffordshire Musical Festivals, held at Hanley, were founded in 1888, and have been noted for the excellent quality of the choral singing. In 1890 'Fair Rosamond,' by Swinnerton Heap, the festival conductor, was performed for the first time; a festival was held in 1893; in 1896 Elgar's 'King Olaf' was the novelty; and in 1899 Coleridge Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha' (see HIAWATHA).

a string sextet and gave chamber music of the highest type in concerts at Brixton and elsewhere. (1) WILLIAM HENRY (b. London, May 30, 1831; d. there, Oct. 20, 1920), viola player, was a member of the Philharmonic and other London orchestras, also of Queen Victoria's private band. He played in the chamber concerts of the MUSICAL UNION (q.v.) and in the Monday Popular Concerts (see POPULAR CONCERTS). He married Sophia Hopkins (see HOPKINS), by whom he had five sons and one daughter, all musicians.

The sons, all choristers of the Chapel Royal, St. James's, and all educated at the R.A.M., were as follows: (2) EDWARD HOPKINS (b. 1861), violinist, was a pupil of Sainton. (3) WILLIAM CHARLES (d. Brixton, Feb. 28, 1925), violoncellist, a pupil of Piatti, became a member of King Edward's private band and of the principal London orchestras. He was on the music staff of Harrow and Mill Hill Schools until his death. (4) LEWIS ROBERT (b. 1865), violinist, was the leader of the family's chamber music party, and a member of the principal London orchestras. He settled in Cheltenham (1891) as principal violin teacher of the Ladies' College. (5) SIDNEY (b. 1868; d. 1921), pianist and second viola player in the family sextet, was organist of Islington Parish Church and Brixton Independent Church. (6) CLEMENT WALTER (b. 1871; d. 1921) was a violoncellist. The daughter, (7) MARIANNE, is a teacher of piano and singing in London. c.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS (1774-1874) contained one of the most famous concert halls of London.

In 1773 a piece of ground on the east side of Hanover Square at the north-west corner of Hanover Street, London, formerly part of a field called the Mill Field, alias Kirkham Close, and described as 'containing in breadth from north to south in the front next the Square as well as in the rear forty feet of assize, more or less, and in depth from west to east on the north side as well as on the south, 135 feet more or less.'

was occupied by a house, garden and office, then in the occupation of Lord Dillon. The freehold belonged to the Earl of Plymouth. On June 28, 1774, Lord Plymouth sold the freehold for £5000¹ to Viscount Wenman, who on the same day conveyed the whole to Giovanni Andrea Gallini,² John Christian Bach and Charles Frederick Abel. Gallini owned one-half, and the others each one-fourth. They erected on the site of the garden and office, and joining on to the house, rooms for the purposes of concerts, assemblies, etc., consisting of a principal room, 95 ft. by 35, on the level of the first floor: a small room on the north side, originally used as a tea-room; and one on the ground floor beneath the principal room. The ceiling of the principal room was arched, and decorated with paintings by Cipriani. The orchestra stood at the east end. The rooms were opened on Feb. 1, 1775, with one of Bach and Abel's Subscription Concerts, established by them in 1763: later in the month Subscription 'Festinos' were announced; on May 4, 'Mr. Gallini's Annual Ball,' and on May 22, the first 'Grand Subscription Masquerade.' On Nov. 12, 1776, Gallini purchased the shares of Bach and Abel, and became sole proprietor. Bach and Abel's concerts continued to be held there until 1782, when the withdrawal by Lord Abingdon of the pecuniary aid he had theretofore given, led to their discontinuance. Thereupon some professors of music established similar concerts under the name of 'The Professional Concert,' which were given in the room from 1783-93. In 1786 Salomon, the violinist, piqued at being left out of the Professional Concert, established concerts here, at which in 1791 and 1792, and again in 1794 and 1795, Haydn directed the performance of his twelve 'grand' symphonies. At the eighth concert in 1792, on May 5 'Master Hummel' played a concerto by Mozart on the pianoforte, and in 1796 John Braham was introduced to the public as a tenor singer. In 1804 the Concert of Ancient Music was removed to these rooms, the directors having taken a lease from Gallini at a rental of £1000 per annum, and the concerts continued to be held here until 1848, the last year of their existence. The directors made considerable alterations; the orchestra was removed to the west end, three boxes were erected across the east end for the royal family and their attendants, and the rooms were newly fitted up in a splendid manner. On the death of Gallini (Jan. 5, 1805), the freehold passed to his two nieces, who leased the rooms to Wallace & Martin, and Martin & Son successively. In Dec. 1832 alterations were made in the great room by the enlargement of the windows so as to render it available for morning concerts; and many mirrors were introduced. The concerts of the Vocal Society were given in these rooms from its foundation in 1832 to its dissolution in 1837. A new Vocal Society gave concerts here in 1838, but its existence was of very brief duration. In 1833 the concerts of the Philharmonic Society were removed here from the Concert Room of the King's Theatre, and continued here until their departure to St. James's Hall in 1869. Both the Misses Gallini dying in 1845, the freehold was sold by auction to Robert Cocks, the music publisher, under whom the younger Martin held it by lease until Dec. 1861. Extensive alterations and decorations were then made in the rooms, which were reopened Jan. 8, 1862, by Henry Leslie's Choir; the concerts of the R.A.M. were also removed there. The annual performance of Handel's 'Messiah' for the benefit of the Royal Society of Musicians was given there from 1785-1848. In 1874 the premises were let on lease for the purpose of being converted into a club-house. The last concert was given in the rooms on Saturday, Dec. 19, 1874, and the building, after undergoing an entire transformation, was opened early in 1876 as 'The Hanover Square Club.' The premises are now shops, with flats ('Hanover Court') above. It must not be forgotten that the great room was remarkable for its excellent acoustic properties.

HANS HEILING, opera in 3 acts and a prologue; libretto by Eduard Devrient (originally intended for Mendelssohn), music by Marschner. Produced Berlin, May 24, 1833.

HANSLICK, EDUARD (b. Prague, Sept. 11, 1825; d. Baden, near Vienna, Aug. 6, 1904), musical critic and writer on aesthetics. He was the son of a well-known bibliographer and of Czech descent, a fact interesting to recall in view of the Germanophil cast of mind exhibited in his writings.

He studied law and philosophy in Prague and Vienna, where he took the degree of Doctor in 1849. In 1856 he was appointed tutor of aesthetics and musical history at the university; in 1861 professor extraordinary, and in 1870 regular professor. His love of music had been fostered at home, and under Tomaschek he became an excellent pianist. In Vienna he had ample opportunities of becoming a critic of no ordinary merit, and his keen insight and cogent logic, and the elegance and versatility of his style, make his literary productions of lasting value. As a juror for the musical department of the Exhibitions of Paris (1867 and 1878) and Vienna (1873 and 1892) he did everything in his power to further the interests of the musical instrument makers of Austria. In 1876 he was appointed a member of the Imperial Council, having some time before received the order of the Iron Crown. The title of K.K. Hofrath was conferred on him in 1886. During the years 1859-63 he gave public lectures on the history of music in Vienna, and occasionally in Prague, Cologne, etc. He was musical critic successively to the Wiener Zeitung, 1848-49, the Presse, 1855-64 and the Neue freie Presse. Hanslick published the following books:

Vom Musikalisch-Schönen (Leipzig, 1854, 9th ed. 1896), translated into French (1877), Italian (1884), English (1891) and Russian (1895), a work which marks an epoch; Geschichte des Concertwesens in Wien (Vienna, 1869); Aus dem Concertsaal (Vienna, 1870); Die moderne Oper (Berlin, 1875, 2nd ed. 1876), with various continuations; Musikalische Stationen, 1880; Aus dem Operntheater der Gegenwart (3rd ed. 1885); Musikalischer Kitzelbuch, 1888; Musikalisches und Literarisches, 1889; Aus dem Tagebuche eines Musikers, 1892 (3rd ed. 1894, as Aus meinem Leben); Fünf Jahre Musik, 1896; Aus Ende des Jahrhunderts, 1899; Aus neuer und neuester Zeit, 1900.

In 1895 he edited Billroth's Wer ist musikalisch, and in the same year he retired from active life. He also wrote the text for the Galerie deutscher Tondichter (Munich, 1873) and the Galerie franz. und ital. Tondichter (Berlin, 1874). In music Hanslick was a conservative. His resistance to the Liszt-Wagner movement is well known.

On the other hand he was an early supporter of Schumann, and a strong adherent of Brahms. An interesting article on him appeared in the R.M.I. vol. xi. p. 819.

HANSSSENS, CHARLES LOUIS JOSEPH (HANSSENS L'AÎNÉ) (b. Ghent, May 4, 1777; d. Brussels, May 6, 1852), violinist, pupil of Wauthier and Berton at Paris. He was music director at Ghent, 1802; then at Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Utrecht; in 1804 at Antwerp; then again at Ghent; and in 1825 at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, where also he became director of the Conservatoire. He lost both positions through the political events of 1830, but returned to the direction of the theatre from 1835-1838 and again in 1840, when he became a partner in the enterprise, whereby he was financially ruined. He composed several operas, 6 masses and other church music.

HANS VON CONSTANZ, MAGISTER, a 16th-century organist and composer at Constance, of whom organ pieces and songs are preserved in various collective volumes. Riemann identifies him with Hans Buchner, who was organist at Constance from c. 1510; but Eitner maintains that Hans von Constanx was Buchner's successor. (See Riemann and Q.-L.)

HARANT, CHRISTOPHER (b. 1564; d. 1621), a Bohemian nobleman of Polžic and Bedružic who was not merely an excellent painter and writer, but a composer of remarkable ability. He wrote a book which, even in those days of wordy titles, is surely unique in the diffuseness of its heading:

'A Journey from the Kingdom of Bohemia to Venice, and thence to the Holy Land and the land of Judaea, and still further, to Egypt; visiting later on Mount Horeb, Sinai and St. Catharine in the Desert of Arabia (1608).'

In this volume appears a motet in six parts, 'Qui confidunt,' composed by the author, which proves this Bohemian humanist to have been a master of vocal polyphony, capable even of carrying a step further the technique of the Netherlands School. He relates that he wrote the motet in 1598, while staying in Jerusalem, in company with certain pious monks who were also accomplished musicians. The work has been transcribed in modern notation by Prof. K. Stecker and published by F. A. Urbánek of Prague. Other compositions by Harant which will be published in the near future are a Mass in five parts, and a Hymn in honour of the Virgin. He was probably too versatile to have composed a great deal, but the quality of these known examples is such as to demonstrate the very high musical standard which ruled in Bohemia, even in amateur circles, at the close of the 16th century.

HARDING, JAMES (JEAMES HARDEN) (d. Jan. 1626), flautist and composer. He appears in the lists of the English court musicians among 'the flutes' from 1581 till Dec. 22, 1625, and is mentioned as deceased, Feb. 2, 1626. Lady Neville's virginal book contains some pieces by him, a Galliard appears in B.M. Add. MSS. 30.826/28, and another (Q.-L. says 5) together with pieces by Dowland, Ant. Holbourne, etc., in Füllsack's Collection of 1607. Playford, in 'A Musical Banquet' (1651), mentions another John Harding 'for the Voyce or Violl,' who died 1684 (Henry Davey, Hist. Eng. Music).

HARDOUIN, L'ABBÉ HENRI (b. Grandpré, Ardennes, c. 1724; d. Reims, Aug. 13, 1808), a choir-boy at Reims Cathedral, where, after becoming a priest and canon, he was appointed maître de chapelle. He composed a considerable number of masses¹ and wrote 'Méthode nouvelle pour apprendre le plain-chant' (1762 and 1828). (See Q.-L.)

HARE, (1) JOHN (d. Sept. 1725), (2) JOSEPH (d. 1733), London music publishers during the early portion of the 18th century, father and son. John was established as early as 1696 in Freeman's Yard, Cornhill, and 1697 (probably also in the previous year) he had an additional place of business in St. Paul's Churchyard at the sign of the 'Golden Violin.' This sign generally stood as the 'Golden Viol' (or more frequently 'Viall'). One of his earliest publications is a reprint, dated 1697, of Youth's Delight on the Flageolet, a small engraved work originally issued by John Clarke, also of the 'Golden Viol,' in St. Paul's Churchyard, and to whose business and stock-in-trade Hare probably succeeded. Throughout the whole business career of Hare and of his son they were associated with John Walsh, and a great number of Walsh's publications bear their names in conjunction with his own; indeed, beyond the flageolet book above quoted I am unable to find any separate work issued by Hare or his son. About 1720 Joseph's name first appears with that of his father on the imprints, and John's name disappears in 1725, in which year he died. Joseph died in 1733, leaving his widow Elizabeth in possession of the business. There are indications that shortly after this date the widow retired to Islington to live, leaving her shop in the hands of John Simpson, who, in or near the year 1734, probably bought the stock-in-trade, and set up for himself in close proximity in Sweeting's Alley. The 'Golden Viol' in St. Paul's Churchyard does not appear in the imprints on any late publications of the Hare family, and was, in all likelihood, not held after 1706-07; Richard Meares is at this sign in 1722. It has been stated, but lacks confirmation, that Walsh and Hare were the first to stamp music on pewter plates to supersede engraving on copper. The registers of St. Michael's Church, Cornhill, give the dates of burial of the Hare family who, living in Freeman's Yard, were in its parish.

Burials 1725, Sept. 9. John Hare in the New Vault.

(3) ELIZABETH, probably a daughter of Joseph (as his wife bore the same Christian name). She had a music shop in or near Cornhill, but not on the old premises. She issued country dances for 1750 and 1751, and her shop was opposite the Mansion House.

HARELBECCANUS, SIGERUS PAUL (b. Flanders), was a citizen of Cologne in 1590. He composed 'Psalmodia Davidica,' 50 psalms translated into German, in 3-6 parts so contrived that they may be sung or played on sundry instruments. The dedication is dated July 21, 1590.

HARFE, see HARP.

HARINGTON (HARRINGTON)² HENRY, M.D. (b. Kelston, Somerset, Sept. 29, 1727; d. Bath, Jan. 15, 1816); in 1745 entered at Queen's College, Oxford, with the view of taking holy orders. He used to pass his vacations with his uncle William, vicar of Kingston, Wilts, from whom he imbibed a taste for music and poetry. He resided there during eight years, and wrote some unimportant verses and music. In 1748 he took his B.A. degree, abandoned his intention of taking holy orders, and began the study of medicine. He remained at Oxford until he took his M.A. and M.D. degrees. Whilst there he joined an amateur musical society established by Dr. W. Hayes, to which those only were admitted who were able to play and sing at sight. On leaving Oxford he established himself as a physician at Bath, devoted his leisure to composition, and was appointed 'composer and physician' to the Harmonic Society of Bath on its foundation by Sir John Danvers in 1784. Two books, in folio, of Harington's glees were issued by Longman & Broderip before 1785; a third followed later. In 1797 he published a volume of glees, catches, etc., and afterwards joined Edmund Broderip, organist of Wells, and Rev. William Leeves, composer of 'Auld Robin Gray,' in the publication of a similar volume. In 1800 he published 'Eloi! Eloi! or, The Death of Christ,' a sacred dirge for Passion Week. Harington was an alderman of Bath, and served the office of mayor with credit. He was buried at Kelston; there is a cenotaph to his memory in Bath Abbey with music from his Passion Dirge. His compositions³ are 'distinguished for originality, correct harmony and tenderness, and he was

HARMONICA. The power of producing musical sounds from glass basins or drinking-glasses by the application of the moistened finger, and of tuning them so as to obtain concords from two at once, was known as early as the middle of the 17th century, since it is alluded to in Harsdörfer's Mathematische und philosophische Erquickungen, ii. 147 (Nuremberg, 1677). In its more modern form, the credit of the invention appears to be due to an Irishman, one Richard Pockrich, who played the instrument in Dublin in 1743, and throughout England in 1744.¹ Gluck, when in England, played 'at the Little Theatre in the Haymarket,' Apr. 23, 1746—

'a concerto on twenty-six drinking-glasses tuned with spring water, accompanied with the whole band, being a new instrument of his own invention; upon which he performs whatever may be done on a violin or harpsichord.'²

This or some other circumstance made the instrument fashionable, for, fifteen years later, in 1761, Goldsmith's fine ladies in the Vicar of Wakefield, who confined their conversation to the most fashionable topics, 'would talk of nothing but high life and high lived company . . . pictures, taste, Shakspeare, and the musical glasses.' That they occupied the attention of better persons is evident from the testimony of Franklin. He came to London in 1757, and writing on July 13, 1762, to Padre Beccaria at Turin, he tells him of the attempts of 'Puckeridge' (i.e. Pockrich) and of Delaval, F.R.S., who fixed their glasses in order on a table, tuned them by putting in more or less water, and played them by passing the finger round the brims. Franklin's practical mind saw that this might be greatly improved, and he accordingly constructed an instrument in which the bells or basins of glass were ranged or strung on an iron spindle, the largest and deepest-toned ones on the left, and gradually mounting in pitch according to the usual musical scale. The lower edge of the basins was dipped into a trough of water. The spindle was made to revolve by a treadle. It carried the basins round with it, and on applying a finger to their wet edges the sound was produced. (See PLATE XXX. No. 5.)

The essential difference between this instrument and the former ones was (1) that the pitch of the tone was produced by the size of the glasses, and not by their containing more or less water; and (2) that chords could be produced of as many notes as the fingers could reach at once. Franklin calls it the 'Armonica,' but it seems to have been generally known as 'Harmonica.' The first great player on the new instrument was Miss Marianne DAVIES (q.v.), who had a European fame, and played music composed for her by Hasse. Another celebrated performer was Marianna KIRCHGESSNER (q.v.), a blind musician. She visited Vienna in 1791, and interested Mozart so much that he wrote an adagio and rondo in C for harmonica, flute, oboe, viola and violoncello (Köchel, No. 617), which she played at her concert on June 19. Sketches of his for another quintet in the same key are also in existence. In England the instrument appears to have been little if at all used during the 19th century. In Saxony and Thuringia, however, it was widely popular; at Dresden, Naumann played it, and wrote six sonatas for it. At Darmstadt a harmonica formed a part of the court orchestra; the Princess Louise, afterwards Grand Duchess, was a proficient upon it, and C. F. Pohl, sen., the Princess's master, was engaged exclusively for the instrument as late as 1818.

Attempts have been made to improve or modify the harmonica by substituting a violin bow for the hand, or by reducing the peculiarly penetrating and exciting tone which is said to be so prejudicial to the nerves of players—but without success. An account of these and of much more than can be included in this short statement will be found in C. F. Pohl's Zur Geschichte der Glasharmonica (Vienna, 1862). One Method only exists for this instrument, that of J. C. Müller, Leipzig, 1788. A specimen of the harmonica, built by Emanuel Pohl of Kreibitz, Bohemia, is in the Victoria and Albert Museum, South Kensington.

A little piece for the Harmonica was composed by Beethoven for the 'Leonora Prohaska' of his friend Duncker in 1814 or 1815. The autograph is preserved in the library of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna, and appeared in print for the first time in the original edition of this Dictionary.³

The name 'Harmonica' is also used for a toy instrument of plates of glass hung on two tapes and struck with hammers.

HARMONIC FLUTE, an organ-stop of 4-foot pitch. The pipes of harmonic flue stops being of double speaking-length, the scale, windage and voicing are such as to cause the pipe to overblow into the octave above.

A small hole (or sometimes two small holes opposite to each other) is, or are, pierced midway in the speaking-length of the pipe, which, by weakening the wind at that point, assists in the division of the vibrating wave or air-column into two lengths, thereby eliminating uncertainty of pitch or tone, and ensuring rapidity of speech. If the holes are temporarily covered by the fingers, and the pipe is softly blown, it gives its full speaking-length pitch.

The lowest note of the harmonic (or double-

The tenor and bass are carried down in (true length) metal, and (half length) stopped wood pipes, a singular sequence of pipe lengths in the same stop. The Harmonic Piccolo is the corresponding stop in 2-foot pitch.

The tubes of the harmonic portions of reed stops are likewise of double length, and generally have a hole pierced midway. (See HARMONIC STOPS.)

HARMONICHORD, a keyed instrument invented in 1810 by Friedrich Kaufmann, the celebrated musical instrument maker of Dresden. In its form it resembled a small square piano; but the sound was obtained not by striking the wires with hammers, but by the friction against them of a revolving cylinder (as in the ordinary hurdy-gurdy), covered with leather, and rosined. This cylinder, which in the effect it produced somewhat resembled the bow of a violin, was set in motion by a pedal worked by the foot of the player. All gradations of tone, as well as the power of swelling or diminishing the sound upon a sustained note, were produced by the pressure of the finger. For this instrument Weber composed in the year 1811 a very interesting adagio and rondo, with orchestral accompaniment, published by Peters, of Leipzig. Weber wrote concerning this composition—

'It was an infernal piece of work to write for an instrument whose tone is so peculiar and strange that one has to call to one's aid the liveliest imagination to bring it suitably forward in combination with other instruments. It is a cousin of the harmonica, and has this peculiarity, that with every sustained note its octave is prominently heard.'

On the printed title-page it is said to be 'for Harmonichord or Harmonium.' This, however, is an addition of the publisher; as not only are the two instruments totally distinct, but the physharmonica, the predecessor of the harmonium, was not invented till about fifteen years later. HARMONIC MINOR is the name applied to that version of the minor scale which contains the minor sixth together with the major seventh, and in which no alteration is made in ascending and descending. Its introduction as a substitute for the melodic or 'arbitrary' minor scale was strongly advocated by Dr. DAY (q.v.) and others, and in the latter half of the 19th century it was very generally adopted. It is true that its use is calculated to impress the learner with a sense of the real characteristics of the minor mode, but its merits are counterbalanced by the awkwardness arising from the augmented second between the sixth and seventh notes, while it is difficult to regard it as a diatonic scale at all, in spite of its theoretical correctness.

HARMONICS. When a pipe or string is made to sound one of its PARTIALS (q.v.) in place of its fundamental, the resulting note is called an Harmonic.

All WIND INSTRUMENTS (q.v.) use harmonics in the normal production of their scales, and the term is therefore applied more especially to stringed instruments, which use harmonics for the sake of their peculiar tone and intonation (cf. EX. 3). For the theory of partial tones see ACOUSTICS, subsection HARMONIC SERIES.

On stringed instruments (violin family and harp) harmonics are obtained by lightly touching the string at a nodal point. Only the first harmonic (producing the octave by the touch of the string half-way through its speaking-length) is used on the harp. The method of obtaining both natural and artificial harmonics on the violin is described under FINGERING (Violin), and the same method, with, however, limitations¹ on the larger instruments, is applied to other members of the family.

The method of notation for natural harmonics (that is those derived from the open strings) consists of writing the notes actually sounded with a small circle over each. Thus:

Another method sometimes used consists of writing diamond-headed notes indicating the nodal point to be touched, by means of the notes which would be sounded if the string were stopped.

2. Double Bass.

This is a case of the 7th harmonic on the E string followed by the third harmonic on the A string. The transposition of the instrument must be borne in mind.

In the case of the harp the usual practice is to write the fundamental note (i.e. an octave lower than the note sounded) with the circle above it. Thus:

The method of notation for the artificial harmonics of the violin family (that is, those derived from stopped notes) is to write the passage as stopped with a diamond-headed note a perfect fourth above it to indicate the position of the finger by which the harmonic is obtained. The stopped notes so written will then be two octaves below the actual sound.

HARMONIC STOPS are organ-stops, the upper pipes of which do not produce the sound that would be expected, having regard to their length, but the octave to that sound. They have been known in Germany for nearly two hundred years. The 'violoncello, 8-foot pitch' on the pedal organ at Weingarten, made in the first half of the 18th century, is in reality 16 feet in length, of tin, and $3\frac{1}{4}$ inches in diameter.

Harmonic stops have come into great favour, in the first instance through the careful and successful experiments of the eminent French house of Cavaillé-Coll, of Paris. Guided by the fact that performers upon wind instruments exercise a greater pressure of wind for the production of the higher notes than the lower, these builders applied the same principle to some of their organ registers, with the most excellent result. In this manner they produced the stops—most of which have been naturalised in England—called 'Flûte Harmonique, 8 pieds,' 'Flûte Octavante, 4 pieds,' 'Trompette Harmonique, 8 pieds,' etc. At first only a few experimental pipes were made to test the soundness of the theory, for the resistance presented to the finger by the highly compressed air was so excessive as to prevent their adoption in practice; but the invention of the pneumatic lever removed this objection, and harmonic stops and the pneumatic attachment were introduced together for the first time, in Cavaillé's fine organ in the abbey church of St. Denis, near Paris, finished in 1841. Very effective harmonic flutes, though naturally less powerful, are frequently voiced upon a wind of the ordinary strength when there is a copious supply of it. (See HARMONIC FLUTE.)

HARMONIC UNION, THE (1852-54); a society based on subscriptions, 'for the performance of sacred and secular music both of the Ancient and Modern Schools,' and particularly of living composers, with solos, chorus and orchestra. The first proposal was issued in July 1852, Benedict was chosen conductor, and Blagrove leader; the concerts took place at Exeter Hall, and the subscription was £3:3s. per head. The first was held on Dec. 17, 1852, the programme being Motet No. 6, J. S. Bach, and the oratorio of 'Joseph' by C. E. Horsley. Others followed at about a month's interval until Feb. 23, 1854, which appears to have been the date of the last concert. New works brought forward included Macfarren's 'Lenora'; Pier-

HARMONIUM (French; also orgue expressif), a well-known popular keyed instrument, the tones of which are produced by thin tongues of brass or steel, set in periodic motion by pressure of air, and called 'vibrators.' They are known also as 'free reeds'; reeds, because their principle is that of the shepherd's pipe; free, because they do not entirely close the openings in which they vibrate at any period of their movement, while those generally used in the organ, known as 'beating or striking reeds,' close the orifice at each pulsation. It is not, however, the vibration of the tongue itself that we hear as the tone: according to Helmholtz this is due to the escape of the air in puffs near its point, the rapidity of alternation of the puffs determining the pitch. The timbre of the note is conditioned in the first place by this opening, and then by the size and form of the channel above the tongue and its pallet-hole, through which the air immediately passes. The Harmonium as we know it and the nearly related AMERICAN ORGAN, in which the vibrator is set in motion by reverse power, that is, by drawing in the air, belong to the 19th century, but can claim an ancient if indirect ancestry in the REGAL (q.v.) and the Chinese CHENG (q.v.). It has been too much the practice to regard the harmonium only as a handy substitute for the organ, and this has been fostered by interested persons to the detriment of its individuality and the loss of the perception that it has reason to exist from its own merits as a musical instrument. It is true that like the organ the tones of the harmonium may be sustained at one power so long as the keys are kept down, and variety of timbre is obtained by using the stops; but when the Expression stop is used, by which the air reservoir is cut off and the pressure made to depend entirely upon the management of the bellows, the harmonium gains the power of increase and decrease of tone under the control of the player, who by the treadles can graduate the condensation of the wind almost as a violin-player manages his tone by the bow. To use this power artistically the harmonium-player must have skill; and few take to this instrument with anything like the high technical aim with which the pianoforte and violin are studied. There is, however, no reason that there should not be a school of composers and players competent to realise and develop the individual character of the instrument. (See KARG-ELERT.)

harmonicas which, from the musical fruit and baby trumpets of Nuremberg, to accordions and concertinas, have during the past century had such extensive popularity. Unlike as the whole tribe of reed organs have been to any notion of music that pertained to ancient Greece, it is not a little surprising that a large vocabulary of Greek names should have been adopted to describe them. The first name, and one still in use, that of orgue expressif, was due to a Frenchman, Grenié, who, according to Fétis,¹ very early in the 19th century imagined the construction of a keyboard instrument which, by tongues of metal vibrating under variable pressures of atmosphere, should give nuances, or varying intensities of sound. His tongues were not 'beating' but 'free' reeds having an alternative movement, the energy depending upon the density of the air-current affecting them. It was not a novel principle, for the Chinese cheng might have suggested the employment of it; but be this as it may, Fétis informs us that Grenié never assumed that he was the inventor of it. The experiments of Sébastien Erard with free reeds, of which Grétry thought so much, were already known. A few years later than these (about 1814 some say) and quite independently, Eschenbach of Koenigshoven in Bavaria invented a keyboard instrument with vibrators, which he named 'Organo-violine.' Then began the Greek era. In 1816 Schlimbach of Ohrdruff, improving upon Eschenbach, produced the Æoline. The next step was an apparatus for continuous wind, by Voit of Schweinfurt, who called his instrument Æolodicon. In 1818 Anton Häckel of Vienna constructed a diminutive æoline as an instrument to be used with a pianoforte, bringing it out as PHYSHARMONICA (q.v.). This bellows-harmonica Professor Payer took with him to Paris in 1823, and several imitations were made of it, one of which, the Aerophone of Christian Dietz, was described by him in the sixth volume of the Revue musicale (Paris, 1829). Returning to Germany, Reich of Fürth, near Nuremberg, produced at Munich in 1820 timbre registers imitating the clarinet and bassoon. The 16-foot or octave-deeper register Fétis attributes to Fourneaux père of Paris, 1836. The MELOPHONE (q.v.) appeared in 1837. Elsewhere we read of an Æolodicon with bent tongues, of an Æolophone, an Adelphone, an Adiaphanon, an Harmonikon and a Harmonine; of Melodiums, Æolians and Pan-orgues; of the Poikilorgue of Cavaillé-Coll, etc. In England keyboard harmonicas with bellows were known by the name of SERAPHINE, which was not a harmonium, for it had no channels for the tongues. The oldest English patent for a seraphine is that of Myers and Storer, dated July 20, 1839.

It must be remembered that nearly all these instruments had but one complete set of vibrators to a keyboard. The Organino, a tentative instrument of Alexandre DEBAIN (q.v.), had two notes an octave apart on each key. To this remarkable mechanician was due the gathering up the work of all his predecessors and uniting four stops on one keyboard to produce the Harmonium. His first patent for this instrument, in Paris, is dated Aug. 9, 1840 (Notabilités de la facture instrumentale, Paris, 1857). Inventor or improver, Debain had the great merit of opening the path to contrasts in colour of free-reed tone, by means of various sized channels to the vibrators, submitted in different registers, to one keyboard. It was, however, unfortunate that in the defence of his rights he was induced to secure to himself the sole privilege of using the name Harmonium in France, thus forcing other makers to use the name Organ, and thus to add another stone to the cairn of confusion in musical instrument nomenclature. More recently, the name Reed-organ has been used to express both the harmonium and the American organ, and is, perhaps, the best way out of a difficulty.

The next great invention after Debain—attributed by Fétis to the Alexandres, father and son—was the 'Expression,' already mentioned, the creation of a new and æsthetically more valuable harmonium. Another major invention was that of Martin, who gave the harmonium, to use a technical term, 'quicker speech,' i.e. made the sound more quickly follow the descent of the key. The invention is known as 'percussion,' and is an adaptation of the pianoforte escapement, by which a little hammer strikes the tongue at the same moment that it receives the impact of the wind. Another invention of Martin's termed 'prolongement,' enables the player to prolong certain notes after the fingers have quitted the keys. Martin governed this by knee pedals, but it is now usually effected by a stop, and knocked off at will by a little heel movement. The 'melody-attachment' of William Dawes, patented in London, 1864, has the effect of making the melody-note, or air, when in the highest part, predominate, by a contrivance that shuts off all notes below the highest in certain registers of a combination. In the 'pedal-substitute' of Dawes and Ramsden this is reversed, and the lowest notes can be made to predominate over the other notes of a left-hand chord. An important invention, and curious as bringing the pianoforte touch to a certain extent upon the harmonium keyboard, is the 'double touch,' invented by an English musician, Augustus L. Tamplin, before 1855, and introduced systematically in the famous harmoniums of Mustel of Paris, producing emphasised or strengthened tones by a greater depression of the key. Another important invention of the greatest delicacy is Mustel's

'pneumatic balance' (French double expression)—valves of delicate construction acting in the wind reservoir, and keeping the pressure of air in it practically equal, so that it cannot possibly be overblown.

Proceeding now to the structure of the harmonium it is sufficient to notice externally the keyboard and treadles as prominent features (see Fig. 1). The latter (a), moved by the feet of the player, feed the bellows (b): the air is by them forced up the wind-trunk (g) into the wind-chest (i), and from thence, while the ex-board of graduated thickness in which are the channels (n)—separate chambers of air to each vibrator, determining, as said before, the different timbres. The proportions of the channels and size of the pallet-holes are found empirically. The air within the channels, set in vibration by the tongues, is highly compressed. Sometimes, to gain space and a different quality, the channels with their tongues are placed upright. A stop (l) being drawn and a key (q) depressed, wind is admitted by the action to the tongue or vibrator, and escapes by the pallet-hole (o)—at a comparatively even pressure if it comes from the reservoir, or at a varying pressure if, as already explained, the expression-stop is drawn and the wind comes from the feeders direct.

We give a cut of the percussion action pression-stop is not drawn, into the reservoir (f), in a continuous and equal stream, excess in which is obviated by a discharge pallet (e) acting as a safety-valve. But when the expression-stop is drawn and the expression-hole (h) to the reservoir is consequently closed, the air acts directly upon the vibrators or tongues (m), from the feeders (c). The entire apparatus for the wind is covered by the bellows-board (k), containing the valves (j) that admit the wind to the different rows of vibrators or reed compartments, as the stops (l) may be drawn. Above the bellows-board is the 'pan' (l), sometimes erroneously called the sound-board, a already alluded to (see Fig. 2). Here q is the key, which on being depressed sends down a 'plunger' (a), which acts upon a little escapement action, with lever (b), hammer (c) and set-off (d); m is the reed, which by this arrangement is struck by the hammer and assisted to move at the moment the wind is admitted.

The harmonium has a keyboard of five octaves at 8-ft. pitch. The bass stops range up to and include the e' on the first line of the treble staff; and the treble stops range from the f' upwards—twenty-nine and thirty-two notes respectively. In an ordinary harmonium the registers or rows of vibrators are four in number, divided, as just stated, into bass and treble, and again into front and back organs as they are technically called. The front organ has the foundation and fuller toned stops, the back organ the imitation and more reedy stops. Thus, adding the French names as they are frequently to be met with—

Front. No. 1. Diapason bass and Diapason treble—Cor anglais and Flûte. 8-ft. pitch.
 No. 2. Bourdon bass and Double Diapason treble—Bourdon and Clarinetto. 16-ft. pitch.
 Back. No. 3. Clarion bass and Principal treble—Clarion and Fifre. 4-ft. pitch.
 No. 4. Bassoon bass and Oboe treble—Basson and Hautbois. 8-ft. pitch.

MUSTEL (q.v.) retains this arrangement of the foundation stops in all harmoniums. In the large Mustel instruments other stops of great beauty are added, the indisputable introduction of their ingenious maker—

Harpe Éolienne. Bass. 2-ft. pitch. Two ranks of vibrators, out of tune, the one a beat sharp, the other a beat flat, producing a tremendous effect.

Musette. Treble. 16-ft. pitch. Nasal quality.

Voix Céleste. Treble. 16-ft. pitch. Two ranks with soft quality.

Baryton. Treble. 32-ft. pitch. Nasal quality like the Musette, but broader.

The 'full organ' (grand jeu) is a drawstop, or sometimes a knee attachment, giving instantly the full power of the harmonium without the out-of-tune ranks. The 'percussion' has to do with the diapason only, and not with all four rows, as originally applied by Martin. Two mechanical stops—the Tremolo, which sets the wind in motion before it reaches the vibrators, and the Sourdine, which shuts off a portion of the wind that would reach them, may be regarded now as discarded in all harmoniums of good manufacture. The Swell (récit) is like the Venetian swell in the organ. It is usually placed over the back organ, and is controlled by the 'Pneumatic Fortes,' set in motion by knee attachments, which open the louvres by extra pressure of wind acting upon pneumatic levers. The front organ in foreign harmoniums is usually subdued by a thin board the under surface of which is covered with swansdown or other soft material; this is replaced in England by a covering of brown sheepskin or basil, also lined with swansdown. The tongues are not made of ordinary sheet rolled brass; but of a metal prepared expressly, and with some secrecy. The best is believed to be from hammered wire reduced by continued hammering to the thickness required. A broader tongue is found to give a bolder tone, but sacrifices quickness of speech; a narrower tongue is shriller. The tongues are bent in various ways, longitudinally and laterally, to gain sweetness, but the speech suffers. Tuning is effected by scraping near the shoulder to flatten the tongue, or near the point to sharpen it. The air pressure somewhat affects the tuning of the larger vibrators, but it is a merit in the harmonium that it alters little in comparison with the pianoforte or flue-work of an organ. Double touch is produced by causing the back organ to speak first, and is divided technically into the 'upper' and 'deep' touches. The harmonium has been combined in construction with the pianoforte by Debain and other makers. The timbres and nature of the two instruments are so dissimilar, not to say antagonistic, that no real benefit is to be gained by yoking them together.

HARMONY. (1) THE EVOLUTION OF THE HARMONIC SENSE.—The practice of combining sounds of different pitch is described by the two technical terms: harmony and counterpoint. There is not in fact a wholly logical separation between these two forms of definition, but the main distinctions which they embody can be understood with fair accuracy if harmony is taken to mean a more vertical consideration of combined notes, while counterpoint deals with a more horizontal aspect of them. Counterpoint is thus a weaving of melodic strands of thought, in which the combinations of notes that arise incidentally have or had a considerable part of their meaning and justification in the melodic logic of the progressions which give rise to them. The vertical combination of sounds is not, contrapuntally speaking, an end in itself. Indeed, it would hardly be too much to say that there is no traditional combination of notes in existence which, analysed into its simplest terms and traced through its historical evolution, cannot be derived in the last resort from the incidental encounters of essentially melodic ideas. Even the interval of the octave is no exception to this rule; for although this interval represents, from the harmonic point of view, the most fundamental and convincing consonance that exists, there is little doubt that it was used intuitively for the reinforcing of a single melodic line long before its mathematical and physical simplicity was intellectually understood. Equally probable is it that the use of consecutive fourths and fifths arose in the first place from a desire to provide the same melodic material for voices of different pitch. Intellectual analysis of these phenomena has subsequently related them to theories of intrinsic harmonic consonance, and many able and ingenious explanations have been given of the still more complicated impressions which have since satisfied the aural intuitions of musicians. But the gulf between the logical science of acoustics and the empirical art of harmony has never been convincingly bridged, and the cause of this failure to make science and art coincide seems to lie undoubtedly in the fact that harmony is largely the secondary product of combined melodies.

Whatever be the proper view of the dim historical beginnings of harmony, it is at least certain that melodic combination provides the only æsthetic explanation of many of the most important elements in the harmonic systems to which music has from time to time attached itself. It is this fundamentally contrapuntal derivation of so much of our music which makes the analysis and definition of harmony as such a task which is not only highly complex, but which also admits of many legitimate divergences of view. Just as counterpoint is much more than a purely horizontal technique, in that the incidental clashes of its melodies must also obey more or less rigid conventions of harmonic consonance, so harmony, though conceived primarily as a system of vertical associations, yet finds much of its logic in the precedent or subsequent behaviour of individual parts. Even with regard to so established a convention as the common chord, the chord, that is, which consists of a fundamental note sounded together with its third and fifth, the fact that this formula has for so long been accepted as a stable point of rest does not alter the historical truth that at least one important element in it, the third, was in the first place contrapuntally approached and exploited, and did not for a considerable time satisfy the then prevailing ideas of consonance. Considerations such as these must be constantly borne in mind in the discussion of harmonic evolution. The art of harmony derives its general orientation from historical tradition and experience. It is the study of aural conventions of consonance, some of which may agree with scientific theory, while others certainly do not. The pivots of harmonic thought are those combinations of notes which enjoy varying but accepted degrees of stability in the technique of their particular environment. Expansions of the system generally arise through the comparatively exceptional behaviour of single parts. (Chords which are accepted as stable are classified as concords. Unstable chords are those in which not every element is accounted to be melodically at rest. These are called discords. It is a natural feature in the evolution of the harmonic sense that these two terms, concord and discord, are always slowly but steadily shifting their ground. What was initially a discord becomes by reiterated use a more stable convention, with reference to which other and more exceptional combinations are in turn discovered, and so, theoretically at least, ad infinitum. This does not one whit invalidate the meaning and reality of concord and discord with respect to their fundamental values in the art of musical expression. What history has to tell us is that the story of harmony is the story of a gradual fixing of relations, a slow growth of conventions, and in this flux of impressions there is no break.

The Greeks were theoretically conscious of the mathematical relations on which certain harmonic conceptions can be made to rest, but it does not appear that they actually used these discoveries for artistic purposes. Their scales were melodically conceived, and the various intervals which these scales offered were not regarded as elements capable of harmonic combination. The artistic purpose of variations of pitch was melodic expression, and this purpose remained paramount throughout the early history of the music of which we have record. The scales characteristic of the various ecclesiastical modes, whether derived or modified from Greek sources, were also, both in theory and practice, exclusively melodic in conception. So far as we are able to gather from the fragmentary evidence of these early centuries, probably the only device which can be prophetically interpreted as involving the possibility of what we now define as a harmonic consciousness, was the use of a drone. Whether this drone came from a pipe of definite pitch or from the more ambiguous sound of a drum, it served as no more than a background for the melodic line. It did not combine with it. The earliest system in which something approaching a latent sense of harmony is clearly indicated, is that known as 'Diaphony' (see DIAPHONIA) or ORGANUM (q.v.), of which examples are found in the 10th century. This music consists for the most part in successions of perfect fifths and fourths, sometimes built into a three-part structure whose external dimensions are mainly octaves. The following examples are from Musica Enchiriadis, and have been variously ascribed to Hucbald or Otger:

It is important to observe that at this time only the fourth, fifth and octave could be used harmonically without qualification. Other intervals were passing and unstable effects which had to be approached and quitted contrapuntally. Even a century later, Guido of Arezzo defines Organum as consisting essentially of successions of these primitive consonances.

There was, however, almost contemporary with Guido, a more elaborate system called 'Discantus' (see DESCANT), which involved a simultaneous performance of distinct melodies, the combination being made comparatively tolerable by certain modifications of discordant notes. This system is described by Franco of Cologne (11th cent.), and if to this we add the early attempts at Canon, whether deliberate or accidental, we have the genesis of that wonderful growth of polyphony to which music owes so many of its major traditions. 'Sumer is iucumen in' is an outstanding example of canonic organisation as the 13th century understood it, and in this same century Marchetto of Padua gives examples of combined melodic progressions which are remarkably independent.

Marchetto classifies the fourth as a discord which must be justified by passage from and to a concord. It was this deposition of the fourth from its earlier status of a perfect consonance which opened the way for combinations of third and fifth, and which thus made possible that common chord which soon became the most stable element in harmony. The Ars Contrapuncti of Jean de Muris (14th cent.) provides an illuminating description of the state of harmonic sensibility in his time. Octaves and fifths are perfect concords, major and minor thirds imperfect concords, as is also the major sixth. The minor sixth is still a discord. These conventions illustrate very clearly the typical development of a more flexible conception of relative consonance, and it seems to be clear that de Muris lived at a time when experimental descant was demanding a still less rigid technique, for his comment on certain contemporary fashions runs thus :

'O magnus abusus, magna ruditas, magna bestialitas, ut asinus sumatur pro homine, capra pro leone,' concluding 'sic enim concordiae confunduntur cum discordiis ut nullatenus una distinguatur ab alia.'

The famous Netherlander, Dufay, was born before 1400, and he uses both the common chord and its first inversion. In the next century Okeghem can occasionally go so far as to essay a suspension on this first inversion, thus :

It was Okeghem's famous pupil, Josquin des Prés, who was said to have first used accidentals in notation, though it is certain that notes had previously been thus modified in practice. He too is generally considered to have been the champion of the major third in all final chords. Before and during his time the following cadence from his Mass 'Faysans regrets' may be taken as a distinctly advanced expression of harmonic values :

A passage from his 'Déploration de Jehan Okenheim' shows Josquin's grasp of harmonic relations, and it is clear that his use of a final major third is beginning to mean much more than the mere filling up of the chord in question. There is a noticeable approach to that sense of final tonality which became in time the pivot of the classical harmonic and architectural systems.

An example from Byrd will demonstrate how this instinct for what we should now call the definition of a key gradually became the predominant feature of cadential thought. Once these tonal cadences were accepted as stable harmonic conventions, it was possible to build on them a tonal system. They affected inferentially all neighbouring progressions and they helped to give to a whole movement an acknowledged harmonic direction. But these values were in the first place very tentatively expressed. In Ex. 6 above there is hardly more than a suggestion of them, and even in the following passage, although Byrd's cadence is strong in its feeling of tonality, his use of a chord of E flat so near the statement of F major is to our ears symptomatic of that less rigidly tonal organisation which has since been superseded, but which we have lately begun to seek anew.

7. BYRD : Anthem, 'Bow thine ear.'

The music of this crowning period of polyphony was all contrapuntally derived, but it definitely established certain harmonic conventions. Common chords and their first inversions were accepted concords and points of contrapuntal repose, and could be used freely within a comparatively diatonic environment without any further restrictions than the euphony of a chosen scale or the vocal progression of parts might impose. The feeling for a prevailing tonality was already present in essentials in those cadences which prepared a tonic by a dominant harmony. This perfect and authentic cadence, as it is called, satisfactorily defined a key from the point of view of harmonic organisation. It could also serve the purposes of modulation by defining a new key when required. From this time forth the art of harmony was wedded to principles in which the claims of key definition had a central place, and the theoretical classification of discords was organised on an increasingly tonal basis. In this system the dominant was held to be pivotal, and this explains why the subdominant or Plagal cadence was felt to be comparatively ambiguous. The most comprehensive cadences, whether defining an original key or establishing a new one, often contained both dominant and subdominant harmonies, just as in later times the key patterns of various accepted forms have obeyed a symmetry of similar nature. What may be called the flat or subdominant side of a key is balanced by the sharp or dominant side. The following from Palestrina's motet: 'Haec dies quam fecit Dominus,' epitomises these principles:

The above is an elaboration of the progressions:

In the latter part of this passage, viewed either as a modulation to, or as a fixing of, the key of C major, it will be seen that the functional chords are those of F, G, and C at the end, of which G is tonally the crucial one. This latter chord is, with respect to the tonality in which the passage finally comes to rest, both technically and psychologically the dominant factor.

The year 1600 is a very convenient date for dividing approximately the music that was more specifically contrapuntal in character from those later developments which were able to exploit a pronounced harmonic technique. This does not mean that counterpoint lost its logic or that harmony could henceforth develop itself without reference to melodic detail, but it does mean that there were by this time certain established harmonic conventions which were sufficiently stable and sufficiently universal to provide precise harmonic values around which the play of chords and parts could be organised. Bach, for example, was the master of a contrapuntal technique never surpassed either before or since, but he was also heir to harmonic and tonal traditions which could bear the weight of a high imaginative freedom. In their simplest forms these harmonic conventions were common chords and tonal cadences, and the subsequent history of the harmonic sense can be broadly related to these primary intuitions.

It will be sufficient here to mention one or two of the particular devices which have helped to expand these harmonic formulæ, and it is characteristic of the involved reactions of all the elements in an art that each of these expedients is contrapuntal in origin.

Passing-notes, suspensions, appoggiaturas and anticipations are terms used to describe a melodic component which is, with respect to its environment, ornamented, or delayed, or inflected, or advanced, as the case may be. Every element of this kind results in a complication of the vertical harmonic structure. If, for instance, we insert the most obvious passing-note in a perfect cadence, we obtain at the moment of passing a new harmonic combination, known technically as the dominant seventh (*).

The dominant seventh, thus historically derived, was eventually accepted as having definite harmonic implications, and this subsequently justified its use without so rigid a preparation. Thus Monteverdi, with daring, but with prophetic truth, wrote the following, in which a seventh of this kind is struck independently. Note also the ninth which precedes it, an originality still more remarkable for its period.

11. MONTEVERDI: Madrigal, 'Cruda Amarilli.'

Again, the most simple passing-note available in the Plagal cadence produces what is technically known as the chord of the added sixth, and although a long time elapsed before this chord could be used without preparation, it did eventually absorb enough logic of its own to serve as a leading, rather than as a derived, chord. It is the chord used by Beethoven in Ex. 38 below.

To the many diatonic passing-notes of which the above are types must be added a whole category of chromatic passing-notes, each of which may involve confessed expansions of the harmonic idiom. It must be remembered that the fixation of the chromatic scale as we now know it was a gradual process, and many later chromaticisms were in earlier days only partially or imperfectly available; but the tendency to supplement diatonic by chromatic progression has been broadly consistent, and the adoption of equal temperament in tuning was the logical result of this and similar intuitions. (See Exs. 20, 25 and 26 below.)

Suspensions are also devices of contrapuntal origin, as will be seen from Ex. 4 above. In them a melodic element is delayed, and vertical analysis at the crucial moment shows a complication which is in fact an expansion of the harmonic system. Monteverdi may again be quoted as a daring pioneer in this direction.

13. MONTEVERDI: Madrigal, 'Straccia me pur.'

The appoggiatura is a form of melodic inflection which has the same harmonic effect as the delayed action of a suspension. It appears to have been considered in some respects aggressively unorthodox, and this feeling was for a long time embodied in the custom of writing such unprepared dissonances as grace-notes. The following from Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion' may be quoted as an extreme discord of this kind (*):

Melodic anticipations have cognate harmonic results. The following succession of them is from a cantata by Carissimi:

And the following is typical of a widely accepted conventional ending, which in this case includes an accented passing-note as well as a melodic anticipation:

16. LULLY: Sarabande.

The influence of these melodic devices on the growth of harmonic variety is apparent, and composers were consistently moved to emphasise such exceptionally expressive factors by delaying or complicating the traditional resolutions. Thus Purcell, in 'Dido and Æneas,' uses a suspended seventh without any direct resolution, the implied sixth, C, appearing solely in another part, and an octave lower.

17.

See also a delayed resolution of a seventh, very characteristic of Bach's melodic freedom. (From No. 24 of the 'Forty-eight'.)

18.

The historical process is unfailingly regular. What was in the first place a novel form of diction becomes by repetition an accepted value. The growing currency of sevenths, for instance, is shown in the following example from Corelli, in which there is also a bold succession of seconds, due to a melodic anticipation in the upper part.

19. CORELLI: Sonata II op. 2

And Stradella provides a further example in which a seventh similar to the above (a) becomes later, by the addition of a chromatic passing-note, a chord of the diminished seventh (b).

In such manner as has been thus briefly outlined have the more specifically harmonic conceptions of music come into being. It is the melodic origin of so many accepted combinations which makes any rigidly scientific analysis of harmonic consonance wellnigh impossible. Consonance to the modern ear depends largely on intervals, such as thirds and sixths, which are no more than approximations, mathematically considered. The harmonic sense is in large measure empirically discovered and acquired. It is impossible to regard any particular stage in its evolution as either fundamental or final. How complicated is this faculty, as viewed from the angle of artistic experience, and how quickly it can be expanded or overlaid by new impressions, will be seen when the discussion of contemporary tendencies is reached. Yet though we are compelled to regard harmony as consisting mainly in a system of conventional values, it is precisely on the acknowledged meaning and associations of these values that the art of harmony has been built. Conventions of this nature may, in the broad stream of history, be demonstrably fluid, yet the expressive power of a particular period or of a particular form of technique must always depend as much on the strength of those conventions which are the pivots of its thought, as on the imaginative fancy which may modify or enrich them.

It will be convenient at this point to classify some of the more important harmonic values on which the music of the last three centuries has been substantially founded.

(2) THE CLASSIFICATION OF CHORDS.—Apart from those major and minor common chords now regarded as axiomatic, by far the most important of the roots recognised by traditional harmonic theory is that dominant note to which reference has already been made. This is only another way of saying that a large number of isolated chords are classified with respect to their power, in the ear of the musician, of suggesting or of defining a particular key. Their technical names often have a double significance which is due to a twofold attitude towards them. Thus the term 'dominant seventh' indicates a chord which, in addition to the third and fifth normally implied in all chords which will bear such interpretation, has also in it a note which makes an interval of a minor seventh with the chosen basic note. But this basic note is also defined as a dominant, a definition which implies a relation to a key, and therefore to a chord or chords other than itself. The term 'dominant seventh' thus defines not only a particular vertical arrangement of notes, but also a traditional behaviour of one or more of these notes as and when they move elsewhere. All chords, qua chords, are intellectual abstractions whose values are acoustical rather than musical. The classification of chords with regard to their musical significance is not only a definition of combinations, but also an indication of harmonic processes. In early use a process of this kind usually involved three stages, preparation, statement and resolution, all of which were to be understood under the single chordal definition. The preparation of chords is now no longer so rigidly implied, but at least a bias in favour of a particular resolution is essential if many of the terms used in traditional theory are to retain any meaning. The methods of various theorists have not always been consistent in this respect, but it can fairly be said that chords of which the dominant seventh is a type must adopt a prescribed behaviour as well as a prescribed structure if they are to be in any real sense chords of dominant derivation. The dominant seventh itself has already been quoted (Ex. 10), and a similar combination of notes which is yet not a dominant seventh will be given later (Ex. 29). The following are some of the other chords which are normally related to the dominant, and hence, in the quotations given, to the tonality of the chosen key of C. In each case an accepted preparation is given before the bar-line, the chord in question comes immediately after the first bar-line, and a traditional resolution follows.

Ex. 21 gives that six-four chord which, although it is actually a simple inversion of a common chord, came into musical currency through a double suspension of this kind. It remained, throughout a long period of polyphonic development, strictly a discord. Ex. 22 is the dominant ninth, major and (b) minor. Ex. 23 is the dominant eleventh, Ex. 24 the dominant thirteenth, major and (b) minor. A simple chromatic passing-note gives the chord of the augmented fifth in Ex. 25, and this can be combined with other devices as in Ex. 26. All these chords and their many variants can be tabulated as derivatives of the following harmonic formula, which consists of a structure of diatonic thirds and contains every note in the major or (b) harmonic minor scale of the chosen key. Its root is the dominant.

If to this formula are added the many alternatives and variants which passing-notes, suspensions, appoggiaturas and anticipations can supply, it is obvious that there is an enormous number of possible combinations of notes, all of which can be related unambiguously, by their subsequent behaviour, to the chosen key of C. They can all be pivoted, as it were, on the chosen dominant. In the following example a selection of these variants is given in black type. It is by no means exhaustive, yet every note in the chromatic scale is included at least once, and it is not rare to find more than one of the notes normal to a particular chord of the dominant, replaced by such melodic variants.

Now may now be taken of a few well-known chords which are not related to the dominant in this way, and whose feeling of key definition is therefore not so inherent. Ex. 29 includes what are technically known as the (1) Italian, (2) French and (3) German forms of the chord of the augmented sixth. Ex. 30 includes the famous 'Neapolitan' sixth (*). The normal harmonic relations of these chords will be clear from the context given.

Now it is obvious that some of these chords may have, regarded purely as harmonic combinations of notes, more than one meaning. The chromatic chord in Ex. 26, for instance, is identical, so far as its actual sound in isolation is concerned, with the dominant minor thirteenth in Ex. 24. Similarly the German sixth in Ex. 29 is, substituting G flat for F sharp, indistinguishable in sound from a dominant seventh in the key of D flat. These enharmonic changes, as they are called, are made possible by the system of tuning by equal temperament, in which E flat is actually the same note as D sharp. It is not necessary here to discuss the earlier systems in which these two notes were not considered identical, either in theory or practice. What chiefly concerns the student of harmony is the fact that a great many of the chords now in general use may be given more than one tonal complexion. A chord of this kind may be approached in one tonality and quitted in another, and it is in the exploitation of ambiguities of this kind that many of the most characteristic advances in harmonic flexibility have sought their justification.

The most notorious chord of this indeterminate type is that of the diminished seventh, the genesis of which was shown in Ex. 20. This chord may be regarded as a symmetrical structure consisting of four minor thirds, each superimposed on the preceding one. Four minor thirds are equal to an octave, and the notes therefore reproduce themselves, by extension of the formula, into any adjacent octave. If we extract this combination from Ex. 27 above, we can take, omitting the root, the major third, fifth, seventh and minor ninth, and regard the chord as a form of dominant minor ninth. But the chord itself, as pure sound, has four possible dominants and therefore four possible tonalities. These four dominants are given in black type below, and the four keys implied are C, A, F sharp, and E flat.

In our octave of twelve semitones there are three varieties of diminished seventh, thus :

These three chords offer four possible tonalities each, a total of the whole twelve existing keys ! It was just this inherent lack of tonal character in the chord which tempted certain composers to use or to abuse it, for purposes of modulation, to such an extent that it came to be stigmatised as a fair criterion of imaginative poverty. Crudely exploited, it is now generally regarded as a form of musical indiscretion.

This somewhat arid analysis of harmonic material will serve its present purpose if it suffices to demonstrate the kind of sensibility on which classification has for the most part been founded. That later complications often differ in degree, rather than in kind, from those of the past, may be made clear by an example typical of contemporary values. There is a chord of six notes which can be derived from Ex. 28 above, and which is essentially modern in its complexity and wealth of implication.

It behaves normally as shown in Ex. 33, the augmented fourth, C sharp, and the minor sixth, E flat, both resolving on to a fifth, and thus simplifying the thord into a normal dominant major ninth in the key of C.

The six notes which form the original chord are, however, those of a whole-tone scale as shown in Ex. 34. They divide the octave into six equal parts just as the diminished seventh divided it into four. Every one of these six notes has therefore a series of mutual relations with the other notes of the chord, and the harmonic sense can choose as to which, for example, shall be the dominant in a particular form of resolution. This chord can thus be related to six keys, respectively, by a procedure which is in each case no more than another aspect of the resolution already given. In the following example resolutions leading into D major, E major, and F sharp major are given.

A flat major and B flat major are the other remaining possibilities in this formula. And by a suitably organised progression the other six keys could also be implied. It is in subtleties of this kind that modern harmony tends more and more to expand its range, yet so far as such devices are founded on the classical tonal values, whether confessed or inferred, they admit of a direct relation to those forms of classification which have hitherto been found convenient.

(3) THE DEVELOPMENT AND CONDENSATION OF TRADITIONAL HARMONIC VALUES.—The music of the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries is based on an architecture of tonal and harmonic relations, the characteristic formulæ of which are of the types already described. An overwhelming preponderance of tonic and dominant associations is common to all the music of these periods. Hence the vigour or originality of a composer's harmonic fancy tended to express itself in combinations or condensations of idiom which were either striking in themselves or exceptional in their context. Technically considered, the further development of the harmonic sense centred mainly in the use of chords accounted relatively dissonant, and the most obvious way of achieving that freshness of statement which plays so great a part in effective expression was to minimise as far as possible the preparation of discords, and to vary or disguise their expected resolutions. How far this method had progressed in the minds of the greatest composers will be seen from the following two examples:

36. Reduced from BACH: 'St. Matthew Passion.'

37. BEETHOVEN: 'Diabelli' Variations.

The above passages are exceptional in their concentration, but they are not exceptional in so far as they show a marked concern for effects specifically harmonic. The march of thought in this direction could almost be epitomised by a series of examples showing the increasing currency of unprepared discords. This unpreparedness is naturally most marked at the beginning of a movement or section. The following are a few characteristic specimens, all of which occur at the beginning of movements or sections:

38. BEETHOVEN: Sonata, op. 31, No. 3.

39. BEETHOVEN: Symph. No. 9, iv.

40. SCHUMANN: Phantasie.

41. WAGNER: 'Tristan und Isolde.'

and later:

43. SRIABINE: 'Prometheus.'

44. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS: 'London Symphony.'

Ex. 38 above is a case of that chord of the added sixth noted first in Ex. 12. Beethoven's resolution of it is chromatic, but smooth and orthodox. His procedure is shown by the chords added in brackets. Ex. 40 is founded on a chord of the dominant eleventh, as given more simply in Ex. 23. Wagner's Ex. 41 is a very interesting case of what is in its implications a variant of the diminished seventh, the D sharp being a chromatic appoggiatura on D natural. This chord is therefore similar in harmonic argument to the second chord in Ex. 31, and Wagner so resolves it, on to the dominant (E) of the key of A minor. Later in the movement, however, he treats it as a variant of the first chord in Ex. 31 and thus resolves it on the dominant (G) of C minor. (This particular ambiguity is further demonstrated in a passage from the same work given in the article on CHROMATICISM.) In Ex. 43 both the first and last chords are variants of the chord discussed under Exs. 33 and 35. 'Prometheus' is full of harmonic devices founded on this chord and its variants. The note added in brackets completes the chosen formula as it is first stated in the work. Ex. 44 gives a case of a strong appoggiatura, the bass E flat, on what is otherwise a common chord; but when this E flat resolves itself on D the other notes move to a new discord. This procedure is thoroughly characteristic of a great many contemporary condensations of idiom.

The possibility of a chromatic succession of diminished sevenths has been already suggested in Ex. 32 above. Each of these chords is in itself highly ambiguous, and such harmonic logic as may be given it depends entirely on the context in which it is used. If this context is itself ambiguous, then any particular diminished seventh in it has little or no precise harmonic significance. There are countless passages in Bach and in later works where successions of diminished sevenths are used in this way, and the only connexion they normally have with the conventions of tonality lies in the approach to the first of a series or in the resolution of the last. They can thus be used as a short circuit, as it were, between any two keys, the initial tonality being as a rule sufficiently attenuated by the chosen succession. In the case of the diminished seventh this faculty has long been recognised, but it is by no means confined to this or indeed to any particular chord. The mediæval musician would have felt a similar sense of vagueness during Beethoven's successions of chords of the sixth in the Sonata, op. 2, No. 3. They might begin or end anywhere.

To later ears neither these nor the still more ambiguous chromatic successions of such chords excite particular remark, yet they have the inevitable effect of destroying the normal harmonic logic.

It is in the extension of this practice to chords other than those already mentioned that contemporary composers have shown one of their most noticeable expansions of technique. Debussy deserves special mention as a pioneer in this direction. He takes a chord of the dominant ninth, for instance, and moves it bodily, either in whole-tones or semitones, and in any direction. The harmonic result is exactly analogous to the cases cited above. Such use destroys all the traditional inferences which are normally attached to the chords, except so far as the first or last of a series may have a more definite relation to the prescribed context

46. DEBUSSY: 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' I.

It is impossible to enumerate all the effects of this kind which have since become current. There is now hardly any chord of traditional derivation, however complex or ambiguous in itself, which is not more or less freely used by certain composers in successions of this nature. In this respect all kinds of chords are often handled almost with the horizontal freedom of single notes. It will be convenient to discuss some of the consequences of this practice in a following section. Here it is only necessary to add that such devices may quickly accustom the ear to thinking in terms of comparatively complex chords without regard to their conventional inferences, and from this it is but a logical step to treating and accepting them as points of comparative rest, either incidentally in a movement or even finally at its end. Examples of this phenomenon are given in the article on CADENCE (2).

How subtly and how freely the traditional harmonic values of the past can be contrasted or condensed will be clear from the passage with which Frederick Delius begins his 'Song before Sunrise.'

There is, of course, in this example no chord that has not firm roots in the past, nor is there any detailed progression which could not be amplified or paraphrased into terms of clearest derivation. As it stands, however, it is an excellent, without being by any means an extreme, example of the wealth and variety of the contemporary harmonic sense, used with remarkable freshness and fertility of invention.

(4) THE COMBINATION OF TONALITIES.—That the tonality of a chord may depend on its context has long been admitted. Under normal circumstances many chords are, in isolation, inherently ambiguous. When a certain degree of harmonic complexity is reached, however, there arise combinations which can be interpreted not only as allowing a variety of tonal implications, but as actually presenting in themselves more than one definite tonal impression. The following chord, for example, would traditionally be analysed as a dominant minor thirteenth, including a third, seventh and minor ninth, and it could thus be related unequivocally to the key of D minor.

If, however, C sharp is also regarded as D flat, then the lower three notes form a dominant seventh in D, while the upper three are clearly a first inversion of the common chord of B flat minor. Should the context of such a chord involve the treatment of these two possible impressions with even a very slight degree of tonal independence, then the harmonic sense might find itself acutely conscious of two simultaneous and highly contrasted keys.

As thus crudely analysed, the possibilities of harmonic expansion in this direction may well appear at first sight to be intellectual rather than artistic. But there is one traditional device which has been consistently developed in every kind of music, and which undoubtedly involves an implied confusion of keys. The drone which was noted as a primitive background for melody became in very early times a more or less definite harmonic expedient, and that function of providing a tonal atmosphere or of preserving a chosen relation of pitch which the drone often performed, was in due time organised and elaborated into the well-known technical purpose of a PEDAL-POINT (q.v.). The use of a pedal-point assisted and justified harmonic daring in many ways, because through all the complexities or modulations of the other parts, the pedal-point preserved something of the atmosphere of a prevailing tonality. In a very real sense, therefore, the pedal-point might be identified with one key while the superstructure wandered into another, and the ear thus became tolerant of harmonic effects that could not be logically analysed into the terms of a single tonality. The following fragment from a long dominant pedal related to E major will make these values clear:

49. WAGNER: 'Die Meistersinger,' II.

Such effects can be pursued to a very extreme degree, and can be emphasised or condensed just as other harmonic complications have been. The following passage is typical of this development. It is related throughout, by virtue of the pedal-point, to the key of the movement, D.

50. Reduced from STRAUSS: 'Don Quixote.'

The blunt statement of combinations such as the following is then no more than the underlining, as it were, of harmonic inferences of this kind.

51. STRAUSS: 'Elektra.'

Another method of approach to values of this nature is perhaps still more significant. It has become a characteristic feature of contemporary technique to reinforce what is essentially a melodic line by presenting it in parallel strands akin to Beethoven's sixths in Ex. 45. When two such streams are combined there may arise a tonal complexity which has a new kind of horizontal logic. It is as if the single melodies of counterpoint had become composite bands of harmony which could be made to react on one another just as the component parts of the older polyphony did. Examples will make the practice clear. There are here two harmonic streams, as it were, each used melodically.

52. STRAVINSKY: 'Pétrouschka.'

Make these streams chromatic in relation,

53. Reduced from HOLST: 'Hymn of Jesus.'

or more complicated individually, either in constitution or movement,

and it is easy to see how far such a technique can be carried. As thus organised, it might eventually provide something approaching a synthesis of those two aspects, contrapuntal and harmonic, between which most of the conflicts of musical history have been fought. But it must be confessed that contemporary composers have not scrupled to use chords whose tonality is thus multiple, without any preparation or sequence that can be recognised as logical. We are as yet far from a coherent organisation of the method.

(5) NEOMODAL IDIOMS. — The persistent search for novel harmonies has led to combinations which have almost lost touch with classical values, and hence with those associations which gave the classical harmonic system its precision and power. It has therefore been suggested that the major-minor system on which conventional harmony has been built is itself in need of expansion, and of expansion of a fundamental kind. The recent vogue of various forms of nationalism in music has owed much of its influence to the piquancy which an unfamiliar melodic dialect may display. The folk-songs of all nations have been cultivated by musicians of various schools for the sake, mainly, of their undoubted freshness and spontaneity of idiom as compared with pseudo-classical models. Artists with knowledge of the past have found a similar attraction in the half-forgotten associations of the ecclesiastical modes proper, and attempts have even been made to invent and use new scales of distinctive character in the hope of finding expressive powers at once more direct and more simple than the complexities in which the classical values appear now to be inextricably involved. It would be an anachronism to describe these various melodic dialects, or the harmonies founded on them, as being in any strict sense modal, and this for two reasons. They are not, in the first place, used with that rigidity which was essential to the distinction of the old modes, either in authentic form or as preserved in folk-song. Secondly, all these new discoveries or revivals have for us a quality of diversion, as compared with the classical system. They are, for the modern ear, projected on a background of classical values. These classical values are, as a rule, freely incorporated with them, and it would therefore seem best to describe them by a term related to, but not identical with, the significance of modal association in the past.

Of these neo-modal forms of expression the folk-music of Europe has provided many examples, and though we are not here concerned with the analysis of melody as such, there is ample evidence that the study of this melodic music has suggested many harmonic idioms of notable freshness and beauty. There has arisen a new type of diatonic harmony which is in the main a grafting of modal turns of speech on to the simpler classical formulæ. This flavour is clear in the following passage, for instance:

It would need a text-book¹ to classify the wealth of experiment which has been bestowed on the many melodic dialects lately imitated or invented. The distinguishing feature of contemporary reaction to such material is a deliberate emphasis of the novelty in detail or strangeness in combination characteristic of the chosen idiom. Whereas those local inflections used by Chopin, Dvořák and other composers of the past were always more or less completely assimilated in the classical technique of their day, later and contemporary composers have shown a growing tendency to attempt the creation of fundamentally new styles. Thus Debussy, in the case of that arbitrarily chosen scale of whole-tones which has already been mentioned, wrote comparatively substantial sections almost totally within it, and organised characteristic harmonies of which the following are typical.

When the melodic idiom is itself thus inherently foreign to classical values, then such harmonies as may be consistently related to it will have little or no association with tradition. This absolute consistency is still rare, because composers have been for the most part content to dress these neo-modal scales in comparatively classical clothes. But the following example will show how the frank acceptance of strange melodic inferences can result in harmonic combinations of unpromising novelty.

57. BÉLA BARTÓK: 'Sketches,' vii.

It must never be forgotten, however, that harmony is a form of artistic expression, and that artistic expression owes its very existence to the organisation of communicable values. The fertility of the classical system rested on the power and precision of its conventions. Should these conventions be permanently displaced, then only a new and equally rigid system can hope to offer an imaginative field of comparable promise.

(8) The goal towards which many of these expansions of harmonic technique would appear to converge seems to reside ultimately in the theoretical acceptance of the chromatic scale itself as a final standard of organisation. This phenomenon has been dealt with under the heading of CHROMATICISM (q.v.). It will be sufficient here to give a final quotation which displays with remarkable directness and simplicity the contemporary search for new harmonic values. Though some of its features can be identified with those already noted, they appear to amount in the aggregate to little less than complete chromatic freedom. The melody might be described as neo-modal, the tonality is decidedly composite, yet there is in the passage a real though highly attenuated relation with associative factors not entirely divorced from experience.

58. STRAVINSKY: 'Le Chant du Rossignol.'

G. D.

HARNISCH, OTTO SIEGFRIED, a 16th-17th century German composer. According to information gleaned from title-pages and dedications of his works he calls himself in Dec. 1586 a musician studying at Helmstedt University. In 1588 he was cantor at St. Blasius, Brunswick; in 1591 at the court of Kurhessen-Schaumburg; in 1604 Kapellmeister to the Duke of Brunswick-Osnabrück-Verden; in 1608 musician and teacher at the Paedagogium, Göttingen, where he still was in 1621. He composed a large number of German songs in 3-6 parts; a Passion music, in the old style, with divided characters (1621); 'Resurrectio Dominica' . . . from the 4 gospels in 1-5 parts (1621); 'Fasciculus novus selectissimarum cantionum,' 5, 6 and more parts (1592); 'Rosetum musicum,' German and Latin ballets, villanelles, madrigals, saltarelles . . . 3-6 v. (1617-18); 'Psalmodia sacra,' 4 v. (1621); also a theoretical treatise, Artis musicae delineatio, about the treatment of the ecclesiastical modes (Kirchentöne) in part-writing (1608).

HAROLD, opera in 4 acts, words by Sir Edward Malet; music by Cowen; produced Covent Garden, June 8, 1895.

HARP (Fr. harpe; Ger. Harfe; Ital. arpa), a musical instrument of great antiquity; in its modern development, by means of the ingenious mechanism of the double action, distinguished as the only instrument with fixed tones not formed by the ear and touch of the player, that has separate notes for sharps, flats and naturals, thus approaching written music more nearly than any other.

The harp presents a triangular form of singular beauty, the graceful curve of the neck adding to the elegance of its appearance. Although the outline has varied at different epochs and in different countries, the relation of its proportions to the musical scale—a condition of symmetry in musical instruments—is in the harp very close; so that whether it be Egyptian, Persian, Mediæval or Celtic, it is always fashioned in beauty of line, and often characteristically adorned.

GENERAL DESCRIPTION.—In looking at a harp we recognise at once the varied functions of its structure. The resonant instrument is the sound-board next the player, which forms an acute angle with the upright pillar. Both support the neck, a curved bracket between which and the sound-board the strings are stretched. In modern harps the neck includes the 'comb' containing the mechanism for raising the pitch of the strings one half tone by the single action, or two half tones by the double action. The pillar is hollow in order to contain the rods working the mechanism. The pedestal, where pillar and sound-board unite, is the frame for the pedals, levers acted upon by the feet and moving the rods in the pillar.

The wood used in a harp is chiefly sycamore, but the sound-board is of deal, and in old harps was frequently ornamented with painted devices. The dimensions of sound-board and body increase downwards. Along the centre of the sound-board is glued a strip of beech, or other hard wood, in which are inserted the pegs that hold the lower ends of the strings, the upper ends being wound round tuning-pins piercing the wrest-plank which forms the upper part of the neck. The sound-board is ribbed underneath by two narrow bars, crossing the grain of the deal, their duty being to drive the sound-board into nodes and figures of vibration. The strings are of catgut, coloured to facilitate the recognition of the notes by the player, the lowest eight being spun over, wire upon silk or wire upon wire. The compass of an Erard double-action harp is $6\frac{1}{2}$ octaves, namely from

The apparently slight resistance offered by the bridge to the tension of the strings, inadequate if their drawing power were perpendicular, is sufficient because they are placed at an angle. There is also a lateral angle in the position of the neck and strings, to allow for the strain on the side to which the strings are attached.

EARLY HISTORY.—The origin of the harp must be put back before the earliest records of civilisation. It was possibly suggested by the stretched string of the bow. The addition of several strings would be analogous to binding several reeds or whistles together to form a syrinx, both contrivances apparently preceding the shortening to different lengths by the finger of a single vibrating string, as in a lute, or the shortening of the vibrating column of air in a pipe by means of holes perforated in it to be stopped also by the fingers. The oldest monuments of the harp are Egyptian. Those first seen by Bruce, painted on the wall of a burying-place at Thebes, are supposed to be as old as the 13th century B.C. These are very large harps, richly ornamented, and standing, to judge from the players, more than six feet high. These instruments, which have been often described, having no front pillar, could have had no great tension, and were probably of a low and sweet tone. But while all Egyptian harps wanted this important member for support, they were not limited to one size. There seems to have been a great variety in dimensions, number of strings, and amount of ornament. Some, like Bruce's, were placed upon the ground; others were upon rests or stools, to admit of the players standing. Those held by seated players were more like the Greek trigonon, a link between the harp and lyre.

The ASSYRIAN HARPS resembled the Egyptian in having no front pillar, but differed in the sound-board being uppermost, the lower angle being a simple bar for the attachment of the strings. Carl Engel¹ regarded the absence or presence of the front pillar as distinguishing the Eastern harp from the Western; but it may be that the distinction is rather that of ancient and modern, for it is said that the Western harp² of which a representation exists in Bunting's Ancient Music of Ireland, attributed by him to an earlier date than A.D. 830, has no front pillar. The beautiful form of the later Irish harp is well known from its representation in the royal arms (see PLATE XXXVIII.). Two specimens are to be seen in the Victoria and Albert Museum: one is a cast of the ancient harp in Trinity College, Dublin, said to have belonged to Brian Boiroidhe but now attributed to the King of Thomond (c. 1221), who sent it as a pledge to Scotland, from whence it was removed by Edward I. to Westminster. In the reign of Henry VIII. it reverted to the then Earl of Clanrikarde. In these the body is perpendicular, or nearly so, instead of slanting, as in modern harps; the front pillar being curved to admit of this, and the neck—in the Irish harp called the Harmonic Curve—descending rather to meet it. This form gives a more acute angle to the strings, which were of brass, two to each note, the sounds being produced by the pointed finger-nails of the player. The number of strings is uncertain, but the fragments of the 'Dalway' harp, shown in the Special Exhibition at South Kensington in 1872, inscribed 'Ego sum Regina Cithararum,' and dated A.D. 1621, justify our assuming the large scale of fifty-two for this instrument. This harp was made by Donal O'Dermody for Sir John FitzGerald of Cloyne, Co. Cork, and is still in the possession of the Dalway family at Ballahill near Carrickfergus. The sound-board is missing, but the harmonic curve and forearm are in good preservation.³

² Canon Gulpin in The Origin of the Clavichord or Irish Harp (Mus. T., Feb. 1912) combats Bunting's statement, and in his Old English Instruments of Music gives a reproduction of an actual rubbing taken from the old cross at Ullard, Co. Kilkenny, on which the original carving appears. In an appendix he adduces reasons for considering the instrument to be an example of the large quadrangular crot or cruit with the usual supports for the head and the small sound-board behind the strings, a form found on other early crosses in Ireland and quite distinct from the later triangular kiarneh or harp (see ROSS and CARTON).

The IRISH GAELIC HARP must have been the SCOTCH GAELIC one also. According to Gunn,⁴ a lady of the clan Lamont in Argyle took a harp with her on her marriage in 1640 to Robertson of Lude, which had for several centuries been the harp of a succession of Highland bards. Gunn described it as then existing, thirty-eight inches high and sixteen broad, with thirty-two strings. It was lent by W. Moir Bryce to the Loan Exhibition of the Musicians' Company in Fishmongers' Hall, 1904. Another, also then existing and in excellent preservation, he stated to have been the gift of Queen Mary of Lorraine to Miss Gardyn of Banchory. It was smaller than the Lude harp, and had originally twenty-nine strings, increased later to thirty. It was sold by auction in Edinburgh on Mar. 12, 1904, for 850 guineas, and purchased for the Antiquarian Museum of that city.

The WELSH HARP has likewise a perpendicular body, but is larger than the Irish, increasing considerably downwards. The neck ascends, the front pillar being longer. The Welsh harp has three rows of gut strings, the outer rows being unisons in diatonic series, the inner the chromatic semitones.

Among the early representations of the portable mediæval harp, which so many painters loved to delineate along with lutes and viols, is that in Gerbert's De cantu et musica sacra, copied from a MS. of the 12th or 13th century in the monastery of St. Blaise in the Black Forest, destroyed by fire in 1768. The form of this instrument is preserved in the modern harp, the front pillar only differing in being straight instead of slightly curving, to admit of the movement of the rods for working the pedals.

It is not generally known that harp-making was carried on in England in the 15th century. According to the Issue Rolls, pp. 363-7, we find circa 1420: 'by the hands of William Menston was paid 8l. 13s. 4d. for two new harps for Henry [V.] and Queen Katharine'; and a previous document mentions another harp sent to Henry when in France, 'purchased of John Bore, Harp-maker, London, together with several dozen harp-chords and a harp-case.'

That the Western harp belongs to Northern Europe in its origin there seems to be no doubt. Max Müller claims the name as Teutonic, and has contributed these historic and dialectic forms: Old High German, Harapha; Middle do., Harpe; Modern do., Harfe; Old Norse, Harpa. From the last were derived the Spanish and Italian Arpa, the Portuguese Harpa, and the French Harpe—the aspirate showing the Teutonic origin. The Anglo-Saxon form was Heape. The Basque and Slavonian, as well as the Romance, took the name with the instrument, but there is a remarkable exception in the fact of the Celtic peoples having their own names, and these again divided according to the Gaelic and Cymric branches. Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte has supplied the following illustration: Irish Gaelic, Cláirseach; Scotch do., Clàrsach; Manx, Clasagh; Welsh, Telyn; Cornish, Telerin; Breton, Telen.

THE PEDAL-ACTION HARP.—The mediæval harp, a simple diatonic instrument, was sufficient in its time, but when modern instrumental music arose, its limits were found too narrow, and notwithstanding its charm of tone it would have fallen into oblivion. It had but one scale, and to obtain an accidental semitone the only resource was to shorten the string as much as was needed by firmly pressing it with the finger. But this was a poor expedient, as it robbed the harpist for the time of the use of one hand. Chromatic harps were attempted by German makers in the 18th century, but it was found impracticable, through difficulty of execution, to give the harp thirteen strings in each octave, by which each would have been a sharp to its next lower and a flat to its next higher string. The first step towards the reconstruction of the harp was due to a Tyrolese, who came upon the idea of screwing little crooks of metal (crochets) into the neck, which when turned against the string would cause the shortening necessary for a chromatic interval. Still the harpist lost the use of one hand while placing or releasing a crook, and one string only was modified, not its octaves. About the year 1720, one HOCHBRUCKER (q.v.), a native of Donauwörth in Bavaria, conceived and executed the first pedal mechanism, and rendered the harp fit for modulation, by using the foot to raise each open string, at will and instantaneously, half a tone higher, and leaving the player's hands free. This brought about a very remarkable revolution in harp-playing, giving the instrument eight major scales and five minor complete, besides three minor scales descending only. Hochbrucker's mechanism acted upon crooks which pressed the strings above nuts projecting from the neck. But there were inconveniences arising from this construction; each string acted upon by a crook was removed from the plane of the open strings, an impediment to the fingering, and frequent cause of jarring, and the stopped strings were less good in tone than the open. A fault no less serious was due to the mechanism being adjusted to the wooden neck, which was intractable for the curving required; if too much bent it was liable to break, and if not bent enough the middle strings would break when tuned up from being too long.

The first to make harps without crooks, and yet to stop half tones, were Frenchmen—the COUSINEAUS (q.v.), father and son. They passed each string between two small pieces of metal (béquilles) placed beneath the bridge-pin. Then by the pedal action these metal pieces were made to grasp the string, and shorten it the distance required. The Cousineaus also introduced a slide to raise or lower the bridge-pin regulating the length of the string, and placed each system of levers belonging to strings of the same name between metal plates which were bevelled to make them lighter. Thus the neck could be curved at pleasure, and its solidity being assured, the proportions of the strings could be more accurately established. About 1782 they doubled the pedals and connected mechanism, and thus constructed the first double-action harp. The pedals were arranged in two rows, and the tuning of the open strings was changed to the scale of C₂ instead of F₂, as in the single-action harps. But it does not appear that the Cousineaus made many double-action harps.

We now arrive at the perfecting of the harp by that great mechanician Sebastian ERARD (q.v.). His earliest essays to improve the harp date about 1786, and were confined to the single action. He worked upon a new principle, the fork mechanism, and in his harps which were finished about 1789, the arrangement of it was chiefly internal; the studs that shorten the strings alone performing their functions externally. He patented in London in 1794 a fork mechanism external to the plate. He made a double-action harp in 1801, patenting it in 1809, (in his early specimens the double movement only affected the notes A and D), and it was not until 1810 that he introduced the double action throughout in the culmination of his beautiful contrivance, which has since been the model for all harp-makers. In this harp, as in the single-action one, Erard maintained seven pedals only, and simply augmented the extent of movement of the cranks and tringles (or levers) acted upon by the pillar-rods, to give successively a portion of revolution to the disks from which the studs project; the first movement of the pedal serving to shorten strings of the same name, to produce the first half tone, the second movement of the pedal for the second half tone, the contrivance being so ingenious that the position of the upper disk—the second to move but the first to act upon the strings—is not changed when the lower disk completes its movement of revolution and acts upon the strings also.

The drawing represents three sections of the neck of Erard's double-action harp, and shows the position of the forks and external levers, (1) when the strings are open, (2) when stopped for the first half tone, and (3) when stopped for the second. Two strings are shown for each pitch.

It is not necessary to keep the foot upon a pedal, as it may be fixed in a notch and set free when not required; spiral springs with two arms fixed beneath the pedestal accelerate the return of the pedals. Unlike the weighty expedient of the Cousineaus, there are but two brass plates which form the comb concealing the greater part of the action. Lastly, Erard made the convex body bearing the sound-board of one piece, doing away with the old lute-like plan of building it up with staves.¹

As already stated, the double-action harp is tuned in C \flat . By taking successively the seven pedals for the half-tone transposition, it can be played in G \flat , D \flat , A \flat , E \flat , B \flat , F, and C \sharp . By the next action of the pedals, completing the rise of the whole tone, the harp is set successively in G, D, A, E, B, F \sharp , and C \sharp (cf. GLISSANDO and ABBREVIATIONS). The minor scales can only be set in their descending form, the ascending requiring change of pedals. Changes by transposition constitute a formidable difficulty in playing keyed instruments through the altered fingering required. On the harp passages may be repeated in any key with fingering absolutely the same. The complication of scale fingering, so troublesome to pianoforte-playing, is with the harp practically unknown.

The difficulties attending performance on the harp, the constant tuning necessitated by the use of catgut strings, and the absence of any means of damping the sounds, induced DIERZ (q.v.), of Brussels, to invent a harp-like instrument with a chromatic keyboard, which he named the Claviharp. It was introduced into England through the advocacy of W. H. Cummings, but without general acceptance. The action of the Claviharp is highly ingenious, the strings being excited mechanically much in the same way as the strings of the harp are excited by the player's fingers. There are two pedals, one being like the pianoforte damper pedal and the other producing the harmonics of the octave.

The harmonics of the harp are frequently used. (See HARMONICS.) The 'sonorousness of these mysterious notes when used in combination with flutes and clarinets in the medium' called forth the admiration of Berlioz, and their effects have been freely exploited by modern orchestrators.

THE CHROMATIC HARP.—Since 1897 a chromatic harp has been manufactured by the Pleyel firm. It was patented in 1894, and perfected in 1903 by Gustave Lyon, chief director of the firm; it has no pedals, and the strings are arranged to cross each other, so that the strings representing the white notes of the pianoforte keyboard are fastened to the left side of the console and the right of the sound-board, whilst those representing the black notes of the keyboard are fixed to the right side of the console and the left of the sound-board. There are ingenious details to facilitate tuning, and the full compass of the ordinary harp is available. It came into use in many of the orchestras, theatrical and otherwise, in France, found favour in the Brussels Conservatoire, and was written for by a few composers of eminence. It has not, however, threatened the supremacy of the double-action harp in general use.

HARPER, THOMAS, an early London music-printer, who worked between 1631 (at least) and 1653. He printed Ravenscroft's 'Psalms' 1633, and several of the earliest publications issued by John Playford, including the first edition of The English Dancing Master, 1650-1651, and H. Lawes's Ayres and Dialogues, 1653.

HARPER, (1) THOMAS (b. Worcester, May 3, 1787; d. London, Jan. 20, 1853), trumpet player, son of Richard Harper, of the parish of St. Nicholas, Worcester. When about 10 years of age he came to London and learnt the horn and trumpet under Eley, then master of the East India Brigade Band. He soon afterwards became a member of the band and a great proficient on the trumpet. He continued in the band till its dispersion in 1814; during the first years of this office, he also performed in the orchestras of some of the minor theatres. About 1806 he was appointed principal trumpeter at Drury Lane, and the English Opera House, Lyceum. He was a member of the Royal Society of Musicians in 1814. In 1820 he was engaged as principal trumpeter at the Birmingham Musical Festival, and in the following year succeeded the elder Hyde at the Concert of Ancient Music, the Italian Opera, and all the principal concerts and festivals, a position which he retained for upwards of a quarter of a century. The East India Company nominated him inspector of the musical instruments supplied to their bands, an appointment which he held until his death. Harper played on the slide trumpet (see PLATE LXXXIII. No. 6), and produced a pure, brilliant and even tone, with a command of execution which enabled him to surmount the greatest difficulties on his most difficult instrument. He was taken ill at a rehearsal in Exeter Hall for a concert of the Harmonic Union, and died a few hours afterwards. He was author of an Instruction Book for the Trumpet.

Harper left three sons, the eldest of whom, (2) THOMAS JOHN (b. London, Oct. 4, 1816; d. Aug. 27, 1898), succeeded his father in all his appointments as principal trumpeter, a position he held for many years; he retired in 1885. The second, (3) CHARLES ABRAHAM (d. Jan. 5, 1893), long filled the place of principal horn in the best orchestras. The youngest, (4) EDMUND (d. Hillsborough, Ireland, May 18, 1869), also a horn-player, settled at Hillsborough as pianist and organist. W. H. H.

HARP LUTE and DITAL HARP, two of the many attempts made at the beginning of the 19th century to replace the guitar. Edward Light, of London, appears to have invented the first form of these instruments in 1798, calling it the 'Harp-Guitar': it has a body triangular in outline, and the ordinary neck and head of the guitar. The eight strings are tuned as follows:

Shortly afterwards he produced the 'Harp-Lute-Guitar' (PLATE XXXI. No. 5), retaining the same form of body, but attaching to it a neck and head something like that of the old arch-lute with a double peg-box, thus providing this instrument with a set of open bass strings. The tuning is

This was followed by the 'Harp-Lute,' the most elegant of all these forms (PLATE XXXI. No. 4). It has eleven or more catgut strings tuned as follows:

To this Wheatstone added a second fingerboard for the strings calling his instrument the 'Regency Harp-Lute.' It must be observed that in these three forms the notation is a major sixth higher in pitch than the actual sounds, the instrument being in F flat major. In 1816 Light took out a patent for an improved instrument called the 'British Lute Harp.' The patent was for the application of certain pieces of mechanism called 'ditals' or 'finger' keys as distinct from 'pedals' or 'foot' keys: each dital key produces by pressure the depression of a stop-ring or eye which draws the string down upon a fret, and thus shortens its effective length and renders the pitch more acute. With slight alteration the instrument became playable with both hands, the first finger of the left hand being used to press the 'dital' or 'digital' keys when a semitone higher was required: this, the most complete instrument of his construction, he named in 1819 the 'Dital Harp' (PLATE XXXIII. No. 5), which is tuned thus, the notes sounding as they are written:

In 1825 Levien of London improved upon Light's original harp guitar by adding thumb buttons for stopping the strings: he called his instrument the 'Guitare-Harpo'; and in 1828 Angelo Ventura, music-master to the Princess Charlotte, introduced a chromatic harp-lute, the 'Harp Ventura,' with seven buttons for altering the pitch of the strings: the instrument, however, was not played in an upright position like the dital harp, but held slantingly across the chest. For minute details of the construction, stringing and playing of all these instruments see Musical Instruments (English and Irish Instruments) by the late Robert Bruce Armstrong, Edinburgh, 1908. HARPSICHORD (Fr. clavecin; Ger. Klavercimbal, Kielflügel, Flügel; Ital. clavicembalo, gravicembalo, not unfrequently cembalo only also arpicordo), the most important of the group of keyed instruments that preceded the pianoforte, holding during the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries a position analogous to that now accorded to the grand pianoforte. It had a place in the orchestra as an accompanying instrument when the first opera and the first oratorio were performed (Florence and Rome, c. 1600), and during the time of Handel and Bach was the constant support to the recitativo secco, its weak bass notes being reinforced by large lutes and viols, and ultimately by violoncellos and double basses. Towards the end of the 18th century the instrument was withdrawn,¹ and the big fiddles were left by themselves to accompany the ordinary recitative in a fashion more peculiar than satisfactory.

The name harpsichord is the English variant of the original arpicordo, which, like clavicembalo, clavicordo, spinetta and pianoforte, betrays its Italian origin. The spinetta was a table-shaped, five-cornered arpicordo, rectangular, like the German clavichord, but otherwise quite different from that instrument, which was made to sound by 'tangents,' or simple brass uprights from the keys. All instruments of the harpsichord, clavicembalo or spinet family were on the plectrum principle, and therefore were incapable of dynamic modification of tone by difference of touch. The strings were set in vibration by points of quill or hard leather, elevated on wooden uprights, known as jacks, and twitching or plucking them as the depression of the keys caused the points to pass upwards. (See JACK.) The Correr upright spinet or clavicytherium, which was in the Music Loan Collection of 1885, and was presented by Sir G. Donaldson to the R.C.M., is perhaps the oldest instrument of this kind in existence. It preserves traces of brass plectra, not leather. Leather points were probably used before quills, since we learn from Scaliger, who lived 1484-1550 (Poetices, lib. i. cap. 48), that crowquills were introduced in keyed instruments subsequent to his boyhood, and he informs us that through them the name 'spinet' (from spine, a thorn or point) became applied to what had been known as the 'clavicymbal' and 'harpichord.' The Canon Paul Belisonius, of Pavia, is said to have introduced quill plectra, but whether leather, as has been said, preceded the use of quills cannot be affirmed. The plectra in harpsichords and spinets were so often renewed that it is impossible to assert that we have direct evidence of the use of either substance in any existing instrument. The use of leather is shown in a harpsichord by Baffo, dated A.D. 1574, and presently to be referred to; and in one by the elder Andreas Ruckers of Antwerp, dated A.D. 1614, formerly in the possession of Col. Hopkinson.²

It is the principle of the plectrum that derives the descent of the harpsichord from the psaltery, just as the pianoforte is derived, by analogy at least, from the dulcimer, and the clavichord from the movable-bridged monochord; the model for the shape of the long harpsichord being that kind of psaltery which the common people called 'istromento di porco' — from a supposed resemblance between the trapeze form, and a pig's head. (See PSALTERY.) There is an interesting suggestion of this connexion of the harpsichord with the psaltery preserved in the church of the Certosa of Pavia, built about A.D. 1475. King David, who in the Middle Ages always played a psaltery, is there shown holding an 'istromento di porco.' The body of the psaltery is open, and shows eight keys, lying parallel with the eight strings. David touches the keys with his right hand, and uses the left to damp the strings. All this may be the sculptor's fancy, but Dr. Ambros³ regards it as a recollection of a real, though obsolete, instrument somewhere seen by him.

The earliest mention of the harpsichord is under the name of clavicymbalum, in the rules of the Minnesingers, by Eberhard Cersne, A.D. 1404. With it occur the clavichord, the monochord, and other musical instruments in use at that time. (See CLAVICHORD.) The absence of any prior mention or illustration of keyed stringed instruments is negative evidence only, but it may be assumed to prove their invention to have been shortly before that date — say in the latter half of the 14th century, especially as Jean de Muris, writing in 1323 (Musica speculative), and enumerating musical instruments, makes no reference to either clavicembalo or clavichord, but describes the monochord (recommending four strings, however) as in use for measuring intervals at that time. Moreover, before this epoch, hammered music wire could not have been extensively used, if it existed before the earliest record of wire-drawing, A.D. 1351, at Augsburg. It may occur to the reader — why were hammers not sooner introduced after the natural suggestion of the dulcimer, instead of the field being so long occupied by the less effective jack and tangent contrivances? The chasm untraversable by all forgotten Cristoforis and Schröters was the gap between wrest-plank and sound-board, for the passage of the hammers, which weakened the frame and prohibited the introduction of thicker strings strong enough to withstand the impact of hammers. It took more than three hundred years to bridge this chasm by stronger framing, and thus render hammers possible.

As pianofortes have been made in three quite different shapes, the grand, the square and the upright, there were as many varieties of the jack instruments — to wit (1) the harpsichord proper (clavicembalo, clavecin, or flügel), of trapeze form (see Frontispiece and PLATE XXXII.); (2) the spinetta, of oblong or pentangular form, frequently called SPINET or VIRGINAL (q.v.) (see PLATES XC. and LXXVI.); and (3) the upright harpsichord, or clavicytherium (see PLATE XIX.). It must be remembered that the long harpsichords were often described as spinet or virginal, from their plectra or their use by young ladies; but the table-shaped ones known commonly by the latter names were never called harpsichords. A few specimens of the upright harpsichords still exist; one decorated with paintings was shown in the collections of Musical Instruments at South Kensington in 1872; another was sold in the Duke of Hamilton's sale in 1883, but was unfortunately broken up for the sake of the paintings; and the Conservatoire of Brussels and the Kraus collection of Florence contain specimens. Another splendid specimen, of Italian origin, dating c. 1600, shown on PLATE XIX., was acquired by Mrs. J. Crosby Brown of New York, and forms part of her munificent donation to the Metropolitan Museum of that city. An interesting bill-head and receipt for an upright harpsichord, dated 1753, and signed by the maker, Samuel Blumer, is in the possession of Messrs. Broadwood.

‘Harpsichord and Spinnet Maker in Great Poultney Street, near Golden Square, London. N.B. Late joerman to Mr. Shudi,’

We are spared the necessity of reconstructing the older harpsichords from the obscure and often inaccurate allusions of the older writers, such as Virdung and Kircher, by the valuable collection now in the Victoria and Albert (South Kensington) Museum, that includes instruments of this family dating from 1521 to Pascal Taskin, 1786. In private hands, but accessible to the inquirer, are large harpsichords by Tschudi and Kirkman, and by Tabel, to whom these makers had in turn been foremen. The oldest harpsichord in the Museum, and so far as is known, anywhere, is a Roman clavicembalo, inscribed and dated ‘Hieronymus Bononiensis Faciebat.

Romae, MDXXI.’

It has one keyboard, and two unison strings to each note, boxwood natural keys, with an apparent compass of near four octaves, E to d''', which, with a ‘short octave’ in the bass, would be C to d'''. This instrument, like many Italian harpsichords and spinets, is removable from its elaborate case. There was no change of power or pitch in this instrument by stops, nor in the later clavicembali; the Italians were always conservative in structural features. Raising the top and looking inside, we observe the harp-like disposition of the strings as in a modern grand piano, which led Galilei, the father of the astronomer Galileo, to infer the direct derivation of the harpsichord from the harp. In front, immediately over the keys, is the wrest-plank, with the tuning-pins inserted, round which are wound the nearer ends of the strings — in this instrument two to each note — the further ends being attached to hitch-pins, driven into the sound-board itself, and following the angle of the bent side of the case to the narrow end, where the longest strings are stretched. There is a straight bridge along the edge of the wrest-plank, and a curved bridge upon the sound-board. The strings pass over these bridges, between which they vibrate, and the impulse of their vibrations is communicated by the curved bridge to the sound-board. The plectra or jacks are the same as in later instruments. (See JACK.) The raised blocks on each side the keys, by which the instrument was drawn out of the case, survived long after, when there was no outer case.

Reference to the oblong ‘clavicordi,’ in which the Victoria and Albert Museum is rich, will be found under SPINET. The actual workmanship of all these Italian keyed instruments was indifferent; we must turn to the Netherlands for that care in manipulation and choice of materials which, united with constructive ingenuity equalling that of the best Italian artists, culminated in the Double Harpsichords of the Ruckers family of Antwerp.¹ (See RUCKERS.)

Of this family there were four members living and working between 1579 and 1651 or later, who achieved great reputation. Their instruments are known by their signatures; and by the monograms forming the ornamental rosette or sound-hole in the sound-board — a survival from the psaltery. The founder of the reputation of this family, Hans Ruckers the elder, brought the Antwerp manufacture to that importance and perfection that have become historical. But the great change of construction that was to become normal was brought about by a grandson of the elder Ruckers, Jan Couchet, a pupil of Hans or Jean Ruckers the younger. It was long believed that the elder Hans Ruckers had added the second keyboard, the octave string, and stops for the control of the registers or slides of jacks acting upon the strings analogously to the stops of the organ, but it was not so, as the octave string has been found in older Italian clavicembali. We find in the Privy Purse expenses of Henry VIII.:

‘1530 (April) Item the vii daye paid to William Lewes for ii payres of virginnalls in one coffer with iii stoppes brought to Greenwich iii li . . . and for ii payres of virginnalls in one coffer brought to the more other iii li.’

The first, evidently a double-keyboard harpsichord with four stops, probably brought from Antwerp or Cologne, a still earlier seat of harpsichord-making; the second, a double harpsichord, no stops being named but probably existing, landed at the mere or marsh adjoining Whitehall, afterwards known as Scotland Yard. Hans Ruckers the elder was not born in 1530, hardly before 1550. His merit, and that of his sons Jean and André, was rather that of the great violin-maker Stradivari, to make perfect an existing model. The tension of harpsichords being comparatively small, they lasted longer than our modern pianos. They were sometimes expensively decorated a hundred years after they had been made. James Shudi Broadwood (Notes, 1838) states that many Ruckers harpsichords were in existence and good condition until nearly the end of the 18th century, and fetched high prices; one having sold in 1770 for 3000 francs (£120).

To Jan Couchet we may attribute the addition of the unison string and limitation of the octave string — the little octave, as Van Blankenberg called it — to the lower keyboard.¹ It was Couchet who, about 1640, changed the double keyboard harpsichord from a mere transposing instrument, contrived to accommodate the authentic and plagal church modes with the singer's capabilities, to a forte and piano instrument, with three strings (reducible to two and one) upon the lower keyboard, and one string always for the upper. Of Couchet's instruments, which are rare, one is in Edinburgh, and the other in Mrs. J. Crosby Brown's splendid collection.²

When the Ruckers family passed away we hear no more of Antwerp as the city of harpsichord makers; London and Paris took up the tale. But all these Antwerp workmen belonged of right to the Guild of St. Luke, the artists' corporation, to which they were in the first instance introduced by the practice of ornamenting their instruments with painting and carving. In 1557 ten of the Antwerp harpsichord makers petitioned the deans and masters of the guild to be admitted without submitting masterpieces, and the chiefs of the commune consenting, in the next year they were received. The responsibility of signing their work was perhaps the foundation of the great reputation afterwards enjoyed by Antwerp for harpsichords and similar musical instruments.³

The earliest historical mention of the harpsichord in England occurs under the name of Clariymball, 1502.⁴ The late Dr. Rimbault (The Pianoforte, London, 1860) collected this and other references to old keyed instruments from records of Privy Purse expenses and from contemporary poets. The house-proverbs of Leckington, the residence of Algernon Percy in the time of Henry VII., preserved (for the house was burnt) in a MS. in the British Museum, named it 'clarisymbalis.' For a long while after this, if the instrument existed, it was known under a general name, as 'virginalls.' It was the school of Ruckers, transferred to England by a Fleming named Tabel, that was the real basis of harpsichord-making as a distinct business in this country, separating it from organ-building with which it had been, as in Flanders, often combined. A Tabel harpsichord with two keyboards is in the possession of Helena, Countess of Radnor. It is inscribed 'Hermanus Tabel Feit Londini, 1721,' and is very like an early Kirkman. Harpsichords had, however, been made in London in the 17th century, by the spinet-makers, the Hitchcocks, Hayward and Keene. The spinets by the first and last of these have been preserved here and there, but only one harpsichord, by John Hitchcock, is known. Tabel's pupils, Burkhard Tschudi (anglicé, Shudi) and Jacob Kirckmann (anglicé, Kirkman), became famous in the 18th century, developing the harpsichord in the direction of power and majesty of tone to the farthest limit. The difference in length between a Ruckers and a Shudi or Kirkman harpsichord — viz. from 6 or 7½ feet to nearly 9 feet — is in direct proportion to this increase of power. Stronger framing and thicker stringing helped in the production of their pompous, rushing-sounding instruments. Perhaps Shudi's were the longest, as he carried his later instruments down to CC in the bass, while Kirkman remained at FF; but the latter set up one row of jacks with leather instead of quills, and with due increase in the forte combination. Shudi, in his last years (1769), patented a Venetian Swell, on the principle of the Venetian blind, but the invention was in use some years before, as it is described in the Salzburger Zeitung of August 6, 1765, together with his use of the machine stop, which, from a London report concerning the child Mozart's last concert there, it also attributes to him, and which was invented about 1750. Kirkman added a pedal to raise a portion of the top or cover. Both used two pedals; the one for the swell, the other by an external lever apparatus to shut off the octave and one of the unison registers leaving the player with both hands free, an invention of John Hayward's, described in Mace's Musick's Monument, A.D. 1676, p. 235. There is a Silbermann harpsichord in the de Wit collection at Leipzig, of wonderful tone, far finer than that of any Shudi or Kirkman, in which all the strings are overspun.

In these 18th-century harpsichords, the Flemish practice of ornamenting with painting — often the cause of an instrument being broken up when no longer efficient — was done away with; also the laudable old custom of mottoes to remind the player of the analogous brevity of life and sound, of the divine nature of the gift of music, or of dead wood reviving as living tone. But it was when the instrument went out altogether that this enrichment of picture galleries by the demolition of harpsichords was most effected. The number of Ruckers, however, known to exist has been extended by research to seventy. There was great care in ⁴ The oldest known English harpsichord still in existence is preserved at Knoll, Kent. The case is of panelled oak, with a decorative stand of Jacobean Renaissance style; keys and jacks are missing. It is inscribed JOHANNES HAYWARD FACTOR LONDINI MDCXXII. John Hayward was the inventor of the 'pedal,' an improved harpsichord in which the stop changes were effected by four small pedals instead of by hand knobs. (Cf. artistic choice of wood and in the cabinet-work of Shudi's beautiful instruments. One, formerly in the possession of Queen Victoria, and long preserved in Kew Palace,¹ is quite a masterpiece in these respects. It bears Tschudi's name, spelt, as was usual, Shudi; the date 1740 and maker's number 94 are inside. The compass is, as in the South Kensington Ruckers, G_1 to f''' , without the lowest $G#$. Two, dated 1766, are in the New Palace at Potsdam, and were Frederick the Great's. (See SHUDI.) Messrs. Broadwood have one dated 1771, with five and a half octaves, C_1 to f''' , Venetian Swell and five stops, comprising the two unisons and octave of the Ruckers, with a slide of jacks striking the strings much nearer to the bridge (also a Ruckers contrivance), and producing a more twanging quality of tone, the so-called 'lute'-stop and a 'buff'-stop of small pieces of leather, brought into contact with the strings, damping the tone and thus giving a kind of pizzicato effect. This fine instrument was used by Moscheles in his Historical Concerts in 1837, and by Pauer in similar performances in 1862, 1863 and 1867. There is also one in the Musikverein at Vienna of similar construction, made by 'Burkat Shudi et Johannes Broadwood,' and dated 1775, which belonged to Joseph Haydn. Dr. Henry Watson of Manchester possesses a Shudi harpsichord numbered 1148 and dated 1791; it has five octaves, F to f''' , Venetian Swell and five stops. A Kirkman harpsichord dated 1798 is in the possession of J. A. Fuller Maitland, and is described in Dannreuther's Ornamentation.

The variety of stops and combinations introduced by different makers here and abroad at last became legion, and were as worthless as they were numerous. Pascal Taskin, a native of Theux in Liège and a famous Parisian harpsichord maker, is credited with the reintroduction of leather as an alternative to quills: his clavecin 'en peau de bûle' made in 1768 was pronounced superior to the pianoforte (De la Borde, Essai sur la musique, 1773). Taskin's were smaller scale harpsichords than those in vogue in England, and had ebony naturals and ivory sharps, and a Japanese fashion of external ornamentation. There is one in the Victoria and Albert Museum, dated 1786. In the Liceo Comunale di Musica at Bologna there is a harpsichord with four rows of keys, called an 'Archicembalo.' This instrument, according to Carl Engel, was made by a Venetian, Vito Trasuntino, after the invention of Nicolo Vicentino, who described it in his work L'antica musica ridotta alla moderna prattica (Rome, 1555). The compass comprises only four octaves, but in each octave are thirty-one keys. A 'tetracordo' was made to facilitate the tuning of these minute intervals. Thus early were attempts made to arrive at purity of intonation by multiplying the number of keys within the bounds of the octave. Another archicembalo, made by Cristofori in 1726, is in the Museo Kraus at Florence. It has a double keyboard, but is not enharmonic; it was intended to be used in an orchestra, the player standing. Another of the curiosities of harpsichord-making was the 'Transponiciavicymbel' described by Praetorius (1614-18). By shifting the keyboard the player could transpose two tones higher or lower, passing at pleasure through the intermediate half tones. Arnold Schlick, however, had achieved a similar transposition with the organ as early as 1512 (M.f.M., Berlin, 1869). A harpsichord pedalier—Clavicymbel-pedal—according to Dr. Oscar Paul, an independent instrument with two octaves of pedals, was used by J. S. Bach, notably in his Trios and the famous 'Passacaille'; and in his transcriptions of Vivaldi's Concertos. Some large German harpsichords had not only the two unison registers and an octave one equivalent to 8- and 4-foot stops, but also a bourdon, answering to 16-foot pitch. J. S. Bach had one of this calibre; it formed one of the interesting objects in Herr Paul de Wit's collection in Leipzig, and has been transferred to the museum attached to the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin.² In 1901 harpsichords came to light containing three keyboards, of Italian make and similarly contrived, the octave being on the highest bank, octava and cymbalum on the middle, and unisons on the lowest bank.³ A fine specimen by Sodi is in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. Lastly a 'Lautenwerke' must be noticed, a gut-strung harpsichord, an instrument not worth remembering had not Bach himself directed the making of one by Zacharias Hildebrand of Leipzig. It was shorter than the usual harpsichord, had two unisons of gut-strings, and an octave register of brass wire, and was praised as being so like the lute in tone as to be capable, if heard concealed, of deceiving a lute-player by profession.⁴ Since 1888 harpsichords have been made in Paris by the pianoforte-makers, Pleyel, Wolff & Cie., and S. & P. Erard. The former firm have introduced original features, one being the substitution of pedals for hand-stops, the gradual depression of which produces a crescendo. Messrs. Erard have been content to reproduce a clavecin by Taskin, said to have been made for Marie Antoinette. (See CLAVICHORD; KIRKMAN; RUCKERS; SHUDI; SPINET; VIRGINAL.)

ARNOLD DOLMETSCH (q.v.), working in turn for Chickering of Boston and Gaveau of Paris, as well as on his own account, has been a leader in the modern revival of harpsichord construction. The 20th century has brought a notable revival in the use of the harpsichord, both as a solo instrument and in ensemble music. c.

HARRER, GOTTLÖB (d. Carlsbad, 1755), J. S. Bach's successor as cantor of St. Thomas, Leipzig, in 1750. He died while taking the waters at Carlsbad. He studied for some time in Italy and made a rare collection of the works of older masters, which with his extensive library was incorporated with the Royal (now State) Library at Berlin. Unfortunately he added or augmented instrumental accompaniments in the scores of the older masters even as far back as the 16th century. His own compositions consisted of 24 symphonies; concertos for various instruments; 3 oboe trios; 51 duets for flageolet, harpsichord sonatas, oratorios, passion music, masses and other church music. Most of his compositions remained in MS. (Riemann; Q.-L.).

HARRIS, a celebrated family of English organ-builders. (1) The first of them (grandfather of Renatus (3), the most celebrated of the family) built an organ for Magdalen College, Oxford; (2) THOMAS, father of Renatus, appears to have emigrated to France, for Dr. Burney says that Renatus came to England with his father a few months after Father Smith's arrival (1660).

Thomas Harris of New Sarum in 1666 contracted to build an organ for Worcester Cathedral. (3) RENATUS became a formidable rival to Smith, especially in the competition for building an organ in the Temple Church. (See SMITH, 'Father.') In 1690 Renatus agreed to improve and enlarge his grandfather's organ in Magdalen College, Oxford. Rimbault gives a list of thirty-nine organs built by this eminent artist.¹ He had two sons—(4) RENATUS, who built an organ for St. Dionis Backchurch, London, in 1724, and (5) JOHN, who built most of his organs in conjunction with his son-in-law, John Byfield.

The firm of HARRIS (JOHN) & BYFIELD (JOHN) carried on business in Red Lion Street, Holborn. In 1729 they built an organ for Shrewsbury, and in 1740 one for Doncaster, which cost £525, besides several others. v. de r., with addns.

HARRIS, SIR AUGUSTUS HENRY GLOSSOP (b. Paris, 1852; d. Folkestone, June 22, 1896), theatrical manager, was in business for a short time, and gained theatrical experience from 1873 in Liverpool, Manchester and elsewhere, before becoming assistant stage-manager under Mapleson in London. He acted in various pieces in London, and in 1879 became lessee of Drury Lane, producing the annual melodramas and pantomimes which revived the vogue of that theatre. The annual visits of the Carl Rosa Company to Drury Lane, in 1883-87, gave Harris his first experience in operatic management, and in the latter year he started on his own account as an impresario, giving 'Aida' with an amount of care in the production which surpassed everything hitherto seen on the English operatic stage. He introduced Mancinelli to English audiences, and the revivals of 'Lohengrin' and 'Les Huguenots' were among his great successes; the brothers de Roszke (Jean making his first appearance in England as a tenor) were the great attractions of the cast, and Mme. Nordica, Mlle. Minnie Hauk, Maurel and others were members of the company. In the following season, Harris began the enterprise at COVENT GARDEN (q.v.) which brought back the fashionable world to the opera as a regular amusement. His qualities as a manager were very remarkable, he had all the astuteness of a keen man of business, and did not scruple to profit by the discoveries of other managers, whether in the matter of singers or of operas. He had a certain amount of musical taste, and his artistic conscience led him to present operas as far as possible in accordance with their composers' intentions. He also realised what seemed a hopelessly impracticable ideal of giving operas in different languages in the same season, presenting every opera in the tongue for which it was written. More than all this, he had the wisdom to see that it is wise to give the public, not the kind of entertainment that they are just beginning to get tired of, but that which is a little in advance of their taste. He did much for the cause of Wagner's music in England, and careful mounting was characteristic of his management throughout. On occasions he managed a set of German performances at Drury Lane during the season of polyglot opera at Covent Garden. He revived the fashion of public fancy-dress balls, and the patronage of the wealthy classes was retained for the opera until his death. His career as a theatrical manager apart from opera does not concern a musical dictionary. He was knighted in 1891, having been sheriff of the City of London in that year. m.

HARRIS, CLEMENT HUGH GILBERT (b. Wimbledon, July 8, 1871; d. Pentepigadia, Apr. 23, 1897), composer. He was educated at Harrow, where a memorial has been erected to him in the chapel. He studied music at the Frankfort Conservatorium, afterwards becoming a pupil of Madame Schumann. He was a virtuoso on the pianoforte and a highly gifted composer. Of excellent position and possessing ample means, he happened to be in Greece when the war broke out between that country and Turkey. His enthusiasm for the cause of Greece impelled him to enlist in that army. He considered his action (in the words of his Diary) as 'the least a man of honour can perform towards a country which, crying for liberty in the name of the Cross, has been insulted and thwarted by each so-called civilised power successively.*

He was killed at the battle of Pentepigadia, where

'he fought as many a Harrow boy has fought before him, and as many another will fight in the days to come, and when the retire was sounded, and his five unwounded comrades sneaked away, young Harris stayed until a friendly bullet ended a career full of promise and laid low a lad who knew not how to fly.'

A memorial erected in the English Church, Athens, at the request of the Empress Frederick of Germany, is inscribed thus:

'To the memory of Clement Hugh Gilbert Harris, born July 8th, 1871. He died fighting for the cause of Greece, on April 23rd, 1897, at Pentepigadia.'

The following is a list of his published compositions:

Paradise Lost. Symphonic Poem for orchestra. First performed in England at Birmingham Town Hall (Halford Concerts), Dec. 5, 1905.

Four Concert Studies: Ballade; II Penseroso, L'Allegro (Études); Lied (Peter Cornelius)—Concert Transcription. For pianoforte.

Six Songs.

Songs of the Sea: (1) Yes, I shall go; (2) A grace, to-night.

Romance for Violin and Piano.

Romance (in F) for Clarinet, Violoncello, and Piano

The symphonic poem is a remarkable work considering the age of the composer when it was written. It shows complete mastery of orchestration and much skill in the development of the beautiful themes it contains. The pianoforte works could only have been written by one who was a virtuoso as well as a composer.

HARRIS, JOSEPH JOHN (b. London, 1799; d. Manchester, Feb. 10, 1869), was chorister in the Chapel Royal under John Stafford Smith. In 1823 he was appointed organist of St. Olave's Church, Southwark. In 1827 he published 'A Selection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, adapted to the psalms and hymns used in the Church of St. Olave, Southwark.' In Feb. 1828 he quitted Southwark to become organist of Blackburn, Lancashire; in 1831 was made 'lay precentor' or choirmaster at the collegiate church (now the cathedral) at Manchester, deputy organist, and on Mar. 25, 1848, organist. Harris composed some cathedral music and a few glees, songs, etc.

HARRISON, (1) BEATRICE (b. Roorkee, N.W. India), violoncellist, daughter of Col. J. H. C. Harrison, R.E.; was brought to England at the age of 3 months. She won the gold medal (senior grade) of the Associated Board, against 4000 competitors, at the age of 10. She studied under Whitehouse at the R.C.M., and afterwards with Hugo Becker at the Hochschule, Berlin. At the age of 14 she was the first violoncellist and youngest student to win the Mendelssohn international prize, for which both instrumentalists and singers competed.

She has distinguished herself in the performance of new works written for her instrument, notably the concertos by Elgar and Delius, and the solo sonata by Kodály, and has made a great name in the world's principal music centres.

(2) MARGARET, a younger sister of the above, a violinist of great promise, made her début in 1918.

(3) MAY (b. Roorkee), violinist, eldest sister of the above, won at the age of 10 the Gold Medal of the Associated Board against 3000 competitors. She was awarded an Exhibition in the R.C.M. and studied there under Arbós and Rivarde, finally also in Petrograd under Auer. At the age of 18 she took Kreisler's place at a Mendelssohn Festival at Helsingfors, playing the following year with the Berlin Philharmonic. Her interpretations of works in the classical repertory are exceptionally fine. With her sister she has frequently played with much success in the principal cities of Europe the double Concerto of Brahms, and occasionally the double Concerto of Delius. W. W. C.

HARRISON, J., a London music-publisher, originally a bookseller in Fleet Street, where he succeeded J. Wenman and published plays, novels and essays. About the year 1779 he removed to 18 Paternoster Row and started the issue of musical works from engraved plates, including the ballad operas of the day and reprints of works by Handel, Arne, Boyce and others. In 1784 the imprints give 'Harrison & Co.,' and in 1788 they are in possession of an additional warehouse named 'Dr. Arne's Head' at 141 Cheapside. In 1796 they issued an octavo publication, consisting of operas and pianoforte pieces, named The Pianoforte Magazine, which ultimately extended to about thirty volumes. This was issued at half a crown a part; and by an advertisement in the Times of the year quoted we find purchasers were entitled, after a number of payments, to a pianoforte. This is perhaps the earliest record of a kind of purchase now in some evidence. About 1798 the firm is styled 'Harrison, Cluse & Co.,' and it is at 78 Fleet Street. In 1802 it is at 108 Newgate Street, and probably did not exist much later than that date. Their publications are always exceedingly well engraved, and comprise many useful reprints of earlier standard works. They began the issue of what promised to be a very excellent dictionary of music, but it did not reach beyond a few numbers. It was printed in a rather unwieldy oblong folio.

F. K.

Harrison & Co. were the original publishers of 'Polly' (the sequel to 'The Beggar's Opera') and of the notorious 'Battle of Prague,' (see KOTZWARA) which, down to 1870 or thereabouts, was a favourite drawing-room piece.

HARRISON, JULIUS (b. Stourport, Worcestershire, Mar. 26, 1885), composer and conductor, was educated in music at the Midland Institute under Bantock. He gained experience as an operatic conductor with the Beecham Opera Company and used it to good purpose later with that company's successor, the B.N.O.C. In 1925 he succeeded Goossens as conductor of the HANDEL SOCIETY (q.v.). He has also conducted opera performances at the R.A.M. and concerts of the Scottish Orchestra. He is a versatile and skilful rather than a very original composer. His suite for orchestra of 'Worcestershire Pieces' was played at the Worcester Festival (1920); his chamber music, including a humoreske for string quartet, 'Widdicombe Fair,' has met with success at London concerts, and he has published many piano pieces and songs. HARRISON, SAMUEL (b. Belper, Derbyshire, Sept. 8, 1760; d. June 25, 1812), singer. On the establishment of the Concert of Ancient Music in 1776, Harrison appeared as a solo soprano singer, and continued so for two years afterwards. But in 1778, being engaged to sing at Gloucester, his voice suddenly failed him. After an interval of six years, during which he most assiduously cultivated his voice and style, George III. heard him sing at one of Queen Charlotte's musical parties, and caused him to be engaged for the Commemoration of Handel in 1784, at which he sang 'Rend' il sereno al ciglio' from 'Sosarme,' and the opening recitative and air in 'Messiah.'¹ He was next engaged as principal tenor at the Concert of Ancient Music, and from that time took his place at the head of his profession as a concert singer. Harrison's voice had a compass of two octaves (A to a'). It was remarkably sweet, pure and even in tone, but deficient in power. His taste and judgment were of a high order. On Dec. 6, 1790, Harrison married Miss Cantelo (d. 1831), for some years principal second soprano at all the best concerts, etc. In 1791 he and Knyvett established the Vocal Concerts, which were carried on to the end of 1794, and revived in 1801. Harrison's last appearance in public was at his benefit concert, May 8, 1812, when he sang Pepusch's 'Alexis' and Handel's 'Gentle airs.' On June 25 following he died suddenly from inflammation. He was buried in the graveyard of the old church of St. Pancras. The inscription on his tombstone includes an extract from an elegiac ode on Harrison, written by the Rev. Thomas Beaumont, and set to music by William Horsley, but the lines are so inaccurately given as completely to mar the allusion to the song 'Gentle airs.' W. H. H.

HARRISON, WILLIAM (b. Marylebone, June 15, 1813; d. Kentish Town, London, Nov. 9, 1868), singer. Being gifted with a tenor voice of remarkable purity and sweetness, he appeared in public as an amateur concert singer early in 1836. He then entered the R.A.M., and in 1837 appeared as a professional singer at the concerts of the R.A.M., and subsequently at the Sacred Harmonic Society. On Thursday, May 2, 1839, he made his first appearance on the stage at Covent Garden, in Rooke's opera 'Henrique.' A few years later he was engaged at Drury Lane, where he sustained the principal tenor parts in Balfe's 'Bohemian Girl,' Wallace's 'Maritana' and Benedict's 'Brides of Venice,' and 'Crusaders,' on their first production. In 1851 he performed at the Haymarket Theatre, in Mendelssohn's 'Son and Stranger,' and other operas. In 1856, in conjunction with Miss Louisa Pyne, he established an English Opera Company, and for several years gave performances at the Lyceum, Drury Lane and Covent Garden Theatres. During their management the following new operas were produced:

Balfe's 'Rose of Castille' (1857), 'Satanella' (1858), 'Bianca, the Bravo's Bride' (1860), 'Puritan's Daughter' (1861), and 'Armourer of Naples' (1863); Wallace's 'Jurine' (1860), and 'Love's Triumph' (1862); Benedict's 'Lily of Killarney' (1862); Mellon's 'Victorine' (1863); and Howard Glover's 'Ruy Blas' (1861).

In the winter of 1864 Harrison opened Her Majesty's Theatre for the performance of English operas. He translated Massé's operetta, 'Les Noces de Jeannette,' and produced it at Covent Garden Theatre in Nov. 1860, under the title of 'Georgette's Wedding.' W. H. H.

HARROGATE is one of the few towns where a symphony orchestra is subsidised by the municipality, but it is easy to understand that this is done not so much from an artistic and educational point of view as because an orchestra is one of the usual attractions of a popular watering-place. The beginnings of the orchestra were modest; the Spa Concert Rooms were carried on as a private enterprise, and a small orchestra provided; but after a few years it was taken over by a body of local tradesmen who formed a 'Public Rooms Company,' and engaged Julian Adams, a solo pianist, who had charge of the orchestra for many years. He was followed in turn by Otto Bernhardt, H. Cohen and R. S. Burton (1820-92), organist of Leeds Parish Church, who was better known as a successful choir-trainer than as an orchestral conductor. Sidney Jones (sen.) came next, and continued till 1903, when C. L. Naylor was appointed, and was followed in 1907 by Julian Clifford (1877-1921). He occupied the post up to his death, when he was succeeded by Howard Carr, who conducted for only two seasons, Basil Cameron, appointed in 1924, being the present occupant of the position. In addition to the usual daily fare of light music combined with variety entertainments, the orchestra gives during the season a series of over twenty afternoon Symphony Concerts, on which the artistic prestige of the town chiefly depends. A symphony, a concerto, a couple of overtures or other short works generally form the programme, and for these concerts the orchestra is augmented to nearly forty performers, and is complete, in the sense that it can play the classical symphonies, etc., without doctoring the score, and though of course the strings are hardly numerous enough to balance the wind, the orchestra is efficient enough to give a good account of the normal repertory.

HART, CHARLES (b. May 19, 1797; d. London, Mar. 29, 1859), pupil at the R.A.M. under Crotch, was, 1829-33, organist at St. Dunstan's, Stepney, and subsequently at the church in Tredegar Square, Mile End, and St. George's, Beckenham. In 1830 he published 'Three Anthems,' and in 1832 a Te Deum and Jubilate, the latter of which had gained the Gresham Prize Medal in 1831. In Apr. 1839 he produced an oratorio entitled 'Omnipotence.' He was author of a motet which gained a premium at Crosby Hall, 'Sacred Harmony,' and other compositions.

HART, JAMES (b. York, 1647; d. May 8, 1718), was bass singer in York Minster until 1670, when he was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal and lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey. He was the composer of several songs published in 'Choice Ayres, songs and dialogues,' 1676-84; 'The Theater of Musick,' 1685-87; 'The Banquet of Musick,' 1688-92, and other collections. (See HART, Philip.)

HART, JOSEPH BINNS (b. London, 1794; d. Hastings, Dec. 10, 1844), became in 1801 a chorister of St. Paul's under John Sale. Whilst in the choir he was taught the organ by Samuel Wesley and Matthew Cooke, and the piano by J. B. Cramer. At the age of 11 he acted as deputy for Attwood at St. Paul's. He remained in the choir nearly nine years, and on quitting it became organist of Walthamstow, and private organist to the Earl of Uxbridge. He left Walthamstow to become organist of Tottenham. At the termination of the war in 1815, when quadrille dancing came into vogue, Hart became an arranger of dance music, and the LANCERS' QUADRILLE (q.v.). From 1818-20 he was chorus-master and pianist at the English Opera House, Lyceum. He composed the music for 'Amateurs and Actors' (1818), 'A Walk for a Wager' and 'The Bull's Head' (1819), all musical farces; and 'The Vampire,' melodrama, 1820. In 1829 he removed to Hastings, started business as a music-seller, and was appointed organist of St. Mary's Chapel. Hart produced 48 sets of quadrilles, waltzes and galopades, and An easy Mode of teaching Thorough-bass and Composition.

W. H. H.

HART, PHILIP (d. London, July 17, 1749), conjectured by Hawkins to be the son of James HART (q.v.), was organist of St. Andrew Undershaft and St. Michael, Cornhill. In 1703 he composed the music for Hughes's 'Ode in Praise of Musick,' performed at Stationer's Hall on St. Cecilia's Day, 1703. On May 28, 1724, he was appointed the first organist of St. Dionis Backchurch, at a salary of £30. In 1729 he published his music to 'The Morning Hymn from the Fifth Book of Milton's Paradise Lost.' He also published a Collection of Fugues for the Organ. Two anthems by him are included in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MS. 7341). From Hawkins's account of him (chap. 175) he appears to have been a sound and very conservative musician, and a highly respectable man. Sir John elsewhere mentions his excessive use of the shake in his organ-playing. Hart died at a very advanced age.

HART & SONS, an eminent firm of violin-makers and experts, was founded at 28 Wardour Street, London (the present premises of the firm, though the name of the street has been altered), by (1) JOHN HART about 1825. This John Hart, was an expert not only in all matters connected with the violin, but with the shot-gun also. He opened business with a collection of guns and violins, and for a considerable time it was doubtful which of these two would prove the fitter, and survive. In the end violins prevailed. (2) JOHN THOMAS (b. Dec. 17, 1805; d. Jan. 1, 1874) was articled in May 1820 to Samuel Gilkes, who had learnt his business under William Foster, a very famous English maker of violins and violoncellos. As an articled pupil he had many opportunities for copying, repairing and studying the peculiarities of Cremonese and other violins of Italian make, and so laid the foundation of his extensive knowledge of instruments. He began business at a time when amateur violinists were longing for famous Italian violins, and as his reputation for unerring accuracy of judgment grew rapidly he became the channel through which most of the greatest instruments came to England. He it was who formed James Goding's collection, that of Charles Plowden, most of Joseph Gillott's collection, and of the famous Adam group. His son and successor,

(3) GEORGE (b. London, Mar. 23, 1839; d. near Newhaven, Apr. 25, 1891), was a violinist and writer, and studied at the R.A.M. under Macfarren and Sinton. Though an excellent player on the violin, it is by his literary ability and by his wide knowledge of what may be called the literary side of the violin that he is best known. In 1875 he published his well-known book The Violin: its famous Makers and their Imitators, which has passed through many editions in England. Of it a French edition was issued in 1886. Next he published a description of Count Cozio de Salabue's purchase of the stock of violins remaining with Paul

Stradivarius, and the tools and drawings of Antonius. In 1872 he classified the Gillott collection, a labour requiring the most accurate and certain knowledge, and in 1881 appeared his book on The Violin and its Music. He married a daughter of Dr. Steward, the inventor of the Euphonicon piano, now in the Victoria and Albert Museum. He, again, was succeeded by his son,

(4) GEORGE (b. near Warwick, Jan. 4, 1860). After being educated at Hampstead and in Paris, Hart entered his father's business, and is esteemed as a fine expert in the selection of wood for violins, while his firm is particularly noted for its exact reproductions of the work of Guarnerius, Stradivarius and others. With him has been associated for many years his brother, (5) HERBERT (b. 1883), who has devoted special attention to the manufacture of bows, which has gained for the firm a wide reputation as bow-makers. R. H. L., with addns.

HARTMANN, HEINRICH (b. Reichstadt), was cantor and school teacher at Coburg about the beginning of the 17th century. He composed two books of sacred songs 5-10 v. (1613 and 1617); also masses and motets. (See Q.-L.)

HARTMANN, a family of German origin established in Copenhagen for some four generations. (1) JOHANN ERNST (b. 1726; d. 1793) was a violinist and composer, who, after holding several musical posts at Breslau and Rudolstadt, became Kapellmeister to the Duke of Ploen, and went with him to Copenhagen. Here he was leader of the royal band from 1768, and wrote much music, now completely forgotten, with the exception of the song 'Kong Christian,' which first appeared in an opera, 'Die Fischer' (produced Jan. 31, 1780), and has since been adopted as the Danish National Hymn. His second son,

(2) AUGUST WILHELM (b. 1775), held the post of organist to the Garrison Church in Copenhagen from 1800-50, and was the father of

(3) JOHANN PETER EMILIUS (b. May 14, 1805; J. Mar. 10, 1900), who for many years held a high place among Danish composers. His opera 'Ravnen' (The Raven), to words by Hans Andersen, was produced Oct. 29, 1832. It was followed by 'Die goldenen Hörner' in 1834, and 'Die Corsaren' on Apr. 23, 1835, and 'Liden Kirsten' ('Little Christie') on May 12, 1846. Besides these he wrote much for the theatre in the way of incidental music, etc., as well as choral works (among them a cantata on the death of Thorwaldsen, 1848), songs, a symphony in G minor, dedicated to Spohr and performed at Cassel in 1838, and many piano pieces. See the Sammelbände of the Int. Mus. Ges., vol. ii. p. 455. He was made director of the Copenhagen Conservatorium in 1840. His son,

(4) EMIL (b. Feb. 21, 1836; d. Copenhagen, July 18, 1898), studied with his father, and with N. W. Gade, his brother-in-law, held between 1861 and 1873 various appointments as organist, but subsequently devoted himself almost entirely to composition. In 1891 he succeeded Gade as director of the Musical Society of Copenhagen. Among his works, which have obtained great success both in Denmark and Germany, may be mentioned:

Operas, 'Die Erlengmädchen' (1867), 'Die Nixe', 'Die Korrikanten' and 'Runeszauber' (1896); a ballet 'Fjeldstuen'; 'Nordische Volkstänze' (op. 18), three symphonies, in E flat, A minor and D, an overture 'Ein nordische Heerfahrt' (op. 25), a choral cantata 'Winter and Spring' (op. 13), concertos for violin and violoncello, a serenade for piano, clarinet and violoncello (op. 24), and many songs. HARTVIGSON, (1) FRITS (b. Grenaa, Jutland, Denmark, May 31, 1841; d. Copenhagen, 1919), pianist, received instruction in music and on the piano from his mother, and at Copenhagen from Gade, Gebauer and Anton Rée. At the age of 14 he played in concerts in Copenhagen, and made a tour through Norway in 1858, at Christiania being personally complimented by Kjerulf. By assistance from the Danish Government he studied at Berlin from 1859-62 under Von Bülow, with whom he played there at a concert Liszt's A major concerto and Hungarian Fantasia, arranged for two pianos. He next played Rubinstein's third concerto at the Gewandhaus Concerts in 1861, and Schumann's concerto at Copenhagen under Gade in 1863. On the death of his father in the Prusso-Danish war, he came to England and played with great success Mendelssohn's 'Serenade and Allegro gioioso' at the Philharmonic, June 27, 1864. Thenceforward Hartvigson lived in England, with the exception of two years, 1873-75, when he was in St. Petersburg. He played at the Musical Union, and introduced there Schumann's trio in F, Apr. 24, 1866. He introduced Liszt's music at the Philharmonic, where he played that composer's first concerto on June 10, 1872. At the Crystal Palace he introduced Schubert's Fantasia, op. 15 (arranged by Liszt for piano and orchestra), on Oct. 6, 1866: also Rubinstein's fourth concerto, Nov. 16, 1872; and Bronsart's concerto, Sept. 30, 1876. He was officially appointed pianist to Queen Alexandra (when Princess of Wales) in 1873, and professor of music at the Normal College for the Blind at Norwood in 1875. He also played at the London Symphony Concerts on Jan. 10, 1888 (and subsequently at a Richter concert), Liszt's 'Todtentanz,' which he had introduced to the English public in 1878 under Bülow's direction. Hartvigson played at Copenhagen in 1872 and 1889, at Munich (under Bülow), in aid of the Bayreuth Building Fund, Aug. 24, 1872, and in concerts at St. Petersburg, Moscow and in Finland. In 1888 he was appointed professor at the R.A.M., and in 1894 an honorary member of the institution. In 1895 the King of Denmark made him a knight of the order of the Dannebrog. In 1905 he joined the teaching staff at the R.C.M. He retired in 1911 to his native country.

His brother, (2) ANTON (b. Aarhus, Jylland, Oct. 16, 1845; d. Copenhagen, Dec. 29, 1911), received instruction in music from his mother, Tausig and Edmund Neupert. He first played in concerts at Copenhagen, and came to England in 1873, where he finally settled in 1882, when he was appointed a professor at the Normal College. In 1893 he settled at Copenhagen as a teacher of his instrument. He made a speciality there of giving yearly courses of lectures in which he analysed and played the principal pianoforte compositions of the great masters. In 1900 the King of Denmark conferred on him the title of 'Professor' (equivalent to a decoration or order). A. C.

HARTY, SIR HERBERT HAMILTON (b. Hillsborough, Ireland, Dec. 4, 1879), orchestral conductor and composer, received knighthood and degree of Mus.D. Dublin in 1925.

The boy was his father's pupil for pianoforte and viola as well as for counterpoint, and he was able to act as his deputy when only 8 years old. At the age of 12 he took an organist's post at Magheracoll Church, County Antrim. He held similar posts successively in Belfast and Dublin; at the latter place he had much help and advice from Signor Esposito. He came to London in 1900, and rapidly became known as one of the best of accompanists. In 1901 a trio by him won a prize at the Feis Ceoil (Dublin), and his piano quintet (1904) won the Lewis Hill prize of 50 guineas. Nevertheless it was in orchestral work that his composition made the strongest mark. His 'Comedy Overture' (Queen's Hall Promenades, 1907) was repeated at the Crystal Palace and at the Philharmonic. In the same year (1907) his setting of the 'Ode to a Nightingale' (sopr. solo and orch.) was produced at the Cardiff Festival, his wife, Mme. Agnes NICHOLLS (q.v.), singing the solo. At the following Cardiff Festival (1910) his tone-poem (based on a poem by Emily Lawless) 'With the Wild Geese' was produced, and this, like the 'Comedy Overture,' was much played subsequently in London. A fine violin concerto in D minor, played by J. Szigeti and the New Symphony Orchestra in Queen's Hall in Mar. 1909, made a great impression. His most considerable work for voices, with orchestra, 'The Mystic Trumpeter' (Whitman), was produced at the Leeds Festival, 1913. Harty's songs, some of them arrangements of Irish folk-songs, others settings of Irish poems, are distinguished by a delicate charm in the union of the vocal and piano writing.

In recent years, while he has been busied with orchestral conducting, he has composed less, but his orchestration of pieces by Handel, notably a selection from the 'Water Music,' must be mentioned, and in 1924 he produced a completely rewritten version of his early 'Irish Symphony.' This was given at Manchester (Nov. 13, 1924), and in London at the Albert Hall (Jan. 21, 1925). After considerable experience in conducting the London Symphony Orchestra, Harty was appointed (1920) to direct the Hallé Orchestra at MANCHESTER (q.v.), where his conspicuous ability has made itself felt. He brought this orchestra to London for a series of three concerts in the autumn of 1924. (See B. M. S. Ann., 1920.) M.; addns. c.

HARVARD, see BOSTON.

HARWOOD, BASIL (b. Woodhouse, Olveston, Gloucestershire, Apr. 11, 1859), organist and composer of church music (see ANTHEM) and for the organ, son of Edward Harwood, J.P., was educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Oxford. He studied the pianoforte with J. L. Roeckel at Clifton, the organ with G. Riseley at Bristol, theory with Dr. C. W. Corfe at Oxford, and composition for a short time at the Leipzig Conservatorium under Reinecke and Jadassohn. He was organist of St. Barnabas', Picnic, from 1883-87, of Ely Cathedral from 1887-92, and Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, 1892-1907, when he retired from professional life. He was precentor of Keble College, Oxford, from 1892-1903, and conductor of the Oxford Orchestral Association from 1892-98. On the foundation of the Oxford Bach Choir in 1896 he was appointed its conductor, a post he held with distinction till 1900, in which year he became choragus of the university. His works are all marked by most careful workmanship and fastidious taste. They include Psalm lxxxvi., 'Inclina, Domine,' for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, performed Gloucester Festival of 1898; Psalm cxxxvii., 'As by the streams of Babylon,' for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra; motet, 'Jesus, thy boundless love,' soli, choir, orchestra and organ; an Agnus Dei, and O Salutaris, for choir and organ; a service in A flat, op. 6; a Communion Service in D, op. 14; several anthems; a vocal trio, songs, etc. His 'Ode on May Morning' (Milton), for choir and orchestra, was produced at the Leeds Festival, 1913, and 'Love Incarnate,' for chorus, semi-chorus, orchestra and organ, was given at the Gloucester Festival in 1925.

His works for the organ are an important addition to the modern literature of the instrument. The first to establish this fact were the fine sonata in C sharp minor, op. 5; 'Dithyramb,' op. 7; 'Pæan' (played by Sir W. Parratt at the reopening of the organ in York Minster); and preludes on Old English Psalm Tunes. A concerto for organ and orchestra was produced at the Gloucester Festival, 1910. A second organ sonata (op. 20, F sharp minor), a fantasia 'Christmastide' (op. 34), and a Rhapsody (op. 38) are among his more recent productions. M.; addns. c.

HARWOOD, EDWARD (b. Hoddleson, near Blackburn, 1707; d. 1787), was the author of many songs, among which may be named 'Absence,' 'The Chain of Love,' 'Hapless Collin,' 'To ease my heart'—all published at Liverpool. He also issued two sets of original hymn tunes, the first without date, the second in 1786. The first volume contains the metrical anthem 'Vital spark of heavenly flame,' formerly popular in country churches. The traditional account of its origin is as follows: Harwood had been staying in London, in company with Alexander Reed, of Liverpool; but when the time for their return arrived, they found themselves without the means of discharging the reckoning at the inn. In this emergency it was resolved to compose some piece of music and raise money upon it. What Reed attempted in that direction is not told, but Harwood, taking up a collection of poetry which lay in the coffee-room, came across Pope's Ode, which he immediately set to music, and taking it to a publisher, sold the copyright for forty pounds. This relieved the friends from their embarrassment, and brought them back to Liverpool. Some difficulties occur in connexion with the story which need not be specified. H. P.

HASILTON (HASLTON, HASILTUNE, HASYLTON), ROBERT, English church composer of the early 16th century. He contributed an anthem to the 2nd part of Day's 'Certaine Notes,' 1565, which was reprinted in the 'Anthems for Parish Church Choirs' (pub. 1846 by the Society for Promoting Church Music). There are also the cantus parts of 2 anthems: 'My soul truly waiteth' and 'Praise we the Lord at all times'; and 2 hymns, 'Lord have mercy' and 'Now Israel may say' (B.M. Add. MSS. 15,166). J. M.^K

HASLINGER, a well-known music-publishing firm in Vienna, originally the 'Bureau des arts et d'industrie,' next S. A. Steiner & Co., and since 1826 Tobias Haslinger. (1) TOBIAS (b. Zell, Upper Austria, Mar. 1, 1787; d. Vienna, June 18, 1842), who came to Vienna in 1810, was an energetic, intelligent man of business, on intimate terms with the best musicians of Vienna. Beethoven and he were in constant communication, and the numerous letters to him from the great composer, which have been preserved (probably only a small proportion of those which were written), each with its queer joke or nickname, show the footing they were on—Adjutant, or Adjutanterl, or Restes kleines Kerlchen, or Tobiasserl or Tobias Peter Philipp, or Monsieur de Haslinger, Général Musicien et Général Lieutenant—such are the various queer modes in which Beethoven addresses him. In a letter to Schott (Nohl, No. 328) he sketches a comic biography of his friend, with illustrative canons. Another canon, 'O Tobias Dominus Haslinger,' occurs in a letter of Sept. 10, 1821; and one of his very last notes contains a flourish on his name, added, with the signature, by the hand of the master:

Haslinger prepared a complete copy of Beethoven's compositions in full score, beautifully written by a single copyist. This was purchased by the Archduke Rudolph, and bequeathed by him to the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, in whose library it now is. He was one of the thirty-six torch-bearers who surrounded the bier of his great friend, and it fell to his lot to hand the three laurel wreaths to Hummel, by whom they were placed on the coffin before the closing of the grave. At his death the business came into the hands of his son, (2) KARL (b. June 11, 1816; d. Dec. 26, 1868), a pupil of Czerny and Seyfried, a remarkable pianoforte player and an industrious composer. His soirées were well known and much frequented, and many a young musician made his first appearance there. He left as many as 100 published works of all classes and dimensions. The concern was carried on by his widow till Jan. 1875, by whom it was maintained under the style of 'Carl Haslinger, quondam Tobias.' It passed in 1875 into the hands of Schlesinger. Among the works published by this establishment may be named Schubert's 'Winterreise' and 'Schwanengesang'; Beethoven's Symphonies 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, Overtures to 'Coriolan,' 'Ruins of Athens,' op. 115, 'King Stephen,' 'Leonora No. 1,' Violin Concerto, Battle Symphony, PF. Concertos 1, 3, 4, 5, Trio in B \flat , Sonatas and Variations, Liederkreis, etc.; Spohr's Symphonies 4 (Weihe der Töne) and 5; Liszt's Concerto in E \flat ; Moscheles' Concertos 2, 3, 5, 6, 7; Hummel's Concertos in C, G, A minor and A \flat , 4 Sonatas, etc. The danc music of Lanner and the Strausses formed an important part of the repertory of the firm. C. F. P.

HASSE, (1) FAUSTINA BORDONI (b. Venice, 1693; d. there, 1783), famous soprano singer, the wife of J. A. Hasse (2), came of a noble family, formerly one of the governing families of the Venetian Republic. Her first instruction was derived from Gasparini, who helped her to develop a beautiful and flexible voice to the greatest advantage. In 1716 Bordonni made her début in 'Ariodante,' by C. F. Pollaro, achieved at once a reputation as a great singer, and was soon known as the 'New Syren.' In 1719 she sang again at Venice with Cuzzoni and Bernacchi, whose florid style her own resembled. In 1722 she sang at Naples, and at Florence a medal was struck in her honour. She visited Vienna in 1724, and was engaged for the court theatre at a salary of 15,000 florins. Here she was found by Handel, who immediately secured her for London, where she made her début, May 5, 1726, in his 'Alessandro.' Her salary was fixed at £2000. Burney says:

'She, in a manner, invented a new kind of singing, by running divisions with a neatness and velocity which astonished all who heard her. She had the art of sustaining a note longer, in the opinion of the public, than any other singer, by taking her breath imperceptibly. Her beats and trills were strong and rapid; her intonation perfect; and her professional perfections were enhanced by a beautiful face, a symmetric figure, though of small stature, and a countenance and gesture on the stage which indicated an entire intelligence of her part. Apostolo Zeno, in speaking of her departure from Vienna, says: "But, whatever good fortune she meets with, she merits it all by her courteous and polite manners, as well as talents, with which she has enchanted and gained the esteem and affection of the whole Court."'

In London she stayed but two seasons, and then returned to Venice, where she was married to Hasse in 1730. In 1731 she went to Dresden, which remained her headquarters till her dismissal in 1763, when she and her husband went to Vienna until 1775. She, with her husband, had a great success in Paris, however, in 1750. They then retired to Venice, where they ended their days in the same year, she at the age of 90.

Faustina has seldom been equalled in agility of voice;

'a matchless facility and rapidity in her execution; dexterity in taking breath, exquisite shake, new and brilliant passages of embellishment, and a thousand other qualities contributed to inscribe her name among the first singers in Europe.'

In London she divided the popular favour with Cuzzoni.

'When the admirers of the one began to applaud, those of the other were sure to hiss; on which account operas ceased for some time in London.'

In a libretto of 'Admeto,' Lady Cowper, the original possessor, has written opposite to Faustina's name, 'she is the devil of a singer.'

Fétis mentions her portrait in Hawkins's History; but he seems not to have known the fine print engraved by L. Zucchi after S. Torelli, which is a companion to that of Hasse by the same engraver, and represents Faustina as an elderly person, handsomely dressed, and with a sweet and intelligent countenance. This portrait is uncommon. J. M.

(2) JOHANN ADOLPH (b. Bergedorf, Hamburg, Mar. 25, 1699; d. Venice, Dec. 16, 1783) was for a third part of the 18th century the most popular dramatic composer in Europe. His father was organist and schoolmaster at Bergedorf. At 18 years of age he went to Hamburg, where his musical talent and fine tenor voice attracted the notice of Ulrich König, a German poet attached to the Polish court, through whose recommendation he was engaged as tenor singer by Keiser, director of the Hamburg Opera, and the most famous dramatic composer of the day. At the end of four years König procured for Hasse a like engagement at the Brunswick theatre, where, in 1721, his first opera, 'Antigonus' (the title is given in Q.-L. as 'Antiochus'), was produced. This (the only opera he ever composed to a German libretto) was very well received, but as, while evincing great natural facility in composition, it also betrayed a profound ignorance of the grammar of his art, it was decided that he must go to Italy, then the musical centre of Europe, for the purpose of serious study. Accordingly, in 1724, he repaired to Naples, and became the pupil of Porpora, for whom, however, he had neither liking nor sympathy, and whom he soon deserted for the veteran Alessandro Scarlatti. In 1725 he received the commission to compose a serenade for two voices. In this work, which had the advantage of being performed by two great singers, Farinelli and Signora Tesi, Hasse acquitted himself so well that he was entrusted with the composition of the new opera for the next year. This was 'Sesostrato,' performed at Naples in 1726, and which extended its composer's fame over the whole of Italy. In 1727 he went to Venice, where he was appointed professor at the Scuola degl' Incurabili, for which he wrote a Miserere for two soprani and two contraltis, with accompaniment of stringed instruments, a piece which long enjoyed a great celebrity. He was now the most popular composer of the day. His fine person and agreeable manners, his beautiful voice and great proficiency on the harpsichord, caused him to be much sought after in society, and he was known throughout Italy by the name of Il caro Sassone. In 1728 he produced, at Naples, another opera, 'Attalo, re di Bitinia,' as successful as its predecessor. In 1729 he returned to Venice, where he met with the famous cantatrice Faustina Bordoni (see above), then at the zenith of her powers and her charms, who shortly afterwards became his wife. For her he composed the operas 'Dalisa' and 'Artaserse' (No. 1), the latter of which is one of his best works.

In 1731 this celebrated couple were summoned to Dresden, where August II. reigned over a brilliant court. Hasse was appointed Kapellmeister and director of the Opera. His first opera produced in Dresden, 'Alessandro nell' Indie,' had an unprecedented success, owing not only to its own merits, but to the splendid performance by Faustina of the principal part. Hasse's position, however, as the husband of the most fascinating prima donna of the day, was, at this time, far from being an easy one. His life, too, was embittered by his enmity to his old master, Porpora, whom he found established in Dresden, and who was patronised by some members of the royal family. Up to 1740 he absented himself as much as he could from Dresden. In company with Faustina he revisited Venice, Milan and Naples, and he also went to London, where he was pressed to undertake the direction of the opera established in opposition to Handel. His 'Artaserse' met with a brilliant reception, but he had no wish to support the rivalry with Handel; besides which he disliked England, and he soon quitted the country. It does not seem that Faustina accompanied him on this expedition. When, in 1739, he returned to Dresden, he was no longer vexed by the presence of Porpora, but he found a fresh grievance in the great success of Porpora's pupil, Regina Mingotti. This excellent singer was a formidable rival to Faustina, and Hasse's jealousy and spite were openly manifested. It is even said¹ that in his opera of 'Demofonte' he introduced into her part an air written entirely in what he thought the weakest part of her voice, the accompaniment being so contrived as to hamper instead of helping her. Mingotti was obliged to sing it, but, like the great artist that she was, she acquitted herself in such a manner as to disappoint Hasse, and she made one of her greatest successes with this very air. This story has been widely repeated and generally believed, but there seems good reason for doubting its truth. If such an air was really written Hasse did not allow it to survive in the opera, but replaced it by another.

In 1745, on the very evening of Frederick the Great's entry into Dresden after the battle of Kesselsdorf, Hasse's opera 'Arminio' was performed by command of the conqueror, who graciously commended the work and its performance, especially the part of Faustina. During Frederick's nine days' stay in the Saxon capital Hasse had to attend at court every evening and superintend the musical performances, and was rewarded by the present of a magnificent diamond ring and 1000 thalers for distribution among the musicians of the orchestra. In 1760 occurred the siege of Dresden, in which Hasse lost most of his property, and during which his collected MSS., prepared for a complete edition of his works to be published at the expense of the King of Poland, were nearly all destroyed. At the end of the war the King was obliged, from motives of economy, to suppress both opera and chamber music. The Kapellmeister and his wife were dismissed, and retired to Vienna, where Hasse, in conjunction with the poet Metastasio, was soon engaged in active opposition to a more formidable rival than Porpora, viz. Christoph Gluck. Although he was 74 years old, he now composed several new operas. His last dramatic work, 'Rugiero,' was produced at Milan in 1771 for the marriage of the Archduke Ferdinand. On this same occasion was performed a serenade, 'Ascanio in Alba,' by Wolfgang Mozart. After hearing it, Hasse is said to have exclaimed, 'This boy will throw us all into the shade,' a prediction which was verified within a few years of its utterance. The remainder of Hasse's life was passed at Venice.

Owing to the destruction of Hasse's works at Dresden, his autograph scores are exceedingly rare, scarcely a MS. or even a letter of his being found in any collection, public or private, though contemporary copies are common enough. The following compositions of Hasse are the chief of those which are published:

1. Miserere for two Soprani and two Alti. (Berlin, Trautwein.)
2. 13th Psalm, for Bass solo and Chorus, with Orchestra. (Kellerfeld, Arnold.)
3. 'Alcide al Bivio,' opera, PF. score. (Leipzig, Breitkopf.)
4. Te Deum in D for Soli and Chorus, with Orchestra and Organ. (Leipzig, Peters.)

There is a fine portrait of Hasse, oval, in folio, engraved by L. Zucchi at Dresden from a picture by C. P. Rotari, representing him as a middle-aged man, with pleasing features and expression. An interesting article on the composer appeared in the Sammelbände of the Int. Mus. Ges., vol. v. p. 230.

Hasse's facility in composition was astonishing. He wrote more than a hundred operas, besides oratorios, masses, cantatas, psalms, symphonies, sonatas, concertos and a host of smaller compositions.² He set to music the whole of Metastasio's dramatic works, several of them three or four times over. His career was one long success: few composers have enjoyed during their lifetime such world-wide celebrity as he; of those few none are more completely forgotten now. Great as was his personal popularity, it is insufficient to account for the universal acceptance of his music. The secret probably lay in the receptivity of his nature, which, joined to the gift of facile expression, caused some of the most genial, though not the deepest, influences of his time to find in him a faithful echo. First among these was the spreading fascination of Italian melody. It is as an Italian, not a German, composer that Hasse must take rank. He began life as a singer, in an age of great singers, and must be classed among the first representatives of that Italian school which was called into existence by the worship of vocal art for its own sake. He had an inexhaustible flow of pleasing melody, which, if it is never grand or sublime, is never crabbed or ugly. Many of his best airs are charming even now. A few have been republished, among which we may quote 'Ritornella fra poco,' from a cantata (to be found in the series called 'Gemme d' antichità,' published by Lonsdale), which has real beauty. As a fair specimen of his style, exhibiting all the qualities which made him popular, we will mention the opening symphony and the first air in the oratorio 'I Pellegrini al Sepolcro,' written for the Electoral Chapel at Dresden. To appreciate the deficiencies which have caused him to be forgotten, we have only to proceed a little farther in this or any other of his works. They are inexpressibly monotonous. In the matter of form he attempted nothing new. All his airs are in two parts, with the inevitable Da Capo, or repetition of the first strain. All his operas consist of such airs, varied by occasional duets, more rarely a trio, or a simple chorus, all cast in the same mould. His orchestra consists merely of the string quartet, sometimes of a string trio only; if now and then he adds hautboys, flutes, bassoons or horns, there is nothing distinctive in his writing for these wind instruments, and their part might equally well be played by the violins. Nor is there anything distinctive in his writing of church music, which presents in all respects the same characteristics as his operas. His symphonies are for three, or at the most four, instruments. The harmonic basis of his airs is of the very slightest, his modulations the most simple and obvious, and these are repeated with little variety in all his songs. The charm of these songs consists in the elegance of the melodic superstructure and its sympathetic adaptation to the requirements of the voice. Singers found in them the most congenial exercise for their powers, and the most perfect vehicle for expression and display. For ten years Farinelli charmed away the melancholy of Philip V. of Spain by singing to him every evening the same two airs of Hasse (from a second opera, 'Artaserse'), 'Pallido è il sole' and 'Per questo dolce amplesso.'

HASSELBECK (HASLBECK), ROSA, see SUCHER.

HASSELMANS, ALPHONSE JEAN (b. Liège, Mar. 5, 1845; d. Paris, May 19, 1912), harpist and composer, was a pupil in Germany of the harpist Gottlieb Krüger, and early showed conspicuous virtuosity. Settled in France during the major part of his career, he obtained his naturalisation in 1903, and was granted the Légion d'honneur in 1905.

On May 1, 1884, he succeeded Conrad Prumier as professor of the harp at the Paris Conservatoire, a post which he held until his death.

As a virtuoso he has undoubtedly been the principal agent in the revival of harp-playing since the end of the last century. A large number of compositions of value have been inspired by his performance and dedicated to him. His own compositions, to which he did not attach great importance, have, however, happily added to the repertory of his instrument. He wrote some 50 pieces, of which the most important is 'L'Orientale,' op. 38, and the most popular his 'Patrouille.' M. P.

HASSLER, (1) HANS LEO (b. Nuremberg, Oct. 25 or 26, 1584; d. Frankfurt, June 8, 1612), was the most distinguished of the three musician sons of Isaac Hassler, organist at Nuremberg.

With his father before him, Isaac Hassler had been settled for some time previously at Jouchunsthal in Bohemia, but had returned to Nuremberg, the original home of the family. In the funeral sermon of Isaac it is recorded of him that he had 'carefully brought up and trained his son Hans Leo in the fear of God, in the free arts, and especially in the praiseworthy art of music.' Though there were many eminent musicians at the time in Nuremberg, it does not appear that Hans Leo had any other teacher there but his father. He became very early a competent organist, as he says himself, 'ab ineunte actate digitis quam lingua loquatur.' Nuremberg had close commercial as well as musical relations with Venice, and it may have been at the expense of the Nuremberg senate that Hans Leo in 1584 was sent to Venice for further study with Andrea Gabrieli. In 1585 he was recalled to Germany to become private organist to Octavian Fugger at Augsburg, where he remained with some interruptions to the year 1600. Though his actual stay at Venice was short, he had already fully imbibed the Venetian influence in music, as the warmth and suavity of harmony of his compositions show.

Already in 1588 Frederick Lindner, the meritorious Nuremberg editor of various collections of Italian music, had included in one of them among the best pieces of Italian masters two motets by Hassler, 'Laudate Dominum' a 8, and 'Nuptiae factae sunt' a 12. In 1590 Hassler published on his own account 24 Italian Canzonette a 4; in 1591, Cantiones Sacrae a 4-12, originally containing 31 motets in several numbers, afterwards enlarged in 1597 to 38, including 2 Magnificats. In 1596 appeared his 'Neue deutsche Gesäng nach Art der welschen Madrigalien und Canzonetten mit 4-8 Stimmen' and 'Madrigali a 5, 6, 7 & 8 voci,' this latter dedicated to Landgrave Maurice of Hesse. In 1599 Hassler published 8 masses a 4-8 dedicated to his patron Octavian Fugger. In order that he might remain in Augsburg after Octavian Fugger's death in 1600, he had applied to be appointed director of the town band, but apparently soon tired of this position, and entered into negotiations with the Nuremberg authorities to return there. For this purpose in 1601 he dedicated to the Nuremberg Senate his second great collection of motets, 'Sacri concentus' a 5-12, containing originally 48 compositions, which in the later edition of 1612 were enlarged to 56, with the further addition of 3 instrumental pieces entitled Ricercari and Canzoni α 4-8. He was appointed organist of the Frauenkirche and director of the town band at Nuremberg, but about the same time he also became absorbed in commercial speculations in connexion with the manufacture of musical clocks, which tended to divert his energies from much further musical production, and involved him in protracted legal disputes.

In 1601 appeared his 'Lustgarten neuer Teutscher Gesäng,' containing 32 German songs α 4-8, mostly of the ballet and gagliarda type, with eleven instrumental Intradas α 6. It is in this work we find the tune 'Mein Gemüth ist mir verwirret,' in simple 5-part harmony, which in the Harmoniae sacrae (Görlitz, 1613) was first adapted to the sacred words 'Herzlich thut mir verlangen,' and by change of rhythm has since become the familiar Passion chorale 'O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden.' (See CHORAL.) In 1604 he received permission from the Nuremberg Senate to retire to Ulm, where he married and settled for a time. Having some time previously been ennobled by the Emperor Rudolph, he also now received the more or less sinecure appointment of Hof-Diener und Kammer-Organist to the Imperial court at Prague.

In 1607 Hassler published his 'Psalmen und christliche Gesäng mit vier stimmen auf die Melodien fugweis componirt.' This work consists of 52 settings of 30 well-known chorale melodies in the elaborate motet form. It was republished in score by Kirnberger in 1777, with the encouragement and support of Princess Amalie of Prussia, as an example of the best contrapuntal art, but the whole work is also distinguished by its exquisite grace and expressiveness. In 1608 appeared a companion work, 'Kirchengesänge, Psalmen und geistliche Lieder auf die gemeinen Melodien mit vier Stimmen simpliciter gesetzt.' This work consists of 70 settings of chorale melodies in simple note for note counterpoint, as if for congregational singing. It would seem to have continued in use in Nuremberg churches for some time afterwards, since a new edition of it was issued in 1637 with some additions by S. G. Staden. A modern edition was published in 1865 by G. W. Teschner, omitting, however, the two 8-part settings with which the original work concludes. In 1608 Hassler applied for and obtained the post of organist to the Electoral Chapel at Dresden, but in the last years of his life suffered greatly from consumption, and published no further works. In 1612 he accompanied the Elector of Saxony, Johann Georg I., to Frankfort, where the Imperial election was to be held, and died there.

Nuremberg did honour to its greatest musician by a memorial epitaph in one of its churches. In 1615 Georg Gruber, a Nuremberg merchant and great lover of music, who in Venice had contracted a close friendship with both Hassler and Giovanni Gabrieli, showed honour to both by his publication, 'Reliquiae sacrarum concentuum Giovan Gabrielis, Johanne Leonis Hasleri, utriusque praestantissimi musici,' etc., which contains a large number of previously unpublished compositions by both, α 4-18. Most of the works of Hassler are now available for study, of which they are well worthy, in various volumes of the D.D.T. (both 1st and 2nd series). Some of the best for practical use were previously published in Proske's Musica divina; also many of Hassler's excellent settings of German chorales in Schöberlein, Schatz. The 'Lustgarten,' edited by F. Zelle, appeared in 1887 as one of Eitner's publications.

In D.D.T. (2nd series), iv. 2, E. von Werra has edited from MS. sources 16 organ works of Hassler, consisting of ricercari, canzoni, toccatas, etc., which are interesting as showing more of a chromatic tendency than his vocal works.

(2) KASPAR (b. Nuremberg, Aug. 1562; d. 1618), elder brother of Hans Leo, received (1587) the appointment of organist at the Lorenz-Kirche, Nuremberg, where he remained till his death. He is only known as the editor of several large collections of sacred motets by Italian musicians, chiefly of the Venetian school ('Sacrae Symphoniae diversorum excellentiorum α 4-16,' 1598, 1600, 1613), among which he includes some by his brother Hans Leo.

(3) JACOB (b. Dec. 17 or 18, 1569; d. after 1618), the younger brother of Hans Leo, obtained in 1590 a grant from the Nuremberg Senate which enabled him to proceed to Venice. In 1593 he was appointed organist to Christoph Fugger at Augsburg, but in 1597, falling into disgrace with the Augsburg authorities, had to take refuge in Hechingen as organist to Count Eitel-Fritz of Hohenzollern. From there in 1600 he published a collection of Italian madrigals α 6, and in 1601, a collection of church works, Magnificats, a Mass, etc. From 1602-12 he was Kammer-Organist to the Imperial court at Prague. After the Emperor Rudolph's death he seems to have returned to Augsburg, but nothing more is heard of him, except that his death took place some time after 1618. Two organ works by him are given in D.D.T. (2nd series), iv. 2. J. R. M.

HATTON, JOHN LIPTROTT (b. Liverpool, Oct. 12, 1809; d. Margate, Sept. 20, 1886), composer of many popular songs and partsongs, whose 'To Anthea' acquired special fame through Santley's singing of it, received in his youth a small rudimentary instruction in music, but was otherwise entirely self-taught.

He settled in London in 1822, and soon became known as a composer. In 1842 he was engaged at Drury Lane Theatre, at which house, in 1844, he produced an operetta called 'The Queen of the Thames.' In the same year he went to Vienna and brought out his opera 'Pascal Bruno.' On his return to England he published, under the pseudonym of 'Czapek,' several songs which met with considerable success. In 1848 he visited America. A programme of the Dublin Philharmonic Society (Nov. 17, 1854) records his singing with Clara Novello, Sims Reeves and other famous singers, in a selection from 'Don Giovanni.' Hatton was for some years director of the music at the Princess's Theatre, London, under Chas. Kean, and whilst there composed music for 'Macbeth' and 'Sardanapalus,' 1853; 'Faust and Marguerite,' overture and entr'actes, 1854; 'King Henry VIII.,' 1855; 'Pizarro,' 1856; 'King Richard II.,' 1857; and 'King Lear,' 'The Merchant of Venice' and 'Much Ado about Nothing,' 1858. He also composed two cathedral services; eight anthems and a Mass; 'Rose, or, Love's Ransom,' opera, Covent Garden, 1864; 'Robin Hood,' cantata, Bradford Musical Festival, 1856; several books of part-songs, and upwards of 150 songs. One of his latest achievements was the 'sacred drama' of 'Hezekiah,' produced at the Crystal Palace, Dec. 15, 1877. He was buried in Kensal Green Cemetery.

HAUER, JOSEF MATTHIAS (b. Wiener-Neustadt, 1883), Austrian theorist and composer, is the author of a system of atonal music described in five pamphlets and illustrated in a large number of compositions. The former consist of Über die Klangfarbe (Waldheim & Eberle, Vienna, 1920), Vom Wesen des Musikalischen, ein Lehrbuch der Zwölftone-Musik (Schlesinger, Berlin), Deutung des Melos (Tal, Vienna, 1923), Vom Melos zur Pauke, eine Einführung in die Zwölftonmusik (Universal Edition, Vienna, 1925), and Zwölftontechnik, die Lehre von den Tropen (Universal Edition, 1926).

Originally he derived his conception by analogy from Goethe's Farbenlehre, from which his earlier writings quote extensively. He holds that the interval, with its overtones, contains within itself both rhythm and melos awaiting development by the composer. Such melos, purely atonal, is neither consonant nor dissonant, and free from the strong inclinations characteristic of diatonic music, which he regards as sensual, such as, for instance, that of the leading note to the octave. He divides the possible combinations of the twelve degrees of the scale into groups, or Tropen, which are the material of composition. In a footnote to his treatise on harmony, Schönberg, who rejects the word 'atonal' and deprecates its use by others, makes an exception in favour of Hauer,

'whose theories, even where I find them exaggerated, are deep and original, and whose compositions, even where I regard them more as examples than as compositions, reveal creative gifts, and whose attitude moreover has earned respect by its courage and self-sacrifice.'

In his more recent works he shows some signs of relaxing the austerity of his creed as originally propounded, though that may be due to the freedom acquired with experience in the practise of his system, which has had his constant attention since 1912.

HAUFF, FERDINAND (b. latter half of 18th cent.; d. 1812), was first Kapellmeister at Delft in 1809. He composed a festival cantata for St. Cecilia's Day, a Salve Regina, Te Deum, etc., 7 pianoforte concertos, quartets, trios, duets, for various instruments; also organ pieces. (See Q.-L.)

HAUK, MINNIE (b. New York, Nov. 16, 1852), born of a German father, was first taught singing by Curto at New Orleans, and appeared there in a concert about 1865. She was then placed under the care of Errani in New York, and for a short time under Albites. On Oct. 13, 1866, as Amalia M. Hauck (sic), she made her début in Italian opera at Brooklyn as Amina in 'Sonnambula.'

'The appearance excited much interest from the fact of her being native born . . . and exceedingly pretty. . . . She gave undoubted promise of future eminence.'

On Nov. 30 she made her début in New York as Prascovia in 'L'Étoile du nord.' In 1867 and 1868 she sang there and in other American cities, having received further instruction from Maurice Strakosch. Her voice was a mezzo-soprano of great force and richness. Her parts included, Nov. 15, 1867, Juliet in Gounod's opera, on its production in New York; Margaret, Norina, Inez in 'L'Africaine'; Annetta in 'Crispino,' etc. On Oct. 26, 1868, she made her début at Covent Garden with great success as Amina, later as Lucia, Zerlina, Margaret, etc. In 1869 and 1870 she sang in Italian in Paris, Moscow and St. Petersburg. In May 1870 she made her début in German at Vienna with such success that she obtained a three years' engagement and became a very great favourite, in the lighter parts. In 1874 she was the principal singer at the first season of the new Komische Oper (later the Ring-Theater), and made a great success, Apr. 20, as Javotte in the production in Vienna of Delibes's 'Roi l'a dit' and as Carlo Broschi in 'Part du Diable.' At Pest, in the summer, she sang in Hungarian at the 200th performance of Erkel's 'Hunyadi Laszlo.' From 1874-77 Minnie Hauk was engaged at Berlin, and was a great favourite there, making a notable appearance on Dec. 11, 1876, as Katharine in Goetz's 'Taming of the Shrew' on its production in Berlin. (See GOETZ.) She was next engaged at Brussels, where, in 1878, she played Carmen two years after its production at Brussels. Mapleson saw her in the part, and promptly engaged her to play it at Her Majesty's. She appeared there Apr. 27, 1878, as Violetta, and made a great hit as Carmen on the production of the opera in England on June 22. Her dramatic powers no doubt did much to establish its success in this country. She reappeared every season until 1881 at the same theatre, and in the early part of 1880 made a success in English under Carl Rosa as Katharine (Goetz) and Aida, having in the meantime reappeared in her native country. In 1881 she married Baron Ernest v. Hesse-Wartegg, the well-known traveller and author, correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse. With him she made three trips round the world, everywhere well received. She fulfilled several engagements in America, and reappeared in this country at intervals, viz. 1885 at the Crystal Palace and Philharmonic Concerts, 1887 and 1888 in opera at Covent Garden and Drury Lane, and in other years, her final appearances being in 1894-95 in the Carl Rosa Opera at Liverpool and at the Ballad Concerts. She also sang in the various cities of Germany and Italy. Her repertory was enormous, about 100 parts; Carmen alone she sang 500 times in French, English, German and Italian. She has received various decorations—Chamber Singer to the Court of Prussia, Officer of the French Academy, the Order of St. Cecilia at Rome, etc. In 1896, on the death of her mother, Mme. von Hesse-Wartegg retired from the stage, but sang occasionally in concerts for charitable purposes.

A. C.

HAUPT, CARL AUGUST (b. Kuhnau, Silesia, Aug. 25, 1810; d. Berlin, July 4, 1891), a distinguished German organist, pupil of A. W. Bach, Klein and Dehn, and at a later date of the two Schneiders. In 1832 he obtained his first post at the French convent in Berlin, from which he rose to the parish church of the city, where he succeeded Thiele in 1849. His reputation spread beyond his native country, and in 1854 he was consulted by Donaldson, Ouseley and Willis, the committee appointed to draw up a scheme for a gigantic organ at the Crystal Palace. In 1869 he succeeded his old master Bach as director of the Königl. Kirchenmusik Institut at Berlin, a post which he filled until shortly before his death. Haupt was remarkable for his fine extempore variations in the style of J. S. Bach—close and scientific, and increasing in elaboration with each fresh treatment of the theme.

G.

HAUPTMANN, MORITZ, D.Ph. (b. Dresden, Oct. 13, 1792; d. Leipzig, Jan. 3, 1868), German composer and eminent theorist, and cantor of the Thomasschule at Leipzig. His education was conducted mainly with a view to his father's profession of architecture; but he was also well grounded in music at an early age. He studied the violin under Scholz, and harmony and composition under Grosse, and subsequently under Morlacchi. As Hauptmann grew up he determined to adopt music as a profession. To perfect himself in the violin and composition he went in 1811 to Gotha, where Spohr was Konzertmeister, and the two then contracted a lifelong friendship. He was for a short time violinist in the court band at Dresden (1812), and soon afterwards entered the household of Prince Replin, Russian Governor of Dresden, with whom he went to Russia for four years in 1815. On his return to Germany he became violinist (1822) in Spohr's band at Cassel, and here gave the first indications of his remarkable faculty for teaching the theory of music. F. David, Curschmann, Burgmüller, Kufferath and Kiel are among the long list of his pupils at that time. In 1842, on Mendelssohn's recommendation, he was appointed cantor and Musikdirector of the Thomasschule, and professor of counterpoint and composition at the new conservatorium at Leipzig, where he thenceforward resided. Here he became the most celebrated theorist and most valued teacher of his day. Among his pupils will be found such names as Joachim, Von Bülow, Cossmann, the Baches, Sullivan, Cowen.¹ His works are characterised by deep thought, philosophic treatment, imagination and much sense of humour. His chief work is Die Natur der Harmonik und Metrik (1853, 2nd ed. 1873); English translation as The Nature of Harmony and Metre, by W. E. Heathcote, London, 1888. His mathematical and philosophical studies had given a strictly logical turn to his mind, and in this book he applies Hegel's dialectic method to the study of music. Gifted with an ear of unusual delicacy, he speculated deeply on the nature of sound, applying to the subject Hegel's formulas of proposition, counter-proposition and the ultimate unity of the two. The book is not intended for practical instruction, and is indeed placed beyond the reach of ordinary musicians by its difficult terminology. But by those who have mastered it it is highly appreciated, and its influence on later theoretical works is undeniable. His other works are: an Erläuterung zu der Kunst der Fuge von J. S. Bach; various articles on acoustics in Chrysander's Jahrbücher; Die Lehre von der Harmonik, a posthumous supplement to the Harmonik und Metrik, edited by his pupil, Dr. Oscar Paul, in 1868; Opuscula, a small collection of articles musical and philosophical, edited by his son in 1874; and his Letters, of which two vols. (1871) are addressed to Hauser, the director of the Munich Conservatorium, and the third, edited by Hiller (1876), to Spohr and others. A large selection from these, translated by A. D. Coleridge, was published as Letters of a Leipzig Cantor in 1892. Hauptmann published some sixty compositions, mainly interesting from the characteristic harmony between the whole and its parts, which pervades them. In early life he wrote chiefly instrumental music—sonatas for PF. and violin (opp. 5, 6, 23); duos for two violins (opp. 2, 16, 17), quartets, etc., which betray the influence of Spohr. During the latter half of his life he wrote exclusively for the voice. Among his vocal compositions—more important as well as more original than the instrumental—may be named his well-known motets and psalms; a Mass (op. 18); a Mass with orch. (op. 43); choruses for mixed voices (opp. 25, 32, 47), perfect examples of this style of writing; two-part songs (op. 46); and three-part canons (op. 50). Op. 33, six sacred songs, were published in English by Ewer & Co. Early in life he composed an opera, 'Mathilde,' which was repeatedly performed at Cassel, where it was produced in 1826. His partsongs are eminently vocal and widely popular, and are stock pieces with all the associations and church choirs throughout Germany.

HAUSER, FRANZ (b. Krasowitz, near Prague, Jan. 12, 1794; d. Freiburg, Breisgau, Aug. 14, 1870), was a pupil of Tomaschek, and for many years a successful baritone singer in the operas of Prague, Cassel, Dresden and Vienna, at the last of which he sang in 1828. In 1832 he was in the London company which included Schröder-Devrient, and in the same year sang at Leipzig, going to Berlin in 1835 and to Breslau in 1836. He retired from the stage in 1837, and settled in Vienna as a singing teacher; in 1846 he was appointed director of the Munich Conservatorium, on the reorganisation of which, in 1865, he was pensioned off and lived successively at Carlsruhe and Freiburg. His Gesanglehre (published in 1886) had a wide circulation, but to modern musicians his name is best known as the recipient of the interesting series of letters from HAUPTMANN (q.v.). (Riemann.)

HAUSER, MISKA (b. Pressburg, 1822; d. Vienna, Dec. 9, 1887), a famous Hungarian violinist, received his musical education in Vienna under Böhm and Mayseder. When only 12 years of age he made a tour through the world. In 1840 he travelled through Germany, Sweden, Norway and Russia; he visited London in 1850, and California, South America and Australia in 1853–58. In 1860 he was fêted by King Victor Emanuel of Italy and the Sultan of Turkey. Of his compositions, his little 'Lieder ohne Worte' for the violin will no doubt survive him for many years. He wrote a set of letters describing his American tours, in the Ostdeutsche Post of Vienna, which was published as Wanderbuch eines österreichischen Virtuosen in 1858–59. Hauser retired into private life about 1878.

HAUSMANN, ROBERT (b. Rottleberode, in the Harz, Aug. 13, 1852; d. Vienna, Jan. 19, 1909), a distinguished violoncellist and long a member of the JOACHIM QUARTET (q.v.), went, at the age of 8, to school at Brunswick, where for some years he studied his instrument under Theodor Müller, the violoncellist of the well-known quartet of the brothers MÜLLER (q.v.). When the Hochschule for music was opened at Berlin in 1869, he entered as a pupil, and worked under Joachim's guidance with Wilhelm Müller. (See MÜLLER, The Brothers (5).) Being anxious to profit by the instruction of Signor Piatti, he was introduced by Joachim to that artist, who treated him with great kindness, and gave him lessons for some time both in London and Italy. He then entered upon his professional career, beginning as violoncellist in the quartet of Graf Hochberg. This post he retained from 1872–76, and was then appointed second professor of his instrument at the Hochschule. He succeeded to the principal place upon the retirement of Müller, and from 1879 was violoncellist of Joachim's quartet. He was well known in London, where he introduced important new works by Brahms and other composers. He had all the qualities which combine to make an accomplished artist. With great command over the technical difficulties of the instrument, he possessed an unusually powerful tone. (See VIOLONCELLO-PLAYING.) He was a kinsman of Georg Haussmann, the violoncellist, upon whose fine Stradivarius he played.

HAUSSMAN, VALENTIN, organist, and Rathsherr of Gerbstädt, near Merseburg, in Saxony, was one of the most industrious and prolific composers of his time. His works appeared from 1588–1611, and mainly consist of collections of German secular songs for four to eight voices, after the manner of Italian canzonets and villanelle. His Venusgarten of 1602 consists of a hundred, mostly Polish, dances a 5, the melodies of which he tells us he had collected during his travels in Prussia and Poland, fifty of which he had now provided with German texts written by himself ('feine höfliche amorosische Texte'); the other fifty he left without text. From 1606-1610 he edited with German texts fifty-one of Marenzio's Villanelle, also four volumes of Vecchi's Canzonets for three and four voices. Gastoldi's Tricinia and Morley's First Book of Ballets. His other works consist of instrumental dances a 4 and 5 (intradas, paduans, galliards)—a selection occupies vol. xvi. of the D.D.T.—and a few sacred compositions.

J. R. M.

HAUTBOY, the English transference of the French haut-boys, i.e. a wooden instrument with a high tone. The word is used by Shakespeare. In Handel's time it was phoneticised into Hoboy. The Italians spell it Oboe (q.v.), which form (occasionally, as by Schumann, Hoboe) is now adopted in Germany and England. G.

HAUTMAN (HOTMAN, HOTTEMANN) (d. Paris, Apr. 14, 1663), lutenist and viola da gambist, one of the most famous players and teachers of his instruments in France at that time, and master of Sainte-Colombe and Marin Marais. He was apparently of German parentage, and belonged about 1662 to the Musique Royale of Louis XIII. Huygens speaks of him also as a composer; a posthumous volume of 'airs à boire' appeared in 1664.¹

HAVERGAL, REV. WILLIAM HENRY (b. High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire, Jan. 18, 1793; d. Leamington, Apr. 19, 1870), was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1815, and M.A. in 1819. He was ordained by Bishop Ryder, and in 1829 was presented to the rectory of Astley, near Bewdley. His first published composition was a setting of Heber's hymn 'From Greenland's icy mountains' as an anthem, the profits of which, as of many other of his compositions, he devoted to charitable objects. In 1836 he published an Evening Service in E and 100 antiphonal chants (op. 35), obtaining the Gresham Prize Medal in 1837 for his Evening Service in A (op. 37). Other anthems and services followed, and in 1844 he began his labours towards the improvement of psalmody by the publication of a reprint of Ravenscroft's Psalter (published 1847). In 1845 he was presented to the rectory of St. Nicholas, Worcester, and to an honorary canonry in the cathedral. In 1849 he published The Old Church Psalmody (op. 43), and in 1854 an excellent History of the Old Hundredth Tune. In 1859 he brought out A Hundred Psalm and Hymn Tunes (op. 48), of his own composition. From 1860-68 he was rector of Sharehill, near Wolverhampton. Besides the works enumerated above, Havergal wrote a number of songs and rounds for the young, besides many hymns, sacred songs and carols for the periodical entitled Our Own Fireside. These were afterwards collected and published as Fireside Music. At the time when church music was at its lowest ebb, the publication of his Old Church Psalmody drew attention to the classical school of English ecclesiastical music. After his death Havergal's works were edited by his youngest daughter, Miss Frances Ridley Havergal (1836-79), whose religious poetry was remarkably popular.

HAWARD, CHARLES, spinet-maker. (See SPINET.)

HAWDON, MATTHIAS (d. Newcastle, Mar. 1787), a popular organist and composer, organist of Beverley Minster and of St. Nicholas, Newcastle, being appointed to the latter post in 1776. He wrote an Ode on the King of Prussia, and some songs; two organ concertos, in B flat and F; 'The Opening of an Organ, a Choice Set of Voluntaries'; and 'First Sett of six sonatas spirituale or voluntaries, for the harpsichord, organ or pfe.' One of his 'Six Conversation Sonatas' for the harpsichord or pianoforte, with accompaniment for two violins and violoncello (published 1785), was played at a concert of old chamber music in 1904, and pleased by its artless if rather insipid tunefulness. Hawdon was buried in St. Nicholas's Church, Newcastle, on Mar. 22, 1787. M.

HAWES, (1) WILLIAM (b. London, June 21, 1785; d. there, Feb. 18, 1846), was from 1793 to 1801 a chorister of the Chapel Royal. In 1802 he was engaged as a violinist in the band of Covent Garden, and about the same time began to teach singing. In 1803 he officiated as deputy lay vicar at Westminster Abbey. On July 15, 1805, he was appointed gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and on the formation of the Philharmonic Society in 1813 was elected an associate. In 1812 he was appointed almoner, master of the choristers and vicar-choral of St. Paul's, and in 1817 master of the children and lutenist of the Chapel Royal. In the same year he became lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey, but resigned his appointment in 1820. He was the first promoter of the Harmonic Institution (see ARGYLL ROOMS), and after the breaking-up of that establishment carried on for some years the business of a music publisher in the Strand. He was for 12 years director of the music at the English Opera, Lyceum; and it was at his instance that Weber's 'Der Freischütz' was first performed in England, July 23, 1824, an event which forms an era in the history of the opera in this country. Hawes did not at first venture to perform the entire work, the finale being omitted and ballads for the soprano and tenor interpolated, but he had soon the satisfaction of discovering that the opera would be accepted without curtailment. The great success of the work induced him subsequently to adapt the following operas to the English stage :

Salieri's 'Tarare,' 1825; Winter's 'Das unterbrochene Opferfest' ('The Oracle, or, The Interrupted Sacrifice'), 1826; Paër's 'I fuorsciti' ('The Freebooters'), 1827; Mozart's 'Così fan tutte' ('Tis for Tat'), 1828; Ries's 'Die Räuberbraut' ('The Robber's Bride') and Marschner's 'Der Vampyr,' 1829.

Hawes composed or compiled music for the following pieces :

'Broken Promises' (compiled), 1825; 'The Sister of Charity,' 1829; 'The Irish Girl,' 1830; 'Comfortable Lodgings,' 'The Dilk Gatherer' and 'The Climbing Boy,' 1832; 'The Mummy,' 'The Quartette,' 'The Yeoman's Daughter,' and 'Convent Belles' (with J. A. Wade), 1833; and 'The Muleteer's Vow' (partly selected), 1835.

He was the composer of 'A Collection of five Gleees and one Madrigal' and 'Six Gleees for three and four voices,' and the arranger of 'Six Scotch Songs, harmonised as Gleees.' His glee 'The bee, the golden daughter of the spring' gained the prize given by the Glee Club on its 50th anniversary in Apr. 1836. He edited the publication in score of 'The Triumphes of Oriana'; of a collection of madrigals by composers of the 16th and 17th centuries; a collection of the then unpublished gleees of Reginald Spofforth; and a collection of chants, etc. In 1830 he gave oratorio performances in Lent at both the patent theatres, but with heavy loss. He was for many years conductor of the Madrigal Society, and organist of the German Lutheran Church in the Savoy.

His daughter, (2) MARIA BILLINGTON (b. London, Apr. 1816; d. Ryde, Isle of Wight, Apr. 24, 1886), afterwards Mrs. Merest, for some years occupied a high position as a contralto singer, and was the composer of several pleasing ballads.

W. H. H.

HAWKINS, (1) JAMES, Mus.B. (b. Cambridge; d. 1729), was a chorister of St. John's College, Cambridge, and afterwards organist of Ely Cathedral from 1681 until his death. He was a voluminous composer of church music, and 17 services and 75 anthems by him are preserved (more or less complete) in MS. in the library of Ely Cathedral. Two services and nine anthems (part of those) are also included in the Tudway collection (Harl. MSS. 7341, 7342). Hawkins transcribed and presented to the library of Ely Cathedral many volumes of cathedral music, some of which have proved of great value to modern research. He took his degree at Cambridge in 1719. He was a non-juror, as appears by an autograph copy of one of his anthems in the R.C.M., the words of which are applicable to party purposes, and which has a manuscript dedication :

'to the very Revvd Mr. Tomkinson and the rest of the Great, Good, and Just Nonjurors of St. John's College in Cambridge.'

(2) JAMES, his son, was organist of Peterborough Cathedral from 1714 (when he was appointed at a salary of £20 per annum) to 1759. He composed some church music. One of his anthems is included in the Tudway collection (Harl. MSS. 7342).

W. H. H.

HAWKINS, SIR JOHN, Knight (b. London, Mar. 30, 1719; d. May 21, 1789), musical historian, was originally intended for the profession of his father, an architect and surveyor, but eventually articulated to an attorney. He was duly admitted to the practice of his profession, devoting his leisure hours to the cultivation of literature and music. About 1740 he became a member of the Academy of Ancient Music. He wrote the words of six cantatas, which were set to music for a voice and instruments by John Stanley, and published at their joint risk in 1742. These succeeded so well that the authors were induced to publish, a few months afterwards, a similar set, which met with equal success. Hawkins was also a frequent contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine and other periodicals. In 1749 he was invited by Samuel Johnson to be one of the nine members who formed his Thursday evening club in Ivy Lane. In 1752 he was elected a member of the Madrigal Society. In 1753 he married Miss Sidney Storer, with whom he received a considerable fortune, which was greatly increased on the death of her brother in 1759. Hawkins then purchased a house at Twickenham, to which he retired. In 1760 he published an edition of Walton and Cotton's Compleat Angler, with a life of Walton and notes by himself, and a life of Cotton by William Oldys. The publication involved him in a dispute with Moses Browne, who had shortly before put forth an edition of the book. Hawkins's edition was thrice reproduced by him in his lifetime, and again by his son, John Sidney Hawkins, after his death. He was an active magistrate, and in 1765 became Chairman of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions.

In 1770, with a view to assisting the Academy, he wrote and published anonymously a pamphlet entitled An Account of the Institution and Progress of the Academy of Ancient Music. In 1772, on Oct. 23, he was knighted. In 1776 he gave to the world the work on which his fame rests—his General History of the Science and Practice of Music, in 5 vols. 4to, on which he had been engaged for sixteen years. In the same year Dr. Burney published the first volume of his General History of Music, the other three appearing at intervals between that date and 1789. Contemporary judgment awarded the palm of superiority to Burney and neglected Hawkins. Evidence of the feeling is found in a catch which was formerly better known than it is now :

'Have you Sir John Hawkins' History?
Some folks think it quite a mystery.'

Musick fill'd his wondrous brain,
How d'ye like him? Is it plain?
Both I've read and must agree,
That Burney's history pleases me.

Which in performance is made to sound :

'Sir John Hawkins!
Burn his history!
How d'ye like him?
Burn his history!
Burney's history pleases me.'

Posterity, however, has reversed the decision of the wits; Hawkins's History has been twice reprinted (Novello, 1853 and 1875, 2 vols. 8vo), but Burney's never reached a second edition. The truth lies between the extremes. Burney, possessed of far greater musical knowledge than Hawkins, better judgment and a better style, frequently wrote about things which he had not sufficiently examined; Hawkins, on the other hand, more industrious and painstaking than Burney, was deficient in technical skill, and often inaccurate. In 1784 Dr. Johnson appointed Sir John Hawkins one of his executors, and left to him the care of his fame. Sir John fulfilled this trust by writing a life of Johnson, and publishing an edition of his works in 11 vols. 8vo in 1787. Whilst he was engaged on the work, his library, in Queen Square, Westminster, was destroyed by fire. Fortunately he had, soon after the publication of his History, presented the fine collection of theoretical treatises and other works formed by Dr. Pepusch, and acquired from him, to the British Museum, so that the loss, although severe, was much less than it might have been. On May 14, 1789, Hawkins was attacked by paralysis, from the effects of which he died. He was buried in the north cloister of Westminster Abbey, under a stone on which was inscribed, pursuant to his own wish, only the initials of his name, the date of his death, and his age. His portrait (see PLATE XXXIII.) is in the Music School collection at Oxford.

HAY, EDWARD NORMAN (b. Faversham, 1889), son of an Irish father, was brought to Ireland in 1890. He studied with Dr. Koeller (Belfast), C. J. Brennan, Dr. E. M. Chaundy and Dr. Eaglefield-Hull; graduated Mus.B. (Oxon) and F.R.C.O., 1911, and proceeded Mus.D. (Oxon) in 1919. He was organist of St. Patrick's Parish Church, Coleraine, 1914-1916, and was appointed organist at Bangor Abbey Church, 1922. He was extern examiner for degrees in music at Dublin University, 1923-24. He married in 1920 Miss Hessie Haughey, of Coleraine. His compositions include: a 6-part madrigal (Feis Ceoil prize, 1908); sonata for violoncello and piano on Irish folk-tunes (Feis Ceoil prize, 1916); phantasy for string quartet on Irish folk-tunes (Cobbett Prize, 1917); string quartet in A (Carnegie Trust Award, 1918); musical comedy, 'The Lady Voter's Dilemma' (1919); 'Dunluce': tone-poem for orchestra (Belfast Philharmonic Society, 1921); a number of other works—choral, orchestral, chamber and songs.

Magdalen, Bermondsey, in the earlier part of the 18th century. About 1723 he published three cantatas which displayed considerable ability. He also composed a song called 'New Mad Tom,' beginning 'In my triumphant chariot hurl'd,' which was afterwards tacked on to the former part of the older song 'Forth from my dark and dismal cell,' instead of the latter verses beginning 'Last night I heard the dog-star bark,' and was often sung with it. His two-part song, 'As I saw fair Clara walk alone,' was long a favourite.

HAYDN. The generally accepted form of the name of a family made famous by one of its members, Franz Joseph, the first great master of the symphony and the string quartet.

The researches of Dr. Kuhač have gathered a large amount of cumulative evidence in support of the contention that the family was by race not Teuton but Slav, not German but Croatian. The name, of which the original form appears to have been Hajden, is a well-known Croatian patronymic, and has no precise parallel among Teutonic forms. Haydn's native village, originally called Trstnik (of which Rohrau is the official German translation), is situated in the heart of a colony of Croatian immigrants who, in the 15th and 16th centuries, occupied the country from Pressburg (Bratislava) to the Neusiedler See. Even at the present day the village contains a large number of Croatian names, and in the 18th century, so far as we have record, the Slav population appears to have been in a considerable majority.

All of Haydn's ancestors who can be traced were born and lived in this district; and the name of his mother's family, which is a voz nihili in German, is most probably explained as a phonetic variant of the Croatian 'Kolar' (wheelwright). Again, not only is the general impression of Haydn's music Slavonic rather than Teutonic in character, but many of his mature compositions are saturated with Croatian folk-songs, to which his own most distinctive melodies bear, both in curve and in rhythm, a very noticeable resemblance. Examples of folk-songs which have been actually identified may be quoted from the Cassation in G major (1765), the quartets in D, op. 17, No. 6; Eb, op. 20, No. 1; C, op. 33, No. 3; Bb, op. 50, No. 1; F, op. 74, No. 2; and G, op. 77, No. 1; from the Salomon symphonies in D, Eb and Bb, from the Rondo of the pianoforte concerto in D, from the Mass 'Hier liegt vor deiner Majestät,' and from the Austrian National Anthem. To the same source may be referred his fondness for metres of five, seven or nine bars, and many among his most characteristic turns of melody and cadence. It is hardly too much to say that he stood to the folk-music of Croatia as Burns to the peasant-songs of Scotland; and it may be remembered that from his appointment at Eisenstadt in 1760 to his journey to England in 1791, he never (except for short visits to Vienna) travelled outside the limits of his native district.¹

(1) FRANZ JOSEPH (b. Rohrau, Lower Austria, night of Mar. 31, 1732; d. Vienna, May 31, 1809) was the second child of Mathias Haydn, a master wheelwright, by his marriage (Nov. 24, 1728) with Maria Koller, daughter of the Marktrichter and cook in Count Harrach's household. Haydn's ancestors came originally from Hainburg, a town close to the Danube, about four leagues from Rohrau. His great-grandfather Kaspar was a servant in the hill-castle there, one of the few who escaped massacre when it was stormed by the Turks on July 11, 1683. Kaspar's son Thomas, a master wheelwright and member of the town council, had seven sons, of whom Mathias (t. Jan. 31, 1699; d. Sept. 12, 1763), the father of our Haydn, was youngest but one. Thomas's widow married a journeyman wheelwright, Mathias Seefranz (d. May 2, 1762, aged 89), who thus became Haydn's step-grandfather; and one of their children, Julie Rosine, married a schoolmaster named Frankh, afterwards Haydn's first teacher. The sons nearly all learnt the wheelwright's trade, and then set out on their travels; after which Mathias settled in Rohrau, a small Austrian village on the river Leitha, and built himself the little house at the end of the market-place where Haydn was born, and which, though twice rebuilt, is still standing in its original form. Maria Haydn (b. Nov. 10, 1707) bore her husband twelve children, of whom the sixth was JOHANN MICHAEL (2), the church composer; and the eleventh Johann Evangelist, an unimportant tenor singer, who was admitted to the chapel of Prince Esterhazy on his brother Joseph's recommendation. After Maria's death (Feb. 23, 1754) Mathias married again, and had five more children, who died young.

CHILDHOOD.—Haydn's parents were honest, industrious people, who instilled into their children a love for work, method, cleanliness and, above all, religion. In his old age Haydn gratefully acknowledged his obligations to their care. Both were fond of music, and both sang. The father had a fair tenor voice, and accompanied himself on the harp, though without knowing a note. The child soon began to sing their simple songs, astonishing them by the correctness of his ear and the beauty of his voice. But he did not stop there. Having seen the schoolmaster play the violin, he would sit on the stove-bench and accompany his parents as they sang, precisely imitating the schoolmaster's handling of the bow, and keeping strict time, with two pieces of wood as his instrument. He was one day surprised, when thus engaged, by his relation Frankh, from Hainburg. Thinking that he saw in him the making of a musician, Frankh persuaded the parents to commit their little boy to his care. The mother would have preferred his entering the priesthood, or becoming a schoolmaster, and it required all the father's authority to make her consent; but he felt that he had himself been capable of better things, and looked forward to seeing his son a Chor-regent or Kapellmeister, as a compensation for his own lot. At the age of 6, then, the little Joseph—in the Austrian dialect 'Sepperl'—was taken by his father to school at Hainburg.

Johann Mathias Frankh, Haydn's distant relative (he called him simply 'cousin'), was an excellent teacher, very strict, and eminently practical. Haydn not only became a first-rate singer, but also learned something of the instruments most in use, and spent nearly all his time in church or in school. Learning came easily to him, and if he had any difficulty, his master's severity soon overcame it. In his old age he spoke with thankfulness of this hard probation and of his cousin's discipline. 'I shall be grateful to that man as long as I live,' said he to Griesinger, 'for keeping me so hard at work, though I used to get more flogging than food.' On another occasion, when speaking in his modest way of his own talents and industry, he added:

'Almighty God, to whom I render thanks for all His unnumbered mercies, gave me such facility in music, that by the time I was six I stood up like a man and sang masses in the church choir, and could play a little on the clavier and the violin.'

But the lad sadly missed his mother's care. He was neglected both in clothes and person (he already wore a wig, 'for the sake of cleanliness'), and the results of this neglect distressed him long and sorely. When quite an old man he said to Dies the painter—who, like Griesinger, visited him frequently with a view to his biography:

'I could not help perceiving, much to my distress, that I was gradually getting very dirty, and though I thought a good deal of my little person, was not always able to avoid spots of dirt on my clothes, of which I was dreadfully ashamed—in fact, I was a regular little urchin.'

Dies has preserved another anecdote of this period, in which Haydn figures. A drummer was wanted for a procession, and his master thrust him into the vacant office, first showing him how to make the stroke. The effect must have been comical, as he was so small that the instrument had to be carried before him on the back of a colleague of equal height, who happened to be a hunchback. Haydn retained his liking for the drum, and prided himself on his skill, with which indeed he once astonished Salomon's orchestra during his stay in London. The drums on which he performed at Hainburg on the occasion just named are still preserved in the choir of the church.

At the end of two years a decisive change took place in his life. George Reutter, Hof-compositor and Kapellmeister at St. Stephen's, Vienna, was on a visit to his friend Anton Johann Palmb, pastor of Hainburg, and having heard Haydn's 'weak, sweet voice' (as he himself called it), put him through an examination, and offered him a place as chorister at St. Stephen's. To go to Vienna seemed to the boy an almost incredible piece of good fortune. His parents gave their consent, and with a joyful heart he bade farewell to Hainburg. His grandmother had died just before—May 17, 1739; Frankh lived to be 75, and died May 10, 1783, his wife, Julie Rosine (who did not do her duty by Haydn), having preceded him in Jan. 1760. Of their two daughters, Anna Rosalia, born 1752, married Philipp Schimpel, usher of the school, and afterwards Chor-regent. Haydn showed his gratitude to the family by leaving the latter couple a sum of money and his portrait of Frankh, 'my first instructor in music.' They both, however, died before him, in 1805, and the portrait has disappeared.

It was in 1740 that Haydn entered the Cantorei of St. Stephen's, where he was to pass his remaining years of study. The house was one of a row which came close up to the principal entrance of the cathedral, and from his window he looked straight on the glorious spire. He tells us that, 'besides the regular studies, he learned singing, the clavier, and the violin from good masters.' The 'regular studies' included religion, a little Latin, writing and ciphering. His singing-masters are said to have been Gegenbauer and Finsterbusch; the former, subcantor and violinist at St. Stephen's, probably taught him the violin as well; the latter was a tenor in the court chapel. No instruction seems to have been given in harmony and composition at the Cantorei; but this did not trouble Von Reutter.¹ Haydn could only remember having had two lessons from him all the time he was there. But the instinct for composition made him cover every blank sheet of music-paper on which he could lay his hands—'it must be all right if the paper was nice and full.' Reutter surprised him once sketching a Salve Regina for twelve voices, and told him sharply he had better try it first in two parts—how, he did not take the pains to show—and further advised him to write variations on the motets and vespers he heard in church. In this way he was thrown back upon himself. 'I certainly had the gift,' he says, 'and by dint of hard work I managed to get on.' An anecdote of this time shows that as a boy he was not behind his comrades in fun and mischief. The choristers were frequently required to sing with the Imperial Chapel—which explains Haydn's statement that he had sung with great success both at court and in St. Stephen's. This generally happened when the court was at Schönbrunn. The palace had only just been completed, and the scaffolding was still standing—an irresistible temptation to boys. The Empress Maria Theresa had caught them climbing it many a time, but her threats and prohibitions had no effect. One day when Haydn was balancing himself aloft, far above his school-fellows, the Empress saw him from the windows, and requested her Hofcompositor to take care that 'that fair-haired blockhead' (blonder Dickkopf), the ringleader of them all, got 'einen recenten Schilling' (slang for a 'good hiding'). When he was Kapellmeister to Prince Esterházy, 'the fair-haired blockhead' had an opportunity, at Esterházy, of thanking the Empress for this mark of imperial favour.

In the autumn of 1745 Haydn had the pleasure of welcoming his brother Michael as a fellow chorister at the Cantorei, and of helping him in his work. Michael made rapid progress, but a cloud came over poor Joseph's prospects. His voice began to break, and the Empress, who had before taken particular pleasure in his singing, remarked jocosely to her vice-Kapellmeister¹ that young Haydn's singing was more like the crowing of a cock than anything else. Reutter took the hint, and on the festival of St. Leopold (Nov. 15), 1748, celebrated at the monastery of Klosterneuburg, near Vienna, gave the Salve Regina to Michael, who sang it so beautifully as to charm both Emperor and Empress, from whom he received twenty-four ducats in gold.

Joseph was thus completely supplanted by his brother. His voice had lost all its power, and he was oppressed with grief and anxiety. In the midst of his trouble Reutter suggested a means by which his voice might be preserved, and even improved; and referred him to the court chapel, which contained at least a dozen 'castrati.' Haydn's father, however, having probably heard of the proposal, came in all haste to Vienna, and saved his son.

His days at the Cantorei were now numbered. He was of no use as a singer, and it does not seem to have occurred to any one that he might be employed as a violinist. Reutter did not consider himself in the least bound to look after his future, and was only waiting for an opportunity to get rid of him. This occurred soon enough, and Haydn himself furnished the pretext. Always full of fun, and inclined to practical jokes, he one day tried a new pair of scissors on the pigtail of a schoolfellow. The pigtail fell, but the culprit was condemned to a caning on the hand. In vain he begged to be let off, declaring he would rather leave than submit to the indignity. That he might do, Reutter said, but he must first be caned and then dismissed.

EARLY YEARS IN VIENNA.—Haydn was thus thrown upon the world with an empty purse, a keen appetite and no friends. The first person to help him was Spangler, a chorister of St. Michael's. He offered him shelter; a few pupils presented themselves, and a good Viennese lent him 150 florins, which enabled him to rent an attic in the old Michaelerhaus, attached to the college of St. Barnabas, in the Kohlmarkt. Here he abandoned himself to the study of composition, and made acquaintance with the master who more than any other became his model—Emanuel Bach. Having acquired his first six clavier sonatas, he pored over them at his little worm-eaten clavier—and how thoroughly he mastered their style his compositions show. Indeed Bach afterwards sent him word that he alone fully understood his writings and knew how to use them. Besides the clavier, he diligently practised the violin, so that although, as he said, 'no conjuror on any instrument,' he was able to play a concerto. About 1751/52² he composed his first Mass, in F (No. 11 in Novello's edition). It bears unmistakable evidences of undeveloped and unaided talent. Haydn had forgotten its very existence when, to his great delight, he discovered it in his old age and inserted additional wind parts.

Having accidentally become acquainted with Felix Kurz, a favourite comic actor at the Stadttheater, Haydn was asked to set his comic opera 'Der neue krumme Teufel,' a kind of magic farce interspersed with songs and a few instrumental pieces, and received for it the sum of 25 ducats. It was produced at the Stadttheater in the spring of 1752, and frequently repeated in Vienna, Prague, Berlin, Saxony and the Breisgau. The libretto has been preserved, but the music is lost. Metastasio was then living in the same house with Haydn. He shared the apartments of a Spanish family to whom he was much attached, and superintended the education of the two daughters. The musical training of the elder, Marianne de Martines, was confided to Haydn, who in this way became acquainted with Porpora, then teaching singing to the mistress of Correr, the Venetian ambassador. Porpora proposed that Haydn should act as his accompanist, thus giving him an opportunity of learning his method. He took him to the baths of Mannersdorf, on the confines of Hungary, where they remained for some months, and, in return indeed for various menial offices, gave him instruction in composition. At Mannersdorf, at the soirées of Prince Hildburghausen, Haydn met Bonno, Wagenseil, Gluck and Dittersdorf, to the last of whom he became much attached. Gluck advised his going to Italy.

² Not 1741, as was formerly said.

One by one he procured all the known theoretical works, and thoroughly mastered their contents, especially Fux's Gradus, which he afterwards used as the foundation of his own teaching. He had had, as we have seen, no regular musical training; but by industry, careful observation and reiterated attempts, he gradually attained that independence which gave the impress of originality to all his works.

WEINZIRL QUARTETS, ETC.—It happened that at this time a certain Karl Joseph Edlen von Fürnberg (son of an eminent physician, ennobled by Charles VI.) was accustomed to invite parties of musicians to his country house at Weinzirl, near Melk, for the practice and performance of such concerted compositions as were accessible. Through some Viennese friend he heard of Haydn's reputation and, in 1755, invited him down on a long visit. Haydn, on arrival, found the usual 'country house' orchestra of the time—a few strings, a couple each of oboes and horns, and proceeded to compose for them a series of works which he called by the title of Divertimenti, Nocturnes or Cassations. There is no evidence that he had any intention of creating a new form; he rather adapted to the larger medium the structural lessons which he had learned from the sonatas of C. P. E. Bach. Some of these works he wrote for strings and wind, some for the four strings alone, his choice being probably determined in some measure by the bare chance of occasion or opportunity. In this quiet and unpretentious manner there came into existence his first quartet and his first symphony, the latter now erroneously included among his quartets as op. 1, No. 5.¹ It must be remembered that the whole nomenclature of instrumental forms was still in a very fluid and indeterminate condition. Any work for three or more instruments might technically be called a 'symphony'; the forces of orchestral and chamber music were not yet separated; and these works of Haydn differ from those of his predecessor, not in the combination of their instruments but in the greater vitality and organisation of their structure. The fact that the majority of them were written for strings alone may be due partly to his want of experience in orchestration, partly to the suitability of the string tone to his nervous and transparent style.

During his stay at Weinzirl he wrote eighteen of these compositions, all of which are now published as string quartets (opp. 1-3: Trautwein 58-75). In the first two collections all except the symphony in B₅ have five movements apiece, two of these being minuetts; in op. 3 he began to establish the four-movement scheme, which since his day has been the usual tradition of chamber music. It is noticeable that from the first he added his favourite 'minuet' to the customary 'Allegro, Adagio and Finale' of C. P. E. Bach's sonata. The character of the lyric form was specially suited to his genius, and throughout his life he treated it with an astonishing range of variety and invention.

On his return to Vienna in 1756 his fortune began to amend: he found himself in request both as performer and as teacher, and was even able to raise his fee from two to five florins a month. Among his pupils at this period was the Countess Thun, an enthusiastic and generous patron of music, who first heard of him through one of his MS. sonatas, and who took lessons from him in singing and on the harpsichord. In 1759, on von Fürnberg's recommendation, he was appointed Musikdirector und Kammercompositor to Count Ferdinand Maximilian Morzin, who maintained a small private orchestra (probably from twelve to sixteen players) at Lucaveč, near Pilsen. Here Haydn composed a further set of concerted works, among which are recorded a 'Divertimento a sei' for two violins, two horns, English horn and bassoon, and a symphony in D major, the form of which is precisely similar to that of the Weinzirl symphony in B₅ (op. 1, No. 5), though the treatment is more genial and more mature. It has commonly been described as Haydn's first symphony: but for this designation it will be seen that there is no sufficient reason.

His salary now amounted to 200 florins (say £20), with board and lodging. Small as this was, it induced him to think of taking a companion for life, although the Count never kept a married man in his employ. His choice fell on the daughter of Keller, a wig-maker, to whose house he had been introduced by her brother, who was violinist at St. Stephen's when Haydn was a chorister. He gave music lessons to the two daughters, and fell in love with the younger. She, however, took the veil, and the father, anxious to keep him in the family, persuaded him to marry the other, Maria Anna, three years his senior. The wedding took place at St. Stephen's, Nov. 26, 1760—a bad day for Haydn, and the foundation of unutterable domestic misery. His wife was a regular Xantippe, who, as her husband said, cared not a straw whether he was an artist or a shoemaker. They had no children, and it can scarcely be wondered at if in time Haydn sought elsewhere the consolations which were denied him at home, or even showed himself susceptible to the attractions of other women. His wife spent the last years of her life at Baden, near Vienna, and died Mar. 20, 1800.

THE ESTERHAZY APPOINTMENT.—Soon after the marriage, Count Morzin was compelled to dismiss his band and its director; but Haydn was not long unemployed. Paul Anton Esterhazy, the then reigning prince, who had heard his symphonies when visiting Morzin, hastened to secure the young composer as his second Kapellmeister, under Werner, who was growing old. He was appointed May 1, 1761, and immediately set out for Eisenstadt, the country seat of the new master in whose service he was destined to remain to the end of his life. The Esterhazy family had been musical amateurs and performers since the days of Paul, first prince of the name (1635–1713), who established a private chapel, small at first but gradually increasing. The orchestra, chorus and solo singers took part both in the church service and in concerts, and in time even performed operas. When Haydn entered upon his duties there were only sixteen members in all, but the excellence of their playing acted as a powerful stimulus to his invention. His arrival gave a great impulse to the concerts, WERNER (q.v.), a first-rate master of counterpoint, having concentrated all his energies on the church service. To a man with Werner's notions of music Haydn must have been a constant vexation, and he always spoke of him as 'a mere fop' and a 'scribbler of songs.' Haydn, on the contrary, had a high respect for Werner, as he proved late in life by arranging six of his fugues as string quartets, and publishing them, through Artaria, 'out of sincere esteem for that celebrated master.'

Prince Paul Anton died Mar. 18, 1762, and was succeeded by his brother Nicolaus, who was passionately fond of art and science, generous, and truly kind-hearted. The love of pomp and display, of which his well-known diamond-covered uniform was an example, earned him the sobriquet of 'der Prachtige,' or the Magnificent. He loved music, and played well on the baryton, or viola di bordone, for which instrument Haydn was constantly required to furnish him with new pieces. In the hope of pleasing his master Haydn himself learned the instrument, but on making his debut was disappointed to find that the Prince did not approve of such rivalry; on which he at once relinquished it for ever. The relations between the Prince and his new Kapellmeister, who found his time fully occupied, were genial and hearty. Haydn's salary was raised from 400 florins a year to 600, and then to 782 (£78), new musicians were engaged, and rehearsals—orchestral, chamber and dramatic—took place every day. The principal members of the chapel at the time were: Luigi Tomasini (violin); Joseph Weigl (v'cello); two excellent French horn-players, Thaddäus Steinmüller and Karl Franz (the latter also playing the oaryton); Anna Maria Scheffstos (soprano), who afterwards married Weigl; and Karl Friberth (tenor). The wind music, formerly played by the band of the regiment, was now given to good players (including the two just named) regularly appointed. On Mar. 5, 1766, Werner died, and Haydn became sole Kapellmeister. His compositions were already known far outside of Austria; in Leipzig, Paris, Amsterdam and London his symphonies and cassations, trios and quartets, were to be had in print or MS. Even the official gazette, Wiener Diarium, for 1766 speaks of him as 'our national favourite' ('der Liebbling unsrer Nation'), and draws a parallel between him and the poet Gellert, at that time the highest possible compliment.

His works composed up to this time at Eisenstadt comprise about thirty symphonies¹ and cassations; a few divertimenti in five parts; six string trios; a piece for four violins and two v'celli, called 'Echo'; a concerto for the French horn (1762); twelve minuets for orchestra; concertos, trios, sonatas and variations for clavier. In vocal music—a Salve Regina for soprano and alto, two violins and organ; a Te Deum (1764); four Italian operettas (1762); a pastoral, 'Acide o Galatea' (the action identical with that of Handel's cantata), performed Jan. 11, 1763, on the marriage of Count Anton, eldest son of Prince Nicolaus; and a grand cantata, in honour of the Prince's return from the coronation of the Archduke Joseph as King of the Romans (1764).

In 1765 he wrote the charming little string quartet in D minor, afterwards published as op. 42, and between this year and 1776 increased the number of his symphonies to about fifty, and added to his quartets those which are printed in the Paris and London editions as op. 9, op. 17 and op. 20.

THE NEW ESTABLISHMENT AT ESTERHÁZ.—Soon after Werner's death an event took place which greatly affected the music, viz. the establishment of a new palace near Süttör, at the southern end of the Neusiedler See, where the Prince rebuilt an old hunting-place, turned it into a splendid summer residence, and gave it the name of Esterházy. Here the chapel (except a small portion left to carry on the church service at Eisenstadt) were located for the greater part of the year, during which they were expected to redouble their exertions.

Esterházy—described by a French traveller as 'having no place but Versailles to compare to it for magnificence'—stands in the middle of an unhealthy marsh, quite out of the world. The erection of such a building in such a neighbourhood, at a cost amounting, it is said, to 11,000,000 gulden, was one of the caprices of Prince Nicolaus. The canals and dykes he constructed were, however, substantial improvements to the neighbourhood. The dense wood behind the castle was turned into a delightful grove, containing a deer park, flower gardens and hot-houses, elaborately furnished summer-houses, grottos, hermitages and temples. Near the castle stood an elegant theatre, for operas, dramas and comedies; also a second theatre, brilliantly ornamented, and furnished with large artistic marionettes, excellent scenery and appliances. The orchestra of the opera was formed of members of the chapel, under Haydn's direction; the singers were Italian for the most part, engaged for one, two or more years, and the books of the words were printed. Numerous strolling companies were engaged for shorter terms; travelling virtuosi often played with the members of the band; special days and hours were fixed for chamber music and for orchestral works; and in the intervals the singers, musicians and actors met at the café, and formed, so to speak, one family. The castle itself was fitted up in exquisite taste, and stored with numerous and costly collections of works of art. Royal and noble personages, home and foreign, formed a constant stream of guests, at whose disposal the Prince placed his beautiful carriages, and to whom he proved the most attentive and charming of hosts. He became so much attached to this place of his own creation as often to stay there till quite the end of autumn, and return with the first days of spring. Eisenstadt he visited very rarely, and Vienna he disliked more and more, often cutting short his visits in the most abrupt manner. Hence his singers and musicians were increasingly tied to this one spot—a fate all the harder, since very few were allowed to bring their wives and families. Here Haydn composed nearly all his operas, most of his arias and songs, the music for the marionette theatre—of which he was particularly fond—and the greater part of his orchestral and chamber works. He was satisfied with his position, and though he sometimes complained of the disadvantages of such a seclusion, and often expressed his wish to visit Italy, he also acknowledged its compensating advantages. In his own words:

'My Prince was always satisfied with my works; I not only had the encouragement of constant approval, but as conductor of an orchestra I could make experiments, observe what produced an effect and what weakened it, and was thus in a position to improve, alter, make additions or omissions, and be as bold as I pleased; I was cut off from the world, there was no one to confuse or torment me, and I was forced to become original.'

With the band and singers Haydn was on the best of terms. They vied with each other in carrying out his intentions, simply to show their gratitude and affection for him. He was constantly endeavouring to improve their lot, was invariably a warm advocate with the Prince on their behalf, and they all loved him like a father. The Prince gave unusually high salaries, and several of the musicians played two instruments—generally the violin and a wind instrument. A good many of them afterwards entered the Imperial Chapel.

The principal and best-paid members of the chapel during the period spoken of (1767–90) were: female singers—Weigl, Cellini, Jermoli, Rippamonti,¹ Valdesturla, Tavecchia, Maria and Matilda Bologna, Raimondi, Nencini, Benvenuti; male singers—Fribberth, Bianchi, Gherardi, Jermoli, Moratti, Morelli, Totti (2), Peschi; violins—Tomasini, Rosetti, Rippamonti, Mestrino, Mraw; violoncellists—Weigl, Küffel, Marteau, Kraft; flute—Hirsch; clarinets—Griesbacher (2); oboes—Columbazzo (2), Poschwa, Czerwenka; bassoons—Schiringer, Peczival; horns—Steinmüller, Karl Franz (also played the baryton), Stamitz, Oliva, Pauer, Lendway. Besides Franz there was another performer on the Prince's own instrument, the baryton—Andreas Lidl (1769–74), who played in London soon after leaving the band. J. B. Krumpholtz, the harpist, was engaged from 1773–76.

In Mar. 1769 the whole musical establishment visited Vienna for the first time, and under Haydn's direction, gave a performance of his opera 'Lo speziale' (comp. 1768) at the house of Freiherr von Sommerau, and a repetition in the form of a concert. On their second visit, in the summer of 1777, they performed at Schönbrunn an opera and a marionette opera of Haydn's, and also played during the Empress's dinner. The Prince would often take them to Pressburg during the sitting of the Hungarian diet, or for the festival of Count Grassalcovich, and in 1772 Haydn conducted the Count's own orchestra even at a ball.

CHURCH MUSIC AND OPERA.—In 1771 Haydn composed a Stabat Mater and a Salve Regina. In 1775 followed his first oratorio, 'Il ritorno di Tobia,' which was performed in Vienna by the Tonkünstler Societät, with solo singers from Esterház, and repeated in 1784 with two additional choruses.² To this period belong four masses (two small ones of an early date have been lost)—in G (1772); in C, 'Cäcilienmesse'; in E \flat , with organ obligato; and in B \flat , with organ solo (Nos. 7, 5, 12 and 8 in Novello's edition). The last is a small but particularly charming work, and, like the first, is still often heard; but that in E \flat is old-fashioned. The 'Cäcilienmesse' has many fugues, and is seldom performed on account of its length. (Novello's edition is taken from Breitkopf's curtailed score.)

In 1773 the Empress Maria Theresa visited Esterház from Sept. 1–3, and was entertained with performances of a new symphony of Haydn's—now known by her name (list,

² 'Tobia' was rearranged by Neukomm in 1808 and performed at the Tonkünstler Societät concerts.

No. 48)—his opera 'L' infedeltà delusa,' and 'Philemon und Baucis,' a marionette piece (see MARIONETTE). One song and the overture—or 'symphony'—in two movements have survived. Similar festivities took place on various occasions—a visit from one of the imperial family or an event in the Prince's own circle. Even Eisenstadt gave a glimpse of its old splendour when the Prince de Rohan, French Ambassador, stayed there in 1772.

In 1776 Haydn composed 'La vera costanza' for the court theatre of Vienna. The intrigues against it were, however, too strong, and eventually Anfossi's opera of the same name was preferred. Haydn withdrew his score, and produced it at Esterházy. It was revived in 1790 at the theatre then in the Landstrasse suburb of Vienna, and Artaria engraved six of the airs and a duet. In 1778 the Tonkünstler Societät offered Haydn a strange affront. He wished to join the Society, and had already paid his deposit, when he was asked to sign an agreement binding him to furnish compositions of importance whenever so required. He naturally declined, and withdrew his money. No reparation was made for this indignity till after his return from London in 1797, when he was introduced at a special meeting by Counts Kufstein and Johann Esterházy, and, amid general acclamation, appointed 'Assessor senior' for life. This compliment he acknowledged by presenting the Society with the 'Creation' and the 'Seasons,' to which gifts its prosperity is mainly owing. 'L' isola disabitata,' one of his best operas, composed in 1779 to a libretto by Metastasio, procured Haydn's nomination as a member of the Accademia Filarmonica at Modena. He sent the score to the King of Spain, and received in return a gold snuff-box set in brilliants. The opera was performed at the court theatre in Vienna, at a concert given by Willmann the violoncellist, in 1785.

On Nov. 18, 1779, the theatre at Esterházy was burnt down, and during the rebuilding the Prince went to Paris. This interval will enable us to mention the origin of the famous 'Farewell Symphony.' It has been often asserted that Haydn intended it as an appeal to the Prince against the dismissal of the chapel, but this is incorrect; the real object was to persuade him to shorten his stay at Esterházy, and so enable the musicians to rejoin their wives and families. As one after another stopped playing and left the orchestra, until only two violins were left (Tomasini, the Prince's favourite, being one), the hint was unmistakable. 'If all go,' said the Prince, 'we may as well go too'; and Haydn knew that his object was attained.¹

This seems also the place to speak of a subject closely affecting Haydn's private life. In 1779 a couple named Polzelli were admitted into the chapel—the husband, Anton, being an indifferent violinist, and the wife, Luigia, by birth a Roman of the name of Moreschi, a second-rate singer. For the latter Haydn conceived a violent affection, which she returned by shamefully abusing his kindness and continually importuning him for money, and even extracting from him a written promise that if his wife died he would marry no one but her. This paper he afterwards repudiated, but he left her a small annuity in his will. Before his death she had been married a second time, to an Italian singer, and died at Kaschau in 1832.² Mme. Polzelli had two sons, of whom the elder died in 1796, while the younger entered the chapel and eventually became its music-director. He was a pupil of Haydn and was popularly supposed to be his son, but the fact is doubtful. Haydn was certainly very fond of him; but he left him only a small sum in his first will, and revoked it in the second.

On Oct. 15, 1780, the beautiful new theatre at Esterházy was opened with 'La fedeltà premiata.' This opera was twice re-presented in Vienna in 1784, once in the presence of the Emperor Joseph, Haydn himself conducting.

PUBLICATIONS AND FRIENDSHIPS. — From 1780 dates his acquaintance with Artaria—the beginning of a business connexion of many years' duration. The first works which Artaria published for him were six clavier sonatas (op. 30), his first twelve Lieder, six quartets ('die Russischen'), six Divertissements in eight parts (op. 31), and six symphonies (opp. 51 and 52).

In 1781–82 the Emperor Joseph received two visits from the Grand Duke Paul and his wife. Great entertainments were given in their honour, consisting chiefly of musical performances, for which the Grand Duchess had a great taste.³ Gluck's operas were given at the theatre, and some of Haydn's quartets played at her own house, so much to her satisfaction that she gave him a diamond snuff-box, and took lessons from him. Haydn seems to have retained a pleasant recollection of her, for twenty years later—in 1802, when she was Dowager-Empress—he sent her his fine part-songs for three and four voices. He also dedicated the six 'Russian' quartets just mentioned to the Grand Duke. The Duke and Duchess had intended accompanying the Emperor to Eisenstadt, and Haydn was hastily composing an opera, but their departure was hurried, and the visit did not take place.

About this time Haydn entered into correspondence with William Forster, the well-known violin-maker in London, to whom he sold the English copyright of a series of compositions. From first to last (the first receipt is dated Aug. 22, 1781) Forster & Son published 129 of his works, including eighty-two symphonies. Almost simultaneously he received a letter from Le Gros, conductor of the Concert Spirituel, saying that his Stabat Mater had been performed four times with the greatest success, and, in the name of the members, asking permission to print it. They also invited him to come to Paris, and proposed to have all his future compositions engraved there for his own benefit. Cherubini's veneration for Haydn is said to have dated from his hearing one of the six symphonies (opp. 51 and 52) which he composed for the Concerts de la Loge Olympique. Besides the publishers already named, he had satisfactory dealings with Nadermann, Willmann, Imbault, Le Duc and especially with Sieber.

The opera which he composed for the expected visit of the Grand Duke and Duchess was 'Orlando Paladino' (given at Esterházy in the autumn of 1782), which in its German form as 'Ritter Roland' has been more frequently performed than any of his other operas. It was followed by 'Armida' (composed in 1783, performed in 1784, and again in 1797 at Schickaneder's theatre in Vienna), the autograph score of which he sent to London¹ in compensation for the non-completion of 'Orfeo.' In judging of his operas we may be guided by an expression of his own when refusing an invitation to produce one in Prague: 'My operas are calculated exclusively for our own company, and would not produce their effect elsewhere.' The overtures to six of them were published by Artaria as 'symphonies,' though under protest from Haydn. To 1782 also belongs the well-known 'Mariazeller-Messe' (in C, Novello, No. 15), so called from the place of that name in Styria. It was bespoken by a certain Herr Liebe de Kreutzner, and Haydn is said to have taken particular pleasure in its composition, not impossibly because it reminded him of a visit to Mariazell when a young man without experience, friends or means of any kind. This was his eighth Mass, and he wrote no more till 1796, between which year and 1802 his best and most important works of the kind were composed.

Between 1780 and 1790 he met a number of artists in Vienna whom he was destined to meet again in London, such as Mara, Banti, Storace and her brother Stephen, Attwood, Janiewicz and Jarnowick. In 1784 he met Paisiello, Sarti and Signora Strinasacchi, the violinist, at Michael Kelly's lodgings; the latter paid him a visit at Esterházy with Brida, an enthusiastic amateur.²

But by far the most important of his Viennese friendships was with Mozart, whom he probably met for the first time in winter of 1781-1782, on the occasion of the court festivities given in honour of the Grand Duke Paul.³ There was no close tie of comradeship between the two men; Mozart seems never to have visited Eisenstadt, Haydn only came to Vienna for a brief annual visit; but they maintained, unbroken, the highest respect and affection for one another, and it is more than a coincidence that the finest works of both were written after the beginning of their acquaintance. Each contributed something to the alliance; Haydn was the more audacious in musical structure, Mozart richer in tone and far more masterly in orchestration; for the next ten years they interacted on one another, and after Mozart's death in 1791, his influence is still abundantly apparent in Haydn's Salomon symphonies, in his later quartets, and in the scoring of the 'Creation' and the 'Seasons.'

The chief event of 1785 was the composition of the 'Seven Words of our Saviour on the Cross' for the cathedral of Cadiz, in compliance with a request from the chapter for appropriate instrumental music for Good Friday. The work was published simultaneously by Artaria and Forster, and in this form Haydn produced it as 'Passione instrumentale' in London.⁴ He afterwards added choruses and solos,⁵ and divided it into two parts by the introduction of a Largo for wind instruments. In this new form it was produced for the first time at Eisenstadt in Oct. 1797, and published by Breitkopf & Härtel (1801), with a preface by the composer. It may seem surprising that the chapter of Cadiz should have applied to Haydn; but in fact he was well known in Spain to others besides the King, who had been in communication with him long before, as we have seen. Thus Boccherini wrote to him from Madrid expressing the pleasure he received from his works, and Yriarte celebrated him with enthusiasm in his poem of 'La musica' (Madrid, 1779). In Jan. 1785 Haydn acquired two interesting pupils—Fritz and Edmund von Weber. They were brought to him by their father Franz Anton, who had just remarried in Vienna. His desire to see one of his children develop into a great musician, afterwards so gloriously fulfilled in the composer of the

Freischütz,' was, to a certain extent, granted in Edmund. In the same year Mozart dedicated the well-known six quartets to Haydn, in terms of almost filial affection. It was after listening to a performance of one of these that Haydn said to Mozart's father, in his open-hearted way,

'I declare to you on my honour that I consider you son the greatest composer I have ever heard; he has taste, and possesses the most consummate knowledge of the art of composition.'

He spoke of him still more warmly in a letter to Prague (1787).

In 1787 Haydn received a pressing invitation to London from W. Cramer, the violinist, who wrote offering to engage him at any cost for the Professional Concerts. Gallini also wrote asking his terms for an opera. Nothing came of either at the time, but Salomon determined to try what personal influence would do, and despatched Bland, the music publisher, to Vienna, where he arrived in November, and finding Haydn still at Esterházy, followed him there. He did not attain his main object, but Haydn gave him the copyright of several of his compositions, among others 'Ariadne,' a cantata for a single voice (composed in 1782). An anecdote of Bland's visit is often told. When he was admitted, Haydn was in the act of shaving, and grumbling over the bluntness of his razor. Bland caught the exclamation, 'I would give my best quartet for a good razor,' and, rushing off to his lodging, fetched his own pair, which he presented to Haydn, and received in exchange his newest quartet, which is often called the 'Rasirmesser' (razor) quartet (Trautwein, No. 2). C. F. P.

Meantime he was making further advance in symphonic and chamber music. The 'Russian' quartets (op. 33) were followed in 1787 by the six dedicated to the King of Prussia (op. 50), and in 1789-90 he added the collections known as op. 54, op. 55 and op. 64. During these same years he wrote (evidently under the influence of Mozart) fifteen clavier trios, the most important of his clavier concertos, and the twelve symphonies commissioned for the Concert Spirituel at Paris. One of the second set of them was the so-called 'Oxford' symphony, performed in the Sheldonian Theatre when, in 1791, the degree of Mus.D. was conferred upon him by the University. (See list, No. 92.)

On Sept. 28, 1790, Prince Nicolaus died—a great loss for Haydn, who really loved him. He left his Kapellmeister, on condition of his retaining the title, an annual pension of 1000 florins, as a mark of esteem and affection. To this sum his successor, Prince Anton, added another 400 florins, but deprived Haydn of his occupation by dismissing the whole chapel, except the few members necessary to keep up the services in church. Haydn now fixed his abode in Vienna, but had hardly done so before Salomon appeared on the scene. He had heard of the Prince's death at Cologne, on his way to England, and immediately returned, hoping, now that Haydn was free, to persuade him to visit London. Haydn could no longer plead the old excuse of unwillingness to leave his master, so he gave way, and began to make preparations for the journey. While thus occupied he was informed that Ferdinand IV., King of Naples, then in Vienna for the marriage of his two daughters, wished to see him. Haydn had thought of visiting Naples in 1787, and the King was well acquainted with his music. He had even commissioned him to compose several concerted pieces for his favourite instrument, the lyre. Nevertheless the audience was put off several times, and when it did take place, and Haydn presented his compositions, the King said: 'The day after to-morrow we will try them.' Haydn replied that he was to start for England on that day. 'What!' exclaimed the King, 'and you promised to come to Naples!' He then indignantly left the room, but returned in an hour, and, having recovered his temper, made Haydn promise to visit Naples on his return from London, gave him a letter of recommendation to his ambassador, Prince Castelcicala, and sent after him a valuable snuff-box. And thus Haydn got over a period which was a great turning-point in his life. Among those of whom he took leave was his old and dear friend Madame Genzinger. (See KARAJAN.) His last hours in Vienna were enlivened by the company of Mozart, who had come to see him off. He too had been invited to London in 1786, and had only declined in deference to his father's wishes. His father was now dead, and Salomon promised him a speedy opportunity of making up for lost time. Too late again—in less than a year Mozart's eyes were closed in death.

FIRST VISIT TO LONDON.—Leaving Vienna on Wednesday, Dec. 15, 1790, Haydn and Salomon travelled by Munich, Bonn and Brussels to Calais, crossed the Channel in nine hours on New Year's Day, 1791, and from Dover proceeded straight to London. Haydn first put up at the house of Bland, the music-seller, 45 Holborn, but soon removed¹ to rooms prepared for him at Salomon's, 18 Great Pulteney Street.² Here he found himself the object of every species of attention; ambassadors and noblemen called on him, invitations poured in from all quarters, and he was surrounded by a circle of the most distinguished artists, conspicuous among whom were his young countryman Gyrowetz; and Dr. Burney, who had been for some time in correspondence with him, and now welcomed him with a poetical effusion.¹ The Anacreontic Society, the Ladies' Concerts, the New Musical Fund, the Professional Concerts, and all the other musical societies eagerly desired his presence at their meetings. His quartets and symphonies were performed, Pacchierotti sang his cantata 'Ariadne a Naxos,' and he was enthusiastically noticed in all the newspapers. Before leaving Vienna Salomon had announced his subscription concerts in the Morning Chronicle, for which Haydn was engaged to compose six symphonies and conduct them at the pianoforte. The first of the series took place on Mar. 11, 1791, in the Hanover Square Rooms. The orchestra, led by Salomon, consisted of thirty-five or forty performers, and was placed at the end opposite to that which it occupied latterly. The symphony (Salomon, No. 2; see list, No. 93) was the first piece in the second part, the position stipulated for by Haydn, and the Adagio was encored—'a very rare occurrence.' The Morning Chronicle gives an animated description of the concert, the success of which was most brilliant, and ensured that of the whole series. Haydn's benefit was on May 16; £200 was guaranteed, but the receipts amounted to £350. Meantime Gallini, manager of the King's Theatre, was trying in vain to obtain a licence for the performance of operas. Two parties were at issue on the question. The Prince of Wales espoused the cause of the King's Theatre, while the King publicly declared his adhesion to the Pantheon, and pronounced two Italian opera-houses undesirable. At length Gallini was clever enough to obtain a licence for 'Entertainments of Music and Dancing,' with which he opened the theatre on Mar. 26, with David as tenor, Vestris as ballet-master, Haydn as composer, Federici as composer and conductor, and Salomon as leader—and with these he performed various works of Haydn's, including symphonies and quartets, his chorus 'The Storm' (the words by Peter Pindar, 'Hark the wild uproar of the waves'), an Italian catch for seven voices, and a cantata composed for David. His opera 'Orfeo ed Euridice,' though paid for and nearly completed, was not performed, owing to the failure of the undertaking. During the time he was composing it, Haydn lived in Lisson Grove²—then absolutely in the country—where one of his most frequent visitors was J. B. Cramer, then 20 years old. His second benefit was on May 30, at the request of some amateurs of high position. Haydn gave a concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, where he conducted two of his symphonies, and, for the first time, the 'Seven Words' ('La Passione instrumentale'), afterwards repeated at the concert of Clement, the boy violinist, and elsewhere. About this time he was invited to the annual dinner of the Royal Society of Musicians, and composed for the occasion a march for orchestra, the autograph of which is still preserved by the Society. He also attended the Handel Commemoration in Westminster Abbey. He had a good place near the King's box, and never having heard any performance on so grand a scale, was immensely impressed. When the Hallelujah Chorus rang through the nave, and the whole audience rose to their feet, he wept like a child, exclaiming, 'He is the master of us all.'

In the first week of July he went to the Oxford Commemoration, for the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, conferred at Dr. Burney's suggestion. Three grand concerts formed an important feature of the entertainments; at the second of these the 'Oxford' symphony³ was performed, Haydn giving the tempi at the organ; and at the third he appeared in his Doctor's gown, amid enthusiastic applause. The 'Catalogue of all Graduates' contains the entry,

'Haydn, Joseph, Composer to His Serene Highness the Prince of Esterhazy, cr. Doctor of Music, July 8, 1791.'

He sent the University as his 'exercise' the following composition—afterwards used for the first of the 'Ten Commandments,' the whole of which he set to canons during his stay in London.⁴

Canon cancrizans, a tre.

On his return he made several excursions in the neighbourhood of London, and stayed five weeks with Mr. Brassey (of 71 Lombard Street)⁵ at his country house 12 miles from town, where he gave lessons to Miss Brassey, and enjoyed the repose of country life in the midst of a family circle all cordially attached to him. Meantime a new contract was entered into with Salomon, which prevented his obeying a pressing summons from Prince Esterhazy to a great fête for the Emperor. In November he was a guest at two Guildhall banquets—that of the outgoing Lord Mayor (Sir John Boydell) on the 5th, and that of the new one (John Hopkins) on the 9th. Of these entertainments he left a curious account in his diary.⁶ In the same month he visited the marionettes at the Fancocchini Theatre in Savile Row, in which he took a great interest from old associations with Esterházy. On the 25th, on an invitation from the Prince of Wales, he went to Oatlands to visit the Duke of York, who had married the Princess of Prussia two days before. 'Die liebe kleine'—she was but 17—quite won Haydn's heart; she sang, played the piano, sat by his side during his symphony (one she had often heard at home), and hummed all the airs as it went on. The Prince of Wales played the violoncello, and all the music was of Haydn's composition. They even made him sing his own songs.

During the visit, which lasted three days, Hoppner painted his portrait, by the Prince's command; it was engraved in 1807 by Facius, and is now at Buckingham Palace. Engravings were also published in London by Schiavonetti and Bartolozzi from portraits by Guttenbrunn and Ott, and by Hardy from his own oil painting. Haydn next went to Cambridge to see the University, thence to Sir Patrick Blake's at Langham, and afterwards to the house of a Mr. Shaw, where he was received with every possible mark of respect and attention. He says in his diary, 'Mrs. Shaw is the most beautiful woman I ever saw'; and when quite an old man still preserved a ribbon which she had worn during his visit, and on which his name was embroidered in gold.

The directors of the Professional Concerts had been for some time endeavouring to make Haydn break his engagements with Salomon and Gallini. Not succeeding, they invited his pupil Ignâz Pleyel, from Strassburg, to conduct their concerts; but far from showing any symptoms of rivalry or hostility, master and pupil continued the best of friends, and took every opportunity of displaying their attachment. The Professionals were first in the field, as their opening concert took place on Feb. 15, 1792, while Salomon's series did not begin till the 17th. Gyrowetz was associated with Haydn as composer for the year, and his works were as much appreciated here as in Paris. At these concerts Haydn produced symphonies, divertimenti for concerted instruments, a notturno for the same, string quartets, a clavier trio, airs, a cantata and the 'Storm' chorus already mentioned. He was also in great request at concerts, and conducted those of Barthélemon (with whom he formed a close friendship). Haesler the pianist, Mme. Mara (who sang at his benefit) and many others. Besides his own annual benefit Salomon gave 'by desire' an extra concert on June 6, when he played several violin solos, and when Haydn's favourite compositions were 'received with an ecstasy of admiration.' 'Thus,' to quote the Morning Chronicle, 'Salomon finished his season on Wednesday night with the greatest éclat.' The concerts over, he made excursions to Windsor Castle, Ascot Races and Slough, where he stayed with Herschel, of whose domestic life he gives a particular description in his diary. The only son, afterwards Sir John Herschel, was then a few months old. He went also to the meeting of the Charity Children in St. Paul's Cathedral, and was deeply moved by the singing. 'I was more touched,' says he in his diary, 'by this innocent and reverent music than by any I ever heard in my life.' The somewhat commonplace double chant by Jones the organist is quoted in his diary. (See JONES, John.)

Amongst Haydn's intimate associates in this year were Bartolozzi the engraver, to whose wife he dedicated three clavier trios and a sonata¹ in C, and John Hunter the surgeon (who begged in vain to be allowed to remove a polypus in his nose which he had inherited from his mother), whose wife wrote the words for most of his twelve English canzonets—the first set dedicated to her; the second to Lady Charlotte Bertie. But the dearest of all his friends was Mrs. Schroeter, a lady of good birth, and widow of the Queen's music-master, John Samuel Schroeter, who died Nov. 1, 1788. She took lessons from him on the pianoforte, and a warm feeling of esteem and respect sprang up between them, which on her side ripened into a passionate attachment. Haydn's affections must also have been involved, for in his old age he said once, pointing to a packet of her letters,

'Those are from an English widow who fell in love with me. She was a very attractive woman and still handsome, though over sixty; and had I been free I should certainly have married her.'

Haydn dedicated to Mrs. Schroeter three clavier trios (Breitkopf & Härtel, Nos. 1, 2, 6). In the second (F[♯] minor) he adapted the Adagio from the Salomon symphony, No. 9 (B[♭]) (see list, No. 102), probably a favourite of the lady's. A second of his London admirers deserves mention. Among his papers is a short piece with a note saying that it was 'by Mrs. Hodges, the loveliest woman I ever saw, and a great pianoforte-player. Both words and music are hers,' and then follows a P.S. in the trembling hand of his latest life, 'Requiescat in pace: J. Haydn.'²

During his absence his wife had had the offer of a small house and garden in the suburbs of Vienna (Windmühle, 73 kleine Steingasse, now 19 Haydngasse, then a retired spot in the 4th district of the Mariahilf suburb), and she wrote asking him to send her the money for it, as it would be just the house for her when she became a widow. He did not send the money, but on his return to Vienna bought it, added a story, and lived there from Jan. 1797 till his death.

Haydn left London towards the end of June 1792, and travelling by way of Bonn—where Beethoven asked his opinion of a cantata—and Frankfort, where he met Prince Anton at the coronation of the Emperor Francis II., reached Vienna at the end of July. His reception was enthusiastic, and all were eager to hear his London symphonies. In Dec. 1792 Beethoven came to him for instruction, and continued to take lessons until Haydn's second journey to England. The relations of these two great men have been much misrepresented. That Haydn had not in any way forfeited Beethoven's respect is evident, as he spoke highly of him whenever opportunity offered, usually chose one of Haydn's themes when improvising in public, scored one of his quartets¹ for his own use, and carefully preserved the autograph of one of the English symphonies.² But whatever Beethoven's early feeling may have been, all doubts as to his latest sentiments are set at rest by his exclamation on his death-bed on seeing a view of Haydn's birthplace, sent to him by Diabelli:—'To think that so great a man should have been born in a common peasant's cottage!' (See BEETHOVEN, Vol. I. p. 301.)

SECOND VISIT TO LONDON.—Again invited by Salomon, under special stipulation, to compose six new symphonies, Haydn started on his second journey on Jan. 19, 1794. Prince Anton took a reluctant leave of him, and died three days after he left. This time Haydn went down the Rhine, accompanied by his faithful copyist and servant, Johann Elssler,³ and arrived in London on Feb. 4. He again took lodgings at No. 1 Bury Street, St. James's,⁴ probably to be near Mrs. Schroeter, who lived in James Street, Buckingham Gate. Nothing is known of their relations at this time; Elssler could have given information on this and many other points, but, unlike Handel's Smith, he was a mere copyist, and none of Haydn's biographers seem to have thought of applying to him for particulars about his master, though he lived till 1843. Haydn's engagement with Salomon bound him to compose and conduct six fresh symphonies; and besides these, the former set, including the 'Surprise,' was repeated. Some new quartets are also mentioned, and a quintet in C (known as op. 88), which, however, was his brother Michael's. The first concert was on Feb. 10, and the last on May 12. At one of the rehearsals Haydn surprised the orchestra by showing young Smart (afterwards Sir George) the proper way to play the drums. At Haydn's benefit (May 2) the 'Military' symphony (list, No. 100) was produced for the first time, and Dussek and Viotti played concertos. The latter was also leader at Salomon's benefit—a proof of the good understanding between the two violinists.

During his second visit Haydn had ample opportunities of becoming acquainted with Handel's music. Regular performances of his oratorios took place in Lent both at Covent Garden and Drury Lane; and in 1795 concerts of sacred music, interspersed with some of Haydn's symphonies, were given at the King's Theatre. Haydn also conducted performances of his symphonies at the New Musical Fund concerts. Among his new acquaintances we find Dragonetti, who had accompanied Banti to London in 1794, and a lasting friendship sprang up between Haydn and that good-natured artist. For Banti Haydn composed an air, 'Non partir,' in E (the recitative begins, 'Berenice'), which she sang at his benefit.

Among the numerous violinists then in London—Jarnowick, Janiewicz, Cramer, Viotti, Clement, Bridgetower, etc.—we must not omit Giardini. Though nearly 80 years of age he produced an oratorio, 'Ruth,' at Ranelagh, and even played a concerto. His temper was frightful, and he showed a particular spite against Haydn, even remarking within his hearing, when urged to call upon him, 'I don't want to see the German dog.' Haydn retorted by writing in his diary, after hearing him play, 'Giardini played like a pig.' After the exertions of the season Haydn sought refreshment in the country, first staying at Sir Charles Rich's house near Waverley Abbey in Surrey. In September he went with Dr. Burney to see Rauzzini at Bath,⁵ where he passed three pleasant days, and wrote a canon to the inscription which Rauzzini had put in his garden to 'his best friend'—'Turk was a faithful dog, and not a man.'⁶ He also went to Taplow with Shield, and with Lord Abingdon visited Lord Aston at Preston. An anecdote of this

Elssler copied a large amount of Haydn's music, partly in score, partly in separate parts, much of which is now treasured as the autograph of Haydn, though the handwriting of the two are essentially different. He survived his master thirty-four years and died at Vienna, June 12, 1849, in the enjoyment of 6000 florins which Haydn bequeathed to him as a 'true and honest servant.' His elder brother Joseph, who at Eisenstadt, died at Vienna, also in 1843. Johann married Therese Prister, whose brothers Anton and Michael were horn-players, and the pride of the Esterházy orchestra. From this union came (1) JOHANN (b. 1802; d. as chorus-master at the Berlin Theatre Royal) 1872; (2) THERESA (b. Apr. 5, 1808) and (3) FRANKLIN (b. June 22, 1810)—all natives of Vienna. Both daughters were concertists. (See Vol. II. p. 159.)

⁶ The canon was printed in earlier editions of this Dictionary under the heading TURK.

time shows the humour which was so native to Haydn, and so often pervades his compositions. He composed an apparently easy sonata for pianoforte and violin, called it 'Jacob's Dream,' and sent it anonymously to an amateur who professed himself addicted to the extreme upper notes of the violin. The unfortunate performer was delighted with the opening; here was a composer who thoroughly understood the instrument! but as he found himself compelled to mount the ladder higher and higher without any chance of coming down again, the perspiration burst out upon his forehead, and he exclaimed, 'What sort of composition do you call this? the man knows nothing whatever of the violin.'

In 1795 Salomon announced his concerts under a new name and place, the 'National School of Music,' in the King's concert-room, recently added to the King's Theatre. Haydn was again engaged as composer and conductor of his own symphonies, and Salomon had collected an unprecedented assemblage of talent. The music was chiefly operatic, but one or even two of Haydn's symphonies were given regularly, the 'Surprise' being a special favourite. With regard to this symphony Haydn confessed to Gyrowetz, who happened to call when he was composing the Andante, that he intended to startle the audience. 'There all the women will scream,' he said with a laugh, pointing to the well-known explosion of the drums. The first concert was on Feb. 2, and two extra ones were given on May 21 and June 1, the latter being Haydn's last appearance before an English audience.¹ His last benefit was on May 4, when the programme consisted entirely of his works, except the concertos of Viotti and of Ferlendis the oboist. Banti sang his aria for the first time, but according to his diary 'she sang very scanty.' He was greatly pleased with the success of this concert; the audience was a distinguished one, and the net receipts amounted to £400. 'It is only in England that one can make such sums,' he remarked. J. B. Cramer and Mme. Dussek gave concerts soon after, at which Haydn conducted his own symphonies.

During the latter months of his stay in London Haydn was much distinguished by the court. At a concert at York House the programme consisted entirely of his compositions; he presided at the pianoforte, and Salomon was leader. The King and Queen, the Princesses, the Prince of Wales, and the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester were present, and the Prince of Wales presented Haydn to the King, who, in spite of his almost exclusive preference for Handel, expressed great interest in the music, and presented the composer to the Queen, who begged him to sing some of his own songs. He was also repeatedly invited to the Queen's concerts at Buckingham House; and both King and Queen expressed a wish that he should remain in England, and spend the summer at Windsor. Haydn replied that he felt bound not to desert Prince Esterhazy, and was not inclined entirely to forsake his own country. As a particular mark of esteem the Queen presented him with a copy of the score of Handel's Passion music to Brockes's words. He was frequently at Carlton House, where the Prince of Wales (a pupil of Crosdill's on the violoncello, and fond of taking the bass in catches and glees) had a regular concert-room, and often played his part in the orchestra with the Dukes of Cumberland (viola) and Gloucester (violin). In 1795 he gave many musical parties, and at one which took place soon after his marriage (Apr. 8) the Princess of Wales played the pianoforte and sang with Haydn, who not only conducted but sang some of his own songs. He attended at Carlton House twenty-six times in all, but like other musicians found much difficulty in getting paid. After waiting long in vain he sent in a bill for 100 guineas from Vienna, which was immediately discharged by Parliament. It must be admitted that the demand was moderate.

Encouraged by the success of the 'Storm,' Haydn undertook to compose a larger work to English words. Lord Abingdon suggested Needham's 'Invocation of Neptune,' an adaptation of some poor verses prefixed to Selden's 'Mare Clausum,' but he made little progress, probably finding his acquaintance with English too limited. The only finished numbers are a bass solo, 'Nor can I think my suit is vain,' and a chorus, 'Thy great endeavours to increase.' The autograph is in the British Museum. Haydn received parting gifts from Clementi, Tattersall and many others, one being a talking parrot which realised 1400 florins after his death. In 1804 he received from Gardiner of Leicester six pairs of cotton stockings, into which were worked favourite themes from his music. His return was now inevitable, as Prince Esterhazy had written some time before that he wished his chapel reconstituted, with Haydn again as its conductor.

The second visit to London was a brilliant success. He returned from it with increased powers, unlimited fame and a competence for life. By concerts, lessons and symphonies, not counting his other compositions, he had again—as before—made £1200, enough to relieve him from all anxiety for the future. He often said afterwards that it was not till he had been in England that he became famous in Germany, by which he meant that though his reputation was high at home, the English were the first to give him public homage and liberal remuneration. His diary contains a list of the works composed in London. Haydn left London Aug. 15, 1795, and travelled by way of Hamburg, Berlin and Dresden.

VARIOUS COMPOSITIONS.—Soon after his return a pleasant surprise awaited him. He was taken by Count Harrach and a genial party of noblemen and gentlemen, first to a small peninsula formed by the Leitha in a park near Rohrau, where he found a monument and bust of himself, and next to his birthplace. Overcome by his feelings, on entering the humble abode Haydn stooped down and kissed the threshold, and then, pointing to the stove, told the company that it was on that very spot that his career as a musician began. On Dec. 18 he gave a concert in the small Redoutensaal, at which three of his London symphonies were performed, and Beethoven played either his first or second piano concerto. At this time he lived in the Neumarkt (now No. 2), which he left in Jan. 1797 for his own house in the suburbs. He now only went to Eisenstadt for the summer and autumn. Down to 1802 he always had a new Mass ready for Princess Esterhazy's name-day, in September (Novello, Nos. 2, 1, 3, 16, 4, 6).¹ To these years belong several other compositions—a cantata, 'Die Erwählung eines Kapellmeisters,' composed for a club meeting regularly in the evenings at the tavern 'zum Schwanen,' in the Neumarkt²; incidental music for 'Alfred,' a tragedy adapted from the English of Cowmeadow, and performed once in 1795 at Schikaneder's Theatre in Vienna³; a fine chorus in the old Italian style, 'Non nobis Domine,'⁴ perhaps suggested by the canon (attributed to Byrd) which he heard so often in London; a grand Te Deum,⁵ composed 1800; and the 'Seven Words,' rewritten for voices, and first performed at Eisenstadt, Oct. 1797. Instrumental music—clavier trios, Breitkopf & Härtel, Nos. 18, 19, 20, dedicated to Princess Marie Esterhazy; 1, 2, 6, to Mrs. Schroeter; 3, 4, 5, to Bartolozzi; 12, 15,⁶ to Mlle. Madelaine de Kurzbeck: when requested by Prince Esterhazy in 1803 to compose a sonata for the wife of Maréchal Moreau, Haydn arranged this trio as a duet for clavier and violin; and in that form it was published years after as his 'dernière Sonate'; clavier sonata (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 1), dedicated to Mlle. Kurzbeck; six string quartets, known as op. 76, dedicated to Count Erdödy; and 2 ditto, op. 77, dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz.

During his visits Haydn had often envied the English their 'God save the King,' and the war with France having quickened his desire to provide the people with an adequate expression of their fidelity to the throne, he determined to compose a national anthem for Austria. Hence arose 'Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser,' the most popular of all his Lieder. Haydn's friend, Freiherr van Swieten, suggested the idea to the Prime Minister, Graf von Saurau, and the poet Hauschka was commissioned to write the words, which Haydn set in Jan. 1797. On the Emperor's birthday, Feb. 12, the air was sung simultaneously at the National Theatre in Vienna and at all the principal theatres in the provinces. (See EMPEROR'S HYMN.) It was his favourite work, and towards the close of his life he often consoled himself by playing it with great expression. He also introduced a set of masterly variations on it into the so-called 'Kaiserquartett' (No. 77). In 1799 Haydn edited for Breitkopf & Härtel the 12 volumes in red covers which formed for long the only collection of his works for clavier and for voice.

THE ORATORIOS.—Shortly before his departure from London Salomon offered Haydn a poem for music, which had been compiled by Liddle from Milton's 'Paradise Lost' before the death of Handel, but not used. Haydn took it to Vienna, and when Freiherr van Swieten suggested his composing an oratorio, he handed him the poem. Van Swieten translated it with considerable alterations, and a sum of 500 ducats was guaranteed by twelve of the principal nobility. Haydn set to work with the greatest ardour. 'Never was I so pious,' he says, 'as when composing the "Creation." I knelt down every day and prayed God to strengthen me for my work.' It was first given in private at the Schwarzenberg palace, on Apr. 29 and 30, 1798; and in public on Haydn's name-day, Mar. 19, 1799, at the National Theatre. The noblemen previously mentioned paid the expenses, and handed over to Haydn the entire proceeds, amounting to 4000 florins (£320). The impression it produced was extraordinary; the whole audience was deeply moved, and Haydn confessed that he could not describe his sensations. 'One moment,' he said, 'I was as cold as ice, the next I seemed on fire. More than once I was afraid I should have a stroke.' The next performance was given by the Tonkünstler Societät, Haydn conducting. Once only he conducted it outside Vienna—Mar. 9, 1800, at a grand performance in the palace at Ofen before the Archduke Palatine Joseph of Hungary. No sooner was the score engraved (1800) than the 'Creation' was performed everywhere. Choral societies were founded for the express purpose, and its popularity was for long equalled only by that of the 'Messiah.' In London Ashley and Salomon gave rival performances, the former on Mar. 28,

² Much frequented in later years by Beethoven (see his letters to Ernschall). It was the scene of the adventure with the waiter (Ries, p. 121).

³ The music was recomposed in 1796 but never used, and the 'Chor der Dämonen,' for men's voices, is the only number published (Breitkopf, 1810).

1800, at Covent Garden, the latter on Apr. 21, in the concert-room of the King's Theatre, with Mara and Dussek in the principal parts, and a concerto on the organ by Samuel Wesley. In the English provinces it was first performed by the Three Choirs—at Worcester in 1800, Hereford in 1801 and Gloucester in 1802.

As soon as the 'Creation' was finished, Van Swieten persuaded Haydn to begin another oratorio, which he had adapted from Thomson's 'Seasons.' He consented to the proposition with reluctance, on the ground that his powers were failing; but he began, and in spite of his objections to certain passages as unsuited to music (a point over which he and Van Swieten nearly quarrelled), the work as a whole interested him much, and was speedily completed. The first performances took place Apr. 24 and 27, and May 1, 1801, at the Schwarzenberg palace. On May 29 he conducted it for his own benefit in the large Redoutensaal, and in Dec. handed over the score, as he had that of the 'Creation,' to the Tonkünstler Societät, which has derived a permanent income from both works. At the time the success of the 'Seasons' fully equalled that of the 'Creation,' and even now the youthful freshness which characterises it is very striking. The strain, however, was too great; as he often said afterwards, 'The "Seasons" gave me the finishing stroke.' On Dec. 26, 1803, he conducted the 'Seven Words' for the hospital fund at the Redoutensaal, but it was his last public exertion. In the following year he was asked to conduct the 'Creation' at Eisenstadt, but declined on the score of weakness; and indeed he was failing rapidly.

OLD AGE.—His works composed after the 'Seasons' are very few, the chief being some vocal quartets, on which he set a high value. In these his devotional feeling comes out strongly in 'Herr der du mir das Leben,' 'Du bist's dem Ruhm und Ehre gebühret' and 'Der Greis'—'Hin ist alle meine Kraft.' In 1802 and 1803 he harmonised and wrote accompaniments for a number of Scottish songs, for which he received 500 florins from Whyte of Edinburgh. This pleased him so much that he is said to have expressed his pride in the work as one which would long preserve his memory in Scotland. He also arranged Welsh airs (Preston; 41 Nos. in 3 vols.) and Irish airs, but the latter he did not complete, and they were undertaken by Beethoven. One of his last string quartets (Trautwein, 83) has two movements complete, the 'Andante' and the 'Minuet'; in despair of finishing it, in 1806, he added the first few bars of 'Der Greis' as a conclusion.¹ He had these same bars printed as a card in answer to friends who inquired after him.²

Haydn's last years were passed in a continual struggle with the infirmities of age, relieved by occasional gleams of sunshine. When in a happy mood he would unlock his cabinet and exhibit to his intimate friends the souvenirs, diplomas and valuables of all kinds which it contained. This often led him to speak of the events of his life, and in this way Griesinger, Dies, Bertuch, Carpani and Neukomm became acquainted with many details. Haydn also received other visitors who cannot have failed to give him pleasure; such were Cherubini, the Abbé Vogler, the Weber family, Baillot, Mme. Bigot the pianist, Pleyel, Bieri, Gänsbacher, Hummel, Nisle, Tomaschek, Reichardt, Iffland; his faithful friends Mmes. Aurnhammer, Kurzbeck and Spielmann, the Princess Esterhazy with her son Paul—who all came to render homage to the old man. Mozart's widow did not forget her husband's best friend, and her son Wolfgang, then 14, begged his blessing at his first public concert, in the Theatre 'an der Wien,' on Apr. 8, 1805, for which he had composed a cantata in honour of Haydn's seventy-third birthday.

After a long seclusion Haydn appeared in public for the last time at a remarkable performance of the 'Creation' at the University on Mar. 27, 1808. He was carried in his armchair to a place among the first ladies of the land, and received with the warmest demonstrations of welcome. Salieri conducted. At the words 'And there was light,' Haydn was quite overcome, and pointing upwards exclaimed, 'It came from thence.' As the performance went on his agitation became extreme, and it was thought better to take him home after the first part. As he was carried out people of the highest rank thronged to take leave of him, and Beethoven fervently kissed his hand and forehead. At the door he paused, and turning round, lifted up his hands as if in the act of blessing.

In 1797 Prince Nicolaus had augmented his salary by 300 florins, and in 1806 added another 600—making his whole emolument 2300 florins (£200)—besides paying his doctor's bills. This increase in income was a great satisfaction to Haydn, as he had long earnestly desired to help his many poor relations during his life, and to leave them something after his death.

To one who loved his country so deeply it was a sore trial to see Vienna twice occupied by the enemy—in 1805 and 1809. The second time the city was bombarded, and the first shot fell not far from his residence. In his infirm condition this alarmed him greatly, but he called out to his servants, 'Children, don't be frightened; no harm can happen to you while Haydn is by.' The last visit he received on his death-bed (the city being then in the occupation of the French) was from a French officer, who sang 'In native worth' with a depth of expression doubtless inspired by the occasion. Haydn was much moved, and embraced him warmly at parting. On May 26, 1809, he called his servants round him for the last time, and having been carried to the piano, solemnly played the Emperor's Hymn three times over. Five days afterwards, at one o'clock in the morning of the 31st, he expired.

On June 15 Mozart's Requiem was performed in his honour at the Schottenkirche. Amongst the mourners were many French officers of high rank, and the guard of honour round the catafalque was composed of French soldiers and a detachment of the Bürgerwehr. He was buried in the Hundsturm churchyard, outside the lines, close to the suburb in which he lived, but his remains were exhumed by command of Prince Esterhazy, and solemnly reinterred in the upper parish church at Eisenstadt on Nov. 7, 1820. A simple stone with a Latin inscription is inserted in the wall over the vault—to inform the passer-by that a great man rests below.

It is a well-known fact that when the coffin was opened for identification before the removal, the skull was missing; it had been stolen two days after the funeral. The one which was afterwards sent to the Prince anonymously as Haydn's, was buried with the other remains; but the real one was retained, and is at present in the possession of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna. The grave at Vienna remained absolutely undistinguished for five years after Haydn's death, till 1814, when his pupil Neukomm erected a stone bearing the following inscription, which contains a five-part canon for solution.

This stone was renewed by Graf von Stockhammer in 1842. A monument to Haydn was unveiled May 31, 1887.

As soon as Haydn's death was known, funeral services were held in all the principal cities of Europe. In Paris was performed a sacred cantata for three voices¹ and orchestra (Breitkopf & Härtel) composed by Cherubini on a false report of his death in 1805. It was also given elsewhere.

During his latter years Haydn was made an honorary member of many institutions—the Academy of Arts and Sciences, Stockholm (1798); the Philharmonic Society at Laybach (1800); the Academy of Arts, Amsterdam (1801); the Institut (1802), the Conservatoire de Musique (1805) and the Société Académique des Enfants d'Apollon, of Paris (1807). He also received gold medals from the musicians who performed the 'Creation' at the Opéra in Paris, Dec. 24, 1800, and from the Institut (1802); the Zwölfache Bürgermedaille, Vienna (1803); from the professors of the Concert des Amateurs (1803), the Conservatoire (1805), the Enfants d'Apollon (1807), all of Paris; and the Philharmonic Society of St. Petersburg (1808). He was also nominated honorary citizen of Vienna (1804).

Poems without end were written in his praise; and equally numerous were the portraits, in chalk or oils, engraved, and modelled in wax. Of the many busts the best is that by his friend Grassy. The silhouette here reproduced, which appeared for the first time in the first edition of this Dictionary, hung for long at the head of Haydn's bed, and was authenticated by Elsler as strikingly like.

Thun; the Erdödy family; Ignaz Pleyel; Niemecz, a monk; Krumpholz, Ant. Kraft and Rosetti, members of the Esterhazy Chapel; Distler, violinist; Fernandi, organist; Démar, composer; Hoffmann of Livonia; Kranz of Stuttgart; Franz Tomisch; Ed. von Weber; Ant. Wranitzky; Haigh, Graeff and Callcott, of London; Nisle; Franz de Paula Roser; the Polzellis; J. G. Fuchs, afterwards vice-Kapellmeister of the chapel, and Haydn's successor; Struck; Bartsch; Lessel; Neukomm; Händel; Seyfried and Destouches. Haydn used to call Pleyel, Neukomm and Lessel his favourite and most grateful pupils. Most of those named dedicated to him their first published work—generally a piece of chamber music.

PERSONALITY.—A few remarks on Haydn's personal and mental characteristics, and on his position in the history of art, will conclude our task. We learn from his contemporaries that he was below the middle height, with legs disproportionately short; his build substantial, but deficient in muscle. His features were tolerably regular; his expression, slightly stern in repose, invariably softened in conversation. His aquiline nose was latterly much disfigured by a polypus, and his face deeply pitted by smallpox. His complexion was very dark. His dark grey eyes beamed with benevolence, and he used to say himself, 'Any one can see by the look of me that I am a good-natured sort of fellow.' The impression given by his countenance and bearing was that of an earnest, dignified man, perhaps a little over-precise. Though fond of a joke, he never indulged in immoderate laughter. His broad and well-formed forehead was partly concealed by a wig with side curls and a pigtail, which he wore to the end of his days. A prominent and slightly coarse under-lip, with a massive jaw, completed this singular union of so much that was attractive and repellent, intellectual and vulgar.¹ He always considered himself an ugly man, and could not understand how so many handsome women fell in love with him: 'At any rate,' he used to say, 'they were not tempted by my beauty,' though he admitted that he liked looking at a pretty woman, and was never at a loss for a compliment. He habitually spoke in the broad Austrian dialect, but could express himself fluently in Italian, and with some difficulty in French. He studied English when in London, and in the country would often take his grammar into the woods. He was also fond of introducing English phrases into his diary. He knew enough Latin to read Fux's Gradus and to set the church services. Though he lived so long in Hungary he never learned the vernacular, which was only used by the servants among themselves, the Esterhazy family always speaking German. His love of fun sometimes carried him away; as he remarked to Dies, 'A mischievous fit comes over one sometimes that is perfectly beyond control.' At the same time he was sensitive, and when provoked by a bad return for his kindness could be very sarcastic. With all his modesty he was aware of his own merits, and liked to be appreciated, but flattery he never permitted. Like a true man of genius he enjoyed honour and fame, but carefully avoided ambition. He has often been reproached with cringing to his superiors, but it should not be forgotten that a man who was in daily intercourse with people of the highest rank would have no difficulty in drawing the line between respect and subservience. That he was quite capable of defending his dignity as an artist is proved by the following occurrence. Prince Nicolaus (the second of the name) being present at a rehearsal and expressing disapprobation, Haydn at once interposed—'Your Highness, all that is my business.' He was very fond of children, and they in return loved 'Papa Haydn' with all their hearts. He never forgot a benefit, though his kindness to his many needed relations often met with a poor return. The 'chapel' looked up to him as a father, and when occasion arose he was an unwearied intercessor on their behalf with the Prince. Young men of talent found in him a generous friend, always ready to aid them with advice and substantial help. To this fact Eybler, A. Romberg, Seyfried, Weigl and others have borne ample testimony. His intercourse with Mozart was a striking example of his readiness to acknowledge the merits of others. Throughout life he was distinguished by industry and method; he maintained a strict daily routine, and never sat down to work or received a visit until he was fully dressed. This custom he kept up long after he was too old to leave the house. His uniform, which the Prince was continually changing both in colour and style, he never wore unless actually at his post.

One of his most marked characteristics was his constant aim at perfection in his art. He once said regretfully to Kalkbrenner, 'I have only just learned in my old age how to use the wind instruments, and now that I do understand them I must leave the world.' And to Griesinger he said that he had by no means come to the end of his powers; that ideas were often floating in his mind, by which he could have carried the art far beyond anything it had yet attained, had his physical powers been equal to the task.

He was a devout Christian, and attended strictly to his religious duties; but he saw no inconsistency in becoming a Freemason—probably at the instigation of Leopold Mozart, when in Vienna in 1785. His genius he looked on as a gift from above, for which he was bound to b:

thankful. This feeling dictated the inscriptions on all his scores large and small—'In nomine Domini' at the beginning, and 'Laus Deo' at the end; with the occasional addition et B. V. Ch.

ad om. S^{ts}

of 'et B. V. Mā et omī S^{ts}' (Beatae Virginī Mariæ et omnibus Sanctis). His writing is extremely neat and uniform, with remarkably few corrections: 'Because,' said he, 'I never put anything down till I have quite made up my mind about it.' When intending to write something superior he liked to wear the ring given him by the King of Prussia.

METHOD OF COMPOSITION.—The immense quantity of his compositions would lead to the belief that he worked with unusual rapidity, but this was by no means the case. 'I never was a quick writer,' he assures us himself, 'and always composed with care and deliberation; that alone is the way to compose works that will last, and a real connoisseur can see at a glance whether a score has been written in undue haste or not.' He sketched all his compositions at the piano—a dangerous proceeding, often leading to fragmentariness of style. The condition of the instrument had its effect upon him, for we find him writing to Artaria in 1788, 'I was obliged to buy a new fortepiano, that I might compose your clavier sonatas particularly well.' When an idea struck him he sketched it out in a few notes and figures: this would be his morning's work; in the afternoon he would enlarge this sketch, elaborating it according to rule, but taking pains to preserve the unity of the idea. 'That is where so many young composers fail,' he says; 'they string together a number of fragments; they break off almost as soon as they have begun; and so at the end the listener carries away no definite impression.' He also objected to composers not learning to sing: 'Singing is almost one of the forgotten arts, and that is why the instruments are allowed to overpower the voices.' The subject of melody he regarded very seriously. 'It is the air which is the charm of music,' he said to Michael Kelly,¹ 'and it is that which is most difficult to produce. The invention of a fine melody is a work of genius.'

Like many other creative artists, Haydn disliked æstheticism and all mere talk about Art. He had always a bad word for the critics with their 'sharp-pointed pens' ('spitzigen und witzigen Federn'), especially those of Berlin, who used him very badly in early life. His words to Breitkopf, when sending him the 'Creation,' are very touching, as coming from a man of his established reputation—'My one hope and prayer is, and I think at my age it may well be granted, that the critics will not be too hard on my "Creation," and thus do it real harm.' He had of course plenty of detractors, among others Kozeluch and Kreibitz, who represented him to the Emperor Joseph II. as a mere mountebank. Even after he had met with due recognition abroad, he was accused of trying to found a new school, though his compositions were at the same time condemned as for the most part hasty, trivial and extravagant. He sums up his own opinion of his works in these words: 'Sunt mala mixta bonis; some of my children are well-bred, some ill-bred, and here and there is a changeling among them.' He was perfectly aware of how much he had done for the progress of art: 'I know,' he said, 'that God has bestowed a talent upon me, and I thank Him for it; I think I have done my duty, and been of use in my generation by my works; let others do the same.'

He was no pedant with regard to rules, and would acknowledge no restrictions on genius. 'If Mozart wrote thus, he must have had a good reason for it,' was his answer when his attention was drawn to an unusual passage in one of Mozart's quartets. With regard to Albrechtsberger's condemnation of consecutive fourths in strict composition he remarked,

'What is the good of such rules? Art is free, and should be fettered by no such mechanical regulations. The educated ear is the sole authority on all these questions, and I think I have as much right to lay down the law as any one. Such trifling is absurd; I wish instead that some one would try to compose a really new minuet.'

And again to Dies,

'Supposing an idea struck me as good, and thoroughly satisfactory both to the ear and the heart, I would far rather pass over some slight grammatical error than sacrifice what seemed to me beautiful to any mere pedantic trifling.'

Even during Haydn's lifetime his compositions became the subject of a real worship. Many distinguished men, such as Exner of Zittau, Von Mastiaux of Bonn, Gerber, Bossler, Count Fuchs, Baron du Baine and Kees the court secretary of Vienna, corresponded with him with a view to procuring as many of his works as possible for their libraries. There is great significance in the sobriquet of 'Papa Haydn,' as if musicians of all countries claimed descent from him. One writer declares that after listening to Haydn's compositions he always felt impelled to do some good work; and Zelter said they had a similar effect upon him.

HIS POSITION SUMMARISED.—Haydn's position in the history of music is of the first importance. When we consider the poor condition in which he found certain important departments of music, and, on the other hand, the vast fields which he opened to his successors, it is impossible to overrate his creative powers. Justly called the father of instrumental music, there is scarcely a department throughout its whole range in which he did not make his influence felt. All his works are characterised by lucidity, perfect finish, studied moderation, avoidance of meaningless phrases, firmness of design, and richness of development. The subjects principal and secondary, down to the smallest episodes, are thoroughly connected, and the whole conveys the impression of being cast in one mould. We admire his inexhaustible invention as shown in the originality of his themes and melodies; the life and spontaneity of the ideas; the clearness which makes his compositions as interesting to the amateur as to the artist; the child-like cheerfulness and drollery which charm away trouble and care.

Of the symphony he may be said with truth to have enlarged its sphere, determined its form, enriched and developed its capacities with the versatility of true genius. Like those which Mozart wrote after studying the orchestras of Munich, Mannheim and Paris, Haydn's later symphonies are the most copious in ideas, the most animated, and the most delicate in construction. They have in fact completely banished those of his predecessors.

The quartet he also brought to perfection. 'It is not often,' says Otto Jahn, 'that a composer hits so exactly upon the form suited to his conceptions; the quartet was Haydn's natural mode of expressing his feelings.' The life and freshness, the cheerfulness and geniality which give the peculiar stamp to these compositions, at once secured their universal acceptance. It is true that scientific musicians at first regarded this new element in music with suspicion and even contempt, but they gradually came to the conclusion that it was compatible not only with artistic treatment, but with earnestness and sentiment. 'It was from Haydn,' said Mozart, 'that I first learned the true way to compose quartets.' His symphonies encouraged the formation of numerous amateur orchestras; while his quartets became an unfailing source of elevated pleasure in family circles, and thus raised the general standard of musical cultivation.

Encouraged partly by the progress made by Emanuel Bach on the original foundation of Kuhnau and Domenico Scarlatti, Haydn also left his mark on the sonata. His compositions of this kind exhibit the same vitality and the same individual treatment; indeed in some of them he seems to step beyond Mozart into the Beethoven period. His clavier trios also, though no longer valuable from a technical point of view, are still models of composition. On the other hand, his accompanied divertimenti and his concertos, with a single exception, were far surpassed by those of Mozart, and have long since disappeared.

His first collections of songs were written to trivial words, and can only be used for social amusement; but the later series, especially the canzonets, rank far higher, and many of them have survived, and are still heard with delight, in spite of the progress in this particular branch of composition since his day. The airs and duets composed for insertion in various operas were essentially ephemeral productions. His canons—some serious and dignified, others overflowing with fun—strikingly exhibit his power of combination. His three-part and four-part songs—like the canons, especial favourites with the composer—are excellent compositions, and still retain their power of arousing either devotional feeling or mirth.

His larger masses are a series of masterpieces, admirable for freshness of invention, breadth of design and richness of development, both in the voice parts and the instruments. The cheerfulness which pervades them does not arise from frivolity, but rather from the joy of a heart devoted to God, and trusting all things to a Father's care. He told Carpani that 'at the thought of God his heart leaped for joy, and he could not help his music doing the same.'

Frequent performances of his oratorios have familiarised every one with the charm and freshness of his melody and his expressive treatment of the voices, which are invariably supported without being overpowered by refined and brilliant orchestration. In these points none of his predecessors approached him. With regard to his operas composed for Esterházy, we have already quoted his own opinion; they attained their end. Had his project of visiting Italy been fulfilled, and his faculties been stimulated in this direction by fresh scenes and a larger sphere, we might have gained some fine operas, but we should certainly have lost the Haydn we all so dearly love.

When we consider what Haydn did for music, and what his feelings with regard to it were—the willing service he rendered to art, and his delight in ministering to the happiness of others—we can but express our love and veneration, and exclaim with gratitude, 'Heaven endowed him with genius—he is one of the immortals.'

Duet—6 for violin solo with viola accompaniment.⁵

Trios, 30; 20 are for 2 violins and bass; 1 for violin solo, viola concertante, and bass; 2 for flute, violin and bass.

3 for 3 flutes; 1 for cornò di caccia, violin and violoncello.

Quartets for 2 violins, viola and violoncello.

1 Bombet and Stendhal are pseudonyms of Henri Beyle, who stole freely from Carpent. The first of these pamphlets was translated into English (by Gardiner). The Life of Haydn in a Series of Letters, etc. (London, John Murray, 1817; Boston, 1839). Mondo's French translation of Carpent's larger work appeared in Paris, 1837.

* Mandyczewski's list.

* Originally for orchestra; arranged first for two violins, viola and bass, then for soli, chor. & orchestra.

* Arrangements were published of several of those in three parts, with violin (for which the flute is occasionally substituted), viola, or violoncello as principal.

* The numerous printed duets for two violins are only arrangements from his other works.

The first 18 were published in 3 series, the next is in MS., then one printed separately, 54 in 9 series of 6 Nos. each, 2 more, and the last.*

Clavier—20 concertos 7 and divertimenti.

28 trios—35 with violin and violoncello, 3 with flute and violoncello.

53 sonatas 9 and divertimenti.

4 sonatas 10 for clavier and violin.

ORATORIOS and 'ANTATAS. 'The Creation'; 'The Seasons'; 'Il ritorno di Tobia'; 'The Seven Words'; 'Invocation of Neptune'; 'Applausus musicus' (for the festival of a prelate, 1768); cantata for the birthday of Prince Nicolaus (1763); 'Die Erwählung eines Kapellmeisters, a cantata.

OPERAS. 1 German, or more correctly, Singspiel; 4 Italian comedies; 14 ditto, buffe; 6 marionette operas; music for 'Alfred', a tragedy, and various other plays; 22 airs mostly inserted in operas.

* Ariana a Naxos, 12 cantata for single voice and PF.

* Deutshlands Klage auf den Tod Friedrichs des Grossen, cantata for a single voice with baryton accompaniment.

SONGS. 12 German Lieder, 1782, 12 ditto, 1784; 12 single ones (5 unpublished); 6 'Original canzonets', London, 1796; 6 ditto; 'The Spirit Song', F minor; 0 'tuneful Voice', Er, composed for a woman; English lady of position, both published; 3 English songs in MS.; 2 duets; 3 3-part and 10 4-part songs; 3 choruses, MS.; 1 ditto from 'Alfred' (Breitkopf & Härtel); the Austrian national anthem, for single voice and in 4 parts.

42 canonens 2 and more parts; 2 ditto; 'The Ten Commandments,' set to canons; the same, with different words, under the title 'Die zehn Gebote der Kunst.'

* A selection of original Scots songs in 3 parts, the harmony by Dr. J. Haydn, with violin and bass accompaniments and symphonies.¹³

* A Select Collection of Original Welsh Airs in 3 parts.¹⁴

SUPPOSITITIONS and DOTTED WORKS. Instrumental—36 Symphonies (38 others formerly ascribed to Haydn have been assigned to their authors by Mandyczewski); the 'Kunstquartett' with different movements, by André, entitled 'Faissons d'avril'; the 'Ochsenmetzger'; 'Nel quartetto, Opera xxi.' (Paris, Durieu); 'Sei quintetti, Opera xxi.' (Paris, Le Chevalier); 1 string quintet in C, published as op. 88 (by Michael Haydn); 1 clavier-trio in C (M. Haydn); Sonata, op. 93, No. 2 (by Camblin); 'Sonates à quatre mains', op. 77, 81, 86, merely arrangements from symphonies; Vocal—2 Requiem, 4 Masses (Novello, 9, 10, 13, 14); 'Schulmeistermesse'; several MS. Masses; Te Deum in C, 3-4 tempo (by M. Haydn); Miserere in G minor; 2 Liberas; MS. Oratorio, 'Alessandro il Grande' (by Mandyczewski); 2 'Pastoral-Oratorien, MS.; 1 'Applausus musicus', 1763, and 'Aria de St. Jeanne de Nepomuk, 1763 (both MS., by Albrechtsberger). 'Cantatas—'An die Freude', found recently; 'Das Erdtiefest'; 'Des Dichters Geburtstag'; 'Hier liegt Constantia', Opera—'Allesandro il Grande', 1780, pasticcio from Haydn and other composers; 'Laurette', opera-comique (Paris, 1791), a pasticcio; 'La cauffera bizarra' (by Weigl); 'Die Horzeit auf der Alm' (M. Haydn); 'Der Apfelhof', Singspiel (by Tast, also set by Berrey); 'Der Freyrief', partially adapted from 'La Isolda', pasticcio, by Fridolin Weber (C. M. von Weber afterwards added two numbers)¹⁵; 'Die Rauchtangkheuer', by Salieri; 'La Fee Urgle' (by Pleyel) also set by Amans and Schulz. Terzet for men's voices, 'Lieber, holder, kleiner Engel' (by Schickaneder); comic-canon 'Venerabili barbara responsorium' (by Gassmann); canon, 'Meine Herren, laßt uns jetzt eine Sinfonie aufführen'; proverbs for 4 voices, by Andre; 'Die Theilung der Erde' a bass song by Roser (Diabelli).

A complete critical edition of Haydn's works projected by Breitkopf and Härtel, is now in progress, and the series of symphonies began to appear in 1907 under the editorship of E. Mandyczewski. The following thematic list of 104 authentic symphonies is based on that of Mandyczewski. To his references are added others to the old catalogue of the Philharmonic

* The arrangement of the 'Seven Words' is wrongly included in the collections.

* One concerto is with principal violin; two only, G and D, have been printed; the last alone survives.

* Only 31 are printed.

* Only 35 are printed; the one in C, containing the Adagio in F, included in all the collections of smaller pieces, only in London.

* 2 are published, but 4 of these are arrangements.

* 10 of the 13 are taken from other compositions, with Latin text added.

* Published by Simrock with orchestral accompaniment by Schneider (?), and with clavier accompaniment, and Italian, German and French words.

* London, printed for W. Napier. Dedicated by permission to H.R.H. the Duchess of York. Vol. I. contains 100. Vol. II. 100. Vol. III. 47. Haydn's own catalogue mentions 364, some of which were published by Thomson & Whyte of Edinburgh.

* Printed by Preston, vol. I. 20, vol. II. 17, vol. III. 4.

* The Or's minute—the title of a Singspiel founded on the well-known anecdote, set to a pasticcio from Haydn's compositions, and long popular.

* See Jahns's Catalogue, Nos. 78, 79.

Society (London), printed in 1828 with MS. additions made in 1831, since English concert programmes frequently contain allusions to the numbering of that catalogue (and its successors in MS.), and in particular the 12 Salomon Symphonies are almost invariably quoted by their order therein.

The numbers of the Philharmonic Catalogue assigned to Haydn's symphonies begin at 25 and end at 89, with many blank spaces. Nos. 25-36 are the '12 Grand Symphonies' composed for Salomon, given in the order shown below as 'Aut. London Symph.' Nos. 42-63 includes those symphonies known by alphabetical names, 'Letter A' to 'Letter W.' It has not been thought necessary to reproduce the general catalogue numbers to these. Nos. 66-79 have an additional numbering 1-14, and occasional opus numbers are also added. These double numberings are noted where they occur in the list after the word 'Phil.'

(2) JOHANN MICHAEL HAYDN (b. Rohrau, Lower Austria, Sept. 14, 1737; d. Salzburg, Aug. 10, 1806), younger brother of Joseph, and an eminent composer, was grounded in music by the village schoolmaster, and from 1745-55 was a chorister at St. Stephen's, Vienna. His voice was a pure soprano of great compass, and his style so good that, as soon as Joseph's voice began to change, Michael took all the principal parts. He played the violin and organ, and was soon able to act as deputy organist at St. Stephen's. He was fond of history, geography and the classics.

In music he aimed at originality from the first, and formed a sort of society among his schoolfellows for detecting plagiarisms. Like his brother he had no regular instruction in composition, but taught himself from Fux's Gradus, which he copied¹ entire in 1757. His first known Mass is dated Temesvar, 1754; other works were composed at Warasdin and Belenyes; but how he came to be in Hungary is not known. In 1757 he was Kapellmeister at Grosswardein to the bishop Count Firmian, whose uncle Archbishop Sigismund of Salzburg appointed him, in 1762, his director and Konzertmeister. In 1777 he also became organist at the churches of Holy Trinity and St. Peter. On Aug. 17, 1768, he married Maria Magdalena Lipp, daughter of the cathedral organist and a singer at the archbishop's court, who took the principal parts in several of Mozart's juvenile operas, and is mentioned by him as leading a peculiarly strict life. Their one child, a daughter, born 1770, died the following year. The wife lived to be 82, and died in June 1827. Michael's salary, at first 300 florins (£24) with board and lodging, was afterwards doubled; and this modest pittance was sufficient to retain him for the whole of his life at Salzburg. His attachment to the place was extraordinary, one attraction being the proximity of his great friend, a clergyman named Rettensteiner. In 1783 the then archbishop, Hieronymus Count Colloredo, commissioned him to compose some vocal pieces to be used instead of the instrumental music between the Gloria and Credo at High Mass. Michael selected words from the Roman Missal, and his first Gradual—first of 114—was performed on Dec. 24.

In 1798 he visited Vienna, and was cordially received by his brother and by Eybler, Süssmayer, Henneberg, Hummel, and von Reich the amateur, who pressed him to settle among them, but in vain. In Dec. 1800 he lost his property through the taking of Salzburg by the French, but his brother and friends came liberally to his assistance. The Empress Maria Theresa² hearing of his losses commissioned him to compose a Mass, which he presented to her in person. The performance took place at Laxenburg, Oct. 4, 1801, under his own direction; the Empress sang the soprano solos, rewarded him munificently, and commanded another Mass for the Emperor and a Requiem. Accompanied by his friend Rettensteiner he visited Eisenstadt, where for the first and only time in their lives the three Haydns spent some happy days together. Michael much enjoyed the canons which decorated the walls of

Joseph's study in Vienna, and asked leave to copy some of them, but Joseph replied, 'Get away with your copies; you can compose much better for yourself.' Michael, however, carried his point, and even added a fourth part to 'Die Mutter an ihr Kind.' Prince Esterhazy commissioned Michael to compose a Mass and Vespers, and offered him the vice-Kapellmeistership of his chapel, but he twice refused, in the hope that the chapel at Salzburg would be reorganised and his salary raised. His hopes were deceived, but meantime the post at Eisenstadt had been filled up, and he wrote to his brother complaining bitterly of the disappointment.¹ Joseph thought Michael too straightforward for Eisenstadt: 'Ours is a court life,' said he, 'but a very different one from yours at Salzburg; it is uncommonly hard to do what you want.' At this time Michael was elected a member of the Academy at Stockholm, and sent in exchange for his diploma a Missa Hispanica for two choirs (comp. 1786), and other church works. In Dec. 1805 he finished his last Mass, for two sopranos and alto, written for his choristers. He made some progress with the Requiem for the Empress, but was unable to finish it. While on his deathbed his beautiful Lauda Sion was sung at his request in the next room, and soon after he died.

The Requiem was completed by portions from his earlier one in C minor, and performed at his funeral. He lies in a side chapel of St. Peter's Church. A well-designed monument was erected in 1821, and over it is an urn containing his skull. In the tavern of St. Peter's monastery is still shown the 'Haydn-Stübchen,' his almost daily resort. His widow received from the Empress 600 florins for the score of the Requiem; from Prince Esterhazy thirty ducats for the opera 'Andromeda and Perseus,' and an annuity of thirty-six gold ducats for all his MS. compositions. His brother several times sent him money, and in his first will (1801) left 4000 florins to him, and in his second (1809) 1000 to the widow. His likeness, with regular, steady features, exists in many oil-portraits, engravings, lithographs and drawings.

In character Michael was upright, good-tempered and modest; a little rough in manners, and in later life given to drink. His letters show him to have been a warm-hearted friend, and that he was devout may be inferred from his habit of initialling all his MSS. with 'O. a. M. D. GL.' (Omnia ad Majorem Dei Gloriam). As a composer he was overshadowed by the fame of his brother. His own words, 'Give me good librettos, and the same patronage as my brother, and I should not be behind him,' could scarcely have been fulfilled, since he failed in the very qualities which ensured his brother's success. On the other hand, Joseph professed that Michael's church compositions were superior to his own in earnestness, severity of style, and sustained power. They are, however, unequal; many are antiquated from the monotony of the accompaniment, while others—the Mass in D minor, the Gradual 'Tres sunt,' the Lauda Sion, the well-known Tenebrae in E♭, etc.—are still highly esteemed. Leopold Mozart, a man who disliked his manners, wrote to his son, 'Herr Haydn is a man whose merit you will be forced to acknowledge.' This refers to his sacred works, several of which Wolfgang scored for practice, he also sent for them to Vienna, and endeavoured to make them better known, especially introducing them to Van Swieten. In 1783, when Michael was laid aside by illness, Mozart composed two string duets for him.² Franz Schubert visited Michael's grave in 1825, and thus records his impressions: 'The good Haydn! It almost seemed as if his clear calm spirit were hovering over me. I may be neither calm nor clear, but no man living reverences him more than I do. My eyes filled with tears as we came away.' Ferdinand Schubert composed a striking chorus to words in praise of Michael Haydn. Among his numerous pupils we may mention C. M. von Weber, Neukomm, Woelfl and Reicha. There exists a Biographische Skizze, a very warm-hearted pamphlet written by Schinn and Otter (Salzburg, 1808).

Of his compositions comparatively few were printed. Recently, however, a selection of his instrumental works has been published in D.T.Ö. xiv. ii., and 3 of his masses in D.T.Ö. xxii. i. In the Hof- and Staatsbibl. at Munich is a thematic catalogue; and a detailed list is in Q.-L.

SUMMARY OF COMPOSITIONS

INSTRUMENTAL. 50 short organ pieces for beginners, consisting of preludes, etc., in all the 8 church tones (published at Linz); 30 symphonies, and Partien,³ 1 sextet, 3 quintets,⁴ serenades, marches, 12 minuets for full orchestra (Augsburg, Gombart), 1 violin concerto, etc.

VOCAL. About 360 compositions for the Church, including 2 requiems,⁵ 24 masses,⁶ 4 German masses,⁷ 114 graduates,⁸ 67 oratorios,⁹ 8 Litanies,¹⁰ 11 vespers, 5 Salve Regine, 8 Responsories, 3 Tenebrae, Regina Coeli, etc., etc.; and several German sacred songs.

Many oratorios: cantatas, operas (including 'Andromeda e Perseo,' 1776), mythological operettas, a pastoral.¹¹ 'Die Hochzeit an der Alm,' 2 collections of 4-part songs (Vienna, Eder, 1799; Salzburg, Haacker, 1800); several single ones, 'Karl der Held Erzhertzog von Oesterreich,' etc.; 6 canons in 4 and 5 parts (Salzburg, Meyer, 1800).

THEATRICAL. 'Partitur-Fundament,' edited by Martin Biehschreiber, etc. In the Imperial Library, an Antiphonarium Romanum with figured bass, finished in 1792.

² Afterwards published in Mozart's name (Köchel's Catalogue, Nos. 423 and 424).

³ Ariola published three.

⁴ One in C was printed under Joseph's name as op. 88.

⁵ The second, in B[♭], is unfinished. (Köhnel.)

⁷ Forty-two in score (1-20 and 41-62) in the 'Ecclesiasticon.' (Spina.)

⁸ 'Litanias de venerabilis sacramento.' (Breitkopf & Härtel.)

¹⁰ Vocal score, Falter & Son, Munich, 1862; often ascribed to Joseph.

¹¹ Reprinted by Ober of Salzburg, 1833. The score is among the MSS. of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.

¹ The vice-Kapellmeistership was bestowed on Johann Fuchs (d. Oct. 29, 1859), violinist in the chapel, and afterwards Haydn's successor.

HAYES, CATHARINE (b. Limerick, Oct. 25, 1825; d. Roccolos, Sydenham, Aug. 11, 1861), distinguished soprano, was brought out by Bishop Knox of Limerick, who inaugurated a subscription list which sufficed to pay for her tuition in Dublin, under Antonio Sapio, from 1839-42. Her first public appearance in Dublin seems to have been at Mrs. Joseph Elliott's annual concert in the Rotunda, May 13, 1840.¹ On Jan. 12, 1841, she sang at a concert given by J. P. Knight, in Dublin, the party consisting of Liszt, Richardson the flautist, Miss Steele, Miss Bassano and John Parry, under the direction of Lavenue and J. A. Wade. Liszt warmly encouraged Miss Hayes, and she was also urged to adopt the profession of a vocalist by Louis Lablache. In Oct. 1842, she proceeded to Paris, having a letter of introduction to her townsman, George A. Osborne, who placed her under Garcia. She then went to Milan, and finished her studies under Ronconi, making her début at Marseilles in 'Puritani,' on May 10, 1845. After a three months' stay at Marseilles, she returned to Milan and was engaged at La Scala, making a tremendous sensation by her appearance in 'Linda di Chamouni.' After a successful tour at Vienna, Venice, Bergamo, Florence and Genoa, she made her first appearance in London, Apr. 10, 1849, in 'Linda.'²

After a short period of fair success here, during which she also sang in 'Lucia,' 'Son-nambula,' and the 'Prophète' (Bertha)—and of much greater éclat in Ireland, where she sang Irish songs amid vast applause—she left Europe for America, India, Australia and Polynesia. In 1857 she returned with a fortune, and married W. A. Bushnell, but was known by her maiden name till her death. Her voice was beautiful, but she was an imperfect musician, and did not study. In society and domestic life she was greatly beloved and esteemed, and on her departure for abroad Thackeray wished her farewell in his Irish Sketch-book. G.

HAYES, (1) WILLIAM, Mus.D. (b. Hanbury, Worcestershire, Dec. 1707³; d. Oxford, July 27, 1777), became a chorister of Gloucester Cathedral under William Hine. He was articled to Hine, and soon became distinguished as an organist. After the expiration of his articles in 1729 he obtained the appointment of organist at St. Mary's Church, Shrewsbury. In 1731 he became organist of Worcester Cathedral, which he resigned in 1734 (after conducting the Worcester Festival of that year) on being appointed organist and master of the choristers at Magdalen College, Oxford. He graduated at Oxford as Mus.B. July 8, 1735. On Jan. 14, 1742, he succeeded Richard Goodson as Professor of Music in the University. On the opening of the Radcliffe Library Hayes directed the performance, and was on that occasion created Doctor of Music, Apr. 14, 1749. In 1763 Dr. Hayes became a competitor for the prizes then first offered by the Catch Club, and obtained three for his canons, 'Alleluja' and 'Miserere nobis,' and his glee, 'Melting airs soft joys inspire.' He conducted the music at the Gloucester Festival in 1757, 1760 and 1763. His compositions comprise:

'Twelve Ariettes or Ballads and Two Cantatas,' 1735; 'Collins's Ode on the Passions'; 'Vocal and Instrumental Music containing, I. The Overture and Songs in the Masque of Clee; II. A Sonata or Trio, and Ballads, Airs and Cantatas; III. An Ode, being part of an Exercise performed for a Bachelor's Degree in Music,' 1742; 'Catches, Glee, and Canons'; 'Cathedral Music' (Services and Anthems edited by his son Philip Hayes), 1795; 'Instrumental Accompaniments to the Old Hundredth Psalm, for the Sons of the Clergy'; and 'Sixteen Psalms from Merrick's Version.'

He was author of Remarks on Mr. Avison's Essay on Musical Expression, 1762. (See AVISON.) He died at Oxford and was buried in the Churchyard of St. Peter in the East. His will is to be found in Bloxam's Magdalen College Registers, 1857, vol. ii. p. 125. His portrait, by Cornish, is in the Music School at Oxford.

(2) PHILIP, Mus.D. (b. Apr. 1738; d. Mar. 19, 1797), second son of William (1), received his musical education principally from his father; graduated Mus.B. at Oxford, May 18, 1763; on Nov. 30, 1767, was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal. In 1776, on the resignation of Richard Church, he was chosen to succeed him as organist of New College, Oxford, and on the death of his father in the following year obtained his appointments of organist of Magdalen College, Oxford, and Professor of Music in the University. He proceeded Doctor of Music, Nov. 6, 1777. On the death of Thomas Norris in 1790 he was appointed organist of St. John's College, Oxford. Dr. Hayes composed several anthems, eight of which he published in a volume; 'Prophecy,' an oratorio, performed at the Commemoration at Oxford, 1781; Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, 'Begin the Song' (written by John Oldham and originally set by Dr. Blow, 1684); and 'Telemachus,' a masque. He was editor of Harmonia Wiccamica, a collection of the music sung at the Meeting of Wykehamists in London, and of some MS. Memoirs of the Duke of Gloucester (son of Princess Anne of Denmark), begun by Jenkin Lewis, one of his attendants, and completed by the editor. Dr. P. Hayes was one of the largest men in England. He is buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. W. H. H.

(3) WILLIAM (b. 1741; d. Oct. 22, 1790), third son of William (1), was admitted a chorister of Magdalen College on June 27, 1749. He resigned in 1751. He matriculated from

On Jan. 14, 1766, he was appointed minor canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, and made 'junior cardinal' in 1783. He was also Vicar of Tillingham, Essex. In May 1765 he contributed to the Gentleman's Magazine a paper entitled, Rules necessary to be observed by all Cathedral Singers in this Kingdom. W. H. H.; CORR. W. H. C., J. F. R. S., etc.

HAYM, NICOLO FRANCESCO (b. Rome, c. 1679), of German parentage, came to England in 1704. A little later, he engaged with Clayton and Dieupart in an attempt to establish Italian opera in London; and played the principal violoncello in Clayton's 'Arsinoë,' 'Camilla' (adapted from Bononcini, to a libretto by Owen MacSwiney) was Haym's first opera, produced at Drury Lane, Mar. 30, 1706. His next performances were the alteration of Bononcini's 'Thomyris' for the stage, and the arrangement of 'Pyrrhus and Demetrius' (see NICOLINI), which, in his copy of his agreement¹ he calls 'my opera,' though in reality composed by A. Scarlatti.² For the latter he received £300 from Rich, while he was paid regularly for playing in the orchestra, and bargained for a separate agreement for every new opera he should arrange or import. The principal parts in 'Pyrrhus and Demetrius' were sung by some of the performers in Italian, and by the rest in English. These operas continued to run from 1709-11, and in the latter year his 'Etearco' was produced; but the arrival of Handel seems to have put Haym to flight. In Nos. 258 and 278 of the Spectator, for Dec. 26, 1711, and Jan. 18, 1712, are two letters, signed by Clayton, Haym and Dieupart, in which they protest against the new style of music, and solicit patronage for their concerts at Clayton's house in York Buildings. Haym was ready, however, to take either side, and in 1713 he reappears as the author of the libretto of Handel's 'Teseo,' a position which he filled again in 'Radamisto,' 'Ottone,' 'Flavio,' 'Giulio Cesare,' 'Tamerlano,' 'Rodelinda,' 'Tolomeo,' etc., for Handel; 'Coriolano,' and 'Vespasiano,' for Ariosti; and 'Calpurnia' and 'Astianatte,' for Bononcini. He seems to have been no more particular about claiming the words than the music of others; for he claims the book of 'Siroe,' though it is the work of Metastasio.³ His merit as a musician, however, entitled him to better encouragement⁴ than he received; he published two sets of sonatas for two violins and a bass, which show him to have been an able master, and his talent for dramatic music may be appreciated from an air printed by Sir J. Hawkins in his History (chap. 174). An anthem, 'The Lord is King,' and a 'Dixit Dominus' are in MS. in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. The former is certainly, the latter probably, by him.

Haym was a connoisseur of medals. He published Il tesoro delle medaglie antiche, two vols. Italian and English, 4to, 1719-20. He also wrote Merope and Demodice, two tragedies; and published a fine edition of the Gierusalemme liberata of Tasso, and a Notizia de' libri rari italiani (1726), a useful book. Hawkins tells us that he also had the intention of printing a History of Music on a large scale, the prospectus of which he published about 1729. He had written it in Italian, and designed to translate it into English, but relinquished the scheme for want of support. It must not be omitted that we owe to the pencil of Haym the only known portraits of our great early English masters, Tallis and Byrd, engraved by G. Vander Gucht, perhaps for the projected History of Music. The two portraits are on one plate, of which only one impression is known to exist.⁵ On abandoning the musical profession, he became a collector of pictures, from two of which he probably copied the heads of Tallis and Byrd. Fétis incorrectly puts his death in 1720; he must have died shortly after the publication of the above-mentioned prospectus, for he is mentioned as 'the late Mr. Haym' in vol. 3 of John Watt's Merry Musician (Nov. 1729). J. M.

HAYNES, WALTER BATTISON (b. Kempsey, near Worcester, Nov. 21, 1859; d. London, Feb. 4, 1900), became a chorister at the Priory Church, Malvern, where he frequently acted as deputy for his uncle, the organist of the church and the boy's first instructor in music. He subsequently studied under Franklin Taylor (pianoforte) and Prout (harmony) in London; but in 1878 his uncle sent him to the Conservatorium, Leipzig, his professors there being Reinecke and Jadassohn. His career at Leipzig was very brilliant, and he was awarded the Mozart Scholarship as being one of the 'most excellent pupils in the Conservatorium.' He composed, during his pupilage, a symphony (in B flat), a concert-overture, a pianoforte trio, a sonata for pianoforte and violin, a prelude and fugue for two pianofortes (published), and an organ sonata in D minor (also published).

After a residence of six months near Boulogne—when he occasionally played the organ in the cathedral—Haynes settled in London and obtained the organistship of St. Philip's Church, Sydenham, in 1884. This post he exchanged in 1891 for the Chapel Royal, Savoy, being organist there till his death. For some time he was director of music at the Borough Polytechnic, and in 1890 was appointed a professor of harmony and composition at the R.A.M.

In addition to the works above named Haynes composed two cantatas for female voices—'Fairies' Isle' and 'A Sea Dream'; an Idyll for violin and orchestra; twelve sketches for violin with pianoforte accompaniment; organ pieces; church music; a book of charming 'Elizabethan Lyrics,' etc. His compositions prove him to have been an artist of absolute refinement in the exercise of a melodic gift and skilful musicianship. HAYOT, EUGÈNE MAURICE (b. Provins, Nov. 8, 1862), violinist, was a pupil of Massart at the Paris Conservatoire, and obtained a brilliant first prize in 1883. He was received with applause at the Padeloup concerts the following year, and from this time onward has had the greatest success in France (Concerts Colonne, Lamoureux, Conservatoire: also abroad).

He has for the last 20 years directed the quartet which bears his name (with Firmin Touche, then André, as 2nd violin, Denayer as viola, and Salmon as violoncellist) and for a long time was attached to the celebrated concerts of 'La Trompette' with Saint-Saëns, Fauré, Pugno, etc.

A brilliant and ardent virtuoso, Hayot is also a teacher of the first rank. From 1894-96 he has been professor at the Paris Conservatoire.

HEAD-VOICE—in contradistinction to chest-voice. This term is applied indifferently to the second or third register, but is more strictly appropriate to the second. Its range is indefinable, seeing that many or most of the notes naturally produced 'from the chest' may also be produced 'from the head'; or, in other words, that the different 'registers' of every voice may be made to cross each other. (See CHEST-VOICE; FALSETTO; SINGING.) J. H.

HEAP, CHARLES SWINNERTON (b. Birmingham, Apr. 10, 1847; d. there, June 11, 1900), was educated at the Grammar School, Birmingham. Displaying at a very early age an aptitude for music, he sang in public as a child, and at the Birmingham Festival of 1858 as a soprano. On leaving school he was articled to Dr. Monk at York, where he remained for two years. In 1865 he gained the Mendelssohn Scholarship, and was sent to Leipzig for two and a half years, studying under Moscheles, Hauptmann, E. F. Richter and Reinecke. On his return he became a pupil of W. T. Best at Liverpool, and from 1868 devoted himself to professional duties in Birmingham, at the classical concerts of which town he constantly appeared as a pianist, and in which district he was widely known as a conductor. In 1870 he wrote an exercise for the Cambridge degree of Mus.B., which produced so favourable an impression upon the Professor of Music (Sir W.

Sterndale Bennett) that he offered to accept the work (the first part of an oratorio 'The Captivity') as an exercise for the Mus.D. degree. Swinnerton Heap accordingly set the 3rd Psalm for the Mus.B. exercise, in 1871, and in the following year proceeded to the degree of Mus.D. He conducted the Birmingham Philharmonic Union from 1870 till its dissolution in 1886; he became conductor of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society, and conducted the festivals held there in 1883 and 1886. He conducted the North Staffordshire Festival at HANLEY (q.v.) from the foundation of the festival in 1888 until 1899. In 1895 he became conductor of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society, and chorus-master for the Birmingham Festival in 1897. He was an examiner for the musical degrees at Cambridge in 1884. His principal works are:

A pianoforte trio (performed at Leipzig), a sonata for clarinet and piano (1879), a quintet for pianoforte and wind instruments (1882), two overtures (one produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1879 and afterwards played at the Crystal Palace Concerts), a 'Salvum fac Regem' (performed at Leipzig), cantatas 'The Voice of Spring' (Liverpool Philharmonic Society, 1882), 'The Maid of Astolat' (Wolverhampton, 1889), 'Fair Rosamond' (Hanley, 1890), and numerous anthems, songs and organ pieces.

HEATH, JOHN, English church composer of the 1st half of the 17th century, who appears in the Rochester Cathedral Treasurer's Book as organist there as early as 1614 and as late as 1668.¹ He is described in the Organ Book of Adrian BATTEN (q.v.) as holding this post in 1633. Heath's name occurs in Clifford's 'Collection' (2nd edn. 1664), but simply as the composer of an anthem of which the words only are given. A Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, as well as a 7-part verse anthem by Heath, are also in the R.C.M. (1045/51). These are all included (in organ score) in the organ book mentioned above, and the Evening Service fragments are also at Peterhouse. He may also be the composer of the song, 'Go tell my most malicious fate' (melody Harl. 7459/43), there ascribed to 'Em. Heath.' The MS. is an early 17th-century one, but Heath's authorship of the song cannot be established. J. M².

HEATH (JOHN?). The John Heath described above must not be confused, as in Q.-L., with another composer of the same name who lived in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, and who contributed a canticle to the 2nd part of John Day's 'Certaine Notes' (1565). This is probably the man whose 'dull service,' written on the note per syllable principle, is referred to by Ernest Walker (Hist. of Music in England, p. 37) as being printed in some of Day's early Psalters. A single part of a madrigal of this period by Heath, 'Hey downe, downe, downe . . . these women all' (Harl. 7578/100b), is probably the work of this man. It was reprinted by Joseph Ritson in his 'Ancient Songs' (1790). J. M².

HEATHCOTE, GILBERT (b. 1765; d. London, Oct. 19, 1829), took his degree of Mus.B. in 1787; M.A.Oxon., 1791; was rector of Hursley in 1804, vicar in 1811, and archdeacon of Winchester in 1819. He composed liturgical chants, etc., which are still in use; also 'The Original Music in score of the Graces used at Winchester College,' etc. (1811). E. v. d. s.

HEATHER, see HEYTHUR.

HEBDEN, JOHN, who lived in London during the first half of the 18th century, was reputed an excellent solo violoncellist as well as viola da gambist and bassoon-player. At a concert which he gave in 1749 he produced a piece for 5 violoncellos by Abaco, who probably took part in it. His portrait painted by Mercier in 1741, was engraved by Faber (E. van der Straeten, Hist. of the Violoncello, vol. i. 310).

HEBENSTREIT, PANTALEON (b. Eisleben, 1667; d. Dresden, Nov. 15, 1750¹) was at first a dancing-master and violinist in Leipzig, but about 1697 he became celebrated for his performances on the dulcimer, an instrument which he greatly enlarged, and on which his performance in Paris in 1705 roused such attention that Louis XIV. suggested his calling the new instrument by his own name of 'PANTALEON' (q.v.). In 1714 he was appointed 'pantaleonist' in the court band at Dresden. In Mattheson's Critica musica for Dec. 8, 1717, is a letter from Kuhnau, extolling the properties of what is called the 'Pantaleonisches Cimbel.' It seems to have allowed great variety and contrast of tone, and Schroeter, the German who claimed to have invented the pianoforte, stated that the idea originated with the Pantaleon. (See also DULCIMER; PIANOFORTE; SCHROETER.)

Various official appointments were bestowed on Hebenstreit, but he seems to have given up the pantaleon in favour of his pupil Richter. His compositions obtained commendation from Telemann; all that are now extant are a series of overtures for pantaleon and other instruments, in the Darmstadt library. M.

HEBREW MUSIC. ORIGINS.—The Hebrews descended from Eber, son of Shem, derived their music from the Syrians (Aramæans). They were well acquainted with the art before their sojourn in Egypt. Gen. xxxi. 27. 'Tof' (tabret) and 'Kinnor' (harp) were identified with Israel's national life. A Hebrew lyre represented on an ancient Egyptian painting discovered in a tomb at Beni Hassan, is, according to Sir Gardener Wilkinson's conjecture, of the period of Pharaoh, patron of Joseph. This shows that it originated with Asiatic Semites, not in Egypt.²

The Alexandrian Jew, Philo, states: The Egyptian priests taught Moses, besides the art of arithmetic and geometry, the knowledge of rhythm, harmony, metre and music.

The first Biblical record of the Hebrews participating in a musical festival is connected with that sublime 'Song of Deliverance' the 'Song of Moses,' known as 'Širath Hayyam' (the Song at the Sea) (Exodus xv.); rendered perhaps by cantillation and song.

The Sephardic melody below has, according to a very ancient Spanish work, been affirmed by some to be that sung by Miriam and her companions. Its striking resemblance to the 'Song of the Water-carriers of Mecca' which Burckhardt noted during his travels in Arabia, supports the notion of its great antiquity. Apart from its topographical value, the limited range of phrases over three notes, is noteworthy as evidence of its antiquity.

The Jews of Northern Europe (whose music is derived and preserved from their Oriental home, unmodified and uninfluenced by sacred or secular song of their neighbours, other than the Spanish and Portuguese Jews) have a rendering for the 'Širath' possessing something in common with the latter's rendering which being more complete in form, etc., is probably older, the Jews of Northern Europe having only retained a varied portion of the original.

ŠIRATH HAYYAM. Sephardic Melody. Allegretto moderato.

Exodus xv. 20 relates that Miriam took a timbrel in her hand and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances; and the following verse states that she 'sang unto them.' Hebrew 'lahem' (=unto them; masculine form) signifies, unto Moses and the Children of Israel.

Thus we find singing unaccompanied and accompanied by instruments of percussion and dancing, also antiphonal singing. Biblical and post-Biblical literature afford many instances of the dance employed by Hebrews on religious and secular occasions.¹

INSTRUMENTS. -The 'Šofar' (ram's horn) (see ŠOFAR, PLATE LXXXIII), the oldest surviving Hebrew musical instrument employed in the Synagogue, was used for the proclamation of the Jubilee Year (Lev. xxv. 8-10). It is blown during Ellul, in the month preceding the New Year Festival (Num. xxix. 1), on both days of which it is also blown a number of times during Divine Service, and once at the termination of the Day of Atonement.

Skill was required to produce 'Teki'ah = a plain deep sound ending abruptly, and 'Tru'ah' = a trill between two 'Teki'ahs.'

In connexion with the 'Šofar,' the earliest reference to musical time-measure is found in the Talmud. Uncertainty prevailed regarding 'Tru'ah' meaning an outcry or moaning, the former was supposed to consist of three connected short sounds, the latter of nine very short notes divided into three disconnected broken sounds ('Šbarim'). The duration of 'Tru'ah' is equal to that of 'Šbarim,' and 'Teki'ah' is half the length of either (Roš Hašanah 4 a). Biblical and post-Biblical writings record the use of the 'Šofar' in war and for other occasions.² The Bells (Ex. xxviii.) were indispensable to the High Priests' functions.

ŠOFAR-CALLS.³

From Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. XI. p. 305.

The 'Šofar' has been incorrectly described as a trumpet or cornet, but the Hebrew 'Hazzozeroth' = trumpets, which had to be made of beaten silver (Num. x.).⁴

The same chapter records the purposes for use and different modes of blowing. It is evident that musical art was not neglected during Israel's 40 years' journeyings in the Wilderness. We find skilled workers for the Tabernacle, and reference to 'wandering minstrels' if this denotes the interpretation of 'Hammōšelim' (Num. xxi. 27). Folk-songs and traces of them occur early and late in portions of the Bible.

Psaltery,⁵ timbrel, pipe⁶ and harp were employed by the Guild of Prophets (1 Sam. x. 5).⁷

1 Chron. xiii. 8, relates the processional bringing up of the Ark from Kirjath-jearim with songs, harps, psalteries, timbrels, cymbals and trumpets.⁸

Chap. xv. 16-25, tells of singers and instrumentalists organised for the bringing up of the Ark from the house of Obed-edom to the tent pitched by David. Three choirs are constituted, the singers Heman, Asaph and Ethan with cymbals of brass to sound aloud (probably the leaders). Chananiah, chief of the Levites, was over the song; he was master in the song because he was skilful.

Chap. xvi. 4-43 is a record of the 'Service of Song' held outside of the Tent and before the Ark. Probably owing to the non-processional character of the assembly, two instead of seven trumpets and one cymbalist instead of three are employed. We find also a 'Psalm of Thanksgiving' to which all the people said 'Amen' and praised the Lord.

At the census of the Levites David selected four thousand for the sacred music (1 Chron. xxi. 1-5).

1 Chron. xxv. 1-31 gives particulars of this imposing choir, the largest and most significant orchestra ever recorded in ancient annals, totalling 24 chief musicians, under whom were 11 skilled musicians and 154 pupils.

Verse 8 demonstrates this systematic organisation.

'And they cast lots, ward against ward, as well the small as the great, the teacher as the scholar.'

The consecration of the Temple built by Solomon was attended with a great musical festivity (2 Chron. v. 12-14; vii. 6).

After Solomon's death, and the partition of the kingdom, when God-fearing and idol-worshipping kings followed each other in Judah, under the former the instituted Liturgical music was continued.

During the exile the musical art was upheld (Ps. 127). 148 musicians of the Asaph family returned from Babylon (Neh. vii. 44).

We can only suppose this family, which had supplied singers and choirmasters for over 500 years, and at this date was able to produce a choir of 148 musicians, had been occupied with music when not required for the Temple. The Jeduthun family also upheld its tradition.

The re-institution of the musical Divine Service is recorded (Neh. xi. 17-23; xii. 27-47; Ezra iii. 10-13. This service continued a regular institution till the destruction of the Temple under Titus.

The Talmud (Tamid vii.) states: At the Temple Daily Sacrifice there were two silver trumpets which gave first a sound of blowing, then of trembling and again one of blowing. After some time, Ben Arsa, a Temple official, struck the cymbal, whereupon the Levites spoke with (or in) song; after a paragraph of a Psalm a blowing was sounded, whereupon the people threw themselves down in worship; this sound followed each paragraph, after which the people threw themselves down.

The Talmud (Suk. 5) describes with more detail the 'Drawing of the Water Festival', the second evening of the Feast of Tabernacles, which was a great popular festivity. On this occasion the Levites stood on the fifteen steps which led into the women's court, corresponding with the fifteen songs of degrees (Ps. cxx.-cxxxiv.), with their musical instruments, and sang. (Galleries were erected for the women, while the men occupied the space below.) The Talmud (Ar. xi. 3) mentions two flutes (reed pipes) played twice daily in the Temple. Two to twelve were used. At close of a cadence one flute played a solo, being considered the most beautiful ending. 'Ugab' signifies pipe (Gen. iv. 21; Job xxi. 12; Ps. cl. 4).

A 'Magrepha' = organ was in the Temple and had ten 'Nekabbhim' (i.e. rows of pipes (Erakhin x. c. 2). An Hydraulus = water-organ was not included there (Jerusalem Talmud, Suk.). (See ORGAN, HYDRAULUS.)

TEMPLE AND SYNAGOGUE.—The Talmud (Ar. 11 b) describes R. Joshua ben Hananiah, a member of the Levitical Choir and of Levitical descent. (Ma'as. Sh. v. 9). He tells how:

'The choristers went in a body to the Synagogue from the orchestra by the Altar [Suk. 53 a] and so participated in both services.'¹

Hence possibly some, if not all, of the traditional Temple Song came into the Synagogue.

The Temple Service was not confined to Sacrifice. Besides 'Reading from the Law' and recital of the Psalms, prayers and what we know as 'Liturgy' date back at least as far as the return from the Babylonian captivity. Some prayers are found in the Pentateuch.²

The ancient rendering by the Sephardic Jews for the Priestly Benediction (Num. vi. 22-27) is held to be a relic of Temple Music. In support of this it is found that the Ashkenazic Jews retained a similar intonation.³

Regarding the Levitical Song, the Talmud employs two words 'vedibberu b'shir.' If this is translated as 'and they spoke in, or with song,' this interpretation denotes the source of 'Ancient Hebrew Song,' viz.:

CANTILLATION.—To the Jews belongs the 'fixed cantillation' system, shown by signs termed 'Ta'amin' and 'Neginoth,' which may have existed in Moses's time (Ex. xv.; Deut. xxxi. 30).

Rabbi Jochanan says: Anybody who reads the Scriptures without 'Ne'imah' = pleasantness, i.e. accentuation, and learns the Mishna without 'zimra' = song, to such a person the text in Ezek. xx. 25 refers.

Wickes points out that Jesus may have made use of it when reading from the Prophet Isaiah (St. Luke iv. 17 ff.).

Cantillation may have evolved from giving expression to word meaning, conveying to the listener the feeling for discerning long and short phrases and cadences of line or verse, before the invention of graphic signs; vocal and verbal utterance being simultaneous.

Moreover, finger movements could illustrate high or low notes, turns and other musical details.

The Talmud (Ber. 62 a) refers to the right hand movement at the 'Speech Recital of the Holy Law.'

Some consider the system was evolved by the Massoretic School (Tiberias, about 700). An outstanding feature not found in any other notation consists in the signs being placed above and below the text.

There are two systems of accents, one for the Holy Law and historical books, the other for the poetical books. The earliest known Hebrew MS. containing accents is in the British Museum No. 44451 (c. 820-850 c.e.). Mr. D. S. Sassoon possesses one of Babylonian-Persian origin. St. Petersburg library has one dated 916 c.e.

Neither vowel-points nor accents are permitted in Scrolls of the Law used in Divine worship. He who reads therefrom in Synagogue memorises the cantillation. When reading from the Prophets, the printed book containing the signs is used.

Illustration marked A in Example 4 shows cantillation for 'Reading from the Law' by Ashkenazic Jews on all occasions excepting Penitential days, when that marked B is employed. Regarding the latter, there would seem to be similarities in this intonation and that for 'Reading from the Prophets' by the Bagdad Jews. The Ashkenazic intonation for 'Reading from the Prophets' is quoted as Example 8.

Example 5 shows some melodic formulas as rendered by the Bagdad Jews for cantillation of the Readings from the Prophets.

The 'Haggadah,' which relates the Redemption from Egypt, is recited in Jewish homes on the first two nights of Passover. This is generally rendered by the master of the house with distinct types of cantillation and melody in which the company present participate. Psalms, including the 'Hallel,' form an important part of Synagogal Liturgy, being generally rendered by precentor, choir and congregation in unison, or harmony, antiphonal style or choir alone, not by double choirs.

Possibly some Psalm headings referred to musical instruments, folk-song titles or scale-modes of particular districts, comparable with the Greek Æolian and Ionian. Extracts from the oldest-known Psalm melodies are reproduced below.¹

The second is sung at the termination of the Sabbath. Note the cadence in the relative minor!

6. *Andante maestoso. Ancient Sephardic Melody.

PSALM CXLIV.

Maestoso. Ashkenazic Ancient Melody.

A probable outgrowth of cantillation is termed 'Hazzanuth,' i.e. appertaining to a Hazzan or precentor, who usually renders the Liturgical portions, not necessarily the 'Reading from the Law and Prophets.' The Sages teach: 'They ought not to send down to the ark any one but who is practised' (Talmud, Ta'an, 16a). Rabbi Judah (c. 135-220) says: '[They should in preference send one who is] acceptable to the people, possesses the faculty for intonation (Ne'imah) and has a pleasant voice.' His place was in the middle of the Synagogue, on a wooden 'bimah' (Yer. Suk. v. 55a).

Possibly the 'Hazzan,' whilst not actually adopting the 'intonation' for the Scriptural cantillation for the next most important section of the Liturgy, the 'Amidah' = Eighteen Blessings, modelled the phraseology thereof on that obtaining in the cantillation.

When the Liturgy assumed greater proportions this 'Speech-song' developed accordingly; the Precentor whilst using a 'free-fantasia' constantly kept in view the main idea or motive. Thus the musical rendering of the service became a logical and artistic whole.

Each particular service has a musical idiom which the Precentor introduced consciously or unconsciously when chanting a Liturgical portion thereof as part of the Sabbath Morning Service, and similarly became the basis for intoning the Evening Service for Passover, Pentecost and Tabernacle Festivals. It is also found in the intonation for the New Year and Day of Atonement, a 'Pizmon,' i.e. hymn, composed by an early mediæval writer Sheph-tiah, and in the well-known 'Yigdal' hymn by Daniel ben-Judah Daggan, 1484.

Ober-Cantor Singer of Vienna has expressed strong views supporting his description of what may be termed a 'Jewish Tonal System,' in which occurs a scale, not apparently known amongst other tonal systems.

The following example composed of its intervals well illustrates this point. We learn from Amran Gaon (870-888) that 'Abinu mal-kenu' = 'Our Father our King' (Example 7), in the time of the Gaonim, was regarded as an institution of the ancients to be recited on Penitential days.²

'ABINU MALKENU.'

JEWISH SOURCE OF EARLY CHRISTIAN MUSIC.—The table of cantillation signs given above has already suggested a connexion between the music of the Jewish Liturgy and that of the early Christian Church. It would seem probable that the converts from Judaism, including perhaps the sect of the Therapeutae, handed down some of the modes of cantillation in a somewhat corrupted form, and that these were subsequently adopted for the Gregorian tones and for plain-song. Not that the Psalm tones themselves were borrowed, as has been erroneously supposed; the only suggestion of influence there is in the use by the Church of the Synagogal method of giving the intonation (which obtains in the Sephardic and Ashkenazic renderings) at the beginning of a Psalm for what is termed the Antiphon.

There are striking similarities between the old Latin Church neumes and the Hebrew cantillation signs.¹ Possibly, when a line was used, considerably later than the adoption of the neumes, for denoting the height and depth of a sound, the idea was borrowed from the manner in which the Hebrew signs are placed in the text.²

The writer's discovery of a strong similarity between the Ashkenazic cantillation for Zech. ii. 14 and the Te Deum is shown in the following example:

² Of considerable importance is Elikan N. Adler's discovery of a Hebrew manuscript in the Genizah at the old Synagogue at Fostat, near Cairo. The signs depicted thereon are neumes. The present writer with the aid of the late Abby Williams and the Benedictine fathers (Solennes) has reproduced the musical content into modern notation. The date ascribed to the music is the end of the 12th or 13th century. Characteristics not found elsewhere are:

(1) The Hebrew letter Daleth (numerical value 24) employed to denote the clef Fa on fourth line.

(2) The ingenious usage of a line showing a number of notes to be sung on a particular syllable of the word over which it is placed.

Cf. Musical Times, Mar. 1921, for fuller details and reproduction of Hebrew MS.

The discovery was the result of investigations of Oskar Fleischer's attempt to trace its origin to a musical setting (akin to, and very probably derived from, the ancient cantillation) of a mediæval Hebrew psalm, written circa 11th or 12th century.

The writer has also discovered a similarity between the ancient Ashkenazic cantillation for the 'Lamentations of Jeremiah' and the musical rendering of the same in the Latin Church.³

HEBRIDES. 'Die Hebriden' is one of the names of Mendelssohn's concert overture (in B minor, op. 26), the others being 'Fingals Höhle' and 'Die einsame Insel.'

It was first played by the Philharmonic Society, May 14, 1832.

HECHT, EDUARD (b. Dürkheim, Haardt, Nov. 28, 1832; d. Manchester, Mar. 7, 1887), was trained at Frankfort by his father, a respected musician, then by Jacob Rosenhain, Christian Hauff and Messer. In 1854 he came to England and settled in Manchester, where he remained until his death, which took place very suddenly.

From a very early date in the history of Hallé's Concerts, Hecht was associated with him as his chorus-master and sub-conductor. But in addition to this he was conductor of the Manchester Liedertafel from 1859-78; from 1860 conductor of the St. Cecilia Choral Society; and from 1879 conductor of the Stretford Choral Society. In 1875 he was appointed lecturer on harmony and composition at Owens College; and was also Examiner in Music to the High Schools for Girls at Manchester and Leeds. In addition to these many and varied posts Hecht had a large private practice as teacher of the piano. These constant labours, however, did not exhaust his eager spirit, or deaden his power of original composition. Besides a symphony played at Hallé's Concerts; a chorus, 'The Charge of the Light Brigade'; 'Eric the Dane,' a cantata; another chorus with orchestra, 'O may I join the choir invisible'—all in their day favourites with choral societies—Hecht's works extend through a long list of pianoforte pieces, songs, partsongs, trios, two string quartets, marches for military band, etc., closing with op. 28.

HECK, JOHN CASPAR, a German by birth, came to London and published A Complete System of Harmony; or a Regular and Easy Method to attain a Fundamental Knowledge and Practice of Thoroughbass, 1768; The Art of Playing the Harpsichord, 1788; The Art of Playing Thoroughbass with Correctness, according to the true Principles of Composition, 1793; The Art of Fingering, 1770. W. H. C.

He published a revised version of Grassineau's Dictionary of Music, 1784. W. H. G. F.

HECKEL, WOLF (WOLFGANG) (b. Munich, 16th cent.), became a citizen of Strassburg. He wrote 'Lautten Buch . . . mit zwei Lautten zu schlagen' (Strassburg, 1556), containing 12 sacred and secular German songs; 4 Latin, 11 French and 5 Italian songs; dance tunes; and 4 fantasias. E. v. d. s.

HECKELCLARINET, the name given to an instrument designed by the Biberich instrument-makers to play the shepherd's pipe melody in 'Tristan und Isolde,' signifying that Isolde's ship is in sight. It is played with a single reed, like that of the clarinet. For this particular passage a muted trumpet has been used, and also the Taragato.

HECKELPHONE, see OBOE (4).

HECKMANN, GEORG JULIUS ROBERT (b. Mannheim, Nov. 3, 1848; d. Glasgow, Nov. 29, 1891), was a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium under David, 1865-67, Konzertmeister of the 'Euterpe' at Leipzig, 1867-70, and in the same capacity at Cologne, 1872-75. He then formed the famous 'Heckmann Quartet' with Herren Forberg, Allekotte and Bellmann, an organisation which had remarkable success wherever it was heard. They appeared first in England at the Prince's Hall in the spring of 1885, and were warmly appreciated. In 1886 they gave a series of daily concerts in Steinway Hall, and paid regular visits to England until 1888. They were the first players to reveal to the London public the qualities that arise from constant association, the beauty, in fact, of perfect ensemble as distinguished from individual attainment. Among other things, their playing of Beethoven's great fugue, op. 133, in Dec. 1887 was memorable. In 1881 Heckmann resumed his post at Cologne for a short time, appearing as a solo violinist in England in 1889, and in 1891 he undertook the duties of Konzertmeister at the Stadttheater of Bremen; he never entered upon them, for he died while on a concert-tour, at Glasgow. M.

HEDGCOCK, WALTER W. (b. Brighton, 1864), organist, conductor, composer. At the age of 12 he became assistant organist at St. Michael's, Brighton, a little later holding also the post of organist and choirmaster at the village of Patcham. In 1879 he was appointed to St. Agnes, Kennington Park, S.E., where he remained many years. After deputising for A. J. Eyre as organist at the Crystal Palace, he succeeded him in 1894, ten years later becoming Musical Director on the retirement of Sir August Manns. In this capacity he has been in charge of the general musical arrangements of the Handel Festivals of 1906-9-12-20-23-26, and has acted as organist thereto. For over twenty years he has been hon. conductor of the Crystal Palace Choir and Crystal Palace Orchestral Society. He has composed a good deal, his best-known works being songs.

H. G.

HEDGELAND, WILLIAM, established an organ factory in London in 1851. Amongst his instruments are those of St. Mary Magdalene, Paddington; Holy Cross, St. Helen's, Lancashire; and St. Thomas, Portman Square, London. V. de R.

HEDING (HEDINE), JACQUES DE (b. Picardy, 13th cent.; d. circa 1270), a troubadour; 2 chansons with the melodies by him are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris.

HEDMONDT, EMANUEL CHRISTIAN (b. Maine, U.S.A., Oct. 24, 1857), operatic tenor. He was educated in Canada and studied singing at Leipzig. He first appeared in opera in Berlin and sang for one season (1886) at Bayreuth. His sympathetic voice, however, was scarcely powerful enough to satisfy German audiences in the heroic tenor parts of the Wagner repertory, and he did better in England, where he ultimately settled down. Under engagement to Augustus Harris, he happened to be in London during a brief season of opera in Nov. 1891, and was hastily sent for to replace an indisposed tenor as Lohengrin. His success led to a long period of work with the Carl Rosa Company, his Lohengrin and Tannhäuser being generally considered his best parts. He also appeared once or twice in London in lighter rôles, as, for instance, Rip van Winkle in Franco Leoni's opera at Her Majesty's Theatre, in Sept. 1897, and again, in Nov. of the same year, in Lecocq's 'Scarlet Feather,' at the Shaftesbury. He gave an autumn season on his own account at Covent Garden in 1895, appearing as Siegmund in 'The Valkyrie' (first time in English); and in 1908 acted as stage-manager besides taking part in the English performances of the 'Ring.' He last sang there during the Carl Rosa season of 1909. H. K.

HEERMANN, Hugo (b. Heilbronn on the Neckar, Mar. 3, 1844), violinist, was, when a boy of 10, introduced by Rossini to Fétis, then director of the Brussels Conservatoire, in which institution he studied the violin under J. Meerts, and won a first prize at the end of three years. In 1865 he was appointed leader of the Museum Concerts at Frankfort, and in 1878 undertook the post of professor of the violin in the Hoch Conservatorium of that city, retaining it till 1904, when he founded a violin school of his own. He was leader of the Frankfort String Quartet (H. Bassermann, Naret-Köning, Hugo Becker), which has played on the Continent with much success. He moved to Chicago in 1907, to Berlin in 1910 and to Geneva in 1911. He has edited a new edition of De Beriot's Violin School. w. w. c.

HEGER, ROBERT (b. Strassburg, Aug. 19, 1886), a conductor of international fame whose field of activities extends over Nuremberg, Munich Grand Opera House, Vienna State Opera House, Royal Opera House, Covent Garden.

He studied in Zürich under L. Kemptner, and later in Munich under Max Schillings. As a composer Heger works on classical lines, showing, however, a marked influence of Schreker, Strauss and Schillings. Short themes, sudden modulations, sharp contrasts, characterise his works, which include: 'Die Juedin von Worms' (melodrama); op. 14, pianoforte trio; 'Ein Fest zu Haderslev' (opera, Nuremberg, Nov. 12, 1919); op. 12, 'Hero and Leander' (symphonic poem); op. 16, concerto in D major (for violin); symphony in D minor; 'Ein Friedenslied' (for soli, choir, orchestra and organ). H. J. K.

HEGNER, ANNA (b. Basle, Mar. 1, 1881), violinist. She is the sister of the late Otto Hegner, a pianist of distinction, and was herself in the first instance a student of the piano, but it was thought better that both children should not take up the same instrument, and at the age of 5 years she began to study the violin under Professor Wolf of Basle. At the age of 16 she was taken in hand by Hugo Heermann of Frankfort, from whom she acquired her proclivity for classical music. Her first public success was in England, where she was heard with her brother at the piano. Since then she has proved her artistic capacity in the many Continental cities in which she has appeared, her programmes including all the masterpieces of violin literature. She gave a cycle of 5 concerts at Queen's Hall in 1923, in the course of which she performed a series of great concertos, showing a marked individuality of style and so much grace of expression that she takes a high rank among the world's violinists. w. w. c.

HEIDEGGER, JOHN JAMES (b. circa 1659–1660; d. Sept. 4, 1749),¹ by birth a Swiss, as it is supposed, arrived in England in necessitous circumstances in 1707. Swiny was still sole manager of the Opera House, but Heidegger was probably the person ('tho' musick is only his diversion') to whom Motteux alluded in his Preface to 'Thomyris', as the selector of the songs in that opera. In 1708 he undertook the management, and held it until the end of the season of 1734 with varying success; but ended by acquiring a large fortune.² He had the address to procure a subscription which enabled him to put 'Thomyris' on the stage, and by this alone he gained 500 guineas. He introduced Ridotti and masquerades at the Opera; and, in allusion to this, Dr. Arbuthnot inscribed to him a poem, 'The Masquerade,' in which he is more severe on his ugliness than on his more voluntary vices. Pope describes him as—

'with less reading than makes felons 'scape, Less human genius than God gives an ape';

and commemorates his personal charms in the lines—

'And lo! her bird (a monster of a fowl), Something betwixt an Heidegger and owl.'
(Dunciad, bk. i.)

and a little print, below which are the words '—Risum teneatis amici?' translates his words into a caricature, representing a chimæra with the head of Heidegger. His face is preserved also in a rare etching by Worlidge, and in a capital mezzotint by Faber (1749) after Vanloo. Lord Chesterfield on one occasion wagered that Heidegger was the ugliest person in the town; but a hideous old woman was, after some trouble, discovered, who was admitted to be even uglier than Heidegger. As the latter was pluming himself on his victory, Lord Chesterfield insisted on his putting on the old woman's bonnet, when the tables were turned, and Lord Chesterfield was unanimously declared the winner amid thunders of applause.

Heidegger was commonly called the 'Swiss Count,' under which name he is alluded to in A Critical Discourse on Operas and Musick in England, appended to the Comparison between the French and Italian Musick and Operas of the Abbé Ragueneau, and in Hughes's Vision of Charon or the Ferry-boat.

The libretto of Handel's 'Amadigi' (1716) is signed by Heidegger as author. In 1729 they entered into operatic partnership at the Haymarket Theatre for three years, but the agreement lasted till 1734. In 1737 Heidegger resumed the management, which the nobility had abandoned, in consequence of Farinelli's detention at Madrid; but the season was calamitous. Previous to closing the theatre, he advertised for a new subscription (May 24, 1738); but a second advertisement (July 25), announced that the project of another season was relinquished. J. M.

HEIFETZ, JASCHA (b. Vilna, Russia, Feb. 2, 1901), violin virtuoso. At the age of 3 he began his training under the guidance of his father, Ravin Heifetz, himself an accomplished violinist. Later he studied at the Vilna School of Music under Elias Malkin, graduated at the age of 8, and made frequent appearances in public. In 1910 he was admitted as the youngest member of Professor Auer's famous class at the Imperial Conservatory, and in his twelfth year was formally launched into the musical world, touring in Russia, Germany and Scandinavia with exceptional success. A year later he played in Berlin, in Vienna (under Safonov), and in Leipzig at the Gewandhaus (under Nikisch). Then came the troublous times of the Revolution in Russia, and eventually, after many vicissitudes, he found his way to the United States, becoming a naturalised American citizen in May 1925.

His first appearance in London was on May 5, 1920, at Queen's Hall. Afterwards he toured in Australia and the East, revisited England in 1922 and 1925, and in 1926 fulfilled engagements which included a visit to Palestine. There he gave several free concerts to large audiences composed mainly of members of the Jewish colony. Already at this early stage in his career he has won for himself the reputation of being the most perfect technician upon his instrument now before the public. He is not what is known as a temperamental player, his aspirations being towards an art entirely free from exaggeration; but nothing more subtle in expression or more perfectly balanced has been heard than his interpretation of the works which the great masters have written for the violin.

HEIGHINGTON, MUSGRAVE, Mus.D. (b. 1680; d. Dundee, c. 1764), son of Ambrose Heighington, of White Hurworth, Durham, and grandson of Sir Edward Musgrave, of Hayton Castle, Cumberland, Bart., embraced the profession of music. He was organist of Hull Parish Church, 1717-20, gave concerts in Dublin, 1725-28, and was organist at Yarmouth, 1733-46. On Aug. 12, 1738, he was admitted a member of the Gentlemen's Society at Spalding, a literary and antiquarian body corresponding with the Society of Antiquaries. In 1739 he produced at the Society's anniversary an ode composed by him for the occasion. In 1748 he was organist of St. Martin's, Leicester, and in 1756 he was appointed to a post as organist at Dundee. He composed the vocal music in 'The Enchanter, or, Harlequin Merlin,' a pantomime published in Dublin, together with the instrumental music, a circumstance which, coupled with the facts of his wife being Irish and his son born in Dublin, leads to the inference that he at some time pursued his profession in that city. He also composed 'Six Select Odes,' and some minor pieces. He is said to have obtained his degree at Oxford,¹ but his name is not to be found in the records there, nor in the catalogues of graduates at Cambridge or Dublin.

HEIL DIR IM SIEGERKRANZ, a German national song, written by Heinrich Harries, a Holstein clergyman, for the birthday of Christian VII. of Denmark, and published in the Flensburger Wochenblatt of Jan. 27, 1790, 'to the melody of the English "God save great George the King."' It was originally in eight stanzas, but was reduced to five and otherwise slightly modified for Prussian use by B. G. Schumacher, and in this form appeared as a 'Berliner Volklied' in the Spenerische Zeitung of Dec. 17, 1793.² (See GOD SAVE THE KING.) The first stanza of the hymn in its present form is as follows:

'Heil Dir im Siegerkranz,
Herrscher des Vaterlands,
Heil König Dir!
Fühl in des Thrones Glanz,
Die hohe Wonne ganz,
Liebling des Volks zu sein,
Heil König Dir!'

HEIMKEHR AUS DER FREMDE ('Son and Stranger'), operetta by Mendelssohn written to words by Klingemann, and composed in London between Sept. 10 and Oct. 4, 1829, for the silver wedding of Mendelssohn's parents on the following Dec. 26. An English version, by H. F. Chorley, was produced at the Haymarket Theatre, London, July 7, 1851. G.

HEINE, SAMUEL FRIEDRICH, was chamber musician in Schwerin court chapel at Ludwigslust c. 1786-87; married the divorced wife of Friedrich Benda, née Rietz, a singer, in 1788; and after 1815 became secretary of the Grand-Ducal archives. He composed symphonies, an overture, sonata for pianoforte and clarinet or violin; also choral works; but he was chiefly esteemed as a song composer. E. v. d. s.

HEINEFETTER, (1) SABINA (b. Mainz, Aug. 19, 1809; d. Nov. 18, 1872),³ in early life supported her younger sisters by singing and playing the harp. In 1825 she appeared as a public singer at Frankfurt, and afterwards at Cassel, where Spohr interested himself in her artistic advancement. She subsequently studied under Tadolini in Paris, where she appeared at the Italiens with great success. From this time until her retirement from the stage in 1842, she appeared in all the most celebrated continental opera-houses. Her last appearance was in Frankfurt in 1844. In 1853 she married M. Marquet of Marseilles. Her sister, the name of Madame Stöckl-Heinefetter. She made successful appearances in Germany. She and her elder sister died insane. A third sister, (3) KATHINKA (b. 1820; d. Dec. 20, 1858), appeared with great success in Paris and Brussels from 1840 onwards (Mendel and Riemann).

HEINICHEN, JOHANN DAVID (b. near Weissenfels, Apr. 17, 1683; d. Dresden, July 16, 1729), was a pupil of the Thomasschule at Leipzig, under Schelle and Kuhnau; after studying law at the University of the same city, he practised as an advocate at Weissenfels for a short time. He soon returned to Leipzig, and composed several operas, undertaking the direction of the concerts called the Collegium musicum. He held some official post at Zeitz in 1710, when he begged Duke Moritz Wilhelm for permission to visit foreign countries and study the state of music in Italy and elsewhere. About the same time he must have been engaged upon his best-known work, the treatise, Neu erfundene und gründliche Anweisung, a valuable explanation of thorough-bass; it was published in 1711 (a second and much altered edition appeared in 1728 with the title Der Generalbass in der Composition), and in the same year (1711) his wish to travel was gratified, and he went with a councillor named Buchta to Italy, remaining in Venice long enough to compose and bring out two operas, 'Calpurnia' and 'La passione per troppo amore.' He went to Rome, and entered the service of Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen, afterwards becoming attached to the suite of the Elector of Saxony, who ultimately appointed him, in Jan. 1717 Kapellmeister at Dresden, where his duties were to conduct the opera and superintend the music of the church. A quarrel with Senesino about 1720 had the result of relieving him of his operatic duties, and he remained in Dresden until his death. Various collections in Dresden contain in all about 15 masses, 3 requiems, many motets, 133 miscellaneous sacred compositions, three operas, other than those already named, five serenades and a number of vocal solos and duets. HEINLEIN (HAINLEIN), PAUL (b. Nuremberg, Apr. 11, 1626; d. there, Aug. 6, 1686). From a town musician he learned to play keyboard and all wind instruments. He went to Italy in 1646 for further studies; on his return in 1649 he was appointed musician to the Town Council. In 1655 he became organist at S. Egidius; in 1656 Kapellmeister at the Church of Our Lady; and in 1658 organist at S. Sebald's Cathedral. He composed a large number of sacred songs of contemporary poets; also church music. (For list see Q.-L.)

HEINRICH, ANTON PHILIPP (b. Schönbüchel, Bohemia, Mar. 11, 1781; d. New York, May 3, 1861), instrumental and song composer of merit (F. A. Mussik, Skizzen aus dem Leben des . . . A. Ph. Heinrich, 1843).

HEINRICH THE MONK (HENRICUS MONACHUS), a 10th-11th century famous composer of sequences. His hymn 'Ave praeclara Maris Stella' has been praised by Glarean. It is reproduced by Schubiger (No. 56), who also gives two celebrated sequences (Nos. 57, 58) by Godeschalk, Heinrich's pupil (Ambros, ii. 115).

HEINRICH VON MÜGLIN, a 14th-century composer, represented by some songs in the 'Codex Lunaecensis.' Some were republished in 1896 by F. Arnold Mayer and H. Rietsch (Q.-L.).

HEINROTH, JOHANN AUGUST GÜNTHER (b. Nordhausen, June 19, 1780; d. Göttingen, June 2, 1846). His father was organist at S. Peter's, Nordhausen, for 62 years. Heinroth succeeded Forkel at Göttingen as musical director of the university in 1818. He introduced a simplified musical notation for use in schools to supplant the use of numbers which had been adopted at the time. Heinroth's system was successful, at least in Hanover. In collaboration with Jacobson, at the latter's institute at Seesen, he did much to reform the Jewish service music, and some of the melodies and songs he composed for the purpose were widely used. He also founded the Academical Concerts at Göttingen. He composed some 4-part chorales and partsongs, and wrote a number of theoretical and didactic works. (For list see Riemann and Q.-L.) E. v. d. s.

HEINSIUS, ERNST, an 18th-century organist of Arnhem, Holland. Six of his compositions, 6 symphonies, op. 2, and 6 violin concertos appeared at Amsterdam in 1760.

HEINSIUS (HEINS), PETER (b. Brandenburg, 16th cent.), cantor at the school of Salzwedel c. 1579. Fétis speaks of him as cantor at the University of Wittenberg in 1590, but does not mention the source of his information. Heinsius wrote a considerable number of occasional songs 4-6 v. as well as some sacred songs. Those which appeared in 1589-90 were published at Wittenberg. E. v. d. s.

HEINTZ, WOLFF (WOLFGANG), organist at Magdeburg in 1537 and afterwards organist at Halle. He was a friend of Luther, who in 1543 wrote to condeole with him on the loss of his wife. He is mentioned also in Amerbach's Organ Tablature. His compositions consist of sacred and secular partsongs, of which several have been reprinted in modern editions; also psalms and cantatas. E. v. d. s.

HEINZE, GUSTAV ADOLPH (b. Leipzig, Oct. 1, 1820; d. there, Feb. 20, 1904), the son of a clarinetist in the Gewandhaus orchestra, into which he was himself admitted, in the same capacity, in his sixteenth year. In 1840 Mendelssohn gave him a year's leave of absence in order that he might perfect himself in the pianoforte study and composition. In 1844 he was appointed second Kapellmeister at the theatre at Breslau, where in 1846 his opera 'Loreley' was produced with great success. This was followed by 'Die Ruinen von Tharandt' in 1847, which also obtained much success. The books of both were by his wife. In 1850 he received the appointment of conductor of the German opera in Amsterdam, and although that institution was not of long duration he remained in that city. Many choral societies, some of a philanthropic nature, were directed by him, and thus opportunities were given for the production of the two oratorios 'Die Auferstehung' and 'Sancta Cecilia,' in 1863 and 1870 respectively. The list of his works includes, besides the above, the choral works 'Der Feenschleier' and 'Vincentius von Paula,' three masses, cantatas, three concert overtures, and many choral compositions of shorter extent, as well as songs, etc. (Mendel's Lexicon). M.

HEKKING, (1) ANDRÉ (b. Bordeaux, Dec. 30, 1866; d. Paris, Dec. 14, 1925), violoncellist, belonged to a family which produced a number of musicians. At Bordeaux he was the pupil of his uncle, Charles Hekking. At 15 years of age he began touring in Spain, and in consequence made a great success for himself throughout Europe. He settled in Paris at the end of 1909, took charge of the class of Cros Saint-Ange at the Conservatoire in 1918, and in 1919 was appointed professor and was decorated in the same year with the Légion d'honneur. The fullness of his tone and breadth of his style made him the uncontested master of the French school of violoncellists.

(2) GÉRARD (b. Nancy, Aug. 22, 1879) violoncellist, cousin of the preceding, won the first prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1899; then spent a year in the orchestra of the Opéra. At the end of 1900 he began a very active concert career, chiefly abroad. He has played in Belgium under the conductorship of Eugène Ysaÿe, in Russia with Safonov, in Holland with Mengelberg, Mahler, etc., in France with all the great symphonic societies. His talent, combining a finely developed technique with an unerring musical sense and artistic enterprise, has made him on numerous occasions the champion of new works, many of which are dedicated to him. M. P.

HELDER, BARTHOLOMAEUS (b. Gotha c. end of 16th cent.), studied theology and became schoolmaster at Friemar, near Gotha, c. 1614-1615; afterwards pastor of Remstedt, where he was in 1620. He wrote 'Cymbalum genethliacum,' New Year and Christmas songs, 4-6 v. (1614); 'Cymbalum Davidicum,' sacred songs mostly taken from the Psalms of David, 5, 6 and 8 parts (1620); also a number of sacred and secular songs in various collective volumes, among others the well-known song, 'Das alte Jahr vergangen ist.' HÈLE, or HELLE, GEORGE DE LA (b. Antwerp after 1550; d. 1589). In his earlier years he was a chorister in the Royal Chapl. at Madrid. The details of his later life as given by Van der Straeten and others are somewhat conflicting.¹ This much is certain, that in 1578 he was choirmaster (Phonascus he is styled) at the Cathedral of Tournai. From 1580 to his death he would seem to have returned to Madrid to preside over the choir of the Royal Chapel. In 1576 he obtained two prizes at a competition which took place yearly in connexion with a Puy de Musique de la Sainte Cécile at Évreux in Normandy, the second prize of a silver harp for the second best motet a 5, and the first prize of a silver lute for the best chanson a 5. It was just the year before, in 1575, that Orlandus Lassus had won the first prize of a silver organ with his motet a 5, 'Domine Jesu Christe qui cognoscis.' These competitions began in 1575, and continued to 1589. Besides the motet and chanson, the only other work of La Hèle which ever appeared in print is a volume of Masses (Octo Missae, quinque, sex et septem vocom, etc. . . . Antwerp, 1578). This work was dedicated to Philip II. of Spain, and it is in the title that La Hèle is styled Phonascus of Tournai Cathedral, while in the dedication he styles himself an 'alumnus' of the King. It is a large choir-book in folio, containing all the parts together. It was issued from the printing-press of Christophe Plantin at Antwerp, and is one of the most magnificent specimens of musical typography. A facsimile and further account of it may be seen in Goovaert's Histoire et bibliographie de la typographie musicale dans les Pays-Bas, pp. 46 and 253. Goovaerts also gives a copy of the agreement between composer and printer. The work is remarkable for another reason. It consists of 8 masses which are all 'Missae parodiae,' the motives of which are borrowed from the most celebrated motets of the great Netherland masters. Thus there are 2 masses a 5, based on two motets of Lassus a 5, 'Oculi omnium' and 'Gustate et videte'; 2 masses a 6, based on the motets of Lassus a 6, 'Quare tristis es,' and 'Fremuit Jesus'; 2 masses a 7, based on Josquin's celebrated motets 'Praeter rerum seriem' and 'Benedicta coelorum regina'; 2 other masses a 5, based on Rore's 'In convertendo' and Crecquillon's 'Nigra sum sed formosa.' The whole work is thus a homage paid by La Hèle to his greater predecessors. Other works of La Hèle are supposed to have perished in a fire at Madrid in 1734. J. R. M.

HÉLÈNE, opera in one act, words and music by Camille Saint-Saëns. Produced Monte Carlo, Feb. 18, 1904; Covent Garden, June 20, 1904; and Opéra-Comique, Paris, Jan. 18, 1905.

HELPER, CHARLES DE (second half 17th cent.), canon and master of the choir-boys at Soissons Cathedral. He wrote some excellent masses published between 1655 and 1674, of which some appeared in several editions; a 'Missa pro defunctis' (in La Borde's Essai sur la musique, vol. ii. 104), vespers and other church music. HELFERT, VLADIMIR (b. 1886), musical critic and historian, Ph.D., appointed in 1921 to the Chair of Music in the University of Brno. His writings, which at present have not been translated, include Hudební barok na českých zámcích (Musical baroque in the castles of Bohemia), 1916, and Hudba na zámku Jaroměřickém (Music in the castle of Jaroměřice), works which throw interesting light on the musical life of the country in the 17th century.

HELLENDAAAL, PIETER, a Dutch violinist, pupil of Tartini, who, after returning from Padua, published several compositions at Amsterdam, and entered the University in 1749. He afterwards settled in London, where in 1752 he obtained a prize at the Catch Club. His works are mainly for violin, alone and in combination; and several of them were published at Cambridge, where also appeared his Collection of Psalms, etc., about 1780. (Q.-L.)

HELLER, JOHANN CHILIAN, a 17th-century composer, who wrote 'Sacer concentus musicus,' containing 5 masses, psalms, motets, . . . 2 sonatas (Mayence, 1671); two pieces in MS. in Upsala library (Q.-L.).

HELLER, STEPHEN (b. Pest, May 15, 1814; d. Paris, Jan. 14, 1888), an accomplished pianist, and author of a large number of pieces for his instrument, mostly on a small scale, but generally elegant in form and refined in diction.

Having studied with Anton Halm in Vienna, and appeared in public at Pest at an early age, he made a tour through Germany, and settled from 1830-33 at Augsburg, where after a prolonged illness he found ample leisure to pursue his studies. From 1838 he resided in Paris, rarely playing in public, but much esteemed as a teacher and composer. He came to England in Feb. 1850, and appeared at a concert of the Beethoven Quartet Society, Queen Anne Street, Apr. 17, and at Ella's Musical Union, May 3, and he stayed until August. He visited England again in 1862, and played at the Crystal Palace with Hallé on May 3 in Mozart's concerto in E flat for two pianos.

His first publication was a set of variations in 1829, and what is apparently his latest, op. 157, 'Three Feuilletts d'album,' about 1884. Next to his numerous Études and Preludes, the best of his publications consist of several series of morceaux put forth under quaint titles, such as 'Promenades d'un solitaire' (taken from Rousseau's letters on Botany), 'Blumen-Frucht- und Dornen-Stücke' (from Jean Paul), 'Dans les bois,' 'Nuits blanches,' etc. A 'Saltarello' on a phrase from Mendelssohn's Italian symphony (op. 77), five Tarantellas (opp. 53, 61, 85, 87), a Caprice on Schubert's 'Forelle' (known as 'La Truite'), are pieces wherein Heller rings the changes on his stock of musical material with delicate ingenuity, and exhibits less of that wearisome reiteration of some short phrase, without either development or attempt at attractive variety in treatment, which afterwards grew into a mannerism with him. He also put forth four solo sonatas¹ which have left no trace, and, together with Ernst the violinist, a set of 'Pensées fugitives' for piano and violin, which have met with great and deserved success amongst dilettante players. His life and works are the subjects of a monograph by H. Barbedette, translated into English by the Rev. R. Prown Borthwick, 1877.

HELLINCK, JOANNES LUPUS (d. 1541), a Flemish composer of the earlier part of the 16th century. His name is variously given as Joannes Lupus, Lupus Hellinck, Joannes Lupi, and sometimes Lupus or Lupi simply. Only once, in a publication of 1546, is the full name given. It was for some time uncertain whether Joannes Lupus and Joannes Lupi were one and the same person, but the identification seems now to be satisfactorily established.² There is still some difficulty in reconciling the conflicting statements as to the appointments which he held. It would appear, however, to be sufficiently made out that he was for a time choirmaster at Cambrai, and afterwards at Bruges. In a publication of 1545 there is a 'Déploration de Lupus,' or Lament on his death, composed by Baston. This has been reprinted in Maldeghem's Trésor, 1876. The only work which contains compositions by Lupus exclusively is a book of Motets, Paris, 1542. His other works, which are fairly numerous, are contained in the large collections which issued from the French, German and Venetian presses between 1530 and 1550. From about 1530-45 Lupus would appear to have held the same position in general esteem that Clemens non Papa afterwards held from 1545-1560. One of the choir-books of the Sistine Chapel, written between 1530-40, contains an unpublished Mass by Lupus on a Flemish song, 'Min Vriendinne.' Ten of his masses were published, and Q.-L. enumerates a few more remaining in MS. Of the masses Ambros speaks somewhat disparagingly, with the exception of one entitled 'Panis quem ego dabo,' which, from the boldness of its themes, he describes as very remarkable and peculiar, but which is further distinguished by the fact that Palestrina did not disdain to borrow the themes of his Mass 'Panis quem ego dabo' from the motet of Lupus beginning with these words, on which no doubt Lupus's own Mass was based. The Mass 'Iam non dicam' Ambros describes as a study in dissonances, not altogether successful, but otherwise interesting. To the motets, on the other hand, Ambros gives the highest praise. There is one, more especially, which fully deserves all the praise Ambros gives, a 'Laudate pueri' a 5, which may be seen in Kade and Eitner's reprint in score of Ott's Liederbuch, 1544. In it there is nothing of the hardness either in melody or harmony usually associated with our idea of the times before Palestrina; the themes are melodious and interesting throughout. Palestrina himself might have written the work. The fifth voice has a cantus firmus with long notes, with only the words 'Laudate pueri, corde et animo' (Ambros gives this wrong). The composer takes the liberty of adding the words 'corde et animo' in the other parts also to the various 'Laudate' psalm-verses which he sets. This might be taken to imply that he himself had written this motet 'with heart and mind.' Other works of Lupus are eleven 4-voice settings of German sacred songs, contained in Rhau's large collection of Deutsche geistliche Gesänge für Schulen, 1544, one of which, a deeply expressive setting of Markgraf Casimir's lied, 'Capitän Herr Gott,' is also in Ott's Liederbuch of 1544. Lastly, there are about 26 French chansons, and three with Flemish words, contained in the collections of Attaignant and Susato. Three very pretty specimens, 'Revin's vers moi,' 'Il n'est trésor,' 'Plus revenir ne puis,' have been reprinted by Eitner in his selection of Chansons, 1899.

HELLMANN, MAX JOSEPH, an early 18th-century composer in the Imperial chapel at Vienna. He composed (c. 1733-37) 5 operas dedicated to the Archduchesses Theresa and Maria Anna (Q.-L.).

HELLMANN, MAXIMILIAN (b. circa 1703; d. Vienna, Mar. 20, 1763), a pupil of Hebenstreit. He was appointed 'Cymbalist' (player of the pantaleon, a large kind of dulcimer) in the Imperial Chapel. Fux praises his virtuosity on the pantaleon, which he (Fux) considered most effective in the orchestra; but the Emperor suppressed it afterwards as it cost 400 guilders a year in strings alone.

HELLMESBERGER, a distinguished family of musicians in Vienna. (1) GEORG (b. Vienna, Apr. 24, 1800; d. Neuwaldeg, Aug. 16, 1873), son of a country schoolmaster, and chorister in the court chapel, entered the Conservatorium of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in 1820, and learnt the violin from Böhm and composition from E. Förster. In 1821 he was appointed assistant teacher, and in 1833 professor at the Conservatorium, where he taught a host of distinguished pupils, including his two sons, as well as Ernst, Joachim, Miska Hauser and Leopold Auer; he retired on a pension in 1867. In 1829 he became conductor of the Imperial opera, and in 1830 a member of the court chapel. This unassuming man, who lived only for his art, was leader at innumerable concerts, published many compositions for his instrument, and died universally respected. His eldest son, (2) GEORG (b. Vienna, Jan. 27, 1830; d. Nov. 12, 1852), made a successful concert-tour through Germany and England with his father and brother in 1847, but chiefly devoted himself to composition, which he studied under Rotter. When barely twenty-one he was appointed Konzertmeister at Hanover, where he brought out two operas, 'Die Bürgschaft' and 'Die beide Königinnen.' His brother (3) JOSEPH (b. Nov. 23, 1829; d. Oct. 24, 1893) early displayed a great faculty for music, and appeared in public as an infant prodigy. In spite of his youth he was appointed violin professor and director of the Conservatorium, when it was reconstituted in 1851, and professional conductor of the Gesellschaft concerts. He resigned the latter post in favour of Herbeck in 1859, and the professorship in 1877, but retained the post of director until his death, with signal advantage to the institution. In 1860 he was appointed Konzertmeister at the Imperial opera, in 1863 first violin solo in the court chapel, and in 1877 chief Kapellmeister to the emperor, resuming the conductorship of the Gesellschaft concert for one season. The quartet parties which he led from 1849-87 maintained their attraction undiminished in spite of all rivalry. These performances were among the first to awaken general interest in Beethoven's late quartets. The fine tone, grace and poetic feeling which marked Hellmesberger's execution as a solo and quartet player were equally conspicuous in the orchestra, of which he was a brilliant leader. To these qualities he united perfect familiarity with every instrument in the orchestra, and considerable skill as a pianist. He received the Legion of Honour for his services as a juror in the Paris Exhibition of 1855; and many other orders, both of his own and other countries, were conferred on him. On the twenty-fifth anniversary of his directorship of the Conservatorium he was presented with the freedom of the city of Vienna. His son (4) JOSEPH (b. Apr. 9, 1855; d. Vienna, Apr. 26, 1907) inherited the family talent, and played second violin in his father's quartet from 1875 succeeding him as leader in 1887. From 1878 he was solo player at the court opera and chapel, and professor at the Conservatorium. He became second Kapellmeister for ballets and concerts at the court opera in 1899, and first in 1900. He resigned in Sept. 1903. His works include six operettas and six ballets.

HELLWIG, KARL FRIEDRICH LUDWIG (b. Kunersdorf, near Wrietzen, July 23, 1773; d. Berlin, Nov. 24, 1838), was appointed organist at the Dom, Berlin, Aug. 20, 1813; also singing master at Joachimsthal College. In 1815 he received the title of Musikdirektor. He composed a large amount of church music, 2 operas, masonic and other songs with pianoforte, and a fugue for string quartet. He edited works by Händel, Gluck and Hasse. (Riemann: Q.-L.)

HELMBRECHT, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH FRANZ (also called WENDT after his stepfather), an 18th-19th century musician, who became blind in early youth but learned to play the organ, pianoforte, harp, flute, clarinet and other instruments. He invented a musical notation for the blind, and composed pieces for the organ, etc. 'Das Launenspiel' for organ and pianoforte was published in Kühnau's 'Die blinden Tonkünstler,' 1810. Helmbrecht was appointed organist at the French Monastery Church, Berlin, in 1790.

HELMHOLTZ, HERMANN LUDWIG FERDINAND VON (b. Potsdam, Aug. 31, 1821; d. Charlottenburg, Berlin, Sept. 8, 1894), was one of the leading scientific men of the 19th century.

In his earlier years he was a surgeon in the Prussian army, but he soon turned his attention to physiology and was appointed in succession to the Chairs of Physiology at Königsberg (1849), Bonn (1855) and Heidelberg (1858).

Whilst he occupied these professorships he published many important works on physiology, amongst which may be mentioned a treatise on Physiological Optics and papers on the Physiology of Muscle and Nerve.

From his early years he showed an interest in physics, and at the age of 26 he published a paper which forms one of the foundations of the doctrine of the Conservation of Energy.

In 1871 he abandoned physiology on his appointment to the professorship of Physics in Berlin, and during the later years of his life his published work included papers on Meteorology, Colour Vision, the Principle of Least Action, Electro-dynamical Theory and other physical subjects.

It was in 1862, whilst he was professor of Physiology at Heidelberg, that he produced his great work, Lehre von den Tonempfindungen als physiologische Grundlage für die Theorie der Musik (6th edition, 1913), known in England as The Sensations of Tone.¹ This book marked an epoch in the development of the theoretical basis of music by giving for the first time a physical explanation of Consonance, the Quality of Musical Notes, the origin of Combination Tones, and the causes of the differences between the Vowel Sounds.

Helmholtz's acoustical theories have been frequently attacked, but they have stood the test of time, and, though they may have been modified in details, are now generally accepted as correct in their main features.

For details of the theories see articles ACOUSTICS (subsections CONSONANCE, QUALITY, COMBINATION TONES) and VOWEL SOUNDS.

HELMONT, (1) CHARLES JOSEPH VAN (b. Mar. 19, 1715; d. ? Brussels, June 8, 1790), maître de chapelle at Notre Dame, Brussels, 1737, and at SS. Michel et Gudule, 1749. He composed an opera, church and secular, choral and instrumental works. His son (2) ADRIEN JOSEPH VAN (b. Brussels, Aug. 14, 1747; d. there, Dec. 28, 1830), was conductor at the Amsterdam theatre until it was burnt down, when he returned to Brussels as choirmaster of the children at St. Gudule and succeeded his father as maître de chapelle in 1790. He took an active part in the revolution and was living at Ghent in 1791; but returned to Brussels, where he was reinstated. In later years he lived in retirement with his son, a professor at the Royal Conservatoire. He composed masses, an opera, etc., which remained in MS.

HELMORE, REV. THOMAS (b. Kidderminster, May 7, 1811; d. London, July 6, 1890), was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. In 1840 he became curate of St. Michael's, Lichfield, and a priest-vicar of Lichfield Cathedral. In 1842 he was appointed Vice-Principal and Precentor of St. Mark's College, Chelsea, and in 1846 succeeded William Hawes as Master of the Choristers of the Chapel Royal, of which in 1847 he was admitted as one of the Priests in Ordinary. He was author or editor of The Psalter noted, The Canticles noted, A Manual of Plain-Song, A Brief Directory of Plain Song, The Hymnal noted, Carols for Christmas, Carols for Easter, St. Mark's College Chant Book and The Canticles accented; and translator of Fétis's Treatise on Chorus Singing. He composed music for some of Neale's translations of Hymns for the Eastern Church. See CHANT.

HEMING, PERCY (b. Bristol, Sept. 6, 1887), well-known English baritone. He was taught at the R.A.M. by Frederic King, studying afterwards with other masters. One event in Heming's career stands out above everything else. When at Covent Garden in 1919, under Sir Thomas Beecham's management, with Albert Coates conducting 'Parsifal' (singing in English for the first time on the stage in this country), he was the Amfortas. It was a severe ordeal, but he passed through it with distinction. Since then Heming has for the most part devoted himself to lighter work, singing all through the long run of 'Lilac Time' at the Lyric Theatre and then taking up musical comedy. Among his opera parts are Valentine in 'Faust,' Marcel in 'La Bohème' and the Escamillo in 'Carmen.'

HEMIOLIA (Gr. ἡμιόλιος; Lat. sesquialtera; Fr. hémiole; Ital. emiolia). Literally, the whole and a half; technically, the proportion of two to three. In this latter sense the word is used, in the musical terminology of the Middle Ages, to denote the perfect fifth, the sound of which is produced on the monochord by two-thirds of the open string. The term is also applied by writers of the 16th century to certain rhythmical proportions, corresponding to the triplets of modern music. Thus, three minims, sung against two, are called Hemiolia major; three crotchets (semiminime) against two, Hemiolia minor. (See PROPORTION.) Italian writers of later date call 3-4 time Emiolia maggiore, and 3-8 Emiolia minore.

HEMMERLEIN, a remarkable Bamberg family of musicians. (1) ANTON (b. Bamberg, 1730; d. there, Sept. 11, 1811) was an excellent violoncellist, a pupil of F. Woczia and J. Riepel, and appeared with great success as soloist at Regensburg and Augsburg. From 1780 he was 'court kettledrummer' in the Bamberg court chapel, and composed sonatas, etc. (2) FRANZ ANTON was chamber musician at the same court. He had two sons: (3) and (4). (3) KARL IGNAZ (b. 1773; d. Bamberg, Feb. 24, 1840), who conducted the opera at Bamberg in the then customary manner, as violinist. He was for a short time replaced by Dr. Joh. Dan. Elster, who conducted with a baton, but the opposition to this proved so strong that Hemmerlein was soon reinstated. He was afterwards court 'Musikdirektor' at Fulda. (4) THOMAS, a violoncellist who made his début at Bamberg in 1784, and was appointed at the court of Salzburg in 1789. (5) JOHANN NIKOLAUS, from 1740-63 teacher of music at the Bamberg college. Mendel mentions him as chamber musician of the Prince-bishop of Lemberg, and as composer of a Mass published in 1748. (6) EVA URSULA, daughter of Johann Nikolaus (5), an excellent singer at the Bamberg court, married her cousin Anton (1) in 1762. (See Marschalk, Bamberger Hofmusik.)

E. v. d. s.

HEMMERLEIN, JOSEPH, was at Frankfurt in 1780 as pianist and composer. Whether or how far he was connected with the Bamberg family is not evident. In 1786 he was in the service of Countess von Vorberg and then went to Paris, where he was still living in 1799. He composed 6 pianoforte concertos; symphonies for pianoforte and strings; pianoforte and violin sonatas; sonatas, rondos, etc., for pianoforte (Fétis; Q.-L.).

HEMONY, (1) FRANZ (1609-67), (2) PIETER (1619-80), the greatest bell-founders of the 17th century. Originally from Lorraine, they set up in business as makers of cannon at Zutphen in 1640.

In 1645 they completed their first carillon for Zutphen winehouse tower. In 1654 Franz removed to Amsterdam. He was held in such esteem that the authorities presented him with a building site for his foundry, at the same time entrusting him with the founding of carillons for five towers in their city.

At Zutphen the casting of cannon was continued. Pieter moved to Amsterdam in 1664, and after his brother's death carried on the business alone.

In 1678 he published in Delft a brochure entitled The Usefulness of C# and D# in the Bass of Carillons: shown by various Opinions of skilful Organists and Carillonneurs, in which he vigorously maintained the omission of these notes.

He was right in more ways than one, particularly as to the technique which is possible on the carillon clavier in such an extreme key as C#. Now, however, with the tuning of equal temperament and the requirements of modern music no carillon of 4 octaves in compass should be made without these semitones being included. During their thirty-four years of existence this firm, according to a list written out by them, made no less than 47 carillons, which list does not include many others known to have been made by them. W. W. S.

HEMPEL, FRIEDA (b. Leipzig, June 26, 1885), operatic and concert soprano. This accomplished artist, born and brought up amid musical surroundings, received her early training at the Leipzig Conservatoire, and was first intended to be a pianist. When her voice developed she entered the Stern Conservatorium at Berlin, and became a pupil of Mme. Nicklass Kempner. Her admirable method and the exquisite purity of her tone, allied to the freedom and facility of a natural coloratura singer, enabled her to fascinate the exigent audiences of the Royal Opera House in Berlin. She made her début there in Aug. 1905, in Nicolai's 'Merry Wives of Windsor'; but it was not until after two years' experience at the Court Opera, Schwerin (1905-7), that she settled down to her real career at Berlin, singing at the Royal Opera without interruption until 1912. Gradually she then built up a remarkably extensive and varied repertory of leading soprano rôles, chiefly belonging to the Italian school, and excelling more especially in the operas of Mozart, wherein her delicate art found perfect scope. The Queen of Night, for instance, had in her its finest exponent since Ilma di Murska, and the part won triumphs for her not only in Germany, but in America, where she first appeared in 1912, and in London, where she made her début during the Beecham season of 1913. At Berlin in 1911 she created the rôle of the Marschallin in Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier,' and also sang it at Drury Lane. Her enthusiastic reception at the Metropolitan Opera, followed by a round of brilliant successes in various parts, led her to take up her residence in New York, where she may be said to have taken the place formerly filled by Marcella Sembrich. She followed the same inspiring example in turning her attention to Lieder singing; gave vocal recitals everywhere in the United States and later in London, her fame spreading far and wide as a concert artist of the highest order. Her 'Jenny Lind recitals,' when the centenary of the birth of that great singer was being observed, enabled her to reproduce with profitable éclat some of the 'Swedish Nightingale's' old programmes; but her device of appearing on the concert platform attired in the ample skirts and flounces of the '50's was not in such perfect taste as her vocal efforts. On the whole, she is entitled to be regarded as an artist of exceptional merit, a rare exemplar of the art of the soprano leggiero, and, above all, one of the best Mozart singers of her day. In recent years she made numerous appearances in London at the Albert and Queen's Halls, and always before large and enthusiastic audiences.

H. K.

HEMPSON (HAMPSON), DENIS (b. Craigmere, near Garvagh, co. Londonderry; d. Magilligan, 1807), one of the last of the Irish bards. At the age of 3 years he lost his sight, as the result of smallpox. When 12 years old he began to learn the harp, under Bridget O'Cahan, and subsequently studied under Garragher (a blind travelling harper), Loughlin Fanning and Patrick Connor. All these were from Connaught, then the best part of the kingdom for harpers and Irish music generally. After six years of study of the harp he began to play for himself, and for many years travelled through Ireland and Scotland, always being hospitably received and entertained in the best houses in both countries. Several amusing anecdotes related by him of the people before whom he played are recorded by Sampson. During his second visit to Scotland (in 1745) he played before Charles Edward at Edinburgh. Later in life he settled down at Magilligan, in his native county, where he passed the rest of his life. He lived to the astounding age of 112, and retained his faculties to the end. Although confined to his bed, he played the harp (which he always kept with him under the bed-clothes) up to the day before his death.

Bunting (q.v.) says:

'He was the only one of the harpers at Belfast in 1792 who literally played the harp with long crooked nails, as described by the old writers. In playing he caught the string between the flesh and the nail; not like the other harpers of his day, who pulled it by the fleshy part of the finger alone. He had an admirable method of playing Staccato and Legato, in which he could run through rapid divisions in an astonishing style. His fingers lay over the strings in such a manner, that when he struck them with one finger, the other was instantly ready to stop the vibration, so that the Staccato passages were heard in full perfection. In fact, Hempson's Staccato and Legato passages, double slurs, shakes, turns, graces, etc., comprised as great a range of execution as has ever been devised by the most modern improvers.'

Hempson was, undoubtedly, a far finer player than his great contemporary, O'CAROLAN (q.v.), but he does not appear to have shared his fellow-countryman's creative gifts. The pieces which he delighted to play were the most ancient of the traditional airs of his country. These he loved passionately, but believed that modern ears could not properly appreciate or understand their beauty. Hempson was 43 years old when O'Carolan died. Although he had been in O'Carolan's company when a youth, it is interesting to notice that he never took pleasure in playing his compositions. O'Carolan was the first of the Irish bards to depart in any way from the traditional Irish style of composition. At the houses in Dublin and elsewhere where he played, he had frequent opportunities of hearing Italian and German music, and this music unquestionably influenced his style. It is easy to understand how Hempson, with his love for the most ancient Irish music, must have looked with disapproval on O'Carolan's modernised music and rebelled against it, just as Grig tells us that he himself did 'against the effeminate Scandinavianism of Gade mixed with Mendelssohn.' An excellent portrait of Hempson is given in Bunting's 'General Collection of the Ancient Music of Ireland' (1809). It is taken from an original drawing made by E. Scriven in 1797, when Hempson was over 100 years old. His harp is still preserved at Downhill, Co. Londonderry, the residence of Sir Henry Hervey Bruce, Bart.

HENDERSON, WILLIAM JAMES (b. Newark, New Jersey, U.S.A., Dec. 4, 1855), an American critic and scholar. He graduated at Princeton University in 1876 and began newspaper work as a reporter on The New York Tribune. In 1887 he became musical critic of The New York Times, a post which he occupied till 1902, when he went to The New York Sun. He has remained on the staff of that journal through its various changes of name and ownership. Since 1904 he has lectured at the Institute of Musical Art in New York, especially on the development of vocal art, on which he is an authority. As a critic he is distinguished for the soundness and sobriety of his judgments, his catholic taste and his extensive historical knowledge of styles and periods; also for his caustic characterisation of mediocrity and sham. He is the author of the libretto of 'Cyrano de Bergerac,' music by Walter Damrosch, produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1913, and of a novel, The Soul of a Tenor (1912). His books on musical subjects, critical and historical, have taken high rank for their interest and authority. They include:

The Story of Music. (1889.)
Preludes and Studies. (1891.)
What is Good Music? (1898.)
How Music Developed. (1898.)
The Orchestra and Orchestral Music. (1899.)
Wagner, his Life and Dramas. (1901.)
Modern Musical Drift. (1904.)
The Art of the Singer. (1906.)
Some Forerunners of Italian Opera. (1911.)
The Early History of Singing. (1921.)

HENKEL, MICHAEL (b. Fulda, June 24, 1780; d. there, Mar. 4, 1851), a pupil of J. G. Vierling; cantor and organist of the town and church of Fulda; episcopal court musician and music teacher at the college. He composed masses and other church music, a hymn-book which greatly improved the church music of the diocese, school songs, pianoforte and organ pieces; he also wrote a tutor for the organ. The number of his compositions exceeds two hundred (Mendel; Q.-L.).

HENNEBERG, JOHANN BAPTIST (b. Vienna, Dec. 6, 1768; d. Nov. 27, 1822), succeeded his father as organist of the Scottish church (Schotten Kloster) there. In 1790 he was conductor at Schikaneder's theatre, and as such directed the rehearsals of the 'Zauberflöte,' and all the performances of it after the second. He continued to hold the same post in the Theatre 'an der Wien' (1801), but soon afterwards left the city. In 1805 he entered Prince Esterhazy's establishment as first organist, and on Hummel's retirement in 1811 conducted the operas at Eisenstadt. In 1813 he returned to Vienna, became choirmaster at the parish church 'am Hof,' and in 1818 organist to the court. He was much esteemed both as a player and a composer. Amongst his operettas have been published—'Die Derwische,' 'Die Eisenkönigin' and 'Die Waldmänner'; also his arrangement of Winter's 'Labyrinth.' The MS. score of another, 'Konrad Longbart,' is in the Munich opera-house (Q.-L.).

HENNIUS (HEYNE, HAYM), GILLES (d. Liège, Apr. 1650), was singer in 1631 at St. John the Evangelist, Liège. In 1638 he was appointed superintendent of the Electoral Chapel at Düsseldorf by Wolfgang Wilhelm, without relinquishing his position at Liège where he was then a canon, and became cantor in 1640; he stood also in some relation to the Electoral court of Cologne, Liège belonging to that diocese. He composed masses, motets, a 'Hymnus S. Casimiri,' etc. (Q.-L.; Riemann).

HENRIC VAN UTRECHT, CORNELISZON (d. Utrecht, c. 1609), organist, first at St. Jacob's, then at St. Mary's, Utrecht. He composed 'Parnassus Musicus a 5 instr.,' Hamburg, 1625 (Q.-L.).

HENRIQUE; OR THE LOVE PILGRIM, opera in 3 acts; words by T. J. Haines; music by Rooke. Produced Covent Garden, May 2, 1839. G.

HENRY. Three of the eight English kings of this name are of some importance in musical history.

HENRY V. (reigned 1413–22) is famous for his maintenance of a full musical establishment as part of his CHAPEL ROYAL (q.v.). See Oxf. Hist. Mus. ii. 145.

HENRY VI. (reigned 1422–53) was a composer of some account. A Gloria and Sanctus (3 v.), in the Old Hall MS. signed 'Roy Henry,' is the principal evidence of his attainment. See article by W. Barclay Squire, Sammelb. of Int. Mus. Ges. 1900–1, p. 342. C.

HENRY VIII. (b. June 28, 1491; d. Jan. 28, 1547), being originally designed for the Church, was duly instructed in music (then an essential part of the acquirements of an ecclesiastic), and appears to have attained to some skill in composition. Hall, the Chronicler, and Lord Herbert of Cherbury mention two masses of his composition, neither now extant; Hawkins (chap. 77) has printed a Latin motet for three voices by Henry from a MS. collection of anthems, motets, etc., written in 1591 by John Baldwin (d. Aug. 28, 1615), singing man of Windsor and subsequently gentleman and clerk of the cheque of the Chapel Royal; and the anthem, 'O Lord, the Maker of all thing,' assigned by Barnard and others to William Mundy, was by Aldrich and Boyce declared to be proved to be the king's production (see Boyce's Cath. Music, ii. 1). In the B.M. Add. MSS. 5665 is 'Passotyme with good compaignye. The Kynges balade,' set to music for three voices. It is printed in John Stafford Smith's Musica antiqua and Chappell's Popular Music of the Olden Time. In Harl. MSS. 1419, fol. 200, is a catalogue of the numerous musical instruments belonging to Henry at the time of his death. Add. MSS. 31,922 contains, in addition to the above-named motet and ballad, five 4-part songs, twelve 3-part songs, fourteen pieces for three viols, and one piece for four viols, attributed to Henry.

HENRI VIII., opera in 4 acts, words by Léonce Détröyat and Armand Silvestre; music by Camille Saint-Saëns; produced Paris Opéra, Mar. 5, 1883, and Covent Garden, July 14, 1888.

W. H. H.

HENSCHEL, (1) SIR GEORGE (ISIDOR GEORG) (b. Breslau, Feb. 18, 1850), distinguished as a singer, composer and conductor, had the advantage of very early training in music, as at the age of 5 years he joined a class of eight children who were taught to play simultaneously on eight pianos.

This naturally encouraged the strong sense of rhythm which has always distinguished Henschel's vocal and other performances. He joined the university choral society of Breslau, and sang the soprano solo of Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' in 1859. He made his first public appearance as a pianist in 1862 in Berlin as a pupil of the Wandell Institut in Breslau. Only four years after this he developed a basso-profondo voice, and sang at a concert at Hirschberg, July 28, 1866. In 1867 he entered the Leipzig Conservatorium under Moscheles for pianoforte, Reinecke and Richter for theory, Goetze for singing, and Papperitz for the organ. In 1868 'Die Meistersinger' was produced at Munich, and in the same year young Henschel, whose voice had become a fine baritone, sang the part of Hans Sachs at a concert performance of the work at Leipzig, thus early associating himself with the music, although he never sang the part on the stage. In 1870, on the completion of his three-years' course at Leipzig, he entered the Royal Conservatorium at Berlin, studying composition with Kiel, and singing with Adolph Schulze. An important appearance as a singer was at the Niederrheinische Festival at Cologne in 1874; and in the following year he sang the principal part in Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion,' conducted by Brahms. His first appearance in England was at the Popular Concert of Feb. 19, 1877, when he sang songs by Handel and Schubert, and impressed all his hearers with his sympathetic voice and the wonderful artistic intelligence he put into his songs. He was at once engaged for all kinds of important concerts, and gave what would now be called a 'vocal recital' on June 7 of the same year. In 1878 he sang at a Bach Choir concert, and in 1879 at the Philharmonic on Apr. 30, when the young American soprano, Miss Lillian BAILEY (q.v.), made her first appearance in England. She joined Henschel in a duet, and subsequently took lessons from him. They were married two years later, and even before their marriage began to give delightful vocal recitals which had important results in after years, both in England and America. In 1881, the year of his marriage, Henschel was appointed conductor of the newly founded Symphony Orchestra at Boston (q.v.), which he conducted for the first three seasons. In 1884 England became his home, and in 1886, while still busily engaged as a singer and vocal teacher (he succeeded Mme. Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt as professor of singing at the R.C.M. in 1886-88), he established the London Symphony Concerts, which were an important feature of musical life in London during the eleven years of their existence. Although he never gained the same kind of public approbation for his conducting that had been bestowed on his singing, he laid London musicians under a deep obligation, for, while not neglecting the well-known symphonic masterpieces, he revived many forgotten works of excellence, and brought forward many new compositions, English and foreign, that were well worth hearing. In 1891 he organised a choir to take part in large works at the concerts: in 1895-1896 he gave very nearly the complete orchestral works of Beethoven; he introduced Brahms's 'Triumphlied,' op. 55, and the double concerto, op. 102, to London audiences, as well as the Te Deum of Dvořák, and many less important compositions. In 1893-95 he conducted the Scottish Orchestra in Glasgow, and on Mar. 1, 1895, gave a 'command' performance with the orchestra at Windsor Castle.

Among important appearances as a singer may be mentioned the Birmingham Festivals of 1891 and 1894, at the first of which he sang the part of Satan in Stanford's 'Eden,' and at the second that of King Saul in Parry's work of that name, in such a way that it would be difficult if not impossible for any successor to efface the impression he made in both. At the latter festival was produced a Stabat Mater for soli, chorus and orchestra. His setting of Psalm cxxx., op. 30; Te Deum, op. 52; and Requiem, op. 59, are other sacred works in the larger forms (the last was performed for the first time at Boston in Feb. 1903, and has been given in many musical centres in America, Holland and Germany); and his opera 'Nubia' was produced with great success at the Court Theatre, Dresden, on Dec. 9, 1899, with a strong company, including Mme. Wittich, Herren Anthes, Scheidemann and Perron. The last-named singer fell ill before the second performance, and the composer took his place as Friar Girolamo, making his first and only appearance on the stage. Among other dramatic compositions are an early opera, 'Friedrich der Schöne,' and an operetta, 'A Sea Change; or Love's Stowaway,' to words by W. D. Howells. Henschel's instrumental works include two orchestral serenades, a string quartet, a ballad for violin, and some extremely beautiful incidental music to Hamlet, written for Beerbohm Tree's revival of the play at the Haymarket in 1892.

After Mrs. Henschel's death in 1901, Henschel lived in retirement in Scotland until 1907, when he married a pupil, Miss Amy Louis of New York. He returned to the concert platform in 1909, and for five years sang and gave recitals in England and on the Continent. In Apr. 1914 he gave a farewell recital in London, since when he has been active, and successful as ever, as a teacher. He was knighted in 1914. He conducted the HANDEL SOCIETY (q.v.) in London and still (1926) accepts occasional engagements as a conductor, notably with the Scottish Orchestra. Among recent compositions a 'Mass for Eight Voices' (English), first sung at All Saints, Margaret Street, on Ascension Day, 1916, is a work of great beauty. In 1918 he published Musings and Memories of a Musician (Macmillan).

The list of his compositions is as follows :

(2) HELEN, daughter of George Henschel by his first wife, has attained a distinct position as a singer of songs to her own piano accompaniment. She excels in the English folk-song, the French chanson and the American negro 'Spiritual.' She sang the soprano part in the first performance of the Requiem written by Henschel in memory of her mother. She is now Mrs. Harold Cloughton. M., with addns.

HENSEL, FANNY CÉCILE (b. Hamburg, Nov. 14, 1805; d. May 17, 1847), was the eldest of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy family, and more than three years older than her brother Felix. She was regularly instructed in music, and Mendelssohn used to say that at one time she played better than he. (See also Devrient, Recoll. p. 3). On Oct. 3, 1829, she married W. Hensel (1794–1861), a painter, of Berlin, and on May 17, 1847, died suddenly. Her death shook her brother terribly, and no doubt hastened his own, which happened only six months later. Felix's letters show how much he loved her, and the value which he placed on her judgment and her musical ability. He called her 'the Cantor.' 'Before I can receive Fanny's advice,' says he, 'the "Walpurgis-night" will be packed up. . . . I feel convinced she would say "Yes," and yet I feel doubtful' (Letter, Apr. 27, 1831). 'Fanny may add the second part,' says he, in sending a Song without words (Dec. 11, 1830). Again, 'I have just played your Caprices . . . all was unmixed delight' (Jan. 4, 1840). Still, indications are not wanting of a certain over-earnestness, not to say pedantry, which was occasionally too severe for her more plastic brother. (See Letter, Apr. 7, 1834, on Melusina; Goethe and Mendelssohn, p. 47, etc.)

Six of her songs were published with his, without indication, viz. op. 8, Nos. 2, 3, 12; op. 9, Nos. 7, 10, 12. She also published in her own name four books of melodies and Lieder for PF. solo; two ditto of songs for voice and PF.; one ditto of partsongs—'Gartenlieder' (republished by Novello, 1878); and after her death a few more songs and PF. pieces were printed, and a trio for PF. and strings in D, reaching in all to op. 11. For her letters, journals, and portrait see Die Familie Mendelssohn, by S. Hensel (Berlin, 1879).

She is buried in the Mendelssohn portion of the Friedhof at the Hallethor, Berlin, and a line of her music (the end of the song 'Bergeslust,' op. 10, No. 5) is engraved on the tombstone:

HENSELT, HEINRICH (b. Neustadt, Rheinpfalz, 1874), operatic tenor. He studied and sang for several years in Germany prior to his first visit to this country in 1911, when he made his début as Siegmund in the cycle of the 'Ring,' conducted by Franz Schalk. He displayed a voice of pleasing quality and considerable power, and was also a good actor. Later on he did even better as Tannhäuser and as Parsifal, which rôle he had meanwhile studied under Siegfried Wagner and sustained with success at Bayreuth in 1912. He took part in the notable performance of 'Parsifal,' when it was mounted at Covent Garden for the first time, given during the spring season of 1914, the cast further including Paul Bender as Amfortas, Paul Knüper as Gurnemanz, and Eva von der Osten as Kundry. His rendering of the part elicited high praise and deserved it.

HENSELT, ADOLF VON (b. Schwabach in Bavaria, May 12, 1814; d. Warmbrunn, Silesia, Oct. 10, 1889), had lessons from Hummel at Weimar, and studied theory for two years under Sechter in Vienna, but can hardly be called Hummel's disciple, since his method of treating the pianoforte differs as much from Hummel's as our concert grands differ from the light Viennese instruments of 1820.

After concert tours (1836) in Germany Henselt went to Russia, where he settled. His success in 1838 at St. Petersburg was unprecedented. He was at once made court pianist and teacher to the Imperial children, and soon after Inspector of 'the Imperial Russian female seminaries,' in which latter capacity his firmness and disinterested zeal have borne good fruit.

Henselt visited England in 1852 and 1867, but did not play in public. On the second occasion, however, he gave an afternoon to a chosen few at Broadwood's, Great Pulteney Street. Hipkins, who was present, wrote to a Russian friend, 'His playing was glorious, faultless. For a German, Chopin is difficult . . . yet Henselt was a German, and Chopin never had a finer interpreter.'¹

Henselt's ways at the keyboard may be taken as the link between Hummel's and Liszt's; that is to say, with Hummel's strictly legato touch, quiet hands and strong fingers, Henselt produced effects of rich sonority something like those which Liszt got with the aid of the wrists and pedals. But as such sonority, apart from any rhythmical accentuation, depends in the main upon the widespread position of chords and arpeggi, the component notes of which are made to extend beyond the limits of an octave, Henselt's way of holding the keys down as much as possible with the fingers, over and above keeping the dampers raised by means of the pedals, does not seem the most practical; for it necessitates a continuous straining of the muscles such as only hands of abnormal construction or fingers stretched to the utmost by incessant and tortuous practice can stand. We have the testimony of Mendelssohn that his speciality in 1838 was 'playing widespread chords, and that he went on all day stretching his fingers over arpeggios played prestissimo.'² And even in his later life he is said to have wasted an hour daily upon mere Dehnungsstudien, i.e. studies of his own invention for extending the stretch of the hand, and training the fingers to work independently. Nevertheless, be his method of touch needlessly cumbrous or not, if applied to effects à la Chopin and Liszt, the result under his own hands was grand; so grand indeed that, though his appearances in public were fewer than those of any other celebrated pianist, he was hailed by judges like Robert Schumann and von Lenz as one of the greatest players. His representative works are two sets of twelve Études each, opp. 2 and 5, which, though not so surprisingly original, deserve to be ranked near Chopin's, inasmuch as they are true lyrical effusions of considerable musical value, over and above their setting forth some specially characteristic or difficult pianoforte effect. Henselt also published a concerto (in F minor, op. 16), likely to survive, a trio, stillborn, and a number of smaller salon pieces, like 'Frühlingslied,' 'Wiegenlied,' Impromptu in C minor, 'La Gondola,' etc.--gems in their way.

An uniform edition of Henselt's works would be a boon, as some pieces are published in Russia only, others appear under different designations, etc. There are thirty-nine compositions with opus numbers, and fifteen without. His arrangements for two pianofortes of Weber's duo in E \flat for pianoforte and clarinet, and of selections from Cramer's Études, to which he has added a second pianoforte part; his transcription of Weber's overtures, bits from Weber's operas, and above all his edition of Weber's principal pianoforte works with variantes, are masterly. E. D., with addns.

HENSTRIDGE, DANIEL (d. June 4, 1736), was probably the son of an organist of the same name, who was organist of Gloucester Cathedral from 1666-73; one or other of the two was organist of Rochester Cathedral from 1674-98, and the son held the position of organist of Canterbury Cathedral (succeeding Nicholas Wootton) from June 1699 until his death. He is buried in the cathedral. A James Henstridge, probably another member of the family, was organist of Dulwich College from 1698-1703. The organ parts of some of his compositions are still extant, but the voice parts are mostly lost. He seems to have been an imitator of Purcell. Some anthems by him are in Croft's Divine Harmony, 1712; and in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge are the MSS. of five songs. West's Cath. Org. and W. H. C.

HEPTINSTALL, JOHN, a London music printer who first introduced into England the 'new tied note'; that is, he was the first to unite in musical typography the quavers and semiquavers into groups. Before the year 1690 or thereabouts, except in engraved music, each of these notes was separately displayed, owing to the difficulty of arranging in movable types notes of varying intervals with the tails tied together. (See PRINTING.) In consequence of this, most of the instrumental music was printed from engraved copper plates, where this difficulty was not experienced, as the graver could be as easily used as the pen in manuscript music. Heptinstall also introduced another improvement, by making the heads of the notes round, instead of lozenge shape. The 'new tied note' was afterwards further improved upon by William Pearson, who printed a few years later than Heptinstall. A number of works by Henry Purcell came forth from his press, including Amphitryon, 1690; The Protheus or the History of Dioclesian, 1691; The Double Dealer, 1694, and others. Some psalm-books, and the 1703 edition of Playford's Dancing Master were also the work of this printer. The dates 1690 and 1713 are the earliest and the latest for his works that the present writer can fix. F. K.

HERBAIN, LE CHEVALIER D' (b. Paris, 1734; d. there, 1769), entered the French Army at the age of 15 and was sent to Italy two years later, where he composed a successful 'Intermedium' for Rome. He then went with his regiment to Corsica, where he wrote 2 operas, which were given repeatedly in Italy with great success until 1753. He returned to France about 1756 and wrote three more operas. E. v. d. s.

HERBART, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (b. Oldenburg, May 4, 1776; d. Göttingen, Aug. 14, 1841), a famous philosopher and professor of Göttingen University. He wrote Psychologische Bemerkungen zur Tonlehre (1811), wherein he expounds among other things the idea that the relation of tones is a manifestation of important universal laws. He was also the first who tried to determine the duration of the rhythmic pulse. Herbart was a good pianist; he composed a pianoforte sonata, op. 1, published in 1808; second edn., 1876. E. v. d. s.

HERBECK, JOHANN (b. Vienna, Dec. 25, 1831; d. Oct. 28, 1877), court Kapellmeister. He had a few months' instruction in harmony from Rotter, but was virtually a self-made man. His ambition was high, he worked hard, and his progress was rapid and steady. In 1852 he was choirmaster to the Piarists in the Josephstadt; in 1856 choirmaster to the first Männergesangsverein; in 1858 professor at the Conservatorium, and choirmaster of the Singverein of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde; in 1859 professional conductor of the Gesellschaft concerts; in 1866 chief court Kapellmeister; and in 1871 director of the court opera. The intrigues and annoyances inseparable from this post were insupportable to Herbeck's nature: in 1875 he resigned it, and resumed the conductorship of the Gesellschaft concerts. As a conductor he left a permanent mark on music in Vienna. The numerous choral societies in particular owe their prosperity in great measure to him. As a composer he was equally ambitious and industrious, although in this branch less remarkable for invention than for his power of assimilating, rather than imitating, the strong points of his favourites, especially Schubert, of whose works he was an indefatigable exponent. His most successful compositions are his partsongs, which are admirable for simplicity and effect. His published works include:

Songs for a single voice; partsongs for men's voices, and choruses, both mixed and harmonised; 'Lied und Reigen' for chorus and orchestra, etc.; 'Tanz-momente'; 'Kühnlerfahrt'; 'Symphonische Variationen,' and Symphony in D minor—all for full orchestra, the last with organ; string-quartet in F, op. 9. In MS. a Grand Mass in E, and a small ditto in F; a Te Deum graduable; a string-quartet in D minor.

Herbeck possessed several orders, including the third division of the Iron Crown, which raised him to the rank of knighthood. A memoir, by his son Ludwig Herbeck, appeared in 1885.

HERBENUS, MATTHEUS (b. circa 1751), musical theoretician; rector of the school of St. Servatius, Maestricht. He wrote 'De natura vocis ac ratione musicae pulcherrimum opus, lib. 5,' MS., 1495. Forkel mentions the MS. under the title 'De natura cantus et miraculi vocis.' E. v. d. s.

HERBERT, VICTOR (b. Dublin, Feb. 1, 1859; d. New York, May 27, 1924), violoncellist, conductor and composer. His mother was a daughter of Samuel Lover, novelist, playwright and composer of characteristic Irish songs. Educated at the Stuttgart 'Conservatorium,' he filled a place as violoncellist for some time in the court orchestra, and in 1886 went to New York, where his wife, Therese Herbert-Förster, had been engaged for the German Opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. Herbert entered the orchestra of the institution as first violoncellist under the direction of Anton Seidl. He soon became a prominent figure in the concert life of the American metropolis, playing at the concerts of Seidl and Theodore Thomas. In 1887 he brought forward a concerto and suite for the violoncello, but his most important composition for that instrument is a second concerto, in E minor, op. 30, dedicated to the Philharmonic Society of New York, at one of whose concerts Herbert played it in Mar. 1894. From 1894-98 Herbert was bandmaster of the Twenty-second Regiment of the National Guard of the State of New York; then he was called to Pittsburgh, Pa., as conductor of the local Symphony Orchestra. In that position he remained till the end of the season 1903-04, when he returned to New York in order to have more time to devote to composition. Meanwhile he had entered into the operetta field, in which he developed a truly remarkable fecundity, producing 35 such works between the years 1894 and 1917. Of these 'The Wizard of the Mill' (1895) and 'Babes in Toyland' (1903) attracted special attention. His grand opera, 'Natoma' (Philadelphia, 1911), had considerable vogue in America partly on account of its Indian subject. A second, 'Madeleine,' was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1914. For the Worcester, Mass., festival of 1891 he wrote a dramatic cantata entitled 'The Captive'; for orchestra, before and after he went to Pittsburgh, a 'Serenade' for strings (1888); 'Suite romantique,' op. 31; symphonic poem, 'Hero and Leander,' op. 33; suite, 'Woodland Fancies,' op. 34; and suite, 'Columbus,' op. 35. HERBING, AUG. BERNHARD VALENTIN d. Magdeburg, 1766), assistant organist and vicar of Magdeburg Cathedral, c. 1758, one of the most gifted revivers of the German Lied. He composed 'Musicalische Belustigungen' (1758, re-edited 1765, posth. 2nd part, 1767), 'Musicalische Versuche an Fabeln und Erzählungen . . . Gellert's' (1759). A selection of his Lieder is in D.D.T., vol. 41, specimens in Friedländer 'Das deutsche Lied im 18ten Jahrhundert.' He died at an early age (Riemann; Q.-L.).

HERBST, JOHANN ANDREAS (b. Nuremberg, 1588; d. Frankfort, 1666), became Kapellmeister at Butzbach in Hosse-Darmstadt in 1616, at Darmstadt in 1619, at Frankfort in 1623, at Nuremberg from 1631-46, and, returning to Frankfort in 1646, remained there till his death. His chief theoretical work is entitled Musica poetica, sive compendium melopoeticum. . . Nürnberg, 1643. It purports to give thorough instruction in harmony and composition generally, and is illustrated with numerous examples. Herbst is credited with having been the first to lay down in this work the stricter rule against 'hidden fifths' so-called (see Riemann, Geschichte der Musiktheorie, 1898, pp. 444-5). He does not indeed employ the later technical expression (Verdeckte Quinten or Quintae coopertae sive absconditae), but he gives as the reason why one perfect concord should not be succeeded by another in similar motion, that there thus arises the auspicion of there being two fifths or two octaves in immediate succession, which is a fault to be avoided. His other theoretical works are Musica practica sive instructio pro Symphoniacis, Nürnberg, 1642, which professes to give instruction in singing, and Arte practica et poetica, Frankfort, 1653, a manual for counterpoint and general or thorough-bass. Herbst's chief compositions consist of: 'Theatrum Amoris,' Nuremberg, 1613, containing twelve German madrigals a 5 and two Latin texts a 6; 'Meletemata sacra,' Nuremberg, 1620, 20 a 3 and 1 a 6. Besides several occasional compositions, he also contributed twenty-five settings a 5 to Erhardi's Harmonisches Chor und Figuralgesangbuch, Frankfort, 1659, five of which reappear in Schöberlein's Schatz der liturgischen Chorgesanges, 1872, and show him to be a good harmonist. In M.f.M. Wiss. 1900 (Anhang), W. Nagel has printed in score a previously unknown MS. composition by Herbst, 'Symphonia gratulatoria, Beatus Vir,' a 5, with basso continuo. J. R. M.

HERCULES, by Handel; the words by Rev. Thos. Broughton; composed between July 19 and Aug. 17, 1744. Announced as a 'musical drama'; performed and published as an 'oratorio.' First given at the King's Theatre, Haymarket, Jan. 5, 1745. G.

HEREDIA, PEDRO (d. Rome, 1648), a composer of Spanish origin or extraction who in his youth was choirmaster at Vercelli, and afterwards held a musical appointment in the Vatican. He wrote masses, motets and at least one madrigal; but the polyphonic style of the preceding century was already a dead language to him. His works include:

Missa super cantu Romano (4 v. with organ); Vienna, Staatsbibl., MS., dated 1636; modern editions.

2 Masses published with those of Florida de Silvestris a Barbarino (Rome, 1640), Bologna.

Motet, 'Anima mea' (4 v.) in Pablo Constantini; 'Selectae cantiones' (Rome 1616), Bologna.

Madrigal 'Passa la vita all' abbassar d' un ciglio' (Sonnet by Pope Urban VIII), 4 v., in Giammatista Doni, 'Compendio . . . (Rome, 1635), Brit. Mus. Paris, Bib. Nat. (quoted in part by Mitjana, Encl. de la musique: Espagne, pp. 2048-9).

HEREFORD FESTIVAL, see THREE CHOIRS FESTIVAL.

HERIGERUS (d. Oct. 13, 1009 or 1010). 'Abbas Lobienensis' (Laubiensis) in the diocese of Liège. He died after twenty years of office there. He composed a hymn, 'Ave perquam,' and two antiphones, 'O Thoma didyme' and 'O Thoma apostole' (Mendel; Q.-L.).

HERING, MAGISTER KARL GOTTLIEB (b. Schandau, Saxony, Oct. 25, 1765; d. Zittau, Jan. 3, 1853), studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg; Conductor at Oschatz, 1795; headmaster and music-master at Zittau school and seminary, 1811; one of the first to apply pedagogics to music teaching. He composed choral and other songs, and wrote numerous successful instruction books and tutors for various instruments. (See list in Q.-L.; also Riemann.)

HERISSANT, JEAN, a 16th-century French composer, known only by a Mass, and three chansons in collective volumes published by Le Roy and Ballard, 1553 and 1556. (Particulars in Q.-L. and Fétis.)

HERITIER, JEAN L', a French composer and pupil of Josquin des Prés, flourished in the earlier part of the 16th century. His works appeared in the collections published between 1519 and 1555, and even as late as 1588 a Mass of his was published at Venice along with several by Orlando Lassus. Only one work bears his name on the title-page, 'Moteti de la fama,' a 4, Venice, 1555, but even here his works only appear along with those of other composers. Ambros classes him with Antoine Févin and Jean Mouton, and describes his works as characterised by a peculiar refinement and grace, uniting something of the solidity of the Netherland school proper with the elegance of the French. Aron in his Toscanello refers approvingly to L'Heritier, because in his earliest published motet, 'Dum complerentur' in Petrucci's 'Motetti della Corona,' 1519, he had expressly marked the E flat in the melodic progression from B flat to avoid the tritone. (See Ambros, Geschichte der Musik, iii. 102-3 and 273.) J. R. M.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. It was the second building known as the KING'S THEATRE (q.v.) which was renamed Her Majesty's Theatre on the accession of Queen Victoria (1837). This was destroyed by fire on the night of Friday, Dec. 6, 1867. It was rebuilt by Apr. 1869, but not opened then as a theatre. In 1875 it was used for the revivalist mission of Moody and Sankey for three months.

The decade 1877-87 was the period of its greatest operative importance under Mapleson's direction. He opened it on Apr. 28, 1877, as an opera-house with Tietjens in 'Norma,' Costa conducting. In this season Tietjens made her farewell appearance in 'Lucrezia Borgia.' Mapleson then gave regular Italian seasons until 1881, Carl Rosa giving English seasons also in 1879, 1880, 1882. There were also short seasons of English opera under Weist-Hill in 1877-78. The first productions of 'Carmen' (1878) and 'Mephistofele' (1880) were important events of Mapleson's seasons. That of Wagner's 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' was given under Seidl in 1882. There was then a lull broken by a few days of Italian opera under S. Hayes (1884), and a French season under M. L. Mayer (1886). The last Italian season under Mapleson was given in 1887. It was a short one begun on June 4, and included Lilli Lehmann in 'Fidelio' and one Patti performance, 'La Traviata,' on July 1. Promenade concerts under Arditi in the autumn proved a failure, and the last important event in the theatre's history was Sarah Bernhardt's appearance there with her own company in 1890. Her last performance was in 'Tosca' on July 12, 1890. The theatre was pulled down in 1891.

Beecham built a smaller theatre with the same name on part of the same site for his own dramatic performances. He opened it on Apr. 28, 1897 (exactly 20 years after Mapleson's venture), with 'The Seats of the Mighty.' On the accession of King Edward VII. (1901) the name was altered to His Majesty's Theatre. Though primarily devoted to the spoken drama, it was part of Beecham's intention to make the theatre available for opera. He frequently lent it to the R.C.M. for occasional productions by the students under Stanford's direction, and in the summer of 1910 he let it to BECHAM (q.v.) for a season of opéra-comique in English. On May 27, 1913, he produced with Beecham an English version of Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (called The Perfect Gentleman) with Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' (1st version), sung by a German company, and then given for the first time in England. In 1924 the BRITISH NATIONAL OPERA COMPANY (q.v.) gave a season of opera in English which began on June 5 with 'Figaro' and included the first public production of 'Hugh the Drover' (Vaughan Williams). In the summer of 1926 the Diaghilev Ballet occupied the theatre, and gave there Stravinsky's 'Les Noces' for the first time in England.

HERMAN, JAN (b. Nevoklov, Bohemia, 1886), one of the leading pianists of Czechoslovakia. After visiting America and Russia, where he settled for a time as a teacher, he became professor of the pianoforte in the newly organised Conservatoire at Prague (1914). He has frequently played in association with the Bohemian (Czech) String Quartet, and met with success in Paris and London (1919 and 1924). His playing is distinguished for rhythmic vigour, breadth and passion.

HERMAN (HEERMANN), NICOLAS (b. circa 1485: d. May 3, 1561), cantor at Joachimsthal in Bohemia about the middle of the 16th century, and esteemed also as versifier. There are chorales extant of which both words and music are by him, e.g. 'Erschienen ist der herrlich Tag' and 'Lobt Gott, ihr Christen alle gleich.' The municipal library at Joachimsthal possesses a folio containing all his songs. A list of the earliest extant editions of his works is given in Q.-L.

HERMANN, MATHIAS, see WERFFCORE.

HERMANNUS CONTRACTUS (b. Sulgau, July 18, 1013; d. at the country seat of Alleshäusen, near Biberach, Sept. 24, 1054). He belonged to the family of the counts of Vehrigen, studied at S. Gall, and became a Benedictine monk in the monastery of Reichenau, which played an important part in the evolution of music. Hermannus's musical tracts were republished by Gerbert, ii. 124. He invented a musical notation which was but short-lived. His chronicle from the foundation of Rome to 1054 contains important music-historical notes. Of his compositions only a hymn, 'O florens rosa,' and 2 sequences are still extant. The Historia de S. Afra und Salve Regina (see below) are also attributed to him.

HÉRODIADE, opera in 3 acts, words by Paul Milliet and Henri Grémont, music by Massenet. Produced Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, Dec. 19, 1881; in an Italian version by A. Zanardini, La Scala, Milan, Feb. 23, 1882; Théâtre des Nations (now the Théâtre Sarah-Bernhardt), Paris, Feb. 1, 1884; Opéra, Dec. 22, 1921; and, with certain alterations insisted on by the censorship, as 'Salomé' at Covent Garden, July 6, 1904; New York, Manhattan Opera House, Nov. 1908. HEROLD, JIŘÍ (GEORGE) (b. Apr. 16, 1875), a Czech viola-player, professor at the Prague Conservatoire since 1922, and a member of the CZECH (BOHEMIAN) STRING QUARTET (q.v.), which he joined in 1906.

HÉROLD, LOUIS JOSEPH FERDINAND (b. Paris, Jan. 28, 1791; d. Les Ternes, Jan. 19, 1833), eminent composer of opera, was the only child of François Joseph Hérold (b. Seltz, Alsace, Mar. 10, 1755; d. Paris, Sept. 1, 1802), an able pianist of the school of Emanuel Bach at Hamburg, composer of PF. and chamber music, who had settled in Paris in 1781. Ferdinand's birthplace was 30 rue des Vieux Augustins, now 10 rue d'Argout. His gifts for music were soon apparent. He was educated at the Institution Hix, where he distinguished himself, and at the same time worked at solfège under Fétis, and the pianoforte under his godfather Louis Adam, father of Adolphe. In 1806 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, where he obtained the first piano prize in L. Adam's class (1810), studied harmony under Catel, and composition under Méhul, whom he always held in great admiration, and at length, in 1812, carried off the Grand Prix de Rome for his cantata 'Mlle. de la Vallière,' the unpublished score of which is in the library of the Conservatoire, together with his envois de Rome. These are a 'Hymne à 4 voix sur la Transfiguration' with orchestra; a symphony in C (Rome, Apr. 1813); a second, in D (May); 'Scena ed aria con cori' (June); and three quartets, in D, C and G minor (July 1814), all written at Naples. These works are short, but contain many interesting ideas; the only one performed in public was the second symphony, which is by no means a 'youthful indiscretion.' The quartets also contain much that might even now be heard with pleasure; and altogether these envois de Rome show that Hérold would have shone in symphony if he had adhered to that branch of composition. The stage, however, possesses an irresistible attraction for a man gifted with ardent imagination and capacity for expressing emotion. It was natural that he should wish to make his début as a dramatic composer at Naples, where he was pianist to Queen Caroline, and where he led a happy life, in good relations with the court and society. With Landriani's assistance he compiled a libretto from Duval's comedy 'La Jeunesse de Henri V,' and the opera was a success. The libretto was printed (Naples, 1815) anonymously, but the music remains in MS.

Shortly after this he left Italy, and made a stay of some months at Vienna on his way home. On his return to Paris he at once tried to procure a good opera-book, but might have waited long for an opportunity of coming before the public, if Boieldieu had not asked him to write the latter half of 'Charles de France,' an opéra de circonstance produced June 18, 1816. This led to his obtaining the libretto of 'Les Rosières,' 3 acts (Jan. 27, 1817), which was a complete success. 'La Clochette,' 3 acts (Oct. 18 of the same year), was full of new and fresh ideas; the charming air 'Me voilà' soon became popular, while those competent to judge were struck by the advance in knowledge of the stage, and the originality of instrumentation which it displayed. His industry and fertility were further proved by 'Le premier venu' (1818), 'Les Troqueurs' (1819), 'L'Amour platonique' (1819), and 'L'Auteur mort et vivant' (1820); but unfortunately he accepted librettos that were neither interesting nor adapted for music. 'Le Muletier' (May 12, 1823), however, is full of life and colour, and assured his reputation with all who were competent to judge. After the success of this lively little piece it is difficult to understand how a man of literary tastes and culture could have undertaken dramas so tame and uninteresting as 'Lathénie' (Sept. 1823) and 'Le Lapin blanc' (1825). From 1820-27 he was pianist-accompagnateur to the Opéra Italien; and in 1821 was sent to Italy to engage singers, among whom he brought back Mme. Pasta, and Galli. In 1827 he became choirmaster at the Académie de Musique, and began to write ballets. During these laborious years, Hérold threw off for the publishers an immense quantity of pianoforte music. Fifty-nine of these pieces, on which he laid no value, have been engraved, but we need only mention the sonata in A; another called 'L'amante disperato'; variations on 'Au clair de la lune,' and on 'Malbrook'; a 'Rondo dramatique'; and a caprice, 'Pulcinella.' He also made arrangements for the piano, Rossini's 'Moïse' among the rest, and like a true artist managed to turn even such work as this to account. In the midst of his daily drudgery, however, Hérold kept one aim steadily in view: that of becoming a great composer. Any opportunity of making himself known was welcome, and accordingly he consented to join Auber in writing an opéra de circonstance, 'Vendôme en Espagne' (1823); and also composed 'Le Roi René,' two acts (1824), for the fête of Louis XVIII. In 'Marie,' 3 acts (Aug. 12, 1826), a charming opera, he evinces thorough knowledge of the stage, great sensibility, and graceful and refined orchestration. It contains perhaps too many short pieces, and the treble and tenor voices unduly predominate, but these drawbacks are redeemed by original and varied melody, by charming effects, and great skill in the arrangement. The scene of Marie's despair is the work of a master of pathos, and a true dramatic poet.

Hérold composed a series of ballets, 'Astolphe et Joconde'; 'La Sonnambule' (Jan. 29 and Sept. 19, 1827); 'Lydie'; 'La Fille mal gardée' (Nov. 17, 1828); and 'La Belle au bois dormant' (Apr. 27, 1829). He also wrote music to a play, 'Missolonghi,' for the Odéon. 'Les Troqueurs' ('Der Tausch') was played at Vienna in 1820 and at Berlin in 1825. These works gave him the same facility and command of his pen that writing verses does to an author. This is clearly seen in his next opera, 'L'illusion,' one act (July 18, 1829), the remarkable finale of which contains a valse with a melody of a very high order. 'Emmeline' (Nov. 28, 1829) was a fiasco, chiefly owing to the libretto; and in the following year he collaborated with Carafa in 'Auberge d'Aurey.'

A rich compensation for 'Emmeline' was in store for him in the brilliant success of 'Zampa' (May 3, 1831). Speaking briefly, we may say that the quartet in the first act, 'Le voilà,' is a model of dignity and refinement; the recognition duet in the second is full of life, taste and dramatic skill; and the deep pathos of the principal number of the third act, the duet 'Pourquoi trembler,' made it one of the finest inspirations in contemporary opera. There is also much variety, both of form and movement, in the different pieces. The first finale, with its richly contrasted effects, is entirely different from the second, the stretto of which is full of tune and inspiration.

Hérolde's countrymen ranked the 'Pré aux Clercs' (Dec. 15, 1832) above 'Zampa,' while the Germans gave the preference to the latter. In the 'Pré aux Clercs' the drama is a very pleasing national poem, free from incongruities and well adapted for music. In setting it Hérolde not only did much to elevate the tone of French opéra-comique, but had the satisfaction of treating a historical subject. The work is characterised throughout by unity of style, variety of accent, and sustained inspiration, always kept within the limits of dramatic truth. The great requisites for a creative artist are colour, dramatic instinct and sensibility. In colour Hérolde was not so far behind Weber, while in dramatic instinct he may be said to have equalled him. His remark to a friend a few days before his death shows his own estimate of his work: 'I am going too soon; I was just beginning to understand the stage.'¹

On Jan. 19, 1833, within a few days of his forty-second year, and but a month after the production of his chef-d'œuvre, Hérolde succumbed to the chest-malady from which he had been suffering for some time, and was buried with great pomp three days after.² He died at a house in Les Ternes, which had been his home since his marriage with Adèle Élise Rollet in 1827, and now forms the corner of the Rue Demours and the Rue Bayen, on the side of the even numbers. Here were born his three children: Ferdinand (b. Paris, Oct. 16, 1828; d. there, Jan. 1, 1882), whose son is the writer and poet, A. Ferd. Hérolde, an able avocat, subsequently a senator; Adèle, married in 1854 to Jean Jules Clamageran, a French politician; and Eugénie (b. 1832; d. 1852), a gifted musician, who died of consumption.

In society Hérolde showed himself a brilliant and original talker, though inclined to sarcasm. The best portrait is that in the Magasin pittoresque. His friend David d'Angers made a medallion of him in Rome in 1815; and there are busts by Dantan (1833), Demesmay—now in the foyer of the Paris Opéra, and by Charles Gauthier.

² Halévy completed the unfinished score of 'Ludovic.'

HEROLD, VICTOR (b. Copenhagen, 1877), operatic tenor, director of the Royal Operahouse at Stockholm. Few tenors singing in German opera at Covent Garden in the first decade of this century have been acclaimed with greater warmth than was this artist on his first appearance as Lohengrin on May 9, 1904. Some good judges went so far as to declare him to be the successor to Jean de Reszke, whose voice his was said to resemble both in sweetness and beauty of timbre. He was also fortunate in having for his Elsa, Emmy Destinn (who only a week before had made her début as Donna Anna), among a cast that further included van Rooy as Telramund, Kirkby Lunn as Ortrud, and Paul Knüpfer as the King, with Hans Richter as conductor. More than one critic described it as 'the best performance of "Lohengrin" that London has ever known,' and the new tenor came in for his full share of the honours. He also did well a few nights later as Walther in 'Die Meistersinger,' and made his reentrée in this part in the following season. He again appeared in the same characters during the winter season of 1907, but in no other operas: neither, curiously enough, was he afterwards heard in London at all. H. K.

HERRER (HERRERIUS), R. P. MICHAEL (b. Munich, c. 1576³), calls himself in 1606 'ad S. Nicolai, Strassburg: Praepositus.' He wrote 'Canticum gloriosae deiparae V.M. 6 v.' (1602), probably identical with a Magnificat 6 v. (Augsb., 1604) mentioned by Fétis (Q.-L.); and 3 motets in collective volumes. He made and edited an important collection of works by Italian composers, published in 3 books in 1606, 1608–09, 1609.

HERRINGMAN, HENRY, printer of many musical works in the years 1650–89. His address was at 'the signe of the Blew Anchor in the New Exchange.' In 1670 he issued the fourth edition of Carew's Masque, 'with the songs set to Musick by Mr. Henry Lawes.' He also printed some works by Purcell, including the first edition of D'Urfe's 'A Fool's Preference,' in 1688. On the title-page of this work is added: 'together with all the Songs and Notes to 'em excellently compos'd by Mr. Henry Purcell.'

Aug. 23, 1822), was second son of a musician at Hanover. He received a good education, and being destined for the profession of his father, was, at the age of 14, placed in the band of the Hanoverian regiment of guards. He came to England with the regiment about 1755 and was stationed at Durham. He soon became organist of Halifax parish church, and continued so until 1767, when he was appointed organist of the Octagon Chapel, Bath. Whilst residing at Bath he turned his attention to astronomy, and pursued his studies for several years during the intervals of his professional duties. He constructed a telescope of large dimensions (1774), and in 1781 announced the discovery of a supposed comet, which soon proved to be the planet Uranus. He was thereupon appointed private astronomer to the King, and abandoned the musical profession. He removed to Datchet and afterwards to Slough, was created a knight of the Hanoverian Guelphic Order (1816), and received an honorary degree at Oxford. In the summer of 1792 he was visited at Slough by Haydn. He published a symphony for orchestra and two military concertos for wind instruments in 1768.

(2) JACOB (b. circa 1734; d. England, 1792), elder brother of the above, was master of the King's band at Hanover. He composed some instrumental music. W. H. H.

HERSEE, ROSE (b. 1845; d. Wimbledon, Nov. 26, 1924), was a soprano singer who took an important place in the English operatic ventures of her generation. She first appeared with Mapleson's company at Drury Lane in 1868, and in the next year ventured on the 'New Italian Opera' (Lyceum Theatre) under the management of her father, Henry Hersee, in the following year. This was a failure and she next visited America with PAREPA-ROSA (q.v.). Rose Hersee was the principal soprano in a season of opera in English given by Stephen Fiske (St. James's Theatre) in London, 1871; in the next year she formed a company of her own and later sang with the CARL ROSA COMPANY (q.v.).

HERTEL, (1) JOHANN CHRISTIAN (b. Öttingen, 1699; d. Strelitz, Mecklenburg, Oct. 1754), son of a Kapellmeister, Jac. Christian, who soon after the birth of his son became court Kapellmeister at Merseburg. Johann Christian was intended for the Church, and his father instructed him, as a secondary study, in singing and viola da gamba playing; but the boy's interest soon became engrossed in music and he took, clandestinely, lessons on the violin and the harpsichord from the organist Kaufmann. After studying for some time at the university at Halle, whence he paid frequent visits to Kuhnau at Leipzig, the father gave way to his choice, and the Duke of Merseburg sent him as a pupil to the famous viola da gambist, E. Christ. Hesse, at Darmstadt. In 1719 he was appointed violinist at the court of Eisenach, where he became Konzertmeister in 1733, and after the dissolution of that chapel in 1742 he was appointed in the same capacity at the court of Strelitz, where he was pensioned on the dissolution of the chapel in 1753. He composed a large number of works for orchestra and chamber music which remained in MS., except 6 violin sonatas with basso continuo (Amsterdam, 1727). (See E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello; also Riemann and Q.-L.)

(2) JOHANN WILHELM (b. Eisenach, Oct. 9, 1727; d. Schwerin, Mecklenburg, June 14, 1789), son of Johann Christian, violinist, Konzertmeister, afterwards Kapellmeister and composer to the court. On account of weak eyesight he resigned the post as Kapellmeister in 1770, devoted himself more to the pianoforte, and became secretary to Princess Ulrike and Privy Councillor to the court. He was a prolific, and in his time highly esteemed, composer in every branch of musical art except opera, and also a writer on musical subjects, collector and translator of musical essays by French, Italian and other authors. The MS. of his autobiography (dated 1784) is in the Royal Library, Brussels (Riemann; Mendel; Q.-L.).

HERTZ, ALFRED (b. Frankfurt-on-M., July 15, 1872), conductor, was educated at Frankfurt, and gained experience at the Stadt-Theater at Halle (1891-92), at Altenburg (1892-1895) and Elberfeld-Barmen (1895-99). He conducted concerts in London (1899) and was then for three years at Breslau (1899-1902). In 1902 he went to New York as conductor of German Opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he conducted 'Parsifal' (the first production outside Bayreuth) in 1903. He remained at the Metropolitan till 1915, but in 1910 he conducted 'Götterdämmerung' and other Wagnerian performances at Covent Garden owing to the retirement through ill-health of Richter. Since 1915 Hertz has been conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. (Amer. Supp.) C.

HERVÉ (b. Houdain, Pas de Calais, June 30, 1825; d. Paris, Nov. 3, 1892), operatic composer and manager, received his musical education at the parish church of Saint Roch, where he sang as choir-boy; then from Elwart, and, about 1840, from Auber. He was afterwards organist at the church of Bièvre Asylum, near Paris; and from 1845 at St. Eustache, Paris, where he remained more than eight years, and became an organist at various Parisian churches.

In 1848 he produced at the Opéra National 'Don Quixote and Sancho Pança,' appearing in it himself with Joseph Kelm the chansonnette singer. He then became conductor at the Odéon, and in 1850 at the Palais Royal; in 1854 he was manager of the Folies Concertantes, Boulevard du Temple, which name was changed to Folies Nouvelles, a small theatre converted by him from a music-hall, where he was composer, librettist, conductor, singer and machinist, as occasion required. Of his then compositions we must name 'Vade au Cabaret' and 'Le Compositeur toqué' (played by him at the Lyceum and Globe Theatres in 1870 and 1871). In 1856 illness forced him to retire from his post; he had written for his theatre 20 pieces in 1855 and 11 for 1856. He played successively at the Bouffes Debureau, Paris, 1858; at Marseilles with Kelm 'in his own repertory'; at Montpellier in small tenor parts such as Cantarelli ('Pré aux Clercs'), Arthur ('Lucia'), etc., and later on at Cairo. In 1859 Hervé was conductor at the Délassements-Comiques, Paris, until 1862, in which year he produced two new operettas, 'Le Hussard persécuté' and 'Le Fanfare de Saint Cloud.' He was for two or three years composer, conductor and actor at the Variétés, Porte St. Martin, and Eldorado. He wrote new music in 1865 for the celebrated revival of the 'Biche aux Bois,' and composed an opera in three acts, 'Les Chevaliers de la Table Ronde,' Bouffes Parisiens, Nov. 17, 1866.

During the next three years he gave some of his most popular works, produced at the Folies Dramatiques, viz.: 'L'Œil crevé,' libretto by himself, Oct. 12, 1867 (Globe Theatre, by the Dramatiques, June 15, 1872; in English as 'Hit or Miss,' in one act and five scenes, freely adapted by Burnand, Olympic, Apr. 13, 1868; and another version, three acts, Opéra-Comique, Oct. 21, 1872); 'Chilpéric,' libretto by himself, and at first a failure, Oct. 24, 1868 (in French at the Globe by the above company, June 3, 1872; in English at the Lyceum for the début of Hervé, Jan. 22, 1870; frequently revived at other theatres); he himself wrote a parody, 'Chilméric' for the Eldorado; 'Le Petit Faust,' his most successful work, Apr. 29, 1869 (in English at the Lyceum, Apr. 18, 1870, and revived at various theatres); 'Les Tures,' a parody of 'Bajazet,' Dec. 23, 1869.

None of his subsequent operettas and opéras-bouffes attained the same success; many of them, on the contrary, were disastrous failures, but 'La Belle Poule,' Folies Dramatiques, Dec. 30, 1875, was played in English at the Gaiety, Mar. 29, 1879. He was afterwards very successful in new songs, etc., written for Mme. Judic, Dupuis and others, such as the 'Pi... Ouit,' the 'Chanson du colonel,' the Provençal song 'Quès aco?' 'Babet et Cadet,' the 'sneezing duet,' the 'Légende de Marfa' and other music introduced into the musical comedies performed at the Variétés, viz.: the 'Femme à Papa,' Dec. 2, 1879, 'La Roussotte,' with Lecoq and Boulard, Jan. 26, 1881, 'Lili,' Jan. 10, 1882 (Gaiety, with Judic, June 1883), 'Maam'zelle Nitouche,' Jan. 19, 1883 (Gaiety, June 1884), 'La Cosaque,' Jan. 26, 1884 (Gaiety, June 1884), in English at Royalty, Apr. 12 of the same year. 'Fla-Fla,' Sept. 14, 1886, three acts (Théâtre des Menus-Plaisirs) reached only five representations. Hervé, in addition, composed for the English stage 'Aladdin the Second,' at the Gaiety, Dec. 24, 1870, as 'Le Nouvel Aladin,' at the Variétés, Apr. 26, 1873. He wrote some of the music of 'Babil and Bijou,' Aug. 29, 1872, and in 1874 was conductor at the Promenade Concerts in London, when he introduced a heroic symphony, 'The Ashantee War,' for solo voices and orchestra. On June 29, 1886, his 'Frvoli' was brought out at Drury Lane, and on Dec. 22, 1887, the ballets 'Dilara' and 'Sport' were produced at the Empire Theatre, of which he was for a few years conductor. 'La Rose d'Amour' (1888), 'Cléopâtre' (1889) and 'Les Bagatelles' (1890) are to be added to the number of his ballets. One of his latest works, 'Bacchanale,' brought out at the Théâtre des Menus-Plaisirs, Oct. 22, 1892, was a failure.

HERVEY, ARTHUR (b. Paris, Jan. 26, 1855; d. Mar. 10, 1922), composer, author and critic. Of Irish parentage, he was educated at the Oratory, Birmingham; studied with Berthold Tours and Edouard Marlois. He was intended for the diplomatic service, but from 1880 took up the profession of music. He was musical critic to Vanity Fair from 1889-92 and to the Morning Post, 1892-1908. A one-act opera, 'The Fairy's Post-Box,' to words by Palgrave Simpson, was produced at the Court Theatre in 1885. Of his charming songs, several sets were published ('Sechs Liebeslieder,' 'Herzens Stimmen,' 'Neue Liebes Lieder,' etc.), as well as single songs. A scena for baritone and orchestra, 'The Gates of Night,' was performed at the Gloucester Festival of 1901. His dramatic overture 'Love and Fate' (St. James's Hall, 1890, and Crystal Palace, 1892) had made it quite clear that Hervey was a master of the orchestra; and a couple of tone-poems, 'On the Heights' and 'On the March,' played at the Cardiff Festival of 1902 enhanced his reputation. Another overture, 'Youth,' was played with great success at the Norwich Festival of 1902, and a third tone-poem, 'In the East,' was given at the Cardiff Festival of 1904. A set of variations for orchestra, 'Life Moods,' was produced at the Brighton Festival of 1910. Hervey was the author of Masters of French Music (1894), French Music in the Nineteenth Century (1904), Alfred Bruneau (Living Masters of Music, 1907), Franz Liszt, and Saint-Saëns (1921).

HERZ, (1) HEINRICH (b. Vienna, Jan. 6, 1806¹; d. Paris, Jan. 5, 1888), son of a musician who, after teaching the boy himself and giving him lessons from Hüntén at Coblenz, was anxious to turn his early talent for the piano to the best account, and wisely entered him in 1816 at the Conservatoire at Paris under Pradher. He carried off the first prize for pianoforte-playing in 1818, and thenceforward his career was continually successful. He became virtually a Parisian, and was known as Henri Herz.

In 1821 Moscheles visited Paris, and though there is no mention of Herz in that part of his Journal, yet we have Herz's own testimony that Moscheles had much influence in the improvement of his style.¹ For the next ten years he enjoyed an immense reputation in Paris both as a writer and a teacher, and his compositions are said to have fetched three or four times the prices of those of much better composers. In 1831 he made a tour in Germany with Lafont, but to judge from the notices in the Allg. Zeitung Lafont made the better impression of the two. In 1833 he made his first visit to London, played at the Philharmonic on June 10, and gave a concert of his own, at which he played duets with Moscheles and with J. B. Cramer. In 1842 he was made professor of the pianoforte (women's class) in the Conservatoire. He returned the following year, appeared again at the Philharmonic, May 5, and took a long tour, embracing Edinburgh and Dublin. About this time he was tempted to join a pianoforte-maker in Paris named Klepfa, but the speculation was not successful, and Herz lost much money. He then established a factory of his own, and to repair his losses and to obtain the necessary capital for this made a journey through the United States, Mexico, California and the West Indies, which lasted from 1845 till 1851, and of which he himself wrote an account.² He then devoted himself to the making of pianos, and at the Exposition of 1855 his instruments obtained the highest medal. He built a concert-hall, Salle Henri Herz, in the rue de la Victoire (now pulled down). The mark of the Herz pianos has passed to the firm Peaureau-Ruch, as also the Salle Herz (rue des Petits-hôtels, Paris). In 1874 he relinquished his chair at the Conservatoire.

Herz left eight concertos for PF. and orchestra, and other compositions for his instrument in every recognised form, reaching to more than 200 in number, and including an immense number of variations, études and a PF. Method (Méthode complète de piano, op. 100, etc.). His brilliancy and bravura and power of execution were prodigious, but they were not supported by any more solid qualities, as in the case of Thalberg, Liszt, Tausig, Bülow and other great executants. Herz found out what his public liked and what would pay, and this he gave them. 'Is Herz prejudiced,' says Mendelssohn, 'when he says the Parisians can understand and appreciate nothing but variations?'³ Schumann was never tired of making fun of his pretensions and his pieces. His Gesammelte Schriften contain many reviews, all couched in the same bantering style. In fact, Herz was the Guleink of his day, and like that once renowned and popular Abbé was doomed to rapid oblivion.

Having taught pianoforte in Paris and London, he became his brother's deputy at the Conservatoire in 1857. He composed PF. music, a quintet, etc.

HERZOG, JOHANN GEORG (b. Schmölz, Bavaria, Sept. 6, 1822; d. Munich, Feb. 2, 1909), an eminent German organ-player. He was educated at Altdorf in Bavaria, and his earlier career was passed in Munich, where in 1842 he became organist, in 1849 cantor, and in 1850 professor at the Conservatorium. In 1854 he removed to Erlangen, and became teacher in the University and director of the Singakademie. His Präludivenbuch and his Handbuch für Organisten are widely and deservedly known. His Organ School is a work of very great merit, and his Fantasias are fine and effective compositions. He retired in 1888.

HERZOGENBERG, HEINRICH VON (HEINRICH, BARON VON HERZOGENBERG-PECCADUC) (b. Graz, Styria, June 10, 1843; d. Wiesbaden, Oct. 9, 1900), studied at the Vienna Conservatorium in 1862–64, after which his time was divided between Graz and Vienna, until 1872, when he went to Leipzig. From 1875–85 he was conductor of the Bach-verein in that town, and was subsequently appointed head of the department of theory and composition at the Hochschule at Berlin. In the spring of 1886 he succeeded Kiel as professor, and at the same time became head of an academical Meisterschule for composition. In 1888 he retired, owing to his wife's ill-health, but resumed his labours after the death of his successor, Bargiel, in 1897. His works are for the most part remarkable for breadth, vigour and originality. That they bear trace of the influence of Brahms is surely no reproach, nor is that influence so marked as to impeach their individuality of style. The list includes:

* 'Columbus,' a cantata, op. 11; * 'Odysseus,' a symphony, op. 16; * 'Deutsches Liederspiel,' for soli, chorus and pianoforte; * 'Der Stern des Liedes,' op. 55; * 'Die Weihe der Nacht,' op. 56; * 'Nannas Klage,' op. 59, two psalms, opp. 70 and 71, a Requiem, op. 72; * 'Totenfeier,' op. 80; * a Mass, op. 81; * 'Die Geburt Christi,' op. 90, and * 'Die Passion,' op. 93—all important works; variations for two pianos, and a second set, op. 23, on a theme by Brahms; trio for piano and strings in C minor, op. 24; two trios for strings alone, HESDIN, PIERRE, a French composer of the earlier half of the 18th century, was registrar of the brotherhood of St. Julien, Paris, 1522, and from 1547-59 singer in the Chapel of Henry II., King of France. About 30 of his compositions are known, consisting of French chansons, motets, masses, which appeared in printed collections published in Paris (Attaignant, Le Roy, Ballard), Lyons (Moderne), Nuremberg (Petrejus), Venice, etc. Two of his masses and a motet were copied into the large choir-books of the Sistine Chapel under Pope Paul III. Another Mass and a motet are at Modena (all MS.). A French chanson (4 v.), 'Graco vertu et bonté,' is at the Cambrai Library (MS.). Two of Hesdin's chansons have been reprinted in modern score, one in Expert's reprint of Attaignant ('Trente et une chansons musicales'), 1529, the other in Eitner's sixty chansons, 1899. M. L. P.

HESELTINE, JAMES (d. Durham, June 20, 1763), a pupil of Dr. Blow, was in the early part of the 18th century organist of St. Katherine's Hospital, near the Tower. In 1710/11 he was elected organist of Durham Cathedral, retaining his London appointment. Heseltine composed many excellent anthems, etc., a few of which are still extant in the books of some of the cathedrals, but the major part were destroyed by their composer upon some difference between him and the Dean and Chapter of Durham. A portrait of him is in the Music School, Oxford. W. H. H.

HESELTINE, PHILIP (b. Oct. 30, 1894), is known as a writer on music, as editor of Elizabethan and other old songs, and as a composer, chiefly of songs published under the name of Peter Warlock.

Heseltine was educated at Eton, where he learnt music. He claims no special musical education after his school days save that of intercourse with his friends Frederick DELIUS and Bernard van DIEREN (q.v.). He came before the London musical public in 1920, when he founded a paper, The Sackbut, and gave some concerts in connexion therewith for the furtherance of such music as specially interested him. That his tastes were eclectic was shown in the range of the programmes from the string fantasias of Purcell to the new works of Van Dieren. He edited the paper only for a year, but during that time made it valuable by his personal contributions involving research, notably his articles on GESUALDO (q.v.). These articles were later brought into book form, Carlo Gesualdo, by Heseltine and Cecil Gray (1926).

Heseltine has edited several series of English songs, viz. Robert Jones's 'The Muses' Garden for Delights' and 'English Ayres, 1598-1612' (in conjunction with Philip Wilson). He has arranged many of Delius's orchestral works for PF., and his book, Delius (1923), besides its informative value, is interesting as the work of a critical-minded disciple. His published compositions are not numerous. His songs range from some delicate little essays in the Elizabethan manner to 'The Curlew' (W. B. Yeats), a cycle for tenor voice, flute, cor anglais and string quartet, which won a Carnegie award in 1923. His work is admired for its faithfulness (both in accentuation and in feeling) to the texts chosen. Published instrumental works include 'An Old Song' (fl., ob., clar., horn, strings) and 'Serenade' for string orchestra. C.

HESS, MYRA (b. London, Feb. 25, 1890), a pianist of distinction, gained primarily through her fine playing of the classics, notably Scarlatti, Bach and Mozart.

Myra Hess began her musical education at the G.S.M. under Julian Pascal and Orlando Morgan, but she won a scholarship at the R.A.M. in 1902, and it was there that, working under Tobias Matthay for five years, she became the finished pianist who first came before the London public in 1907. On Nov. 15 she gave a concert at Queen's Hall and played Beethoven's concerto in G with Thomas Beecham and his orchestra. Her success was immediate and engagements to play concertos with the chief London orchestras followed. She played much in London, giving recitals and taking part in chamber concerts, and proved that her abilities were not only those of the brilliant virtuoso but of the interpretative artist, sensitive to musical beauty wherever it appears. She has brought forward new works by contemporary composers, especially those of her countrymen. Though her repertory is a wide one, including most of the big things of piano music, it is in the sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti, the '48' of J. S. Bach, and the concertos of Mozart, perhaps, that her intuitive musical sense appears most directly. But she is no specialist in the narrow sense, and, indeed, her richly romantic playing of Schumann's concerto and solo works is as outstanding in its way as her delicate handling of the earlier classics. European tours in Holland, Germany and France confirmed the high reputation she had gained at home. In 1922 she visited America for the first time, and has since revisited both Canada and the United States at frequent intervals. C.

HESS, WILLY (b. Mannheim, July 14, 1859), violinist, studied first with his father, a professional violinist, pupil of Spohr. In 1865 he visited America, where he resided with his family and continued his studies, receiving in 1868 an engagement to tour through the States with the Thomas orchestra. In 1872 he left America for Holland, playing in various Dutch towns with his sister. The following year he moved to Heidelberg in Germany, making that town a point of departure for tours in various continental musical centres. In 1874 he visited London for the first time, and in 1876 went to Berlin to study under Joachim, with whom he remained for two years, until his appointment as leader of the opera and Museum Concerts at Frankfort, where he also founded a string quartet and a trio with Kwast and Hugo Becker. In 1886 he succeeded Professor Wirth as professor at the Rotterdam Conservatorium, and in 1888 took the place of Ludwig Straus as leader of Sir Charles Hallé's orchestra in Manchester, where he remained for seven years. He then received an invitation to return once more to Germany, this time to Cologne, where he found a very fine musical position awaiting him, comprising the leadership of the Gürzenich Quartet, and conductorship of the Gürzenich orchestra. In 1903 he accepted the position vacated by Emile Sauret as professor of the violin at the R.A.M., but in 1904 went to Boston to lead the Symphony Orchestra in succession to KNEISEL (q.v.) and a quartet, of which Alwin Schröder was the violoncellist. In 1910 he returned to Berlin to take HALIK's place as teacher at the Hochschule and leader of the Halik Quartet. He became also a member of the 'Schumann Trio.' He succeeded to some part of Joachim's work at the Hochschule on the death of the latter. Hess is distinguished both as soloist and quartet leader, and, adding to the intellectuality of the German school a certain impetuosity of style peculiar to himself, his range is remarkably wide, and he is not less at home in the romantic than in the classic school. He plays upon a violin by J. B. Guadagnini, one of the finest known of that maker. w. w. c.

HESSE, ADOLF FRIEDRICH (b. Breslau, Aug. 30, 1809; d. there, Aug. 5, 1863), great organ-player and composer, son of an organ-builder. His masters in the pianoforte, composition and the organ were Berner and E. Köhler. His talent was sufficiently remarkable to induce the authorities of Breslau to grant him an allowance, which enabled him to visit Leipzig, Cassel, Hamburg, Berlin and Weimar, in each of which he played his own and other compositions, and enjoyed the instruction and acquaintance of Hummel, Rinck and Spohr. In 1831 he obtained the post which he kept till his death, that of organist to the church of the Bernhardins, Breslau. In 1844 he opened the organ at S. Eustache in Paris, and astonished the Parisians by his pedal-playing. In 1851 he was in London, and played on several of the organs in the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park—protesting much against the unequal temperament in some of them. But his home was Breslau, where he was visited by a constant stream of admirers from far and near up to his death. Hesse was director of the Symphony Concerts at Breslau, and left behind him a mass of compositions of all classes. But it is by his organ works that he will be remembered. His 'Practical Organist,' containing 29 pieces—amongst them the well-known variations on 'God save the King'—has been edited by Lincoln and published by Novello. A complete collection of his organ works was edited by Steggall and published by Boosey. g.

HESSE, (1) ERNST CHRISTIAN (b. Grosse-gottorn, Thuringia,¹ Apr. 14, 1676; d. Darmstadt, May 16, 1762), studied law at Giessen, and went to Paris to perfect himself on the viola da gamba which he had already studied at Darmstadt. The story of how he studied under Marin and Forqueray at the same time under different names, how the masters boasted about their favourite pupil, discovered his identity, and forgave him, is told in E. van der Straeten's History of the Violoncello. He toured for some years as virtuoso, visiting all the principal towns of Europe, earning fame and wealth, and returning in 1708 to Darmstadt, where in 1713 he married the famous operatic singer, JOHANNA ELISABETH DOEBRIGHT. Soon after this he was appointed court Kapellmeister at Vienna, where he remained until 1719, when the artist pair went to the wedding festivities of the Hereditary Prince at Dresden. Here he played at the court concerts while his wife sang in operas by Lotti, Heinichen, etc. After this they returned to Darmstadt laden with honours and wealth. His compositions, 2 operas, church music, sonatas and solos for viola da gamba, remained in MS., and appear to have been lost with but few exceptions. His son, (2) LUDWIG CHRISTIAN (b. Darmstadt), studied the viola da gamba under his father and became, like him, one of the greatest virtuosos of that instrument, and also one of the last. He became a member of the Royal Chapel at Berlin in 1754, and in 1766 joined that of the Prince of Prussia (afterwards Frederick William II.). The State Library in Berlin contains a large number of MS. arrangements by him from operas for 1 and 2 viola da gambas, dated from 1767–70. E. v. d. s.

HEUBERGER, RICHARD FRANZ JOSEPH (b. Graz, June 18, 1850; d. Vienna, Oct. 28, 1914), was at first an engineer, but in 1876 devoted himself to music, becoming choir-master of the Vienna Akademische Gesangverein, and in 1878 conductor of the Singakademie in the same capital. In 1881 he gave up work as a conductor, and took up criticism, working on the Wiener Tageblatt, the Munich Allgemeine Zeitung, and the Neue Freie Presse, for which he wrote from 1896–1901. In 1902 he was a teacher in the Conservatorium, and in 1904 became editor of the Neue Musikalische Presse. His literary works included Musikalische Skizzen (1901) and a biography of Schubert contributed to Riemann's Berühmte Musiker. He wrote numerous works as follows:

Operas: 'Abenteuer einer Neujahrsnacht' (Leipzig, 1886), 'Manuel Benegas' (ib., 1889), 'Miriam' (Vienna, 1894), given as 'Das Mäifest' (ib., 1904), 'Barfäsele' (Dresden, 1905); two ballets: 'Die Lautenschlägerin' (Prague, 1896) and 'Struwwelpeter' (Dresden, 1897); operettas: 'Der Opernball' (Vienna, 1898), 'Die Kaskaden' (ib., 1899), 'Der Rechenrutz' (1900), 'Das Baby' (1902), 'Der Fürst von Dürsternstein' (1910), and 'Don Quixotte' (1910).

HEUGEL, HANS, a 16th-century composer, court Kapellmeister at Cassel c. 1535–63, composed church music, including a Te Deum a 12 v., psalms, motets, sacred and secular songs in MS., and various collective volumes (Q.-L.; Mendel).

HEUGEL ET C^{ie}, an important firm of French music publishers, founded by Jacques Léopold Heugel (b. La Rochelle, 1815; d. Paris, Nov. 13, 1883). The house has a great reputation for the issue of educational works, such as the treatises or methods of Cherubini, Baillot, Mongozzo, Crescentini, Cinti-Damoreau, Stamaty, Marmontel, Fauré, Dubois and others. Besides these, numerous compositions by Delibes, Massenet, Reyer, Lalo, Charpentier and others are published by the firm. The famous musical periodical, Le Ménestrel, was started in 1833 by the founder, and is still the property of the firm. The business is under the control of Jacques Heugel, son of Henri (d. 1916), and grandson of the founder, with whom, since 1891, has been associated as a partner his nephew, Paul Chevalier Heugel.

HEURTEUR, GUILLAUME LE, a French composer in the earlier part of the 16th century, was a canon in the Church of St. Martin at Tours. His works appeared chiefly in Attaingnant's collections from 1530–1543, among them four masses, which Ambros ranks with those of Sermisy, a few Magnificats and motets, and a number of chansons. Two of the chansons are given in Eitner's Selection of Chansons, 1899, Nos. 28, 29. Fétis mentions some independent works of Le Heurteur, which, however, Eitner has not been able to verify. 1794, and organist in the court chapel, Hildburghausen, in the same year. He went to Wiesbaden in 1826 and afterwards, as music teacher at the court, and chamber musician, to Biberich. He was a noted instrumental and song composer in his time (Mendel; Q.-L.).

HEXACHORD. In order to remove certain grave difficulties connected with the Tetrachords of the Greek tonal system, Guido d'Arezzo is said to have proposed, about the year 1024, a new arrangement, based upon a more convenient division of the scale into Hexachords—groups of six sounds, so disposed as to place a diatonic semitone between the third and fourth notes of each series, the remaining intervals being represented by tones. The sounds of which these Hexachords are composed were represented, by the rules of this system, by the syllables ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, the semitone falling always between the syllables mi and fa. But, in addition to this syllabic distinction, the notes of each entire octave were provided with alphabetical names, exactly similar to those now in use—A, B, C, D, E, F, G; and, these names being immutable, it follows that, as the Hexachords begin on different notes, and constantly overlap each other, the same syllable is not always found in conjunction with the same letter.

The first, or Hard Hexachord (Hexachordon durum), begins on G, a note which is said to have been added, below the Greek scale,¹ by Guido, who called it Γ (gamma), whence the word gamma-ut, or gamut—

The second, or Natural Hexachord (Hexachordon naturale), begins on C, the second space—

On comparing these two examples it will be seen that the note which, in the first Hexachord, was sung to the syllable fa, is here sung to ut. Hence this note, in the collective gamut, is called C fa ut. And the same system is followed with regard to all notes that occur in more than one Hexachord.

The third, or Soft Hexachord (Hexachordon molle), begins on F, the fourth line: and, in order to place the semitone between its third and fourth sounds, the note, B, must be made flat.

¹ It is a curious analogy that the proslambanomenos (A), the lowest note of the Greek scale, was considered as an addition, and theoretically extraneous; since the bottom interval of a true tetrachord must be semitonal.

The note, sung, in the second Hexachord, to the syllable fa, is here sung to ut, and is therefore called F fa ut. The next note, G, is sung to sol, in the second Hexachord, re, in the third, and ut, in the next Hard Hexachord, beginning on the octave G; hence this note is called G sol re ut. And the same rule is followed with regard to all notes that appear in three different Hexachords. The note B♭, occurring only in the Soft Hexachord, is always called B fa. B♮ is called B mi, from its place in the Hard Hexachord, where alone it is found.

The four remaining Hexachords—for there are seven in all—are mere recapitulations of the first three, in the higher octaves. The entire scheme, therefore, may be represented, thus:

HEYWOOD, JOHN (b. circa 1497; d. 1587), English choir trainer and writer of interludes and farces. In Dec. 1514 he is mentioned in the Chamber accounts (B.M. Add. MSS. 21,481/178), when he received 8d. a day for services at the court in some undefined capacity. In 1520 he became a Yeoman of the Crown, and from 1519–21 the Chamber accounts show him as a 'singer' at £5 a quarter. From 1529–49 there are intermittent records of him as a player on the virginals, for which he received 50s. a quarter. In 1553 he was a 'Sewer of the Chamber' at the funeral of Edward VI. He was in high favour under Mary, and at her death retired to Malines. He is chiefly interesting as one of a group of men (which includes such names as Gilbert Banestre, William Cornyshe, Richard Pygott, John Redford and Richard Edwards) who, in their capacities as masters of the various boy companies (the children of the Chapel Royal, Windsor, St. Paul's, etc.), wrote and presented plays and interludes, usually with music, at court and other places. As one of our earliest writers of regular farces, his name is of considerable importance in the history of English dramatic literature.¹ If, as is most probable, he wrote his own incidental music and the music for the songs in his plays, like Cornyshe and the rest, none of it, and indeed no evidence to this effect, has come down to us. Prof. Wallace² says that Heywood 'had grown up in the Chapel under Cornyshe,' and attributes some of Heywood's most important work to the latter, but it is more probable that he assisted Westcott, with the St. Paul's children, or was attached to the Household children under Philip van Wilder. In 1538 he brought the St. Paul's children to perform before Mary (then Princess):

'Item geven to Heywood playeing an enterlude with his children before my lades grace, XL^s' (F. Madden, Expenses of Lady Mary, p. 62).

The next year Wolsey paid him for a masque of 'Arthur's Knights' at court. In 1553 he again brought the St. Paul's children to court, and on Aug. 7, 1559, the Queen was entertained by the Earl of Arundel with

'a play of the chylidren of Powles and ther Master [Sebastian] Westcott, Master Phelypes, and Master Haywod.' J. M.³

HICKFORD'S ROOM, if not the first, was one of the first regular public concert-rooms in London. The name was associated at different periods with two buildings on different sites. For the sake of clearness these are here numbered (1) and (2).

Hickford appears to have been a dancing-master of Queen Anne's reign, for the first advertisements of concerts held in his room mention it as 'Mr. Hickford's Dancing School'³ or 'Mr. Hickford's Great Dancing Room.' Later it was called simply 'Mr. Hickford's Great Room' or 'Hickford's Room.'

(1) It was originally in James Street, Haymarket, opposite the Royal Tennis Court, and its probable site is now occupied by the Comedy Theatre. It must have been a room of very considerable size to begin with, and was perhaps enlarged, since, two or three years after it was opened, we hear of an entrance from Panton Street; and in 1719, on the occasion of a concert for the benefit of Dahuron, the flautist, it is stated that

'Coaches and Chairs may come into James Street or into Panton Street, there being a passage into the room both ways.'

The first concert in this room took place on Mar. 25, 1713, for the benefit of Signora Lod. and Mr. Corbet, followed by others on Apr. 4, 1713, for the benefit of Signor Claudio Roieri, and on Apr. 17 'by subscription for Signor Nicolino Haym.' The only other concert of that year took place on May 20, for the celebrated 'BARONESS' (q.v.) and Mrs. Paulina. Hickford's Room became very quickly a favourite place of entertainment with audiences and performers. It must have had considerable advantages; for most of the great performers, both vocal and instrumental, who visited England, gave their concerts there, and those who resided in London held their benefits there year after year.

In 1714 there are records of six concerts in the room. On Feb. 1 'an extraordinary Concert of Vocal and Instrumental musick by the best Masters of the Opera,' for the benefit of Rogier. The Baroness held her benefit on Mar. 17, when the 'famous Signor Veracini' performed several Sonatas, and the great Violinist had a benefit of his own on Apr. 22, the Concert consisting entirely of his own compositions, both vocal and instrumental, and ³ Concerts were given at Hickford's Room from 1697–1701 under the management of Thomas Hickford. W. H. O. F.

'several solos on the Violin never played before.' Signora Stradiotti, a player on the harpsichord, 'who has never yet performed since her arrival in England,' gave a concert on Apr. 29. Signor Pardini had a benefit on May 20; and the Daily Courant of May 18 gives notice 'that the concert for the benefit of Mr. Matthew Dubourg, which was to have been at Mr. Hickford's school, is deferred to May 27.'

Dubourg was then 11 years old, and he was evidently, in 1714 and long after, considered an extraordinary youthful prodigy; for in the advertisements of his annual benefits, which for some years invariably took place at Hickford's Room, his age is always mentioned.

When Handel began his work at the opera, and procured celebrated performers for England, many of these, in addition to their engagements at the opera, took the opportunity of giving one or two concerts for their own benefit, and Hickford's great dancing-room soon became one of the fashionable resorts of the town. In 1715 nine or ten concerts were given by and for various more or less well-known people. But the first concert of that year is thus advertised in the Daily Courant of Mar. 21:

'By desire of several Ladies of Quality. For the benefit of Mrs. Smith. At the Great Room in James Street near the Haymarket, on Wednesday next, being the 23rd of March will be performed a compleat Consort of Musick by the best Masters of the Opera.' Mrs. Smith, or Betty Smith as she was sometimes called, was wigmaker to the opera for many years, and this was not the only occasion on which the 'Ladies of Quality' desired and obtained for her a benefit at Hickford's Room.

On Mar. 31, Valentini, though not singing at the opera, held a benefit concert, at which he was assisted by the gifted and fascinating Anastasia Robinson. The Baroness was a very faithful patroness of Hickford's Room for many years. At her benefit concerts she almost always managed to introduce some new and attractive instrumentalist, or some new compositions. In this year she announces

'a C nsort of Musick entirely new. Particularly several solos on the violin by Mr. Alexander Bitti, newly arrived from Italy.'

Only two other concerts of 1715 call for any particular notice. Dubourg, mentioned as 'the youth of 12,' held his annual benefit, playing several solos, and a concert was given 'for the benefit of a lady under misfortune.' This would seem to mark the beginning of charity concerts, for it is the first announcement of its kind.

The first concert of 1716 was a benefit for the violinist Castrucci, and may possibly have been his first appearance in England, for he is announced as being 'lately come from Italy.' It is in the advertisements of this concert that mention is first made of an entrance from Pantton Street into the room. Besides being appointed leader at the opera, Castrucci quickly obtained many concert engagements, and after his first appearance at Hickford's Room he played at most of the best concerts there for some years. On Mar. 15 he performed the instrumental music at Signora Isabella Aubert's concert, and again on Mar. 21, for the benefit of the Baroness, who on that occasion introduced several songs out of the opera 'Pyrrhus and Demetrius'—'to be sung in Italian and English.' On Apr. 12 there was a ball and masquerade by Dumirail, together with

'several entertainments of dancing performed by Mr. Dumirail and his son, who is lately come from Paris, and others. This being the last time of their appearing in Publick before their return to Paris.'

'A compleat Consort of Vocal and Instrumental Musick by the best Masters of the Opera' was announced for the benefit of Giorgio Giacomo Berwillibald, 'Servant to his Serene Highness the Margrave of Brandenburg Anspach, Brother to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales.' This concert, originally intended for May 21, was put off two or three times on account of the opera, and was finally given on June 9. Up to this period it was usual for the concert season to terminate at the end of May or in the middle of June, but in 1716 two entertainments at Hickford's Room were given in December, one on the 13th, another on the 20th.

In 1717 the first concert recorded was for the benefit of Castrucci on Mar. 13; and at another, on the 20th, for the benefit of Botelli 'lately arrived from Italy,' the celebrated Nicolini Grimaldi (see NICOLINI) is announced to sing; possibly one of his last performances in England. Dubourg and the Baroness held their annual benefits as usual in the Great Dancing-Room, as did Pietro, a player on the bass-viol and German flute. These, with three or four less important concerts, complete the tale for that year. Few concerts are recorded in 1718, except the usual annual benefits of the regular performers—Dubourg, Castrucci, etc., and the only apparent novelties were those introduced at her concert by Mlle. Coraill, in the form of 'several new songs by the famous Domenico Scarlatti, never before performed in this Kingdom.'

The concerts of 1719 seem to have been mostly given by various members of the opera band, including the famous oboe-player Kytch, whose name figures at several concerts, and who at his own benefit played 'several new solos and Concertos on the Hautboy and Little Flute': it is further stated that the 'Vocal and Instrumental Musick will be by the Best Hands from the Opera.' The Daily Courant of May 1 advertises 'The Benefit of Signor Francisco Scarlatti. The greatest part of his own composition, being brother to the famous Alessandro Scarlatti.'

During the next ten years few concerts calling for special remark are recorded as having taken place at Hickford's Room. Among the most noticeable may be mentioned one announced for Mar. 20, 1724, for the benefit of Scarlatti,

'in which will be a Pastoral Cantata for two voices, accompanied by all sorts of instruments, composed by himself on this occasion.'

The concert-giver is most likely to have been Domenico Scarlatti, who is known to have visited England, and who was a great friend of Handel. In December of the same year we hear of an entertainment of dancing by a French company, who performed

'the curious Sword Dance as it is danced in Italy, Spain, France, and Germany, which never was danced in England before.'

Bigonzi, the contralto, also gave a concert at Hickford's Room, as did other less noticeable singers and instrumentalists who visited England during that period, and Dubourg, Kytch and various members of the opera band gave concerts of their own, and played at others for the benefit of their friends. Castrucci's name occurs frequently, and he always held his annual benefits at Hickford's. For these he generally advertises some novelty, sometimes concertos and solos 'by his master Corelli,' sometimes pieces in which he can show off his power of playing tricks on his instrument, such as 'a particular Concert with an Echo,' and 'a new composition called the Feasts of the Piazza di Spagna, in which Mr. Castrucci will make you hear Two Trumpets on the Violin.' During the year 1724, and always afterwards, the room was called 'Hickford's Great Room in Panton Street,' to which street the main entrance appears to have been transferred, though at certain concerts people are requested to let their chairs wait in James Street near the old entrance which was still used as an extra exit.

Early in Jan. 1729 Granom the composer began a series of subscription concerts to take place on Saturday evenings, but no details of the performances are recorded. It would appear, however, that the weekly concert began at about this period to be a recognised form of entertainment with people of fashion, and in Dec. 1731 Geminiani advertised a series of concerts, twenty in number, beginning on Thursday Dec. 9, and to be continued on every succeeding Thursday till the number was completed. The subscription was four guineas, and for that amount each subscriber had a silver ticket. These tickets were non-transferable, for it is emphatically stated that 'no other Lady or Gentleman will be admitted in the absence of the subscriber, and each lady that subscribes may take another Lady with her, paying a Crown at the door, but no Gentleman will be admitted without a Ticket.'

The concerts were carried on for some years; Geminiani himself performed at them, together with other instrumentalists, and he engaged popular singers of the day, such as Mrs. Young and Hull. In 1738 there are no concerts recorded in connexion with Hickford at the Panton Street room, his name does not appear at all, nor are the entertainments such as he was generally associated with.

(2) On Feb. 9, 1739, appeared an advertisement of a concert for the benefit of Valentine Snow (q.v.) to be given 'at Mr. Hickford's new Great Room in Brewer Street near Golden Square.' Of Hickford's reasons for removing from Panton Street nothing is known. The new room had the advantage of being in a fashionable part of town, for both Golden Square and Brewer Street were at that time inhabited by persons of position. The room itself is still in existence, and is built out at the back of one of the fine old Georgian houses yet remaining in Brewer Street, in which Hickford lived. It is a room of good proportions, 50 feet long by 30 broad, lofty, and with a coved ceiling. It is lighted by one large window at the southern end, in front of which is the platform, small and rather low, and there is a gallery opposite, over the door. It appears to be in much the same state now as in Hickford's time, and bears but few marks of alteration, except that the walls, cornices and beautiful carved mouldings have been covered with paint and whitewash to their great disfigurement. At the present time the house belongs to a private club, and concerts are still given by the members in the room, which possesses good acoustic qualities, and was evidently designed and built for a music-room. It originally had a back door into Windmill Street, where, as formerly in James Street, ladies and gentlemen were desired to order their chairs to wait, but no trace of this old exit remains, and buildings of a later date now crowd closely against the back of the old house. The concerts in the new room were on a larger scale than those in the old one, and in addition to the ordinary concerts of 'Vocal and Instrumental music' for the benefit of various soloists, oratorios, anthems and other compositions of a like nature were given, and frequently formed the programme of some of the subscription concerts that were carried on with greater success than ever. John Christopher Smith's musical drama 'Rosalinda,' and his oratorio 'The Lament of David over Saul and Jonathan,' were both performed for the first time at Hickford's Room during the season of 1740, and were repeated three or four times 'at the particular desire of several persons of Quality.' Two new anthems by Handel, 'O sing unto the Lord,' and 'My song shall be always,' were performed in Holy Week of that year, also for the first time. Among the singers were Geminiani's brilliant pupil Mrs. Arne and John BEARD (q.v.), the famous tenor. During 1741 Androni and the celebrated violoncellist Caporale appeared several times at the subscription concerts now held every Friday, and one of the chief novelties of that season was Hasse's 'Salve Regina,' much advertised beforehand, and performed three times.

One of the most noticeable concerts of the later days of Hickford's Room was that given by Mozart and his sister on May 13, 1765. It was announced some weeks beforehand, and the following advertisement appeared in the Public Advertiser on the day of performance:

'For the benefit of Miss Mozart of thirteen and Master Mozart of eight years of age; Prodiges of Nature. Hickford's Great Room in Brewer Street. This day May 13 will be a Concert of Vocal and Instrumental Music. With all the Overtures of this little Boy's own composition. The vocal part by Sig. Cremonini, Concerto on the Violin Mr. Barthelomon, Solo on the Violoncello by Sig. Ciril. Concertos on the Harpsichord by the little Composer and his sister, each single and both together, etc. Tickets at 5s. each to be had of Mr. Mozart at Mr. Williamson's in Thrift Street, Soho.'

This was the last public concert given by the Mozarts before they left England. During the next ten years Hickford's Room continued to be used for a variety of good concerts, some being directed by J. C. Bach and Abel; and for several seasons Hay carried on a series of subscription concerts on Monday evenings. In 1775 Edward Jones gave a concert introducing the Welsh harp. After that date, however, most of the important concerts were given in the new rooms in Hanover Square, and Hickford's Room fell gradually into disuse. The last concert with which his name is connected took place in 1779. B. H.; addns. W. H. G. F.

HIDALGO, JUAN (d. Madrid, before 1644), Spanish composer, who wrote music for the first performances of several of the plays of Calderon. He is said to have been a harpist in the Chapel Royal, Madrid; and to have invented an instrument called the clavi-harpa. His music for Calderon's 'Ni Amor se libra de Amor' (1640) is illustrated in Pedrell's Teatro lirico español, vols. iv. and v.

Music for 'Los celos hacen estrellas,' a zarzuela (comic opera) by Juan Vélez de Guevara (Madrid, Bibl. Nac.), produced in 1644, is said to be the earliest known use in Spain of recitative. J. B. T.

HIDDEN FIFTHS AND OCTAVES. (Fr. quintes cachées, octaves cachées.) The approach of two parts to the interval of a fifth or octave by similar motion, was given this name, since theorists argued that CONSECUTIVES (q.v.) were implied or hidden within the movement of the parts.

From the 17th century to the 19th therefore they forbade it, but without any appreciable effect on the practice of composers. (See HERBST.) C.

HIERONYMUS DE MORAVIA (first half of 13th cent.), a Dominican of the monastery Rue St. Jacques, Paris. The chief merit of his Tractatus de musica, mostly compiled from older writers, lies in his giving four 'positiones solemnes' about mensural music, and the tuning of the 'fiedel' of his time. HIGHLAND FLING, a step in dancing, peculiar to the Scotch Highlands. The name is commonly transferred to the dance itself. The term 'fling' expresses the kicking gesture which characterises it. When a horse kicks by merely raising one leg and striking with it, he is said, in groom's parlance, to 'fling like a cow.' The performer dances on each leg alternately, and flings the other leg in front and behind. The Highland Fling, in which three, four or more persons may take part, is danced to the music of the Strathspey. The following is a specimen:

HILDEBRAND, ZACHARIE (1680-1743), and his son JOHANN (GOTTFRIED), were eminent organ-builders in Germany. The latter, who was the principal workman of the Dresden Silbermann, built the noble organ of St. Michael's, Hamburg, in 1762, which cost more than £4000. V. de R.

HILES, (1) HENRY (b. Shrewsbury, Dec. 31, 1826; d. Worthing, Oct. 20, 1904), was organist successively at Shrewsbury, as his brother's deputy: Bury (1846); Bishopwearmouth (1847); St. Michael's, Wood Street (1859); the Blind Asylum, Manchester (1859); Bowden (1861 and St. Paul's, Manchester, 1863-67. In 1876 he became lecturer in harmony and composition at Owens College, and in 1879 at the Victoria University. He was conductor of several musical societies in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and was editor and proprietor of the Quarterly Musical Review, which lasted from 1885-88. In 1893 he was appointed professor at the Manchester College of Music. He retired to Pinner, near Harrow, in 1904. His compositions include:

'David,' oratorio, 1860; 'The Patriarchs,' oratorio, 1872; 'War in the Household,' operetta, 1885, from the German of Castell ('Häusliche Krieg'), originally composed by Schubert; 'Harold,' overture, composed 1893; 'Watchfulness,' 'Payre Pastorel' and 'The Crusaders,' cantatas; settings of Psalm xlvii. and xlviii.; several anthems, services and part-songs (his glie,

'Hushed in Death,' obtained the prize offered by the Manchester Gentlemen's Glee Club, 1878; 'Installation Ode,' Victoria University, 1892, and other choral works.

He wrote books on music, namely :

Grammar of Music, two vols., Forsyth Bros., 1879; Harmony of Sounds, three editions, 1871, 1872, 1873; First Lessons in Singing, Elme & Addison, Manchester, 1881; Part Writing or Madras Counterpoint, Novello, 1884; Harmony or Counterpoint I 1889; Harmony, Choral or Contrapuntal, 1894.

HILL, HENRY (b. London, July 2, 1808; d. there, June 11, 1856), a distinguished English viola-player, a son of Henry Lockey Hill, the violin-maker. He became the leading viola-player of his time at the Opera, the provincial festivals, and the principal oratorio concerts, and he especially made a name for himself as a player of chamber music. He was a cultured musician and a man of scholarly attainments. He was a member of the Queen's Private Band, of Ella's Musical Union, and the Queen's Square Select Society; in association with ALSAGER (q.v.) he was one of the founders of the Beethoven Quartet Society, for the analytical programmes of which he was responsible. He made the acquaintance of Berlioz, and he played the solo part in 'Harold en Italie' on the occasion of its first performance in London, Feb. 7, 1848. Berlioz, in his Soirées de l'Orchestre, speaks of Hill and his incomparable instrument, which was made by the English maker, Barak Norman. An admirable lithograph portrait of Henry Hill was drawn by Baugniet, a well-known draughtsman of the time.

HILL, JOHN (b. Rugby, Warwickshire, 1724; d. Timberland, Lincolnshire, Jan. 19, 1797), a composer of church music, greatly esteemed by Handel (Gentleman's Magazine, 1797, Feb., p. 166).

HILL, (1) JOHN (b. Norwich, Apr. 5, 1797; d. there, July 28, 1846), co-founder (with Edw. Taylor) of Norwich Choral Society; chorus master of musical festivals, 1826-46; for some time precentor of St. Mary's Chapel. He edited, in conjunction with his son, (2) JAMES FREDERICK, the Norwich Tune Book, containing some numbers of his own composition (1844).

HILL, (1) JOSEPH (b. 1715; d. 1784), a London violin and other instrument maker. He worked at 'Ye Harp and Hautboy' in Piccadilly, then in High Holborn; afterwards at the 'Violin' in Angel Court, Westminster, and finally at the 'Harp and Flute' in the Haymarket in 1762. From this address he issued some volumes of music, being sets of lessons for the harpsichord by different authors. He was ancestor to a line of fiddle-makers, the descendants of whom are

HILL, THOS. HY. WEIST-, see WEIST-HILL.

HILL & SON, W., organ-builders in London. The house was founded by John SNETZLER (q.v.) about 1755, who was succeeded in 1780 by his foreman, Ohrmann. The latter had a partner, W. Nutt, in 1790, who was afterwards joined by Thomas Elliott about 1803. After Elliott had done business some time alone, he took as partner, in 1825, (1) WILLIAM HILL (d. Dec. 18, 1870), a Lincolnshire man, who had married his daughter. Elliott died in 1832, Hill remaining alone until 1837, when he was joined by Frederic Davison. After 1838 Davison left to become a partner of John Gray (see GRAY & DAVISON), and the firm became W. Hill & Son. William Hill deserves the gratitude of English organists for having, in conjunction with GAUNTLETT (q.v.), introduced the CC compass into this country.

Elliott & Hill built the organ in York Minster, since which the Hills have built, amongst many others, the organs of Ely, Worcester and Manchester Cathedrals; Birmingham Town Hall; St. Peter's, Cornhill; All Saints', Margaret Street, London; Melbourne Town Hall, Johannesburg Town Hall, etc.

(2) ARTHUR GEORGE HILL (d. Sept. 10, 1923), one of the partners in the firm, was author of a valuable book on Organ-cases and Organs of the Middle Ages and Renaissance, etc., 1883.

v. de r.

HILL & SONS, W. E., a London firm of violin-makers, dealers and repairers carrying on business at 140 New Bond Street, and holding in the musical world a position of recognised authority on all matters relating to the violin. Most of the famous instruments by Stradivari and other makers have passed from time to time through their hands.

The firm at one time consisted of four brothers, of whom two, Arthur Frederick Hill and Alfred Ebsworth Hill, are still active partners in 1926. With them are associated Paul Ebsworth Hill and Albert Edgar Phillips. The Hill family is connected traditionally with the 'Mr. Hill, the instrument maker' mentioned in Pepys's Diary (1660). The firm was founded by Joseph Hill (1715-84. see above), who was apprenticed to Peter Wamsley, and afterwards carried on business at the sign of the 'Violin' in Holborn in 1762, and later at the sign of the 'Harp and Flute' in the Haymarket. He turned out, in his time, many good instruments, and his violoncellos are to this day in good repute both here and on the Continent. His five sons—William, Joseph, Lockey, Benjamin and John—were all violin-makers and musicians, the names of three of them appearing in the orchestra at the first Handel Commemoration in 1784. As much may be said of many other members of the family. One of them belonged to Queen Anne's band; others appeared late in the 18th century in the minute-books of the Royal Society of Musicians and in the records of the Musicians' Company. The connexion between the art and the craft has always been maintained, and Henry HILL (q.v.) ranked as the leading English viola-player of his day. His brother, William Ebsworth (d. 1895), father of the present members of the firm, was one of the worthies of the violin world, a genuine craftsman, whose judgment could be relied upon where the authenticity of old instruments was concerned. He was gifted, it may be added, with a keen sense of humour. Alfred Ebsworth and Walter Edgar both learned their craft of luthier in the old French violin-making town of Mirecourt, the former being the first Englishman to do so. William Henry (d. 1927) began life as a professor of the viola. The firm has established workshops near London, and good results have been attained. The brothers have co-operated in producing important literary works dealing with the violin. Among them are Gio. Paolo Maggini (see MAGGINI), from the pen of Lady Huggins, and a Life of Stradivari (see STRADIVARI), an exhaustive work. W. W. C., rev.

HILLEMACHER, two brothers whose works, written in collaboration, attained a high position in French music. (1) PAUL JOSEPH WILHELM (b. Paris, Nov. 25, 1852); (2) LUCIEN JOSEPH ÉDOUARD (b. Paris, June 10, 1860; d. June 2, 1909). Both studied at the Conservatoire; the elder obtained a second accessit in harmony and accompaniment in 1870, a first accessit in counterpoint and fugue in 1872, a second prize in 1873, the second Grand Prix de Rome in 1873, and the first in 1876. The younger brother gained a first accessit in harmony and accompaniment in 1877, a first prize in 1878, the second Grand Prix de Rome in 1879, and first in 1880. The practice of writing in collaboration was adopted in 1881, with the signature 'P. L. Hillemacher.' Their first important work was 'Loreley,' a Légende symphonique (crowned at the concours of the Ville de Paris, 1882). Other works include:

'Saint-Mégrim,' 4-act opera (Brussels, Mar. 2, 1886); 'La Légende de Nte. Geneviève' (1886); 'Une Aventure d'Arléquin,' 4-act opéra-comique (Brussels, Mar. 22, 1886); incidental music to

'Héro et Léandre' (1893); 'Le Régiment qui passe,' 1-act opéra-comique (Rouen, Sept. 11, 1894); 'One for Two,' 1-act pantomime (London, Prince of Wales's Theatre, May 26, 1894); 'Le Drac' ('Der Fluthgeist'), lyrical drama in three acts (Carlsruhe, Nov. 14, 1896); and 'Ornela,' lyric drama in three acts (Paris, Opéra, May 21, 1902). 'Circé,' lyric drama in 3 acts, accepted at the Opéra-Comique in 1898; played there, Apr. 17, 1907; 'Fra Angelico,' tableau musical, 1 act (Opéra-Comique, June 10, 1924).

The brothers also brought out several albums of songs and choral pieces, as well as works for orchestra and chamber music. G. F.

HILLER, FERDINAND (b. Frankfurt-on-Main, Oct. 24, 1811; d. May 10, 1885). His first music-lessons were from a violinist named Hofmann, who did little beyond allowing him to form his taste by playing the sonatas of Mozart and Beethoven. Instruction on the pianoforte he received from Aloys Schmidt, and in harmony and counterpoint from Vollweiler. At 10 he played a concerto by Mozart in public, and at 12 began to compose. Though educated for a learned profession, he was allowed to take up the study of music in earnest; and in 1825 was placed with Hummel at Weimar. Here for a time his attention was absorbed by composition; for Hummel, recognising his obvious bent, allowed him to take his own course. His master's criticisms on his early compositions were severe and disheartening, but Hiller proved the reality of his artistic impulse by never allowing himself to be discouraged. In 1827 he accompanied Hummel on a professional tour to Vienna, and had the privilege of seeing Beethoven on his death-bed and of witnessing the dissipation of the cloud which had once interrupted his intercourse with Hummel. Of this meeting he has given an interesting account from memory in his Aus dem Tonleben (2nd series). While in Vienna he published his op. 1, a pianoforte quartet written in Weimar. He then returned to Frankfurt, but stayed there only a short time, in spite of his advantageous intercourse with Schelble, as he was anxious to push on to Paris.

His stay in Paris lasted from 1828-35, with one break caused by the death of his father. He acted for a time as professor in Choron's 'Institution de Musique,' but afterwards lived independently, perfecting himself as a pianist and composer, enjoying the best society. Besides Mendelssohn, whom he met as a boy at Frankfurt and with whom he remained in the closest friendship to a late date, he was intimate with Cherubini, Rossini, Chopin, Liszt, Meyerbeer, Berlioz, Nourrit, Heine and many others. Fétis, in his Biographie universelle, gives further particulars of this stay in Paris, and especially of Hiller's concerts, in which Fétis took part. Suffice it to say here that his performances of Bach and Beethoven had an important share in making the works of those great masters better known in France. He was the first to play Beethoven's E♭ concerto in Paris; and his classical soirées, given in company with Baillot, excited much attention at the time.

From Paris he returned to Frankfurt, conducted the Cäcilien-Verein in 1836 and 1837 during Schelble's illness, and then passed on to Milan, where he again met Liszt and Rossini. Rossi furnished him with the libretto of 'Romilda,' which he set to music, and which, through the intervention of Rossini, was produced at La Scala in 1839, but without success. Here also he began his oratorio 'Die Zerstörung Jerusalems,' perhaps his most important work, and one that interested Mendelssohn so much that he induced Hiller to pass the winter of 1839 in Leipzig, personally superintending its production (Apr. 2, 1840), which was most successful, and was followed by performances at Frankfurt, Berlin, Dresden, Vienna, Amsterdam and elsewhere. On his second journey to Italy in 1841, he went to Rome and studied old Italian church music under the guidance of Baini, of whom he has recorded his recollections (Tonleben, ii. 101).

On his return to Germany he lived successively in Frankfurt, Leipzig (conducting the Gewandhaus Concerts of 1843-44) and Dresden. Here he produced two more operas, 'Traum in der Christnacht' and 'Conradin.' During this time he lived on intimate terms with Spohr, Mendelssohn, the Schumanns, David, Hauptmann, Joachim and many more illustrious artists. A lasting memorial of this period is preserved in the dedication of Schumann's PF. concerto to him—'freundschaftlich zugeignet.' In 1847 he became municipal Kapellmeister at Düsseldorf, and in 1850 accepted a similar post at Cologne, where he organised the Conservatorium, and became its first director. This post he retained till his death, and in his various capacities of composer, conductor, teacher and littérateur, he exercised an important influence on music in the Rhenish Provinces. The Lower Rhine Festivals, which he conducted from 1850 as often as they were held at Cologne, chiefly contributed to gain him his high reputation as a conductor. (See NIEDERRHEINISCHE MUSIKFESTE.) As a teacher his career was closely connected with the history of the Cologne Conservatorium. Among his numerous pupils there, Max Bruch became the most famous. He occasionally left Cologne to make concert tours in Germany, or longer excursions abroad. He conducted the Italian opera in Paris for a time (1852-53), and visited Vienna and St. Petersburg, where in 1870 he conducted a series of concerts by the Russian Musical Society. England he visited several times, first in 1852, when he conducted a work of his own at the London Philharmonic Concert of June 28; and again in 1870, when his cantata, 'Nala und Damajanti,' was performed at the Birmingham Festival, and in 1872, when he was enthusiastically received both as a pianist and conductor of his own works at the Monday Popular and Crystal Palace Concerts, and also in Liverpool and Manchester.

Hiller's published works include :

CHAMBER MUSIC.—Five PF. quartets; five trios; five string quartets; Sonatas for PF. alone, and with violin and violoncello; a suite 'in Canone' for PF. and violin; Serenade for PF. and violoncello; 'Moderne Suite' for PF.; and a mass of other piano-forte compositions, including twenty-four Études, 'Rhythmische Studien,' 'Impromptu' zur Guitarre, 'opérettes without words, etc., etc.

ORCHESTRA.—Four overtures, including that to 'Demetrius'; a Festival March for the opening of the Albert Hall; three symphonies, including that with the motto 'Es muss doch Frühling werden'; etc., etc.

VOCAL.—Two oratorios, 'Die Zerstörung Jerusalems' and 'Saul'; five operas, including 'Die Katakomben,' 'Der Deserteur,' and many smaller works; Lieder; choruses, mixed and for men's voices only; motets, psalms, etc.; a number of cantatas for soli, chorus and orchestra, especially 'O weint um Nie' from Byron's Hebrew Melodies, op. 49, 'Ver sacrum,' op. 75; 'Nala und Damajanti,' written for Birmingham; 'Israels Fliegengesang,' op. 161, 'Prometheus,' op. 170; and 'Lebecca,' op. 182.

His literary works include a crowd of interesting articles, biographical, critical and miscellaneous, contributed to the Kölnische Zeitung, many of them republished under the title Aus dem Tonleben unserer Zeit, two volumes in 1867, with a 'neue Folge' in 1871, and a fourth vol., Persönliches und Musikalisches, in 1876. He also published his recollections of Mendelssohn—which appeared in Macmillan's Magazine and were reprinted separately with a dedication to Queen Victoria—and a very interesting paper on Cherubini, first printed in the same periodical. He edited a volume of letters by Hauptmann to Spohr and other well-known musicians. To complete the list, we may add—additional accompaniments for Handel's 'Deborah' (for the Lower Rhine Festival, 1834), and 'Theodora'; and an instruction book, Übungen zum Studium der Harmonie und des Contrapuncts (2nd ed., 1860).

HILLER, JOHANN ADAM (real name HÜLLER) (b. Wendisch-Ossig, near Görlitz, Prussia, Dec. 25, 1728; d. June 16, 1804), famous as founder of the German SINGSPIEL (q.v.), was the son of a schoolmaster and parish clerk.

He lost his father when barely six, and had a hard struggle to obtain his education. He possessed a fine treble voice, and had already acquired considerable facility on various instruments, and he quickly turned these talents to account. He passed in 1747 from the Gymnasium at Görlitz to the Kreuzschule at Dresden, where he studied the harpsichord and thorough-bass under Homilius. It was, however, the operas and sacred compositions of Hasse and Graun which exercised the most lasting influence upon him. Hasse's operas, of which he had the opportunity of hearing excellent performances, had a special attraction for him, and he copied the scores of several. In 1751 he went to the University of Leipzig, where, besides his legal studies, he devoted much attention to music, 'partly from choice, partly from necessity,' as he himself relates. He took part in the so-called 'Grosses Concert' both as flautist and singer, and began to make his way as a composer and author. In 1754 he entered the household of Count Brühl, the Saxon minister, as tutor, and in this capacity accompanied his pupil to Leipzig in 1758. A hypochondriacal tendency, which overshadowed his whole life, caused him not only to resign this appointment, but also to refuse the offer of a professorship at St. Petersburg. Henceforward he lived independently at Leipzig, engaged in literature and music, and actively employed in promoting the revival of public concerts, temporarily given up during the war; and it is largely owing to his exertions that they afterwards reached so high a pitch of excellence. He was appointed director in 1763, when the concerts were called 'Liebhaber-concerte,' and immediately took steps to improve the choruses.

In 1771 he founded a school for the cultivation of singing, which he supported from 1775 by giving performances of the oratorios of Handel, Graun, etc. As paid director of a society for the practice of music, he established Concerts Spirituels in 1776 (so called after the Parisian 'Concert Spirituel'), which took the place left vacant by the failure of the old Grosses Concert. In 1781 this Concert-Institut moved into the newly-built hall of the Gewandhaus, and thus originated the Gewandhaus concerts (see LEIPZIG) of world-wide celebrity. Not content with this, he composed for the then flourishing theatre at Leipzig a series of Singspiele, which are sufficient of themselves to perpetuate his name in the history of music. Though doubtless an adaptation of the French operetta, Hiller established the German Singspiel as a separate branch of art. He took for his basis the simple Lied, a form which brought it within the capacities of the company, who were by no means trained singers; but within these narrow limits he developed a variety of invention and expression, a delicacy and precision of character, which at once secured universal approval, and have sufficed to maintain this class of piece to the present day. He enlarged both the form and substance of the Lied proper, by departing from the simple strophe, and giving to the songs a specific dramatic colouring in accordance with the character. He also introduced 'morceaux d'ensemble,' and traces are not wanting of the beginnings even of the dramatic 'scena.' Of these Singspiele, the best known are 'Lisuart und Dariolette,' 'Lottechen am Hofe,' 'Liebe auf dem Lande,' 'Dorfbarbier,' and especially 'Die Jagd,' which kept the stage for more than a century, and is even still performed (see list). He also wrote a quantity of sacred songs and Lieder, which had their share in bringing to perfection this style of composition—so significant a contrast to the Italian aria. Having been induced to accompany his pupils, the two Fräulein Podleska, to the court of the Duke of Courland at Mittau, in 1782 Hiller made so favourable an impression, that on his departure in 1784, he was appointed hofcapellmeister, with a salary. He resigned his post at the Gewandhaus concerts in 1785, and in 1789 his many services to the cause of music were recompensed by the appointment as cantor and musical director to the Thomas-schule in Leipzig. He was at first appointed as deputy to Doles, and succeeded to the post after the latter's death in 1797. This post he held till 1801.

As composer, conductor, teacher and author, Hiller's industry was indefatigable. His instrumental compositions are now quite antiquated, but not so his vocal works. These consist chiefly of motets and the Singspiele already named; but the following must not be omitted:

* Choralmelodien zu Gellerts geistlichen Oden und Liedern' (1761); 'Weisse's Lieder für Kinder' (1769); '50 geistliche Lieder für Kinder' (1774); and 'Vierstimmige Choräle' (1794). Of his larger works may be cited a 'Passions-oratorio' and a 100th Psalm, both much prized by his contemporaries. Hiller also composed a Choralbuch (1793), with two appendices (1794 and 1797), largely used in his day.

Hasse and Graun were the models of his taste, whom he revered all his life. But he was by no means insensible to the influence of the great renovation of music originated by Haydn and Mozart, and was powerfully impressed by Handel, while for Bach and Gluck he entertained a bare outward respect, with no real sympathy. He had deeply imbibed the spirit of that insipid and shallow age, which being entirely without feeling for historical propriety, permitted arbitrary changes in the treatment of older works, which in our day of historical enlightenment seem as astounding as they are impertinent. This is very remarkable in Hiller's careful editions of classical works. Thus he introduced many alterations of his own into a German edition of Handel's Jubilate under the title of the 100th Psalm: and arranged Pergolesi's two-part Stabat Mater for a four-part choir. He also edited Hasse's 'Pilgrimme auf Golgatha,' Graun's 'Tod Jesu,' and Haydn's Stabat Mater with German words, and in an abridged form for pianoforte. Still much praise is due to him for his frequent performances of oratorios, chiefly those of Handel. The 'Messiah' especially was given at Berlin, Breslau, Leipzig and other places, with nearly as much éclat as at the great English festivals. As an author Hiller was painstaking and prolific. His first important book seems to have been Abhandlung von der Nachahmung der Natur in der Musik, 1753. Besides several single articles in periodicals he edited a weekly paper, Wöchentliche Nachrichten und Anmerkungen die Musik betreffend (1766-70). He had always given great attention to the cultivation of singing, and two instruction books of that kind, Anweisung zum musikalisch-richtigen Gesange (1774) and Anweisung zum musikalisch-zierlichen Gesange (1780), are among the most valuable of his works. He also published a good Method for violin. He edited Lebensbeschreibungen berühmter Musikgelehrten und Tonkünstler (1 vol., 1784), with his autobiography.² Two of his collections also deserve mention—Musikalische Zeitvertreib (1760), of German and Italian airs, duets, etc., and 'Vierstimmige Motetten,' etc. (6 vols. 4to, 1776–91), containing motets by many celebrated composers—a work of real value. (For complete list of his works, both musical and literary, see Q.-L.) His grateful pupils, the sisters Podleska, erected in 1832 a small monument to his memory on the Promenade at Leipzig, before the windows of his official residence at the Thomasschule, and close to Mendelssohn's Bach memorial. HILTON, (1) JOHN, contributed a 5-part madrigal, 'Fair Oriana, Beauty's Queen,' to the 'Triumphes of Oriana,' 1601. He is there called 'Batcheler of Musick,' very likely correctly, though no record exists of his having taken his degree. He may probably be identified with John Hilton, a counter-tenor in Lincoln Cathedral choir, first mentioned in 1584. The Lincoln chapter gave him 30s. (Jan. 21, 1593) for helping to prepare two comedies to be acted by the choristers. As a reward for good and faithful service, the chapter allowed him to dispose of his house in the Close on his being elected organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, Jan. 28, 1594; he is then described as 'late Poor Clerk and Organist of the Cathedral,' but he can only have been assistant organist, for Thomas Butler was organist.¹ Hilton was probably dead before 1612, when George Mason was organist of Trinity.² A 7-part anthem, 'Call to remembrance,' by 'John Hilton, senior,' is in the Boal. Lib. (MS. Mus. f. 25–28). Possibly some of the compositions assigned below to the younger Hilton may prove to be by the elder. A dialogue, 'Job,' by one of the John Hiltons, was printed in the Monatshefte in 1897.

(2) JOHN (b. 1599³; d. Mar. 1656/7). He may very well have been the son of the first John Hilton. In 1626 he took his degree of Mus.B. at Cambridge from Trinity College. In supplicating for the degree he mentions that he has studied the science of music for ten years. In 1627 he published 'Ayres, or Fa La's for Three Voyces' (edited by Warren for the Mus. Antiquarian Society, 1844). In dedicating 'these unripe First-fruits of my Labours,' as he calls them, to Dr. Heather, founder of the Oxford professorship of music, Hilton speaks of them as 'but a drop that I receiv'd from you the Fountaine'; which may be taken to mean that Heather was either his master or his patron. In 1628 Hilton was made parish clerk and organist of St. Margaret's, Westminster, receiving for the former office a salary of £6:13:4 a year. It is assumed that on the suppression of the organs in 1644 he retained the post of clerk.⁴ Anthony Wood, in his MS. Notes on Musicians, now in the Bodleian Library, says:

'He died in the time of Oliver, and was buried in the Great Cloysters at Westminster; at which time the singing at burials being silenced, as popish, the Fraternity of Musicians who intended to sing him to his grave, sang the Anthem in the House over the corps before it went to the church, and kept time on his coffin.'

Wood seems to have been wrong as to the place of his burial, for it is entered in the registers of St. Margaret's, Westminster, on Mar. 21, 1656/7.

An Elegy by Hilton on the death of William Lawes, 'Bound by the neere conjunction of our Soules,' for three voices and bass, was printed among other similar compositions in Lawes's Choice Psalms, 1648. In 1652 he published 'Catch that catch can, or A Choice Collection of Catches, Rounds and Canons for three or four Voyces,' dedicated to his 'much Honoured Friend, Mr. Robert Coleman.' This contains a large number of compositions by Hilton himself as well as by other musicians; among his rounds being the still popular 'Come follow me.' The second edition is dated 1658. In the B.M. Add. MSS. 11,808, among a number of airs and dialogues by Hilton, are two songs, which have been thought to be his latest dated works, 'Love is the sun' and 'When first I gazed,' both bearing the date 1656; but as the first is also dated Feb. 16, 1641, in neither case can 1656 be taken as the date of composition.

Two madrigals by Hilton, 'One April Morn' and 'Smooth-flowing Stream,' were printed by Oliphant 'from an old MS.,' with words adapted by the editor. Rimbault printed a service by him in his Cathedral Music, 1847, professedly from a MS. at Westminster Abbey. Among works still remaining in MS.⁵ are the anthems 'Teach me, O Lord' (Oxford Mus. School); 'The Earth is the Lord's' (Christ Church, Oxford); 'Sweet Jesus' and 'Hear my cry' (Peterhouse, Cambridge); the last is also in a MS. at Lichfield which calls Hilton 'organist of Newark' (see Peterhouse Catalogue, Ecclesiologist, 1859), but this is an error; John Hinton, not Hilton (d. 1688), was organist of Newark. In the British Museum are two songs for the ute (Egerton MS. 2013) and eight short pieces for three viols (Add. MSS. 29,283/5); the latter were in Warren's collection, and are needlessly described by him as being written in too late a style to be the work of this Hilton. Six Fantasies in three parts are at Christ Church, Oxford. The organ part of an Evening Service and six anthems is in Batten's *Organ Book*¹ (Tenbury MS. 791).

It should be mentioned that Hilton's name is given as composer of the anthem 'Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake' (usually ascribed to Farrant), in a MS. copy made by James Hawkins, organist of Ely, 1682-1729. Rimbault also speaks of a MS. copy in Blow's writing, dated 1686, with Hilton's name.

The portrait of Hilton at the age of 50, dated Sept. 30, 1649, is in the Oxford Music School Collection; the head was engraved for Hawkins's History of Music. G. E. P. A.

HIME, a family of music publishers who in the latter part of the 18th century and in the early years of the 19th did the largest provincial trade in this country. The firm was started by Humphrey and Morris Hime (brothers), who were in business in Liverpool at 56 Castle Street, prior to 1790. In 1791 MORRIS HIME (d. Jan. 1828) had gone to Dublin, and established an extensive concern there. Owing to the fact that at this period music, copyrighted in England, had no protection in Ireland, great numbers of English works were re-engraved by the Irish publishers, and in many cases sent over to England for sale at cheaper rates. The Liverpool Hime's connexion with his Dublin brother no doubt was advantageous to him in this respect. Wm. Gardiner, in Music and Friends, mentions how he was thus enabled to obtain from Hime of Liverpool some cheapened works of Haydn; and Michael Kelly, in his Reminiscences, tells how he had to travel to Dublin in 1813, being subpoenaed as a witness in a law suit against Hime of Dublin, for this kind of piracy. M. Hime was first at 26 Dame Street, Dublin, but before 1795 he was at 34 College Green, from which address most of his publications were issued. About 1812-13 the number at College Green became 29, and shortly after this date published music bearing his name ceases. (2) HUMPHREY HIME retained his address in Castle Street, Liverpool, from 1790-1805, when, taking his son into partnership, they had additional premises in Church Street, and this place of business was held by the family until well into the 'seventies. The shop was then taken over by a music-selling firm, 'Henry Lee, late Hime.' F. K.

HIMMEL, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH (b. Treuenbriezen, Brandenburg, Nov. 20, 1765; d. Berlin, June 8, 1814), a man of some mark in his day; still remembered in England by a small anthem, 'Incline Thine ear.'

He was intended for the Church, and studied theology at Halle; but the excellence of his pianoforte-playing induced the king, Frederick William II., to have him educated as a musician. After three years' harmony and counterpoint under Naumann at Dresden, he took to Berlin 'Isacco,' an oratorio, performed (1792) by the court chapel with brilliant success, and a cantata 'La Danza.' The King gave him 100 friedrichs for his oratorio, made him his chamber composer, and sent him to Italy for two years. While there he produced 'Il primo navigatore' at the Fenice in Venice (1794), and 'Semiramide' at San Carlo in Naples (Jan. 1795). Reichardt having been dismissed from the court Kapellmeistership at Berlin, the King gave the appointment to Himmel, who thereupon returned at once. When in office he composed several pièces de circonstance, such as a Trauer-cantate for the funeral of King Frederick William in 1797, and a Te Deum for the coronation of his successor. In 1798 he visited Stockholm and St. Petersburg, where the Emperor commissioned him to write 'Alessandro,' an opera for which he received 6000 roubles. In 1769 he was at Riga. In 1801, in which year his 'Frohsinn und Schwärmerei' was given at Berlin, he produced 'Vasco di Gama' at Copenhagen, proceeded thence to France, England—where he made only a short stay of which we have no particulars—and Vienna, returning to Berlin in Dec. 1802. After the battle of Jena he retired first to Pyrmont, and then to Cassel, and died of dropsy at Berlin. Besides the works already mentioned he composed—'Fanchon, das Leiermädchen' (1804), libretto by Kotzebue, his best opera; 'Die Sylphen' (1806), 'Der Kobold' (1814); all produced in Berlin; a 'Vater Unser'; Psalms; motets, masses, etc.; PF. sonatas; dance music and concerted music for PF.; and a number of songs. The sonatas and songs abound in melody, and are the work of a sound musician. (A list is in Q.-L.) Himmel had much intercourse with Beethoven during the visit of the latter to Berlin in 1796. If Beethoven hurt his feelings by a rude joke on his extemporising, Himmel had certainly the better of the encounter in the end. A song by him, 'An Alexis,' is in the Musical Library, vol. i. M. C. C.

HINDE, HENRY (d. Lichfield, Aug. 6, 1641), a 16th-century musician, cathedral organist of Lichfield. He was the teacher of Ashmole. An Anthem of his is contained in Clifford's 'Divine Services' (1664). E. V. D. S.

HINDEMITH, PAUL (b. Hanau, Nov. 16, 1895), viola-player and composer, studied at Hoch's Conservatorium in Frankfort under Arnold Mendelssohn and Bernhard Sekles. From 1915-23 he first led and then conducted the Frankfort Opera. He now plays the viola in the Amar Quartet, which is constantly travelling throughout Central Europe, but it is as a composer that his fame has become widespread, especially in the German-speaking countries, where he is regarded as the most prominent of the younger 'moderns.' An unusually varied experience as an executant on several instruments has equipped him with an exceptional facility in writing, and his output is remarkable for his years. This faculty is not without a certain danger, but Hindemith, whilst exercising it to the full, retains a clear standard of values, and there is little in his lengthy opus list that does not represent a progressive stage in his development. At first he is eclectic, submitting as students do to a variety of not always reconcilable influences. Then he engages in adventures among modern technical 'innovations.' Presently it becomes clear that his natural trend is contrapuntal, and in pursuit of 'linear' methods he gradually abandons tonal principles of construction in favour of atonality, at first tacit, and then avowed. But the contrapuntal appetite is not thereby satisfied, and before long he is found, like so many composers of his generation, carried along by a current which has set definitely towards neoclassicism. This 'back to Bach' tendency is clearly evident in his 'Kammermusik' No. 2 (op. 36), which is a concerto for piano with twelve solo instruments, played in 1925 at the Venice Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music. To avoid repetition it may be stated here that from 1921 onwards, when his fame was first established, his name has appeared annually at the Donaueschingen Festival, whilst his string quartet in C (op. 16), clarinet quintet (op. 30, unpublished) and string trio (op. 34) were performed at Salzburg respectively in 1922, 1923 and 1924. Apart from its technical dexterity and evolutionary interest, Hindemith's style is remarkable for a buoyancy that is not common with his compatriots, and at times even for a pronounced sense of fun. The latter, however, is not indulged in those works upon which his reputation chiefly rests.

HINDLE, JOHN, Mus.B. (b. Westminster, 1761; d. 1796), was a lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey. He matriculated at Oxford in 1791. He published 'A Collection of Songs for One and Two Voices,' and 'A Set of Glees for 3, 4 and 5 voices.' His favourite glee, 'Queen of the silver bow,' first appeared (with another) in the 'Professional Collection.' He also composed a well-known chant. W. H. H.

HINE, WILLIAM (b. Brightwell, Oxfordshire, 1687; d. Aug. 28, 1730), became a chorister of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1694, and continued so until 1705, when he was appointed a clerk. He was removed from his place in the same year, when he came to London and studied under Jeremiah Clarke. In 1708 he was appointed deputy to Stephen JEFFERIES (q.v.), organist of Gloucester Cathedral. Jefferies retired in 1710, when Hine succeeded him. Shortly afterwards Hine married Alicia, daughter of Abraham Rudhall of Gloucester, the famous bell-founder. His wife survived him until June 28, 1735. Both were interred in the eastern ambulatory of the cloisters, where a mural tablet to their memory informs us that the Dean and Chapter had voluntarily increased Hine's stipend in consideration of his deserts. Dr. Philip HAYES (q.v.) presented a portrait of Hine (his father's instructor) to the Music School, Oxford. After Hine's death his widow published, by subscription, 'Harmonia sacra Glocestriensis; or, Select Anthems for 1, 2 and 3 voices, and a Te Deum and Jubilate, together with a Voluntary for the Organ.' The Te Deum is by Henry Hall, and the other compositions by Hine. The voluntary furnishes a curious example of the style of organ-playing then in vogue. (West, Cath. Org.) W. H. H., rev.

HINE, WILLIAM (d. Oxford, July 27, 1777), organist at St. Mary's, Shrewsbury, 1729-31; Worcester Cathedral, 1731-34; thence as organist and choirmaster at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he took the degree of Mus.B. in 1735. In 1740-41 he became professor of music at the University, and Mus.D. in 1749. He wrote liturgical church music which is still in use. E. v. d. s.

HINGSTON, JOHN (d. 1683), a pupil of Orlando Gibbons, and one of the musicians to Charles I.; afterwards he entered the service of Oliver Cromwell, whose daughters he instructed in music. When the organ of Magdalen College was removed from Oxford to Hampton Court, about 1654, Hingston was appointed organist to the Protector at a salary of £100 per annum, and with two boys, his pupils, was accustomed to sing Dering's Latin motets to Cromwell, who greatly delighted in them. He had concerts at his house, at which Cromwell was often present. Hington has been said to have been Dr. Blow's master, but this is doubtful. He was keeper of the organs, and a musician for the viol in the king's private music, being appointed to the latter place in 1660 in place of Alfonso Ferrabosco. Henry Purcell succeeded to his place as repairer and keeper of the organs.¹ He composed some Fancies which possess considerable merit. He was buried at St. Margaret's, Westminster, Dec. 17, 1683. He presented 6 volumes of his compositions to the Music School, Oxford, where there is also a portrait of him. W. H. H., rev.

HINTON, ARTHUR (b. Beckenham, Kent, Nov. 20, 1869), composer, was educated at Shrewsbury School, and at first intended for a commercial career.

However, he was entered at the R.A.M., where he studied the violin with Sainton and Sauret, and composition with F. W. Davenport. After his three years' course he was appointed a sub-professor of the violin, and after three years more in London he went to Munich to study with Rheinberger. His first symphony, in B flat, was played at a Conservatorium concert there, under the composer's direction. Some time was spent at Vienna, Rome and Albano, and the fruits of this stay abroad were an opera, 'Tamara,' in two acts, an orchestral fantasia, 'The Triumph of Caesar,' and other things. The fantasia was played at a concert given by a group of young English composers in the Queen's Hall in Dec. 1896. Two scenes from Endymion for orchestra were given at New Brighton at Granville Bantock's interesting concerts there, and his second symphony in C minor was played at a concert at the R.C.M. in 1903. His various chamber works have been produced in London, where he has lived. His operettas for children, 'The Disagreeable Princess' and 'St. Elizabeth's Rose,' have had much success; and while his songs have been more or less frequently sung, his pianoforte works, including a concerto in D minor, have found an ideal interpreter in his wife, known as Miss Katharine GOODSON (q.v.). The following are his chief published works. For a fuller list, including many works still in manuscript, see B. M. S. Ann., 1920. M., with addns.

ORCHESTRA

Suite 'Endymion' (3 scenes).
Pianoforte Concerto in D minor.
'Chant des vagues,' violoncello and orchestra.

CHAMBER MUSIC

Quintet in G minor, PF. and strings.
Trio in D minor, PF. and strings.
Sonata in B flat, vin. and PF.
Suite in D, vin. and PF.

PIANOFORTE

A Summer Pilgrimage in the White Mountains (6 pieces).
Bagatelles (4 pieces).

Rhapsody in B minor.
Carnival, Valse Caprice.
'Chant des vagues' (arranged).
Romance in A flat, etc.

SONGS

Many Songs, published in sets, include 'Schmetterlinge' (Butterflies) in 2 books, 10 songs, and 'Weisse Rosen' (White Roses), a cycle of six.

HINTON, KATHARINE, see GOODSON.

HINTZE, JACOB (b. Bernau, near Berlin, Sept. 4, 1622; d. Berlin, May 5, 1702), became in 1666 court musician to the Elector of Brandenburg at Berlin; but he retired to his birthplace in 1695, and died at Berlin with the reputation of being an excellent contrapuntist. He edited the 12th and subsequent editions of Crüger's 'Praxis pietatis,' Berlin, 1666, 1690, 1695, adding to it 65 hymns to the Epistles by himself, none of which are said to be ever used now; but others in the book are his, some of which continue to be favourites, especially 'Gieb dich zufrieden' and 'Allo Menschen müssen sterben' (if the latter be really by him). Concerning the chorales composed by Bach, refer to Spitta's Bach, vol. iii. pp. 108, 114, 287, etc. (English translation). M.

HIPKINS, ALFRED JAMES, F.S.A. (b. Westminster, June 17, 1826; d. June 3, 1903), entered the pianoforte business of Messrs. Broadwood & Sons in 1840, and remained in it until his death, sixty-three years afterwards. The practical experience he gained in the business was turned to the best account, and he gradually and quietly established his position as the highest authority in England on many points connected with the pianoforte. During Chopin's visits to England he always insisted on using a piano tuned by Hipkins, and thus the young man enjoyed frequent opportunities of hearing the composer play. As need hardly be said, he was, in after years, very difficult to please in performances of Chopin by the younger players. His own playing of Chopin was of exquisite beauty, for he was a highly accomplished pianist, and was an unrivalled authority on the old keyboard instruments. His studies, guided by the perusal of C. P. E. Bach's treatise, made him a master of the harpsichord, concerning which, before his time, but little was really understood in modern days; his methods of disposing the two keyboards, so as to play the 'Goldberg' variations of Bach or the sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti, with their continual crossings of hands, are undoubtedly right, and to him is to be ascribed the resuscitation of a practical interest in this instrument, as well as in the clavichord, the secrets of which he divined from long practice on an instrument lent to him by Carl Engel, whose friendship was of great value to him for many years. He was the first in modern times to perform upon the harpsichord the pieces already named, and the 'Fantasia cromatica' of Bach on the clavichord. The revival of the clavichord was as much due to him as to Engel. Besides the professional work involved in his holding a position of the highest importance and responsibility in the Broadwood business, he found time to study most thoroughly the scientific side of music, becoming a specialist on the questions of Temperament and Pitch. His support of the practical adoption of Equal Temperament dates from 1844; and his investigations into the history of musical pitch, which he prosecuted from 1855 onwards, at length bore fruit in the substitution of a pitch nearly in accord with the diapason normal ($A=439$ at a temperature of 68° Fahrenheit), instead of the old 'Philharmonic' pitch. This good work was not finally accomplished until 1896. His studies on musical pitch led in 1876 to an acquaintance with Dr. A. J. Ellis, with whom he was closely associated in his later writings, such as The History of Musical Pitch, 1880; Musical Scales of all Nations, 1885, and the second edition of Ellis's translation of Helmholtz in the latter year. The latest fruits of his researches on the Pianoforte and on Pitch are embodied in articles contributed to the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, and throughout the first edition of this Dictionary he contributed valuable articles on the keyboard and other instruments. His final corrections for the present edition, carried down as far as the article 'Harpsichord,' represent the last work of his life.

The following works, only one of which is of any great bulk, have become classics in their own way: Musical Instruments, Historic, Rare, and Unique (1888),¹ the outcome of Hipkins's connexion with the Music and Inventions Exhibition of 1885, with a beautiful series of coloured illustrations by William Gibb; the concise and learned little History of the Pianoforte and its Precursors, 1896-97; Dorian and Phrygian, re-considered from a non-harmonic point of view, 1902.² Besides these he was a valued contributor to the first edition of this Dictionary, wrote reviews on books dealing with ethnology and antiquity, articles for many musical works and magazines, and prefaces to various catalogues of musical exhibitions, etc., all of which are of great and permanent value.

Between 1883 and 1896 he gave many interesting lectures, published in contemporary journals; many of them have been translated into French, German, Italian and Japanese. For one, on the Pianoforte, the Society of Arts awarded him a silver medal, an honour repeated for his paper on the Standard of Musical Pitch. At the Royal Society he gave two lectures on Certain Harmonics in a Vibrating String.³ He also gave lectures, illustrated by himself, on the old instruments, at the R.A.M., R.C.M., the musical clubs of Oxford and Cambridge, and various musical societies in the country. His services to various exhibitions must not be passed over; they began with the Great Exhibition of 1851, in connexion with which he gave a series of pianoforte recitals, over forty in number; here, too, he acted as interpreter to Fétis, one of the jurors at the Exhibition. In the Exhibition of 1885, before mentioned, he took a principal part in the formation of the loan collection. Other exhibitions claimed his services, such as Bologna, 1888; the Military Exhibition, 1891; the Music Exhibition at Vienna, 1892; the Victorian Exhibition, 1897; and finally the Paris Exhibition of 1900. Besides all these services to musical art he established, when on a visit to Potsdam, the claim of Cristofori to be considered as the inventor of the pianoforte. He had permission from the Empress Frederick, then Crown Princess, to make the necessary examination of the instruments in the Royal collection.

He enjoyed the friendship of an extraordinary number of great musicians, from Cramer, Sterndale Bennett, Chopin, Liszt, Von Bülow, Rubinstein, Wagner, down to the youngest aspirants for musical fame, who found in him a wise counsellor and the kindest of supporters. His geniality of manner, his earnestness, modesty, good humour, and the generosity with which his vast knowledge and skill were put at the disposal of any one who was in earnest, made him universally beloved. He was a member of the Council of the R.C.M., and honorary curator of its Museum, and a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. His collection of Tuning Forks, together with those of his collaborator, Dr. A. J. Ellis (who made him his literary executor), was given after his death to the Royal Institution, and his splendid collection of musical instruments to the R.C.M. M.

HIS, the German name for B sharp.

HISLOP, JOSEPH (b. Edinburgh, Apr. 5, 1887), operatic tenor. Although a boy-soloist in the Cathedral choir in his native city, he was not intended for a musical career, and served his apprenticeship at photo-press work and engraving before coming to London to study at the Technical College. It was, however, during a visit to Stockholm, when acting as demonstrator in some colour work, that he first came into touch with professional musicians. His voice, a pure tenor of unusual charm and distinctive quality, attracted the notice of Dr. Bralt, who induced him to take up vocal study seriously. For some years he made his home in the Swedish capital and, having graduated in the School of Opera there, made his début in 'Faust' with entire success. He sang in several operas in Scandinavia, and, after further training in Italy, sustained leading parts at the chief theatres in Milan, Rome and Naples. Then in 1920 he was engaged for Covent Garden, where he appeared for the first time as Rodolfo in 'La Bohème' on May 14, and sang the same part there again in the two following seasons, in addition to that of the Duke in 'Rigoletto.' For a British tenor of his ability, however, he deserved a better chance in London, and though partially compensated by his success there as a concert artist, it was really by his triumphs in America and in the Argentine that he laid the foundations of a world-wide fame. In 1925 his reception at the Colon Theatre in Buenos Ayres, particularly in 'Romeo,' 'Traviata' and the Puccini operas, was extremely enthusiastic. During the London season of 1926 he sang the 'Messiah' solos at the Handel Festival of that year. H. K.

HISTORIES OF MUSIC. It will be necessary in this article to confine our attention almost exclusively to Histories proper, except in cases where there are none, or at least few, of the subject under treatment; so that only occasional mention will be made of Musical Biographies, Dictionaries, Manuscripts and Periodicals. Most of the works enumerated, unless marked with an asterisk, will be found in the library of the British Museum. The dates of the first and latest editions are usually given. For convenience we shall adopt three principal headings, namely: I. GENERAL HISTORIES OF MUSIC; II. HISTORIES OF SEPARATE COUNTRIES; and of a few other, III. SPECIAL SUBJECTS, arranged alphabetically; and most of these will have to undergo further subdivision.

I. GENERAL HISTORIES OF MUSIC

(a) ANCIENT MUSIC. The earliest writings bearing on the history of music are the Ἀπορικῶν στοιχείων βιβλία γ of Aristoxenus (Lat. edn. published at Venice, 1562; Gr. edn. by Meibom, 1652; Fr. edn. by Ruelle, 1870; Ger. edn. by R. Westphal, etc., 1883, 1893. See also L. Laloy's Aristotele de Tarente et la musique de l'antiquité, 1904, and H. L. Macran's Harmonies of Aristoxenus 1902): Ἀπορικῶν ἑρμηνειῶν of Nicomachus (see Meibom below); Περὶ μουσικῆς of Plutarch (edn. by Rd. Volkmann, with Latin translation, 1856; by H. Weil and Th. Reinach, 1904, etc.); Pausanias's Græciarum descriptio accurata also contains frequent allusions to music and musicians. Other early works relating partially to music are the Deipnosophistae of Athenæus (1514, 1920) and the Stromateis of Titus Flavius Clemens (Clement of Alexandria), the latter dated A.D. 194. From that period down to the Renaissance musical writers appear to have been too deeply engrossed in the development of the music of their own time to bestow much thought upon that of the past; and it is only by the chronological juxtaposition and study of the works of such authors as St. Augustine, Boethius, St. Isidore of Seville, Bede, Huchald, Guido d' Arezzo, Philip de Vitry, Odington, Dunstable, Gafuri, Glarean, etc., that we can obtain an adequate history of music in the early and middle ages.

Johannes Tinctoris wrote a treatise De oratione musicae in the 15th century; Rud. Schlick's Exercitatio de musicae origine*, published at Spiera in 1588, was thought highly of in its day; the De musica of F. Salinas, 1577, 1592, is chiefly theoretic. In 1652 appeared M. Meibom's excellent work Antiquae musicae auctores septem in 2 vols., which was not surpassed till the publication in 1784 of Abbé Martin Gerbert's Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica, in 3 vols. Abbé F. J. Roussier also wrote a Mémoire sur la musique des anciens, in 1770, which is spoken highly of. In the 19th century we have G. W. Fink, Erste Wanderung durch die älteste Tonkunst, 1831; C. von Winterfeld, Gabriel und sein Zeitalter, 1834; C. E. H. de Coussemaker's invaluable works: Histoire de l'harmonie au moyen âge, 1852; Les Harmonistes des 12^e et 13^e siècles, 1863; Scriptorum de musica mediæ ævi nova series, 4 vols., 1864-76; L'Art harmonique au moyen âge, 1865; Traité inédit sur la musique du moyen âge, 1865-69; Carl Engel, Musik der most ancient Nations, 1864, 1870; Rudolf Westphal, Geschichte der alten und mittelalterlichen Musik, 1865; Albert von Thimus, Die harmonische Symbolik des Alterthums, 1868-76; F. J. Fétis, Histoire générale de la musique, 5 vols., 1869-76 (unfinished); William Chappell, History of Music from the Earliest Records to the Fall of the Roman Empire, 1874, etc. (unfinished); Fr. Auguste Gevaert, Histoire et théorie de la musique de l'antiquité, 1875, 1881; W. Brambach, Musikliteratur des Mittelalters, 1883; F. X. Haberl, Hausteine für Musikgeschichte (a series of musical biographies, beginning with Willem Dufay), 1885-88; J. F. Rowbotham, History of Music (down to the Troubadours), 3 vols., 1885, 1893; Richard Wallaschek, Primitive Music: An inquiry into the origin and development of music . . . of savage tribes, London, 1893 (German edition, Die Anfänge der Tonkunst, 1903); Joh. Wolf, Beiträge zur Geschichte des 14. Jahrh., 1890, and in the 20th century: A. Mohler, Geschichte der alten und mittelalterlichen Musik*, 1900; H. E. Woodbridge, The Polyphonic Period of Musical Art, 1901 (Oxford History of Music, vols. i, ii.); Hermann Smith, The World's Earliest Music, 1904; F. Torrance, Le origini della musica*, 1907; Pierre Aubry, Troubadours et troubadours, Paris, 1909; Carl Stumpf, Die Anfänge der Musik, 1911; L. Laloy, Les Origines de la musique*, 1913; Arn. Scherling, Studien zur Musikgeschichte der Frührenaissance, 1914.

(b) MODERN MUSIC. The best histories are: Abbé G. J. Vogler, Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Tonkunst im 19. Jahrhundert, 1814; Gustav Schilling, Geschichte der heutigen Musik, 1841; A. L. Blondéau, Histoire de la musique moderne, 1847; A. B. Marx, Die Musik des 19. Jahrhunderts, 1855 (English translation, 1855-57); John Hullah, History of Modern Music, 1862, 1871, and Lectures on the Transition Period of Musical History, 1 65-76; Sir C. H. H. Parry, The Music of the 17th Century, 1902 (Oxford History of Music, vol. iii.); J. A. Fuller Maitland, Age of Bach and Handel, 1902 (Oxford History of Music, vol. iv.); Sir W. H. Hadow, The Viennese Period, 1904 (Oxford History of Music, vol. v.); E. Dannreuther, The Romantic Period, 1905 (Oxford History of Music, vol. vi.); Walter Niemann: Die musikalische Renaissance des 19. Jahrh.*, 1911; Die Musik seit Richard Wagner, 1913; Die Musik der Gegenwart und der letzten Vergangenheit, 1918; F. Marsillac, Histoire de la musique moderne*, 1881; H. Merian, Illustrierte Geschichte der Musik im 19. Jahrh., 1900-02; R. H. Legge, Music in the XIXth Century, 2 vols., London, 1902, 1903; H. Rietsch, Die Tonkunst in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jahrh., Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der musikalischen Technik, 1900; C. W. J. Hugo Riemann, Geschichte der Musik seit Beethoven, 1800-1900, 1901.

(c) GENERAL HISTORIES OF ANCIENT AND MODERN MUSIC COMBINED. Sethus Calvisius's important work De initio et progressu musicae appeared in 1600, and a second edition in 1611: this was followed shortly by Michael Praetorius's still greater Syntagma musicum, 1615, 1884. Other useful works of the 17th century bearing on the subject are Pèr M. Mersenne, Travé de l'harmonie universelle with the Latin version Harmonicorum libri tri., 1625, 1648; J. Albert Bannius, De musicae natura, etc., 1637, 1658; Pietro della Valle, Della musica dell' età nostra, 1640, containing a good description of music in the 15th, 16th and early 17th centuries (see G. B. Doni's works, vol. II, 1782); Pater Anastasius Kircher, Musurgia universalis, 2 vols., 1650; Wolfgang C. Prinz, Historische Beschreibung der edelen Sing- und Klängekunst, 1690—this little work is interesting as the first real history of music by a German. It is published in the 1749 edition of Printz's Musical Lexicon.

The following is a list of the principal musical histories of later date: Jacques Bonnet, Histoire de la musique et de ses effets, 1715, republished in 4 vols. by Bourdelot as Histoire de la musique depuis ses origines, 1743; Hon. Roger North, Memoirs of Musick, 1728 (reprinted 1846); F. W. Marpurz, Historisch-kritische Beiträge zur Aufnahme der Musik, 5 vols., 1754-78, and Kritische Einleitung in die Geschichte . . . der . . . Musik, 1759 (unfinished); Padre G. B. Martini's splendid Storia della musica, 3 vols., 1757-81; F. J. Fétis, Histoire générale de la musique, 1869-75, 5 vols. (incomplete); Ant. Extimeno, Dell' origine e delle regole della musica colla storia del suo progresso, decadenza, e rinnoazione, 1774; Dr. Charles Burney, General History of Music, 4 vols., 1776-89; Sir John Hawkins, General History of the Science and Practice of Music, 5 vols., 1770, with reprints in 1853 and 1875, in 2 vols.; J. B. de la Borde, Essai sur la musique ancienne et moderne, 4 vols., 1780; J. N. Forkel, Allgemeine Geschichte der Musik, 2 vols., 1788-1801; C. 10. GREECE.

In the absence of Musical Histories of this country by early Greek writers, we may mention, as works useful to the student, A. Boeckh's edition of Pindar, 3 vols., 1811-21; Plutarch's work already alluded to, which is interesting as the only surviving work of that time on the history of Greek Music, and the writings named at the beginning of the paragraph on Ancient Music. Other works on this subject are: F. von Drieberg, Die Musik der Griechen, 1819; J. Friedrich Bellermann, Die Tonleiten und Musiknoten der Griechen, 1847; Carl Portlage, Das musikalische System der Griechen, 1847; A. J. H. Vincent, De la musique des anciens Grecs, 1854; C. F. Wetzmann, Geschichte der griechischen Musik, 1855; Oscar Paul, Die absolute Harmonik der Griechen, 1866; Johannes Tetztes, Über die althellene Musik, 1874; Rudolf Westphal, Die Musik des griechischen Alterthums, 1883; D. III. SPECIAL SUBJECTS

(a) CHURCH MUSIC.—In the subjoined list it has not been thought necessary to include all the innumerable treatises on Plain-song, the training of Chors, etc. The following works have been selected as throwing most light on the subject:

(a) Music of the Latin Church.—F. Aug. Gevaert, Les Origines du chant liturgique, 1890; Th. Nisard, L'Archéologie musicale et le vrai chant grégorien, 1890; D. J. Morin, * Les Véritables Origines du chant grégorien, 1890; Amédée Gastoué, Les Origines du chant romain, 1907, and L'Art grégorien, 1910; Dom. A. Gataud, La Musique grégorienne, 1913; Michael Praetorius, Syntagma musicum, vol. 1, 1615, 1873; Card. Glov. Bona, De divina psalmodia, etc., 1653, 1747; G. G. Nivers, Dissertation sur le chant grégorien, 1683; Abbé J. Lebeuf, Traité historique et pratique sur le chant ecclésiastique, etc., 1741; Gijs. Santarelli, * Della musica del Santuario, Rome, 1764; M. Gerbert, De cantu et musica sacra, 2 vols., 1774; H. A. Daniel, Thesaurus hymnologus, 1841-66 (Supplements, 1908, 1911, etc.); L. Lambilliotte, * Histoire com. lre du chant ecclésiastique, 1855; Félix Clément, Histoire générale de la musique religieuse, Paris, 1861-77; R. Schlecht, * Geschichte der Kirchenmusik, 1871; A. J. M. A. Goovaerts, De Kerkmuziek, with French version, * La Musique de l'Eglise, 1876; Dom. Jos. Pothier, Les Mélodies grégoriennes, 1880 (German edn., 1881); J. Sittart, * Kompéndium der Geschichte der Kirchenmusik, 1881; Dr. Thiéry, Étude sur le chant grégorien, 1883; X. Schauerte, * Geschichte der liturgischen Musik, 1894; F. X. Matthias, * Der katholische Gottesdienst und die abendländische Musik, 1908; Emil Nikol, Geschichte der kath. Musik, 1908; Amédée Gastoué, * La Musique d'église. Études historiques, esthétiques et pratiques, Lyons, 1911; Peter Wagner, Geschichte der Messe bis 1600, 1912, etc.; Peter Wigner, Einführung in die katholische Kirchenmusik, 1919. See also the articles on HYMN, PLAIN-SONG, SOLESMES.

(B) Music of the Reformed Church.—J. A. Latrobe, Music of the Church, considered in its various branches, Congregational and Choral, 1831; J. E. Häuser, Geschichte des christliche: insbesondere des evangelischen Kirchengesanges und der Kirchenmusik . . . nebst Andeutungen und Vorschläge zur Verbesserung des musikalischen Theiles des evangelischen Culus, Leipzig, etc., 1834; A. C. Mankell, * Kyrkomusikens Historia, 1841; Carl von Winterfeld, Der evangelische Kirchengesang und sein Verhältnis zur Kunst des Tonsetzes, 3 pts., 1845, 1847; Ed. Emil Koch, * Geschichte des Kirchenlieds und Kirchengesangs der christlichen, insbesondere der deutschen evangelischen Kirche, 4 vols., 1852-53; Rev. E. Hicks, Church Music: a popular sketch, with Illustrations, 1881; E. L. Taunton, History and Growth of Church Music, London, 1887; R. von Liliencron, Liturgisch-musikalische Geschichte der evangelischen Gottesdienste von 1523 bis 1700, Schleswig, 1893; Myles B. Foster, Anthems and Anthem Composers, 1901; Ed. Dickinson, Music in the History of the Western Church, 1902; Karl Weinmann, Geschichte der Kirchenmusik mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der kirchenmusikalischen Restauration im 19. Jahrh., 1913 (the History of Church Music, in the British Museum, is evidently a translation from an earlier edition, 1910); Joh. Westphal, * Das evangelische Kirchenlied nach seiner geschichtl. Entwicklung, 1911.

(γ) Musie of the Greek Church.—(Greek) H. Caisler, Le Système musical de l'Église grecque*, etc., 1901.

(b) DANCE MUSIC.—John Playford's English Dancing Master (1651, etc.) is not a regular history, and John Weaver's Essay towards the History of Dancing is more about dancing than dance music. The best works on the subject are mostly by Frenchmen. Among them are: P. Bonnet-Bourdelot, Histoire générale de la danse . . . avec supplément de l'état de la musique, 1724; J. A. Lenoir de la Fage, Histoire générale de la musique et de la danse, 2 vols., 1844; A. Czerwinski, Geschichte der Tanzkunst, etc. (1862), and Brevier der Tanzkunst (1879); F. L. Schubert, Die Tanzmusik, 1867; F. M. Böhm, Geschichte des Tanzes in Deutschland, etc., 1886; and P. Grävins, Il ballo (storia della danza), 1897; H. de Soria, Histoire pittoresque de la danse, 1897; G. Vuillier, La Danse à travers les âges, 1897, with a translation, A History of Dancing from the Earliest Age to our Times, 1897; A. de Ménil, Histoire de la danse à travers les âges*, 1904. See also the article on BALLET-DANCING.

(c) GYPSY MUSIC.—Almost the only works on this subject are: F. Liszt, Des Bohémiens et de leur musique en Hongrie, Paris, 1859, 1881; followed by a Hungarian edition in 1861, and a German one in 1883; Lud. Fökövi, Die Zigeuner-musik in Ungarn*, Berlin, 1898; D. C. Parker, Some Aspects of Gipsy Music, London, 1913.

(d) INSTRUMENTS OF MUSIC (GENERAL HISTORIES).—A manuscript in the British Museum (Tiberius, c. vi.) contains Descriptions et delineations instrumentorum musicorum of the 11th century. Other works are: Sebastian Virdung, Musica getuscht und ausgezogen durch S. V., 1511; J. W. von Wasmolewski, Geschichte der Instrumentalmusik in XVI. Jahrhundert, 1878; M. Praetorius, Syntagma musicum, 1614–18; Girolamo Desideri, Discorso della musica*, Bologna, 1671; Fil. Buonanni, Gabinetto armonico, 1722—reprinted in 1806 as Descrizioni degl' istromenti armonici, 2 vols.; F. Blanchini (the Elder), De instrumentis musicæ veterum, 1742; H. Welcker von Gontershausen, Magazin musikalischer Tonwerkzeuge, 1855; Carl Engel, Musical Instruments, etc., 1875, 1908; H. Lavoix, Histoire de l'instrumentation, 1878; Sir J. Stainer, Musie of the Bible, with an Account of the Development of Modern Musical Instruments from Ancient Types, 1879; Léon Pillaut, Instruments et musiciens, 1880; A. J. Hipkins, Musical Instruments, historic, rare and unique, 1883, 1921; René Brancour, Histoire des instruments de musique, 1921. See also the article on ORCHESTRATION.

(e) MILITARY MUSIC has been treated of by very few authors; we need only instance J. G. Kastner, Les Chants de l'armée française, avec un essai historique sur les chants militaires des Français, 1855; A. Kalkbrenner, Die Organisation der Militärmusik-korps aller Länder, Hannover, 1884; Edm. Neukomm, Histoire de la musique militaire, 1880; M. Brenet, La Musique militaire (with a bibliography), 1917; H. G. Farmer, Memoirs of the Royal Artillery Band, 1904—an excellent book of its kind—and Rise and Development of Military Music, 1912; and H. de Lamont, Histoire des musiques militaires, 1914. See also the article on MILITARY SOUNDS AND SIGNALS.

(f) NATIONAL MUSIC.—Works on this subject have been mentioned under the headings of the countries to which they relate. Other general works are: C. Engel, Introduction to the Study of National Music (1866), and Literature of National Music (1879); H. F. Chorley, National Music of the World, published in 1880–82, after the author's death, and 1911.

For further information see the articles on DICTIONARIES, SONG, etc.; also A. Aber's Handbuch der Musikliteratur in systematisch-chronologischer Anordnung, Leipzig, 1922.

A. H. H.

HITCHCOCK, spinet-makers, see SPINET.

HITZELBERGER, SABINA (b. Rander-sacker, Nov. 12, 1755), a famous soprano (coloratura) with a compass of three octaves, a pupil of Steffani. Her husband was a flautist and composer at the court of Würzburg. Sabina appeared at the Concert Spirituel, Paris, with great success, but refused a permanent engagement from the King, as also another from the Elector of Mayence on her appearance at some concerts at Frankfort-on-M. in 1783. Apart from these two occasions she never left Würzburg. Her four daughters were likewise excellent singers (Mendel).

HOBBS, JOHN WILLIAM (b. Henley-on-Thames, Aug. 1, 1799; d. Croydon, Jan. 12, 1877), was the son of a bandmaster of a volunteer corps at Henley. He sang in public at the early age of 3 years, and at 5 was admitted a chorister of Canterbury Cathedral, of which his father was a lay-vicar. The beauty of his voice attracting the attention of John Jeremiah Goss, the alto singer and singing-master, young Hobbs was article to him. He appeared as principal singer at a Musical Festival at Norwich in 1813. On arriving at manhood his voice had developed into a tenor of limited compass but of remarkable purity and sweetness. He became a member of the choirs of King's, Trinity and St. John's, Cambridge, and afterwards of that of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, of which his father was already a member. In 1827 he was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and in 1836 a lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey. Hobbs long held a prominent position as a concert singer. His singing was distinguished by taste, refinement and expression. He was the composer of a very large number of songs, several of which gained prizes from the Melodists' Club, and many were highly popular, especially 'When Delia sings,' 'Phyllis is my only Joy,' 'My Ancestors were Englishmen' and 'The Captive Greek Girl.'

W. H. H.

HOBDAY, (1) ALFRED CHARLES (b. Faversham, Apr. 19, 1870), well-known viola-player in London, studied at the R.A.M. and attained a position of distinction as a chamber music player at the St. James's Hall Popular Concerts, etc. He played in Richter's Orchestra at the Royal Opera. He is leading viola-player of the R. Philharmonic Orchestra, and also of the London Symphony Orchestra since its foundation.

(2) CLAUDE (b. Faversham, May 12, 1872), brother of the above, double-bass player, studied at the R.C.M., and joined its teaching staff in 1902. He has played in all the chief orchestras of London, as well as in the Scottish Orchestra.

C.

(3) ETHEL (née SHARPE) (b. Dublin, Nov. 28, 1872), a pupil of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, and subsequently of the R.C.M., where, under the tuition of Franklin Taylor, she became a pianist of remarkable accomplishment. She gave her first concert in Princes Hall in Nov. 1891, and received the silver medal of the Musicians' Company in the same year. Her début at the Crystal Palace took place on Mar. 26, 1892, and for the next two years she gained experience and pursued her studies on the Continent, making a great success at a recital in Vienna in 1894. During her stay at Vienna she enjoyed the friendship of Brahms and other notable musicians. She reappeared in London in 1895, playing again at the Crystal Palace. In that year she married Alfred Hobday (1), gave many recitals with her husband, and in recent years has specially concentrated on concerted chamber music performance. M.

HOBRECHT, see OBRECHT.

HOCHBRUCKER, (1) CHRISTIAN (b. Tagmersheim, Bavaria, May 17, 1733), member of a musical family, and a virtuoso on the harp. He went in 1770 to Paris, where some of his compositions, mentioned by Fétis, were published c. 1781. At the outbreak of the Revolution in 1792 he fled to London, where, according to Mendel, he published some more of his compositions. He left in all 15 sonatas, 3 duets, and airs with harp accompaniment. His brother, (2) CELESTIN (1727-1809), a pupil of Cammerloher, priest and Benedictine monk, was the composer of an oratorio and a large amount of church music, considered of distinct merit. His uncle, and his cousin (3) CELESTIN, are mentioned as the inventors of the pedal-harp. E. v. d. s.

HOCHZEIT DES CAMACHO, DIE (The Wedding of Camacho), comic opera in 2 acts; words by Klingemann, after Don Quixote; music by Mendelssohn (op. 10); score dated Aug. 10, 1825. Produced in the small theatre, Berlin, Apr. 29, 1827 (see MENDELSSOHN). G.

HOCKET (HOKET) (Fr. hocquet, hoquet; Lat. ochetus; Ital. ochetto). The literal meaning of the word is said to be 'hiccough,' the proper Latin term being truncatio. A naïve device of the early mediæval contrapuntists, by which the notes of a melody were interspersed with rests, and that with little or no regard to the chopping up of words or syllables in the process. A well-developed example is the following passage from the motet 'Tribulatio proxima est,' written for the coronation of Charles IV. of France in 1364 by Guillaume de MACHAUT. The elaborate rhythmical hocket of the treble voice is accompanied here by semibreve movement in the two lowest parts, showing another arrangement of the system, while the second voice moves in minims, in free counterpoint of the fourth species. The form repeats four times, with different melodies but identical time-values, separated by a length of twelve semibreves in each case. A precisely similar arrangement occurs seven times at regular intervals in the companion motet 'Apprehende arma et scutum.'

Another type of hocket is that in which the melody is divided between two voices, in alternato notes and rests. This second type is to be found in the theoretical treatises rather than in actual music. After the time of Machaut (d. 1374) hocket seems to have fallen out of use, though there is an example by Leonel Power, some fifty years later, in the Bodleian Library. (See Early Bodleian Music, vol. ii. p. 92.)

Mediæval ecclesiastics (e.g. John of Salisbury and Pope John XXII.) disliked truncatio as an ornament to church music, and were not mealy-mouthed in expressing their aversion to it. We cannot but agree with them; but though it is the fashion among musical historians to poke fun at the hocket, it is only fair to point out that it was a genuine attempt to obtain that particular emphasis of rhythm which is now styled staccato, and later men have sometimes used the same device. 'Its value' (as Rockstro said in the first edition of this Dictionary) 'as a means of dramatic expression has been recognised by composers of all ages with the happiest possible result. An early instance of its appearance as an aid to expression will be found in Orazio Vecchi's motet "Velociter exaudi me" (Venice, 1590),

where it is employed, with touching pathos, at the words deficit spiritus meus.

As instances of its power in the hands of operatic composers, we need only mention the death-scenes of Handel's "Acis," the Comendatore in "Don Giovanni," and Caspar in "Der Freischütz": a conspicuous instance is the representation of Gilda's sobs in the quartet in "Rigoletto."

For fuller details as to the mediæval practice the theoretical treatises in Coussemaker's Scriptores (e.g. Robert de Handlo, in vol. i.) should be consulted; but to quote one of them (Simon Tunstede), haec de Hoket sufficient. A. H.

HODGES, (1) EDWARD, Mus.D. (b. Bristol, July 20, 1796; d. Clifton, Sept. 1, 1867), organist of Clifton Church, and afterwards of the churches of St. James (from 1819) and St. Nicholas (from 1821), Bristol. At the age of 15 he developed remarkable inventive faculties, and some of his projects have since been adopted in different branches of mechanical science. Connected with music were improvements in organ bellows, etc., and, more important than all, the introduction of the C compass into England is claimed for him. The new organ in St. James's Church, remodelled under his direction, and opened 1824, contained the first CC manual and CCC pedal made in England (see GAUNTLETT; HILL & SONS, W.). He produced a Morning and Evening Service and two anthems on the reopening of St. James's Church organ, May 2, 1824, and published them in 1825. He obtained his doctor's degree at Cambridge in 1825. He was a contributor to the Quarterly Musical Magazine and the Musical World. In 1838 he quitted England for America, was appointed organist of the cathedral of Toronto, and in the following year became director of the music of Trinity Parish, New York, taking the duty at St. John's while the new Trinity Church was being built. He published An Essay on the Cultivation of Church Music at New York in 1841. On the opening of Trinity Church, New York, May 21, 1846 (the organ in which had been built from his specifications), Dr. Hodges quitted St. John's to become its organist. He composed church music, published in New York and London. During his long residence in America he was much esteemed for his performance on the organ. Illness obliged him to give up duty in 1859, and in 1863 he returned to England, and died at Clifton. His church compositions are numerous and elaborate. They comprise a Morning and Evening Service in C, with two anthems, a full service in F and another in E, Psalm cxxii., etc. (all published by Novello), besides many MS. compositions, and occasional anthems for various royal funerals, etc.

His daughter, (2) FAUSTINA HASSE (d. New York, 1895), organist in Brooklyn, and subsequently of two churches in Philadelphia, composed some songs and instrumental pieces. In 1896 her memoir of her father appeared in New York and London.

His son, (3) REV. JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH HODGES, D.D., Rector of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, is an excellent organist. W. H. H.

HODSOLL, WILLIAM, a London music-seller and publisher who first worked in 1794, at Sevenoaks, Kent, and succeeded shortly before 1800 to the business established by John BLAND (q.v.) at 45 High Holborn, then in the hands of Francis LINLEY (q.v.). Hodsoll published sheet music, country-dances and other collections, and held the business until about 1831, when it was taken over by Zenas T. Purday, noted for his great issue of the comic songs of his period. F. K.

HOECKH, KARL (b. Ebersdorf, near Vienna, Jan. 22, 1707; d. Zerbst, 1772), violinist, horn-player and composer. He was a pupil of Franz Benda, with whom he toured in Poland, and was engaged with him at Warsaw. When Benda went to Berlin he recommended Hoeckh to the court at Zerbst, where he became Konzertmeister in 1742, and Kapellmeister in 1759. He composed 10 symphonies, violin concertos, solos, capricetti for violin (together with Benda), all in MS., and 7 'Parthien' (suites), published 1761. E. v. d. s.

HOERTER, PHILIPPE (b. Strassburg, Aug. 30, 1795; d. there, Nov. 6, 1863), was intended for the tailor's craft, but joined the French army and was taken prisoner in Russia. In 1815 he opened a music shop at Strassburg and studied music without a master. In 1819 he became contrabass-player at the theatre, and in 1820 singing-master at the Protestant seminary. He composed over 100 works, including cantatas, orchestral works, a string sextet, songs, etc., which for the most part perished in a fire in 1860 (Riemann; Hommage à Ph. Hoerter, Strassburg, 1864).

HOESSLIN, FRANZ VON (b. Munich, Dec. 31, 1885), a pupil of Reger and Mottl, is chiefly known as a conductor of opera at Danzig, St. Gallen, Riga, Lübeck and Mannheim. Since 1922 he has been conductor of the 'Berliner Grosse Volksoper.' As a composer he is influenced by Reger and the neo-romantic school, his music being of a light unconventional style with happy expression and clear concise colouring. His works include three pieces for orch., a clar. quartet, and numerous choral works, songs and orchestral works.

K. D. H.

HOEY, JAMES (d. 1773), a famous Dublin printer of the first half of the 18th century. In 1728 he issued the 'Beggar's Opera,' and in 1742 published the word-book of the 'Messiah.' In 1749 he printed a book of songs with symphonies and thorough-bass, by Lampe, then residing in Dublin, and some pieces by Pasquali, and in 1755 the word-book of Arne's 'Eliza.' His address was 'the signe of the Mercury in Skinner Row.' James Hoey died in extreme old age. W. H. G. F.

HOFFMAN, RICHARD (b. Manchester, May 24, 1831; d. New York, Aug. 17, 1909), a pianist, teacher and composer, of English birth and European training, but for over half a century intimately associated with the best musical activities of New York. He studied at various periods with his father, Leopold de Meyer, Pleyel, Moscheles, Rubinstein, Döhler and Liszt. He was 16 years old when he went to New York in 1847, and a year later embarked on his first concert tour with Joseph Burke, a precocious Irish lad, who was both actor and violinist. Meanwhile he had introduced himself to New York as a pianist, effecting his début at a concert of the Philharmonic Society on Nov. 27, 1847, with Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor. He played again the next season, and in Mar. 1854 gave the society's patrons their first opportunity to hear Chopin's Concerto in E minor. He had spent some of the intervening time on a concert tour with Jenny Lind, and stood so high with the musicians of the city that the Philharmonic Society now elected him an honorary member. His name figures on the society's programmes for sixteen seasons, and forty-five years after his first appearance in New York, at the age of 61, he took part in the concert with which the Philharmonic celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. Hoffman composed and published many pianoforte pieces of the brilliant kind in vogue in his early period, including an excursion into the field of folk-music in the shape of some Cuban Dances. His book, Some Musical Recollections of Fifty Years, was published in 1910. H. E. K.

HOFFMANN, ERNST THEODOR AMADEUS (orig. WILHELM) (b. Königsberg, Jan. 24, 1776; d. Silesia, June 25, 1822), a man of genius, and an extraordinarily clever and eccentric musician and littérateur, who though a voluminous composer will not live by his compositions so much as by some other productions of his pen. He learned music and law at the same time, and bid fair to rise in the official world; but an irrepressible love of caricaturing put an end to such solid prospects and drove him to music as his main pursuit. His music to Goethe's 'Scherz, List und Rache' was given at Posen in 1801, and three other compositions in the department of incidental music are mentioned in Riemann. His first musical appointment was to the theatre at Bamberg in 1809, but it was a post without salary, on which he starved. It fortunately urged him to write a set of papers in the character of 'Johannes Kreisler the Kapellmeister' for the A.M.Z. of Leipzig. They appeared at intervals from Sept. 26, 1810, and onwards, and in 1814 Hoffmann republished them with other essays in the same vein in two volumes as Fantasiestücke in Callot's Manier, with a preface by Jean Paul, in whose style they are couched. Among the most interesting, and at the same time most practically valuable, are the essay on Beethoven's instrumental music—far in advance of the day—another on Gluck, and a third on 'Don Giovanni.' The essays, which have often been reprinted, are all more or less humorous, some extremely so. They were followed by the Eliziere des Teufels, a novel (1815); Nachstücke (1817), Serapionsbrüder (4 vols. 1819–21); and by the Lebensansichten des Kater Murr, etc., or Views of life of Murr the tomcat, with fragments of the biography of Johann Kreisler, the Kapellmeister, from loose and spotted sheets. Many single stories from the above have been translated into English in various periodicals; a version of the Serapionsbrüder, as Serapion Brethren, by Major Alex. Ewing, appeared in 1886. Schumann's admiration of these pieces may be inferred from his imitations of them in his Florestan and Eusebius, and his adoption of their nomenclature in the titles of his music. After the fall of Napoleon, Hoffmann again obtained official employment at Berlin, which he discharged with efficiency, and kept till his death at a Silesian bath, of gradual paralysis, after much suffering for four months. He was fantastic and odd in the greatest degree, much given to liquor and strange company, over which 'he wasted faculties which might have seasoned the nectar of the gods' (Carlyle). He sang, composed, criticised, taught, conducted, managed theatres, wrote both poetry and prose, painted—all equally well; and in fact could, and did, turn his hand to anything. The list of his works contains 11 operas (MSS. in the Berlin Library), including 2 Singspiele:

'Der Renegat' and 'Faustina' (1804), 'Lastige Musikanten' (1804), 'Der Kanonikus von Mailand' (1806), 'Schärpe und Blume' (1806, to his own libretto), 'Der Trank der Unsterblichkeit' (Bamberg, 1808), 'Das Gespenst' (1809), 'Dirna' (1809), 'Saul' (1811), 'Aurora' (1811) and 'Undine' (Berlin, 1816); one act of another, 'Julius valentin', was unfinished at his death, as well as a ballet, 'Harlekin'; incidental music for three plays, a ballet, a Requiem, two symphonies, etc. etc.

Beethoven took the unusually spontaneous step of addressing him a letter (Mar. 23, 1820). This probably led to a closer acquaintance, to judge from the canon in his letter to the Cäcilia (Nohl, No. 328)— which it is difficult not to refer to him.¹

¹ Nottebohm (Versuch einer), however, connects it with Joachim Hoffmann, a composer who settled in Vienna, 1815.

Hoffmann's devotion to Mozart led him to add Amadeus to his Christian names. Weber knew and loved him, and he died keenly regretted by many friends. Carlyle translated his Goldne Topf in German Romance (vol. ii.), and gave a sketch of his life, which is also in the Miscellanies (vol. iii.). His life by Rochlitz is in Für Freunde d. Tonkunst, vol. i., and Hitzig's Aus Hoffmanns Leben, etc. (Berlin, 1823), contains an estimate of him as a musician by A. B. Marx.

HOFFMANN, EUGENIUS (b. Heldburg, Saxony), a 16th-century theorist and composer, cantor at the school of Stralsund, 1577; afterwards corrector. He wrote several theoretical works, and vocal compositions including '24 cantiones 4, 5, 6 v.' in 12 major and 12 minor modes in the sense of the older composers (1577); his 'Brevis synopsis de modis' was published at Rostock, 1605.

HOFFMANN, GERARD (b. Rastenberg, Nov. 11, 1690), composed sacred cantatas and church music. He is credited by Walther with certain improvements in musical instruments—an additional key to the horizontal flute, making it easier to tune (1727); an additional key to the oboe, by which the G \sharp in both octaves was given much more correctly; a mechanical arrangement by which the whole four strings of the violin could be altered at once (a different pitch was then in use for church and chamber music); a new temperament for tuning instruments (1728); and for the organ (1733); and a gauge for the strings of violins, bass-violas, lutes and other stringed instruments.

HOFFMANN, HEINRICH AUGUST (b. Fallersleben, Hanover, Apr. 2, 1798; d. Corvey, Westphalia, Jan. 29, 1874), surnamed 'von Fallersleben' from his birthplace; philologist, poet and German hymn-writer. He was educated at Helmstedt, Brunswick, and (under Grimm) at the University of Göttingen (1816). In 1819 he removed to Bonn, and after studying Dutch literature in Holland, was appointed in 1835 professor at Breslau. His political views caused his dismissal in 1843, and he was not allowed to return to Prussia till 1848. Finally he became librarian to Prince Lippé at Corvey, and there died. His Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes (1st ed. 1832, 2nd 1854; Rümpler, Hanover) is written in a thoroughly scientific spirit, and contains important discoveries. He edited Schlesische Volkslieder mit Melodien (1842) and Deutsche Gesellschaftslieder des 16. und 17. Jahrhunderts (1844). His original melodies, and above all his poems for children (Kinderlieder, 1843), are widely and deservedly popular.

F. G.

HOFFMANN, KAREL (b. Smíchov, Prague, Dec. 12, 1872), Czech violinist. He studied under Antonin Bennewitz at the Prague Conservatoire, and, together with his fellow-students, Suk, Nedbal and Berger, founded the BOHEMIAN (CZECH) STRING QUARTET (q.v.) in 1892. He has led this organisation for 33 years. In 1922 Hoffmann was appointed professor of the violin at the Prague Conservatoire. Although a zealous propagandist of Smetana's music, he has a wide outlook on his art and is equally good as an interpreter of the classical or romantic schools.

R. N.

HOFFMANN (HOFMANN), LEOPOLD (b. Vienna, c. 1730; d. there, Mar. 17, 1793), Kapellmeister at St. Stephen's Cathedral in 1772, where Mozart became his assistant in 1791. He was a prolific and, in his time, greatly admired composer of church music, and one of the first who in his symphonies, concertos and chamber music adopted the style of the Mannheim school of J. Stamitz. His popularity was such that it even retarded the recognition of Haydn, who, in a letter to Artaria, speaks of him as a braggart who tries all he can to suppress him (Haydn) in certain high quarters. Burney, on the other hand, speaks well of him (Q.-L.; Riemann).

HOFFMEISTER, FRANZ ANTON (b. Rothenburg on the Neckar, 1754; d. Vienna, Feb. 10, 1812), studied law at Vienna, began his musical life as a church Kapellmeister, and in 1783 opened a book, art and music business there. This he threw up in 1798 with the intention of going to London. He, however, got no farther than Leipzig, remained there, and in Dec. 1800, in conjunction with Ambrosius Kühnel, founded the well-known Bureau de Musique. (See PETERS.) On Jan. 2, 1805, he again relinquished his business, returned to Vienna and devoted himself to composition. Hoffmeister was an extraordinarily prolific writer; he left 350 pieces of all dimensions for the flute alone; 120 for strings; symphonies and nocturnes for full orchestra; pieces for wind band and for clavier; songs; church music; and nine operas—all light and pleasing, and much relished by dilettanti. (See Q.-L.) The early publications of his firm were very coarsely engraved, as, for instance, Haydn's overture in D and quartet in D minor (known as op. 8), also Mozart's PF. quartets in G minor and E \flat , which promised to be the beginning of a long series; but on Hoffmeister's allegation that they were too obscure for the public, Mozart cancelled the contract, though applying to Hoffmeister when in want of money shortly afterwards. He started a subscription in 1801 for the publication of Bach's works. The nature of Beethoven's relations with him is shown by his letters of 1800 and 1801, in which he offers his opp. 19, 20, 21, 22, to his 'geliebtesten Herrn Bruder.'

C. F. P.

HOFFMEISTER, KAREL (b. Liblice, Bohemia, 1868), professor and composer. He studied organ and composition under Skuhersky, Stecker and Klička, theory and musical æsthetics under Hostinsky and Guido Adler, and pianoforte under H. von Kaan. From 1891-98 he carried on his profession in Laibach, after which he was appointed professor of pianoforte, harmony and musical history at the Prague Conservatoire. Upon the reorganisation of this institution after the change of government in 1918, Hoffmeister was called to the professorship of pianoforte in the 'master school,' a post which he occupies at present (1926). In his classes many excellent Czech and Jugo-Slav pianists have had their training. As a virtuoso Hoffmeister was associated with the Czech Trio, founded in 1899 by the violinist Suchy, with Vaška as violoncellist (afterwards replaced by J. Burian). His compositions include numerous piano pieces: Impromptu and Two Nocturnes, Rhapsodies, Scherzo Intermezzo in Valse-time, Melodie, are all published, as are also the following song cycles—'Trije-psomi,' Three Songs, 'Vsoumraki' (At Twilight), 'Osmutnych laskach' (Unhappy loves) 'Mladé,' 'Serenade,' 'Pohádka maje' (Legend of May). Hoffmeister has also written books on Smetana and Dvořák, and a very full Compendium of the Science and Literature of the Pianoforte.

R. N.

HOFHAIMER (HOFFHEIMER), PAUL (b. Radstadt, Jan. 25, 1459; d. Salzburg, 1539), became, apparently without much special instruction, one of the most distinguished organ-players of his time. He entered first the service of Archduke Sigismund of Tyrol, but afterwards betook himself to the court of the Emperor Maximilian I. He was in high favour with the Emperor, and frequently accompanied him on his journeys. There is some uncertainty as to the precise dates of his appointments, but from 1480-1519 his chief place of abode would seem to have been Innsbruck, where the Emperor had his regular chapel with Hofhaimer as organist. In 1515, on the occasion of a solemn Te Deum sung in St. Stephen's Church, Vienna, when Hofhaimer played the organ in the presence of three crowned heads, he was, at the Emperor's request, created a Knight of the Golden Spur by King Ladislaus of Hungary, and was raised to the rank of nobility by the Emperor himself. After the Emperor's death in 1519 he would seem to have returned to Salzburg, where from 1526 to his own death in 1539 he was in the service of the Archbishop as Cathedral organist.

It was chiefly as an organ-player that Hofhaimer acquired fame in his lifetime and was celebrated by his contemporaries. Ottomar Luscinus praises his playing in the highest terms, describing it as full of warmth and power, uniting the most wonderful finger-skill with a majestic flow of harmony previously unsurpassed. But of his organ compositions little if anything remains. In a MS. of song compositions by Isaac, Senfl and others, now in the Imperial Library, Vienna, Ambros was fortunate enough to discover a piece with Hofhaimer's name, which appeared to be a three-part organ fantasia upon a song, 'On freudt verzer ich manchentag.' Ritter in his Geschichte des Orgelspiels (p. 97), where the piece is reproduced (n. 58), confirms the judgment of Ambros as to its being really an organ piece, and considers that it alone suffices to give Hofhaimer his place as a master of the organ beside Arnold Schlick, who, if he surpasses Hofhaimer in the invention of florid passages for the organ, is inferior to him as a harmonist. But it is chiefly as the composer of simple four-part German songs that Hofhaimer is now known to us. Eitner is able to reckon up fifteen songs as certainly by Hofhaimer, but many more by him may be hidden among the anonymous works in the various collections of the time. Five of them are found without name in Oeglin's Liederbuch, 1512.² Several others besides these are to be met with in Forster's Liederbuch, 1539. Kade in the Noten-Beilagen to Ambros has reprinted three from Forster, one of which is the same as in Oeglin. These songs, as Eitner says, are distinguished by a rare tenderness of feeling and unusual loveliness of expression. They are written for the most part in very simple four-part harmony, without much contrapuntal elaboration. In the Monatshefte, xxv. p. 191, Eitner gives a specimen of Hofhaimer's different contrapuntal treatment of a three-part song. In one of the four-part songs reprinted by Kade ('Meins trauern ist'), Ambros calls attention to the remarkable resemblance to the melody of the well-known Choral, 'Aus tiefer Noth.' Another work of Hofhaimer's to be noticed is his 'Harmoniae poeticae, sive carmina nonnulla Horatii,' 4 voc., published at Nuremberg in 1539. This work consists of forty-four simple harmonic settings (thirty-five by Hofhaimer, nine by Senfl) of Odes of Horace in strict accordance with the rules of Latin prosody. The idea of writing music in strict accordance with the rules of metre was one of the fruits of the classical humanism of the time, and had considerable influence in helping forward the movement in favour of homophonic music, as also on the development of the simple note-for-note setting of the Protestant Choral. These settings of the Horatian Odes have been reprinted in recent times.

HOFMANN, HEINRICH KARL JOHANN (b. Berlin, Jan. 13, 1842; d. July 16, 1902), was a chorister in the Domchor at 9 years old, and at 15 entered Kullak's Academy, studying the piano with that master, and composition under Dehn and Wierst. For some years after leaving this institution he played in public and gave lessons. His earliest compositions were pianoforte pieces, but he first came before the public as a composer with his comic opera 'Cartouche,' op. 7, produced 1869, and performed successfully in several places. In 1873 the production of his 'Hungarian Suite,' op. 16, for orchestra, obtained such renown that he determined to devote himself thenceforth to composition alone. In the next year his 'Frithiof' symphony, op. 22, was brought out with extraordinary success at one of Bilse's concerts in Berlin, and rapidly became known all over Germany; in 1875 his cantata 'Die schöne Melusine,' op. 30, gained a similar success. In 1882 he was made a member of the Berlin Academy. Besides the works mentioned, the following are the more important of his productions:

'Nornengesang,' for solos, female chorus, and orchestra, op. 21; two orchestral suites, opp. 16 and 68; string sextet, op. 25; violoncello concerto, op. 31; trio, op. 18; quartet, for piano and strings; an octet, op. 80; cantatas, 'Aschenbrödel,' 'Editha,' 'Prometheus,' 'Waldfräulein' and 'Festgesang,' op. 74, the operas 'Der Matador,' 1872, 'Armin' (produced at Dresden, 1877), 'Anachen von Tharau,' 1878, 'Wilhelm von Oranien' (three acts, op. 60), 1882, the words of the first two by Felix Dahn, and 'Doana Diana' (op. 76, Berlin, Nov. 13, 1886). Among his later compositions are a Liederapil I (op. 84) for solo quartet with PF accompaniment, entitled 'Lenz und Liebe,' a set of songs for baritone and orchestra, 'Die Lieder des Troubadours Raoul' (op. 89), and 'Harald's Brautfahrt' for baritone solo, male chorus and orchestra (op. 90), 'Johann von Orléans,' 'Nordische Meerfahrt,' etc. An orchestral suite, 'Im Schlosshof,' is op. 78, a serenade for strings and flute, op. 5, serenade for strings, op. 72, concertstück for flute, op. 98, an orchestral scherzo, 'Irrlichter und Kobolde,' op. 94. Many concerted vocal works, songs, duets and pianoforte pieces have also been published.

HOFMANN, JOSEF (b. Cracow, Jan. 20, 1876). His father was a professor at the Warsaw Conservatoire and conductor of the Warsaw opera, his mother having been a distinguished singer. Till 1892 he studied the piano with his father, and then till 1894 he studied with Rubinstein, who declared him a boy such as the world of music had never before produced. At the early age of 6 he played in public, and when only 9 made a tour of Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, playing also in Vienna, Paris and London. Whilst touring in America in 1887 he was overworked, giving fifty-two concerts in two and a half months, which caused great indignation, and ended in the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children taking the matter up, his health having given way under the strain. After six years' rest in Berlin, he reappeared, stronger, more mature and more musical, making his début in Dresden in 1894, and in 1898 made a successful tour in America. Since then he has lived chiefly in America, where he has attained his present high reputation by his performances with all the great orchestras, his numerous recitals and his several works on piano-playing. He played in London as a mature artist in 1903 and frequently since. His compositions include piano concertos, sonatas, a symphony in E. Some of his slighter works for piano have been published under the name of 'Dvorsky.' He has been summed up by an eminent critic as an astonishingly individual artist, and has been classed as one of the group of pianists that concerns itself with the orchestral development of piano tone.

HOFMEISTER, (1) FRIEDRICH (b. Strehlen a. Elbe, Jan. 24, 1782; d. Reudnitz, near Leipzig, Sept. 30, 1864), founded a music publisher's business in 1807, and published from 1830 the Musikalisch-literarische Monatsbericht (catalogue of all music printed in Germany during the month). His son and successor, (2) ADOLF (d. 1870), published a new edition of Whistling's handbook of musical literature with supplements, and from 1852 they published also a yearly catalogue (Jahresbericht). (See WHISTLING.) E. v. d. s.

HOGARTH, GEORGE (b. 1783; d. Feb. 12, 1870), writer on musical and other subjects. He studied music as an amateur, and became a violoncellist and composer. He studied law in Edinburgh, associating with the literary characters of the day and taking part in the musical life of the city as joint secretary, with G. F. Graham, to the Edinburgh Musical Festival of 1815, etc. He came to London in 1830, when he contributed articles to the Harmonicon, and was engaged on the staff of the Morning Chronicle. His eldest daughter, Catherine, was married at St. Luke's, Chelsea, Apr. 2, 1836, to Charles Dickens, who is recorded in the parish register as Charles John Huffham Dickens. On the establishment in 1846 of the Daily News, under the editorship of Dickens, Hogarth was at once appointed musical critic, an office which he held until his failing health obliged him to resign in 1866. Besides filling a similar post for the Illustrated London News, editing for their short period of existence the Evening Chronicle and the Musical Herald, assisting Dickens in the compilation of the Household Narrative, and contributing articles to several periodicals, Hogarth found time to write some volumes on musical subjects, in which his judgment on contemporary art-life appears to have been sound and his mind open to the new influences at work; for his artistic instinct was sure even where his knowledge was limited. These works are:

Musical History, Biography, and Criticism, 1835: Memoirs of the Musical Drama, 1838; a revised edition of the same, called Memoirs of the Opera, 1851; The Birmingham Festival, 1855; and The Philharmonic Society, from its foundation in 1813 to its 50th year in 1862.

He was secretary to the Philharmonic Society from 1850-64. (See D.N.B.)

Hogarth died in his eighty-seventh year, and was buried in Kensal Green Cemetery.

HOL, RICHARD (b. Amsterdam, July 23, 1825; d. Utrecht, May 14, 1904), composer and conductor. He was conductor of the choir of the Maatschappij tot bevordering der Toonkunst in Amsterdam, 1856-63; he went in 1863 to Utrecht as musical director, organist and conductor of the town music school. Thanks to his stimulus and to his many-sided activities, Utrecht became the centre of the musical life of Holland during the second half of the 19th century. Hol composed a number of choral and orchestral works, chamber music and songs.

R. M^a.

HOLBORNE, ANTONY (d. 1602) and WILLIAM, were brothers. There was published in 1597 a work bearing the title of

The Ciththarn Schoole, by Antony Holborne, Gentleman, and servant to her most excellent Maiestie. Hereunto are added six short Aers Neapolitan like to three voyces, without the Instrument: done by his brother, William Holborne.

It is dedicated to Thomas, Lord Burgh, Baron Gainsburgh. In the Preface the author says he was induced to publish these early works in consequence of some stranger having put forth corrupt copies of them. 'The Ciththarn Schoole' contains 32 pieces (preludes, pavans, galliards, popular song tunes, etc.) for the ciththarn alone, in tablature; 23 others for the ciththarn with an accompaniment, in ordinary notation, for bass viol; and 2 more for the ciththarn, with accompaniments for treble, tenor and bass viols. The six 'Aers' by William Holborne are stated to be 'the first fruites of Composition' done by him. They are printed in Eng. Madr. Sch. vol. xxxvi. The second of them speaks of BONNY BOOTS (q.v.) as dead, agreeing in that respect with one of Morley's Canzonets. 'The Ciththarn Schoole' was unnoticed till 1847, when Rimbault partially described it in his Bibliotheca madrigaliana, from a copy, presumably unique, then in his possession, but now in the R.C.M. Music by Antony Holborne is also in Dowland's 'Varietie of Lute Lessons' (1610), and he is there called Gentleman Usher to Queen Elizabeth. A duet, 'My Heavy Sprite,' is in Dowland's 'Musical Banquet' (1610), and commendatory verses by him are prefixed to Morley's Plaine and Easie Introd. (1595 and 1608), and to Farnaby's Canzonets, 1598.

W. H. H.

HOLBROOKE, JOSEPH (JOSEF¹) (b. Croydon, July 6, 1878), a prolific composer and ardent propagandist, studied at the R.A.M. under Corder (composition) and Westlake (piano). On leaving the R.A.M. in 1898 he held minor appointments as a conductor, and appeared as a pianist on the concert platform. On the whole, however, he has avoided executive work in order to devote himself to composition, and his chief public appearances have been as a pianist in the several series of chamber concerts he has given in London and elsewhere to introduce British music to the British public.

¹ The name so appears on many of his published scores.

In this cause he has been untiring and generous, for he has given these concerts through many seasons for the benefit of his contemporaries' works as well as his own.

He first came prominently before the public as a composer for the orchestra, and his symphonic poem 'The Raven' (after E. A. Poe, whose works have given him much congenial subject-matter) was played at the Crystal Palace in 1900. His grip of the orchestra as a means of expression arrested attention at once, and other works followed at various London concerts and provincial festivals. Those which may be considered as landmarks in the composer's career were 'Queen Mab' (Leeds Festival, 1904), 'The Bells' (Birmingham, 1906) for voices and orchestra, and 'Apollo and the Seaman' (Queen's Hall, 1908), the last named a symphony on a poem by Herbert Trench. At the first performance the poem was presented to the audience by means of lantern slides. Holbrooke first became known as an operatic composer when his 'Pierrot and Pierrette' (2 acts, words by Walter E. Crogan) was given by Beecham (His Majesty's, 1909). A more ambitious scheme followed in a trilogy of Wagnerian dimensions, though hardly of Wagnerian proportions, on British legends, 'The Cauldron of Anwyn,' the libretto by T. E. Ellis (Lord Howard de Walden), who has been an assiduous patron of Holbrooke's art. Two of the three works making the trilogy have appeared. 'The Children of Don' was first given at the London Opera House (June 1912), 'Dylan' at Drury Lane (July 1914). The third, 'Bronwen,' still (1926) awaits performance. 'The Children of Don' was given performances at the Volkoper, Vienna, and at Salzburg in 1923. Two slighter works, 'The Wizard' (Chicago, 1915) and 'The Stranger,' which opened the operatic season of the Liverpool repertory theatre (Oct. 1924), deserve mention. The exuberant versatility of Holbrooke's talent is admitted by all; his works have been widely performed, but scarcely one, unless it be the variations on 'Three Blind Mice,' frequently played at the Promenade concerts, can be said to have taken hold of a public which allows its admiration to be directed, but bestows its affections only where it will. The following is a list of his principal compositions:

ORCHESTRA AND CHORUS

Symphonic Poems:

- 'The Raven' (Poe). (Crystal Palace, 1900.)
- 'The Viking.'
- 'Byron' (Ode to Victory), chorus ad lib. (Leeds, 1906.)

HOLCOMBE, HENRY (b. probably Salisbury, c. 1690; d. London, c. 1750), was a chorister at Salisbury. He came to London while a boy, and sang in the Anglo-Italian operas at Drury Lane as Prenesto in 'Camilla' (1706, 1708), and the Page in 'Rosamond' (1707). On the breaking of his voice he left the stage and became a teacher of the harpsichord and singing, in which he was very successful. Holcombe issued as op. 1 six solos for a violin in 1745, and about the same year published two collections of songs, viz. 'The Musical Medley; or, A Collection of English Songs and Cantatas set to Musick,' and 'The Garland; a Collection of eleven Songs and Cantatas.' Two of his songs, 'Happy Hour' (printed in the Musical Miscellany) and 'Arno's Vale,' were much sung in their time. (See Mrs. Delany's Autobiography, i. 189.) W. H. H.

HOLDEN, JOHN, lived in Glasgow during the latter half of the 18th century, settling there as a potter, and becoming a burgess about 1757. He published an Essay towards a Rational System of Music, Glasgow, 1770; other editions appeared in Calcutta, 1799, and Edinburgh, 1807. He published a 'Collection of Church Music, consisting of New Setts of the Common Psalm Tunes, with some other Pieces; adapted to the several Metres in the Version authorised by the general assembly . . . principally designed for the use of the University of Glasgow,' 1766. Fétis's statement that he was a professor in Glasgow University is an error.

W. H.².

HOLDEN, SMOLLET. Dr. Petrie in his Ancient Music of Ireland, 1855, refers to him as 'the most eminent British composer of military music in his time.' He was the father of Dr. Francis Holden, who, with his sister, was instrumental in noting down many of the old Irish traditional airs. Smollet Holden kept a music shop at 26 Parliament Street, Dublin, at the end of the 18th century. He issued a very valuable collection of Irish airs, many being printed for the first time. It is in two volumes folio, and is entitled A Collection of Old-Established Irish Slow and Quick Tunes, c. 1806-07. Other of his publications include A Selection of Masonic Songs, A Collection of Original Welsh Music, A Collection of (24) Quick and Slow Marches, and a collection of Irish melodies published periodically.

F. K.

HOLDER, JOSEPH WILLIAM, Mus.B. (b. St. John's, Clerkenwell, 1764; d. 1832), was educated in the Chapel Royal under Dr. Nares. After quitting the choir he became assistant to Reinhold, organist of St. George the Martyr, Queen Square. He next obtained the post of organist of St. Mary's Church, Bungay, which he held for many years, after which he removed to the neighbourhood of Chelmsford. He took his degree of Bachelor of Music at Oxford in Dec. 1792, his exercise being an anthem, the score of which is preserved in the Bod. Lib. Holder's compositions consist of a Mass, anthems, glees (three collections published), canons, songs and pianoforte pieces, including arrangements of many of Handel's choruses.

W. H. H.

HOLDER, REV. WILLIAM, D.D. (b. Nottinghamshire, 1616; d. Hertford, Jan. 24, 1697), deserves record here for his studies in phonetics. He was elected F.R.S. in 1663. He had succeeded in teaching a deaf-mute to speak, and he wrote a paper on the subject in Philosophical Transactions for May 1668, publishing his Elements of Speech, etc., in the following year. He was appointed a canon of St. Paul's in 1672. He was author of A Treatise on the Natural Grounds and Principles of Harmony, 1694; second edition 1731, a very able work, written chiefly for the service of the gentlemen of the Chapel Royal. An Evening Service in C and two anthems by him are in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MSS. 7338 & 7339). Dr. Holder was buried in the undercroft of St. Paul's Cathedral. He married a sister of Sir Christopher Wren, and had a considerable share in the latter's education. (See D.N.B.)

HOLE, (1) WILLIAM. It may be claimed that he was the first to engrave music in England. This was the celebrated work Parthenia, or the Maydenhead of the First Musicke that ever was printed for the Virginalls. Folio. The imprint says that it was 'engraven by William Hole for Dorethie Evans.' There is no date, but this has been fixed at 1611. Later editions were issued from the same plates. William Hole in 1613 engraved the Prime musiche nuove of Angelo Notari, and the portrait of Michael Drayton which is prefixed to the 1627 edition of his works.

(2) ROBERT, of the same family, engraved a companion work to Parthenia named Parthenia Inviolata, c. 1614. Of this work only one copy is known, which is in the hands of an American collector.

HOLLÄNDER, ALEXIS (b. Ratibor, Silesia, Feb. 26, 1840), went to Breslau, where he was a pupil of Schnabel and Hesse, and conducted the Gymnasium scholar singing society. From 1858-61 he studied in Berlin at the Royal Academy under Grell and A. W. Bach, and was also a private pupil of K. Böhmer. In 1861 he was appointed instructor at Kullak's Academy, and in 1870 conducted the Cäcilienverein, being nominated professor in 1888. He has written several compositions for the piano, a suite for violin and piano, a pianoforte quintet; also songs, partsongs, studies as a preparation for choral singing, besides editing a volume of Schumann's pianoforte pieces. W. R. C.

HOLLÄNDER, (1) GUSTAV (b. Leobschütz, Upper Silesia, Feb. 15, 1855; d. Berlin, Dec. 6, 1915), violinist, teacher and composer, was taught the violin by his father, a physician, appearing in public as a prodigy when very young. From 1867-69 he studied with David at Leipzig, and then went to Berlin, where he was for five years a pupil of Joachim. In 1875 he became the principal violin-teacher at Kullak's Academy, and was appointed Royal Chamber Musician, also making a successful tour with Carlotta Patti in Austria. From 1878-81 he gave a series of subscription chamber concerts in Berlin, and in 1881 became leader of the Gürzenich orchestral concerts, and teacher at the Cologne Conservatorium. After Japha's retirement he took the leadership of the Cologne string quartet, playing with success not only locally but in various continental towns. In 1884 he was leader of the Stadttheater orchestra, and in 1894 led the Professorien Streichquartette, being in the same year appointed director of the Stern Conservatorium in Berlin. In 1896 he was engaged as Konzertmeister of a new orchestra in Hamburg, and has toured in Belgium, Holland and Germany. He composed several works for violin and piano, as well as arrangements, and a small violin concerto for pupils.

(2) VICTOR (b. Leobschütz, 1866), younger brother of Gustav, studied with Kullak. In 1897 he became substitute director of the Stern Conservatorium, in 1901 musical director of the Metropoli Theater, and in 1908 of the Neuen Operetten Theater, in Berlin. He has composed pieces for the piano and several comic operas, 'Carmosinella' (Frankfort-on-Main, 1888), 'The Bay of Morocco' (London, 1894), 'Der Sonnenvogel' (1907), 'Der Regimentspapa' (Dresden, 1914), also 'San Lin' and 'Trilby.' (See Riemann.) W. R. C.

HOLLAND, JOHANN DAVID (b. Herzberg, Hanover, c. 1746). He was music director at St. Catherine's, Hamburg, and in 1777 calls himself 'Musikdirektor am Domkapitel in Hamburg.' An oratorio of his was produced in 1774 by C. P. E. Bach. He also composed songs, instructive pieces, 'aleigh party' for orchestra, etc. Another contemporary composer of the same name is mentioned by Sowinski as having lived in Poland (Q.-L.).

HOLLANDE (HOLLÄNDER), JEAN DE, appointed successor at St. Donat, Bruges, Feb. 21, 1541, formerly at St. Sauveur there. Seven of his songs are preserved in collective volumes, 1543-53. (See Q.-L.)

HOLLANDER, BENNO (b. Amsterdam, June 8, 1853), first appeared as a violinist in London in the Hanover Square Rooms when quite a child. On the advice of Isidor Lotto, who was playing at the Promenade Concerts at the time, the boy was sent to Paris to study at the Conservatoire with Massart. Here he had the good fortune to become acquainted with Berlioz during the last years of that master's life, and had the advantage of hearing Wieniawski, from whom he learnt much, and of studying composition with Saint-Saëns. He carried off the first violin prize in 1873, and came to London in 1876 after a long tour in Sweden, Denmark, Russia, Germany and France, where he made many successful appearances. On Costa's strong recommendation he remained in London. He joined Auer's quartet at the Musical Union, and played the viola frequently at the Popular Concerts. For the German Opera seasons of 1882 and 1884 he was leader of the orchestra under Richter, was appointed professor of the violin at the G.S.M. in 1887, and was leader of the orchestra for Henschel during his seasons of London Symphony Concerts. The Wagner concerts conducted by Mottl, Strauss, Weingartner and Levi were 'led' by Hollander, and the practical experience he had gained of conducting bore excellent fruit in the establishment of an organisation of his own, called the  (i.e. B.H.) Orchestral Society, which gave concerts of some interest in the Kensington Town Hall, beginning in May 1903. In 1910 he conducted a series of 3 concerts in London at which Saint-Saëns played the piano concertos of Mozart. Hollander's compositions include:

Two violin concertos with orchestra, a pastoral fantasia for the same (played by Yanyo, Queen's Hall, Feb. 1900), a 'dramatic symphonic poem,' 'L'impell' (concert performance by London Choral Society, Dec. 1907), a septet for piano, strings and two horns, two string quartets, a trio for two violins and viola, a trio for piano, violin and violoncello, two sonatas for piano and violin, a sonata for piano solo, a symphony, 'Roland,' and two pieces for orchestra, 'Drame' and 'Comédie.' M., rev.

HOLLANDER, CHRISTIAN JANSZON (d. before 1570), from 1549 choirmaster at St. Walburg's, Audenarde, became in 1559 singer in the Imperial Chapel at Vienna under the Emperors Ferdinand I. and Maximilian II. A large number of motets by him are contained in the collections of the time, and especially in the Thesaurus of Joannelli, 1568, from which Commer has reprinted twenty-five. The only other works of Hollander that appeared in print are:

(1) A collection of German songs, sacred and secular, for 4 to 8 v. (Munich, 1570); (2) 'Tricinia' (Munich, 1573). From the former Commer has reprinted two sacred songs for 5 voices, 'O Herr durch deinen bittern Tod.' 'Allmächtiger Gott der du all' Ding erhaltst,' and two secular songs for four voices. 'Der Wein, der schmeckt,' 'Ach edles Bild.'

For a critical account of his motets, see Ambros's Geschichte der Musik, Bd. iii.

HOLLINS, ALFRED (b. Hull, Sept. 11, 1865), organist, is a remarkable example of the attainment of great proficiency in spite of total blindness. At the age of 9 he went to the Wilberforce Institution for the Blind at York, studying under the eldest brother of Sir Joseph Barnby. In Jan. 1878 he entered the Royal Normal College for the Blind at Upper Norwood, where he studied the pianoforte under Frits Hartvigson, and the organ under Dr. E. J. Hopkins, and it is remarkable that throughout his career he has maintained his skill equally on both instruments. He was quite a boy when he played Beethoven's E flat concerto at the Crystal Palace, under Manns's direction, and only 16 when he played to Queen Victoria at Windsor. He went to Berlin to study with Hans von Bülow, played before the King and Queen of the Belgians at Brussels, and the Empress Frederick at Berlin. He was appointed to the post of organist at St. John's Church, Redhill, in 1884. In the Music and Inventions Exhibition of 1885 he appeared with great success as an organist, and in 1886 was taken by the principal of the Royal Normal College, Dr. F. J. Campbell, to America, with a quartet party of blind performers. A second visit to the United States was made independently in 1888 when he played concertos with the chief orchestras of New York and Boston; but before that Hollins had studied again in Germany at the Raff Conservatorium at Frankfurt; in 1886 he had appeared at one of the Popular Concerts, and in 1888 at the Philharmonic Concert, in Beethoven's E flat concerto. In 1888 he was appointed the first organist of the People's Palace, and organist of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Upper Norwood. During his tenure of the latter post he was a professor of pianoforte and organ in the Royal Normal College. In 1897 he was appointed organist of Free St. George's Church, Edinburgh, when the organ was first introduced into that church. In Aug. and Sept. 1904 he gave a number of organ recitals in Australia, creating great enthusiasm by his wonderful skill. Subsequent recital tours have included three in South Africa (1907, 1909 and 1916). On the last of these he opened the organ at the Town Hall, Johannesburg, the specification for which he had drawn up. An extensive recital tour in the U.S.A. took place in 1925. Hollins's compositions are marked by sound musicianship, and no little originality. They include songs, church music and solos for various instruments, among the last-named being many organ pieces which have attained wide and deserved popularity, notably a couple of brilliant concert overtures. He is honorary Fellow of the R.C.O., and received in 1922 the degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causa, at Edinburgh University.

It is often the case that the performances and works of blind musicians are felt to be wanting in what may be called vitality; in many notable instances a certain dryness of style has undoubtedly been noticed; but if a practical argument against the assumption that it is universally the case were wanted, none better could be given than both the playing and the compositions of Hollins, both of which are eloquent and vividly full of vigour and feeling. An excellent article on him appeared in the Mus. T. for Oct. 1901, from which much of the above information is taken.

HOLMES, (1) ALFRED (b. London, Nov. 9, 1837; d. Paris, Mar. 4, 1876), son of Thomas Holmes of Lincoln, a self-taught man, was at the age of 7 initiated by his father in the practice of violin-playing. With no other instruction than that of his parent and Spohr's 'Violin School,' he soon became distinguished, and especially noted for the performance of duets with his younger brother, Henry (2). At a later period their father made them study the classic French school of Rode, Baillot and Kreutzer. When about 10 years of age Alfred became principal soprano boy at the Oratory, then newly established in King William Street, Strand, in the building previously the Lowther Rooms, afterwards Toole's Theatre. On July 13, 1847, the two brothers made their first appearance in public at the Haymarket Theatre at the benefit of F. Webster, and played Auber's overture to 'Masaniello,' arranged as a violin duet. They were heard by Spohr about 1852, but did not again appear in public until 1853, in the summer of which year they played at a concert at the Beethoven Rooms, assisted by W. H. Webb, Piatti and Lindsay Sloper. In 1855 they went to Brussels, where they remained for several months performing with great success. In 1856 they visited Wiesbaden, Frankfurt, Darmstadt, Leipzig, Mayence and Cassel, where Spohr paid them the compliment of dedicating his three grand duos to them. In 1857 they went to Vienna; after that to Sweden, where they remained for two years, and then to Copenhagen in 1860 and Amsterdam in 1861, meeting everywhere with great success.

In 1864 Alfred Holmes settled in Paris, where in 1866 he established a quartet party. In 1867 he made a tour in Belgium, Holland, Germany and Russia. At St. Petersburg he produced his 'Jeanne d'Arc,' symphony with solos and chorus, which was performed for the first time in England at the Crystal Palace, Feb. 27, 1875. Returning to Paris he gave some fragments of a symphony called 'The Youth of Shakespeare,' at one of the Concerts Populaires, and an opera 'Inez de Castro,' was accepted, though never performed, at the Opéra. He afterwards produced two symphonies entitled 'Robin Hood' and 'The Siege of Paris,' and composed two others under the names of 'Charles XII.' and 'Romeo and Juliet.' His overture 'The Cid' was played at the Crystal Palace, Feb. 21, 1874, and another, 'The Muses,' after the composer's death in London.

(2) HENRY (b. London, Nov. 7, 1839; d. San Francisco, Dec. 9, 1905), was also a chorister at the Oratory. After quitting his brother in Paris in 1865 he proceeded to Copenhagen and thence to Stockholm, where he remained some time, but ultimately returned to England and settled in London, where he was highly esteemed as a solo violinist and quartet-player. His compositions included four symphonies (No. 1, in A, was performed at the Crystal Palace, Feb. 24, 1872; another, 'Boscastle,' was given at a London symphony concert in 1887) and a violin concerto in F (Crystal Palace, Dec. 11, 1875). For some years from 1868 he gave chamber concerts under the title of Musical Evenings; he held the post of professor of the violin at the R.C.M. from its foundation until his enforced resignation in 1894, when he retired to San Francisco. W. H. H.

HOLMÈS (properly HOLMES), AUGUSTA MARY ANNE (b. Paris, Dec. 16, 1847; d. there, Jan. 28, 1903), of Irish parents, and naturalised in France in 1879, was, in fact, a composer of French music, for, being a member of the school of Franck, she wrote music only to French words.

Her parents were strongly opposed to her musical propensities, and she began her career as a prodigy, playing the piano at concerts and in drawing-rooms, and singing airs of her own composition signed with the pen-name Hermann Zenta. She studied harmony and counterpoint with H. Lambert, organist of the cathedral at Versailles, and received excellent advice as to instrumentation from Klosé, band-master of the Artillerie de la Garde Impériale, and professor of the clarinet in the Conservatoire. In reality, however, Mlle. Holmès, whose character was one of great independence, worked alone both at her musical and literary studies, for between the time of her début and her intimacy with Catulle Mendès she always wrote her own librettos; but in 1875 she became aware of the necessity for more serious studies under a master, and enrolled herself as a pupil of César Franck. With the exception of an opera, 'Héro et Léandre,' submitted to the directors of the Opéra Populaire, and of the Psalm 'In exitu,' performed by the Société Philharmonique in 1873, her compositions nearly all date from this time.

She produced at the Concerts du Châtelet

(Jan. 14, 1877) an 'Andante pastorale' from a symphony on the subject of Orlando Furioso, and in the following year she gained a second place after Dubois and Godard (bracketed together) at the musical competition instituted by the city of Paris. Her prize composition, a symphony entitled 'Lutèce,' was afterwards played at the concerts at Angers (Nov. 30, 1884). In 1880 Mlle. Holmès again entered the second competition opened by the city of Paris, and though she only gained an honourable mention she was fortunate enough to attract the attention of Pasdeloup, who performed the entire score of her work 'Les Argonautes' at the Concerts Populaires (Apr. 24, 1881), and this unexpected test proved to be entirely to her credit, and to the discomfiture of Duvernoy, whose 'Tempête' had been preferred to Mlle. Holmès's work by eleven judges against nine. On Mar. 2, 1882, Mlle. Holmès produced at the Concerts Populaires a Poème Symphonique entitled 'Irlande'; another symphony, 'Pologne,' after its production at Angers, was played at the same concerts on Dec. 9, 1883; and a symphonic ode for chorus and orchestra with recitative, entitled 'Ludus pro patria,' was given on Mar. 4, 1888, at the Concerts of the Conservatoire. The above, with a collection of songs called 'Les Sept Ivresses,' are the works by which Mlle. Holmès's vigorous talent may be judged. Certain portions of her work, as the opening of 'Irlande,' her most complete work, and the third part of 'Les Argonautes,' although they contain serious faults in prosody and in the union between the words and the music, are nevertheless creations of great worth, evincing by turns a charming tenderness, ardent passion and masculine spirit. It is true that the author did not always measure her effects; she gave rather too much prominence to the brass instruments, and in seeking for originality and grandeur she was sometimes affected and pompous; but this exuberance was at least a sign of an artistic temperament, and of a composer who had something to say and tried to give it a fitting expression. An 'Ode triomphale,' for solos, choir and orchestra, was played at the Paris Exhibition of 1889; a 'Hymne à la Paix,' for the same, at Florence in May 1890, at the fêtes in honour of Dante; and 'Au pays bleu,' a symphonic suite, was played in 1891. Her 4-act opera 'La Montagne noire' was produced at the Paris Opéra, Feb. 8, 1895, and had a considerable success. Two more operas, 'Astarte' and 'Lancelot du lac,' remain in MS. On July 13, 1904, a monument to her memory was unveiled in the St. Louis Cemetery, Versailles. A. J.; addns. G. F.

HOLMES, EDWARD (b. 1797; d. America, Aug. 28, 1859), school-fellow and friend of Keats, was educated for the musical profession under V. Novello, and became a teacher of the pianoforte. He was engaged as musical critic of the Atlas newspaper. In 1827 he made a tour in Germany, and wrote a volume entitled A Ramble among the Musicians of Germany, etc., 1828. It reached a third edition. In 1845 he published The Life of Mozart, including his Correspondence, in an 8vo volume, which justly attracted great attention. This book, which was the result of a second visit to Germany, was characterised by Otto Jahn as the most useful, complete and trustworthy biography then in existence.¹ A new edition was prepared by Prout (Novello & Co., 1878). In addition to this, his great work, Holmes wrote a life of Purcell for the second issue of Novello's edition of his Sacred Music, an Analytical and Thematic Index of Mozart's P.F. works, often reprinted by the same firm, analyses of several of Mozart's masses, which were published in the Mus. T., with many other papers on musical subjects. He married the grand-daughter of S. Webbe. (See Mus. T., Oct. 1, 1859.) w. h. h.

HOLMES, GEORGE (d. 1721), organist to the Bishop of Durham, was appointed organist of Lincoln Cathedral on the death of Thomas Allinson in 1704. He composed several anthems, two of which—'Arise, shine, O daughter of Zion,' composed on the Union with Scotland, 1706, and 'I will love Thee, O Lord'—are to be found in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MS. 7341), and others are in the choir books of Lincoln. His fine setting of the Burial Sentences is still sung in Lincoln Cathedral, and has been republished (Novello), edited by Dr. G. A. Bennett. Holmes composed an Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, but for what particular year is not stated; its contents, however, show it to have been written between 1703 and 1713. Some catches by a George Holmes are contained in Hilton's 'Catch that catch can,' 1652; their composer may possibly have been the father of the organist of Lincoln.

HOLMES, (1) JOHN, organist of Winchester Cathedral in the latter part of the 16th century, and organist of Salisbury Cathedral from 1602–1610, contributed to 'The Triumphes of Oriana,' 1601, the madrigal for five voices, 'Thus Benny Boots the birthday celebrated.' Some church music of his composition is extant in MS. He was master to Adrian Batten and Edward Lowe. His son (2) THOMAS (d. Salisbury, Mar. 25, 1638) was sworn a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, Sept. 17, 1633. Some catches by him are contained in Hilton's 'Catch that catch can,' 1652.

HOLMES, WILLIAM HENRY (b. Sudbury, Derbyshire, Jan. 8, 1812; d. London, Apr. 23, 1885), son of a musician, entered the R.A.M. at its opening in 1822, and gained two of the first medals granted there for composition and the piano. In 1826 he became sub-professor and subsequently professor of the piano. As a teacher he was remarkably successful, having trained some of the most eminent of English musicians; among them Sterndale Bennett, the two Macfarrens, J. W. Davison and others. His knowledge of pianoforte music was very great, and as a virtuoso he long enjoyed a high reputation. His first appearance at the Philharmonic was in Mendelssohn's Introduction and Rondo, Mar. 24, 1851; and as late as 1876 he performed at the Alexandra Palace a concerto of his own, in A major, written for the Jubilee of the R.A.M. His numerous compositions of all classes are still in MS. Like his friend Cipriani Potter he was always ready to welcome new composers and new music, in proof of which we may name the fact that it was at his instigation and under his care that Brahms's first P.F. concerto was first played in England by Miss Baglehole, at the Crystal Palace, Mar. 9, 1872. a.

HOLST, GUSTAV THEODORE (b. Cheltenham, Sept. 21, 1874), one of the most prominent composers in England of his generation.

The family, originally Swedish, settled in Baltic Russia early in the 18th century, whence Matthias von Holst (1767–1854) migrated to England in 1807 with his eight-year old son, Gustavus Valentin, who eventually married an Englishwoman and settled at Cheltenham. Their son, Adolf von Holst (1846–1901) married an English pianist, Clara Lediard, and was the father of Gustav, who dropped the use of the 'von' during the war. Despite the foreign origin of his name, Gustav Holst's ancestry is thus preponderantly English, and associated with those western counties whence have come many representative English composers of this generation and the last. His father intended him to become a pianist, but from the earliest days he turned his attention for preference to composition. A village organistship gave him the first opening in a direction which was to have important results for his career—the handling of choirs, of which he had conducted several, besides a small orchestra, before coming to London, where he entered the R.C.M. in 1893. As a boy he had tried seven or eight times to win a scholarship, but he did not succeed until 1895, within a few days of passing the age-limit. It was for composition, which he studied with Stanford, having previously had instruction in theory from Rockstro. He also studied the piano and organ respectively under Sharpe and Hoyte, but a tendency to neuritis in the hand led him to take up the trombone under Case. This hand trouble, which has often caused him to employ a musical amanuensis, was indirectly a blessing in disguise, for it led to the intimate orchestral experience and practical sense of interpretation which have contributed so much to his technical equipment. It was during these student years that he formed the abiding friendship with Vaughan Williams which has had a pronounced influence upon his career.

On leaving the R.C.M. he joined the Carl Rosa Opera Company as first trombone and répétiteur, and played for many years in the Scottish and other orchestras. He was also for some seasons organist at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden. It was in 1903 that he entered upon his career as a teacher, which has been crowned with remarkable success, again in consequence of his practical outlook on music. He then became music-master at Edward Alleyn School, Dulwich, and the following year musical director at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, retaining the former post until 1919, but relinquishing the latter in 1907, when he became musical director at Morley College. Meanwhile he was appointed in 1905 music-master at St. Paul's Girls' School. These two positions he still holds, besides teaching composition at the R.C.M. since 1919, but he has been obliged to throw up the similar post he held at Reading College from 1919-23. He was suffering from overwork and had already decided to reduce his teaching engagements, when, in that year, he fell from the platform at Reading, sustaining a shock which would not have been serious but for the previous strain, which made a period of rest imperative. He nevertheless fulfilled an engagement in May to conduct several of his own works at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, and returned to work in the autumn. In Feb. 1924 he gave up all teaching, lecturing and conducting, and spent the rest of the year in the country. He was allowed to write, and took advantage of the enforced freedom from distractions. That same year he was elected a Fellow of the R.C.M. The only other incidents bearing upon his musical development are a holiday spent in Algeria, which inspired the 'Beni Mora' Suite, and, in Oct. 1918, a journey to Salonika for the purpose of organising music among the troops under the Y.M.C.A. Army Education scheme. The following March he went to Constantinople, and thence to several camps in Asia Minor. His entire career has been one of useful and productive activity.

As a composer his beginnings were remarkable more for the intensity of his preoccupation with music than for premature brilliance or facility. He was unusually free alike from vague aspirations and from the vanity of cleverness, desiring only to make music as well as he might. Though with the approach of maturity he has found deeper sources of inspiration and a wider variety of aim, the main incentive has remained the same, and is stronger even than the mystical inclinations suggested by his choice of subjects. The best-known of his early works is the Ballet suite of 1900, which was performed and published under the auspices of the Patron's Fund, to which is due also the performance of 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' afterwards the first of Holst's compositions to be performed by the Royal Philharmonic Society. Meanwhile the 'Cotswolds' Symphony had been given at Bournemouth in 1902. He was also giving much attention to choral writing, and to the study of folk-song; the latter bearing early fruit in the Somerset Rhapsody of 1907. About 1906 he entered upon what has come to be known as his 'Sanskrit' period, which may be said to have lasted until 1911. During those years he was attracted by the Hindu epics, but especially by the hymns of the Rig-Veda. His first opera, 'Sita,' which was placed second in the Ricordi competition of 1908 (the prize being awarded to E. W. Naylor's 'The Angelus') is based upon an episode from the Ramayana, but has otherwise little in common with the works that followed. These comprise four sets of choral hymns from the Rig-Veda, other settings for solo voice, an opera di camera, 'Savitri,' based upon an episode from the Mahabharata, an ode, 'The Cloud Messenger,' for chorus and orchestra, and 'Two Eastern Pictures' for female chorus and harp, both the latter being derived from the Kalidasa. For these works he mostly wrote his own texts, in the setting of which he acquired a peculiarly sensitive feeling for the elasticity of English prose accentuation, out of which grew subsequently his addiction to irregular and asymmetric rhythms, or, rather, his allegiance to the rhythmic in preference to the metric accent. In these works there is no spurious or superficial Orientalism, but an intimate penetration of the text. Nevertheless, reinforced by the Algerian Suite 'Beni Mora,' they brought the composer for the time a reputation for Oriental associations which had to be lived down afterwards. Towards the end of this period he turned his attention to the resources of the military band, for which he wrote two suites, and he reverted to his love of the folk-song idiom in the 'St. Paul's' suite for strings, thus named after the school, besides numerous choral settings.

The next phase of Holst's career opened with 'The Planets,' a suite of seven orchestral tone-poems suggested by astrological associations. Because it begins with a singularly powerful depiction of Mars, it was thought to owe inspiration to the war period, but in fact the composition was thought out much earlier, and the scoring was in progress when war broke out. Many of Holst's works have had this prolonged preparation. His third opera, 'The Perfect Fool,' was actually in his mind for fifteen years before being completed in 1921. 'The Planets' was first given a semi-private morning performance at Queen's Hall in 1918, on the eve of the composer's departure for Salonika—performed for the first time in public at a Philharmonic Concert the following year, with the exception of 'Venus' and 'Neptune.' It is still rarely performed in its entirety, but groups of from three to five of its sections constantly appear in orchestral programmes. Then followed the 'Hymn of Jesus,' completed in 1917 and performed two years later by the Philharmonic Society and Choir, which had the effect of confirming in another direction the deep impression made on the public by the success of 'The Planets.' From being a composer highly esteemed in a somewhat narrow circle, Holst suddenly became a celebrity from whom great works were expected. His name acquired enhanced prominence at the big provincial Festivals with the 'Ode to Death' (Leeds, 1922), 'The Evening Watch,' motet (Gloucester 1925), and the Choral Symphony, after Keats (Leeds 1925), and reached an even wider public through performances by the British National Opera Company of his operas 'The Perfect Fool' (completed 1921, and produced at Covent Garden in May 1923), 'Savitri,' and 'At the Boar's Head' (composed 1924, produced at Manchester in Apr. 1925). 'A Fugal Overture,' which is an independent work, though associated in performance with 'The Perfect Fool,' was written in 1922, a 'Fugal Concerto' for flute, oboe and strings, on the American journey of 1923, and a Toccata for piano in 1924.

It would be hazardous to venture generalisations upon so varied and copious an output. It has, however, some persistent traits: a high degree of technical proficiency of the kind that is shown by an uniformly practicable manner of writing, and by the close relation of means to effect, but which is personal rather than orthodox; a fondness for insistent uneven time-measures (5-4, 7-4, etc.) where symmetry is the intention, and at others an unusual rhythmic independence of metrical bar-lines, especially in the setting of words; copious melodic invention, with a flexible melodic line often influenced, but not dominated, by the folk-song idiom; an intimate sense of choral effect; and a feeling for polyphony which is directly based upon experience in preference to theory. The vein of mysticism to which reference has been made expresses itself with equal directness in the simplicity of the Four Songs for voice and violin unaccompanied, and the complexity of the 'Hymn of Jesus.' Directness of expression is, in fact, the ideal he has kept before him. He has little liking for the vagueness which passes under the name of atmosphere, or for subtleties of whatever kind, and it is often in this simplicity that consists the inspiration of his work.

HOLSTEIN, FRANZ VON (b. Brunswick, Feb. 16, 1826; d. Leipzig, May 21/22, 1878), the son of an officer of high position. He was himself obliged to adopt the military profession, but eagerly embraced every opportunity of improving his musical knowledge. He studied with such success under Griepenkerl that in 1845, while he was working for an examination, he found time to finish an opera in two acts, 'Zwei Nächte in Venedig,' which was privately performed. He went through the Schleswig-Holstein campaign, and on his return to Brunswick set to work upon an opera on the subject of 'Waverley.' This more ambitious work in five acts was finished in 1852, and was shown to Hauptmann, who was so pleased with it that he persuaded Holstein to leave the army and devote himself to art. From 1853-56, therefore, with a considerable interval occasioned by ill-health, he studied at Leipzig, and produced several very promising works, among them a concert overture, 'Loreley.' He went to Rome in the winter of 1856-57, and continued his studies there, and subsequently at Berlin and Paris. In 1869 a new opera, 'Die Haideschacht,' was produced with success at Dresden, and was heard on all the principal stages of Germany. A comic opera, 'Die Erbe von Morley,' was produced in 1872 at Leipzig, and in 1876 yet another, 'Die Hochländer,' was given at Mannheim. Besides the dramatic works he left a posthumous overture, 'Frau Aventure,' a solo from Schiller's 'Braut von Messina,' and 'Beatrice,' a scena for soprano with orchestra. M.

HOLYOKE, SAMUEL, A.M. (b. Boxford, Mass., U.S.A., 1771; d. Concord, N.H., U.S.A., 1816), an American teacher and composer of both vocal and instrumental music. He published Harmonia Americana (printed in type at Boston, 1791)—a collection of hymn-tunes and other pieces; The Instrumental Assistant (vol. i. 1806, vol. ii. 1807, Exeter, N.H.); The Columbian Repository of Sacred Harmony (Exeter, N.H., 1809), a very voluminous work; and, with Oliver Holden, The Massachusetts Compiler. G.

HOLZ, KARL (b. Vienna, 1798; d. there, Nov. 9, 1858), an Austrian official, able violinist, and devoted lover of music. In 1824 he became one of Schuppanzigh's quartet party, and an active member of the direction of Gebauer's Spirituel Concerte, in which he led the first violins. He was a jovial, pleasant fellow, devoted heart and soul to Beethoven, who dubbed him 'Mahagoni-Holz,'¹ and often invited him to dinner, where he took more than his share of his entertainer's wine—'a hard drinker, between ourselves,' says Beethoven.² Possibly drink was not his only failing, if we may so interpret the 'Monsieur terrible amoureux' of another letter of Beethoven's.³

In 1826 Beethoven informed him by letter⁴ that he had chosen him for his biographer, in the confidence that whatever information might be given him for that purpose would be accurately communicated to the world. According to Schindler, Beethoven afterwards repented of this arrangement. In 1843 Holz made over his rights to Gassner of Carlsruhe, but nothing was done.

One of the last times that Beethoven's pen touched the paper before he took to his death-bed was to add his signature and a line of music (in a strange scale) to a note of his dictation to Holz, 'Dec. 1826' (Nohl, Letters, 385):

C. F. P.

HOLZBAUER, IGNAZ (b. Vienna, 1711; d. Mannheim, Apr. 7, 1783), composer. He was a chorister in St. Stephen's Church, and was destined for the law, but devoted all his spare time to music, and by study of Fux's Gradus made himself a good contrapuntist. On Fux's advice he went to Italy, running away from the Prince of Tour and Taxis to whom he was secretary at Laybach; but a fever, caught at Venice, obliged him to return. He next became Kapellmeister to Count Rottal in Moravia, and while there married. Returning to Vienna in 1745, the court theatre engaged him as director of music, and his wife as singer. In 1747 they started on a tour in Italy, and in 1751 he became first Kapellmeister to the Duke of Wurtemberg at Stuttgart. In 1753 his pastoral opera 'Il figlio delle selve' (Schwetzlingen) procured him the appointment of Kapellmeister to the Elector Palatine at Mannheim. It was during this time that the Mannheim orchestra attained that excellence of performance which made it famous, though it is difficult to say how much of this was due to Holzbauer and how much to Cannabich the leader. In 1757 he produced 'Nitteti' at Turin with great success, and in the following year his best work, 'Alessandro nell'Indie' was well received at Milan. In 1776 he composed his only German opera, 'Günther von Schwarzbürg' (Mannheim), which was brilliantly successful. When the orchestra was transferred to Munich, Holzbauer remained at Mannheim; he was entirely deaf for some years before his death. He composed other operas besides those mentioned, and church and instrumental music (see Q.-L. for list), all now forgotten, though not without value in their day, as we may judge from the testimony of Mozart, no lenient critic:

'I heard to-day a Mass of Holzbauer's, which is still good although twenty-six years old. He writes very well, in a good church style; the vocal and instrumental parts go well together, and his fugues are good.' (Letter, Nov. 4. 1777.)

And again:

'Holzbauer's music' (in "Günther") 'is very beautiful—too good for the libretto. It is wonderful that so old a man has so much spirit, for you can't imagine how much fire there is in the music.' (Nov. 14-16, 1777.)

He evidently behaved well to Mozart, without any of the jealousy which he too often generated. The score of 'Günther von Schwarzbürg' is printed in the D.D.T., vols. viii. and ix., and a thematic list of 65 symphonies is given in D.T.B., Jhrg. iii. vol. i. M. C. C.

HOLZBLASINSTRUMENTE (Ger.), the 'wood-wind' department of the orchestra.

HOLZBOGEN, JOHANN GEORG (d. Munich, Nov. 7, 1775), an excellent violinist, a pupil of Tartini c. 1753. After his return to Munich he was appointed court Konzertmeister in 1762. Burney, who heard him, praises his brilliant technique as well as his temperament. On June 19 and 22, 1770, he gave concerts at Frankfurt-on-M. with Leitgeb, the horn virtuoso. Gerber (1) mentions a number of his compositions; Eitner (Q.-L.) could only trace a symphony a 4, and a trio and nocturne for 2 violins and violoncello. E. v. d. s.

HOMBERGER, PAUL (b. 1560; d. Ratisbon, Nov. 19, 1634), a pupil of Giov. Gabrieli, cantor and teacher in 1601. He composed Psalmodia Vespertinae, MS. 1607, and a large number of occasional songs in parts and for single voices (Q.-L.).

HOMER, LOUISE (née BEATTY, b. Pittsburg, U.S.A., 1874), operatic contralto. She studied music in Philadelphia and Boston: singing, etc., in Paris with Fidèle Koenig and Paul Lhérie, and married the composer, Sidney Homer, in 1895. She gained her early experience in opera in France, making her début in 1898 at Vichy as Leonora in 'La favorita.' Engaged by Maurice Grau for Covent Garden, she sang there in 1899-1900, appearing first in the small part of Lola in 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' and later as one of the Valkyries. After a season at the Brussels Monnaie she returned to America, and made her début there at San Francisco as Amneris in 1900. Subsequently she entered upon a long and successful career at the Metropolitan, New York. It was there that her fine voice developed its full beauty and power, chiefly for a couple of years in Italian and French operas, then in the leading contralto rôles of Wagnerian music-drama, Orfeo, the Witches in 'Hänsel und Gretel' and 'Königskinder,' Dame Quickly in Verdi's 'Falstaff,' etc. She also earned a high reputation in oratorio and as soloist with the principal American orchestras.

HOMER, SYDNEY (b. Boston, Dec. 9, 1864), studied with Chadwick at Boston and also with Rheinberger and others at Munich and Leipzig. Returning to America he taught and lectured in Boston until in 1900 he removed to New York. He has been exceedingly successful as a composer of songs, some of which have become very popular in America. (See Amer. Supp.)

HOMILIUS, GOTTFRIED AUGUST (b. Rosenthal, Saxony, Feb. 2, 1714; d. June 2, 1785), a pupil of J. S. Bach, and master of Adam Hiller. He matriculated at the university of Leipzig in 1735; in 1742 he became organist of the Frauenkirche in Dresden, and in 1755 director of the music in the three principal churches there, and cantor of the Kreuzschule, the choir of which he brought to a high pitch of excellence. He enjoyed a considerable reputation among his contemporaries as an organist, especially for his skill in registration. He was an industrious composer, and in the latter part of the 18th century his larger church works were ranked very high. His numerous sacred compositions are characterised by a peculiarly happy vein of melody, and, in accordance with the taste of the day, an avoidance of polyphonic treatment of the parts. On the other hand, it is difficult to compare his music with more modern homophonic compositions. His treatment of his themes—as is the case throughout this period in which Bach's influence was paramount—is always interesting, and sometimes masterly. His most important works are his motets, model compositions of the kind. Little of his music has been printed, but he was very liberal in allowing copies of his works to be taken. Of his 32 motets some excellent examples are to be found in his pupil J. A. Hiller's 'Vierstimmige Motetten,' in Sander's 'Heilige Caecilia' (Berlin, 1818-19), Weeber's 'Kirchliche Chorgesänge' (Stuttgart, 1857), and Trautwein's 'Auswahl.' Specimens of his organ works are to be found in Körner's Orgelvirtuos. A Pater Noster for four voices, fully bearing out the description of his style just given, is printed in Hullah's 'Vocal Scores.' His published works include, a 'Passions-Cantate' (1775); a Christmas oratorio, 'Die Freude der Hirten über die Geburt Jesu' (1777); 'Sechs deutsche Arien für Freunde ernsthafter Gesänge' (1786) and a 'Weihnachtsmotette.' Those still in MS. are much more numerous, and comprise a course of church music for Sundays and festivals; several Passions, including one according to St. Mark, perhaps his best work; a 'Choralbuch' containing 167 chorales; and finally organ music, consisting of fugues, chorales with variations, and trios. (See the article on him by Spitta in the Allgem. deutsche Biographie, and the Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwiss., vol. 10, No. 3, p. 346, where an extensive list of his works is to be found.) A. M.

HOMOPHONY (ὁμοφωνός), voices or instruments sounding alike—unison. The term is sometimes applied to music written in what is called the monodic style. (See MONODY.) But it is now ordinarily employed for music in plain harmony, the parts all sounding together, as opposed to the polyphonic treatment, in which the several voices or parts move independently of each other or in imitation. (Cf. COUNTERPOINT and POLYPHONY.) G.

HONAUER, LEONZI, lived in Paris c. 1760, where a large number of his compositions for chamber music, especially harpsichord sonatas with and without accompaniment, were published between 1760–70. Some of his works (including sonatas, together with Schobert) appeared in London about that time (Q.-L.).

HONDT, GHEERKIN (GERARD) DE, choir-master (c. 1539) at Hertogenbosch, where he composed motets in honour of the confrérie. Only a limited number of his compositions have so far been recovered, some dated 1542, and these are declared so masterly in form and so fresh in conception that they defy their age (Q.-L.; Fétis).

HONEGGER, ARTHUR (b. Havre, Mar. 10, 1892), composer. Although a member of the group of French musicians known as the 'Six,' he is of Swiss parentage. He began by studying harmony with R. Ch. Martin, and the violin with Capet, and subsequently spent two years at the Conservatoire of Zürich. In 1912 he returned to France and entered the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied harmony, counterpoint and fugue under Gédalge and Widor, and conducting under Vincent d'Indy. Honegger continues to live in France, but frequently spends the summer months in the country of his origin, chiefly at Zürich.

Honegger's first work of importance, a sonata for violin and piano, appeared in 1916, and the following year saw the production of a string quartet and two orchestral works, 'Le Chant de Nigamon' and the prelude to 'Aglavaine et Sélysette.' In Dec. 1918, the Théâtre du Vieux-Colombier in Paris produced the masque 'Le Dit des jeux du monde,' the first work on a large scale which fully revealed the young composer's individuality. In 1919 followed a second sonata for violin and piano, and the incidental music to Max Jacob's 'La Mort de Sainte-Almène.' The year 1920 proved a year of exceptional productivity, for it saw not only the appearance of three new sonatas (for viola and piano, violoncello and piano and 2 violins unaccompanied) and the 'Pastorale d'été' for small orchestra, which was awarded the 'Prix Verley,' but also the production, at the Autumn

Salon, of the ballet 'Vérité et mensonge.' To 1921 belong the pantomimic symphony 'Horace victorieux' and the incidental music for 'Le Roi David,' a play by the Swiss poet René Morax, produced at Mézières (Switzerland) on June 12. In 1922, Honegger was working at music for André Gide's 'Saul,' and in 1923 at a score intended for a production of Shakespeare's Tempest. The chief work of 1924 is the 'Pacific No. 231,' an orchestral description of a steam engine, and this was followed by 'Judith,' another dramatic work for the Mézières theatre. Apart from these larger works, Honegger has written a number of piano and organ pieces, songs and chamber works.

Arthur Honegger attaches much importance to questions of musical structure and to a complex polyphonic style, as distinct from harmony and colour. He inclines towards grave and tragic subjects and austere, ample forms. His musical texture is for the most part elaborately contrapuntal, proceeding in melodic lines, the convergence of which produces a rich and varied harmonic fabric of a peculiarly harsh polytonality. Literary or pictorial aspects, even in the case of his music for the stage, are always thrust into the background in favour of a purely musical, symphonic element.

Honegger devoted more time to hard study than most of his contemporaries, with the result that he developed comparatively slowly. In his early works his wrestling with the problems of medium and form betrays itself in the subordination of his imagination to such technical considerations, and it was not until he had reached the age of 26 that he succeeded in expressing himself convincingly within the formal restrictions he had set himself. In 'Le Dit des jeux du monde,' which dates from that time, he also showed that he is not insensible to the value of new discoveries in the domain of orchestral colour. The work is scored for a string nonet, flute, trumpet and percussion only, while the orchestra of 'Le Roi David' consists of wood-wind, brass, double bass, piano and harmonium, the composer gaining remarkably full and varied effects in both cases. A concert version of 'Le Roi David,' virtually an oratorio, was produced in the Coliseum at Rome in March 1926, and later in the year repeated at Zürich in the festival of the Int. Soc. for Contemporary Music. E. B.

HONORIO, ROMUALDO, a 17th-century monk of the Calmaldolenses, composed 2 books of masses (Venice, 1642, 1645), 'Concerti a doi tre e quattro voci' with some psalms in 4 and 5 parts (1638), some songs in collective volumes, etc. (See Q.-L.)

HOOK, JAMES (b. Norwich, June 3, 1746; d. Boulogne. 1827), studied music under Garland, organist of the cathedral. When a very young man he came to London and composed some songs which were sung at Richmond and Ranelagh, and which he published as his op. 1. In 1769 he was engaged at Marylebone Gardens as organist and composer, and continued there until 1773. In 1774 he was engaged at Vauxhall Gardens in the same capacities, and continued there until 1820. He was for long organist of St. John's, Horsleydown. During his engagements at Marylebone and Vauxhall he is said to have composed upwards of 2000 songs, cantatas, catches, etc. He gained prize medals at the Catch Club in 1772, for his catch, 'One morning Dame Turner,' and in 1780 for 'Come, kiss me, dear Dolly.' In 1776 Hook brought out 'The Ascension,' an oratorio. He composed the music for the following dramatic pieces:

'Dido,' 1771; 'The Divorce,' composed in 1771 for Marylebone, but not produced until 1781 at Drury Lane; 'Trick upon Trick,' 'Il Dilettante,' 'Country Courtship,' and 'Cupid's Revenge,' 1772; 'Apollo and Daphne,' 1773; 'The Fair Peruvian,' 1776; 'The Lady of the Manor,' 1778; 'William and Nancy,' 1779; 'Too civil by half,' 1783; 'The Double Disguise,' 1784; 'The Triumph of Beauty,' 1786; 'Jack of Newbury,' 1795; 'Diamond cut Diamond,' 1797; 'Wilmore Castle,' 1800; 'The Soldier's Return,' 1805; 'Tegell,' 'The Invisible Girl,' and 'Catch him who can,' 1806; 'Music Mad' and 'The Fortunes,' 1807; 'The Siege of St. Quintin,' 1808; 'Killing no Murder' and 'Safe and Sound,' 1809. Besides these he composed a number of odes, such as that on the return of peace, 1783, and music for the following, the dates of production of which are uncertain: 'The Wedding of Love and Virtue,' 'The Cryer of Vauxhall,' 'The Pledge,' 'Coralie,' 'Blanche and Edgar,' and 'The Country Wake.'

Many of his songs were published in collections, as 'The Feast of Anacreon,' 'Hours of Love,' etc., but the greater number were issued singly. Hook composed several concertos for the organ or harpsichord, and sonatas for the pianoforte, and was author of Guida di musica, a book of instruction for the pianoforte. Several of his glees, catches and rounds are printed in Warren's Collections.

Several members of Hook's family were eminent in literature. His first wife, Miss Madden (d. Oct. 19, 1795), was authoress of 'The Double Disguise.' His son, James Hook, D.D., Dean of Worcester (b. 1772; d. 1828), was author of the words of 'Jack of Newbury,' 'Diamond cut Diamond,' etc. His younger son, Theodore Edward (b. 1788; d. 1841), was a well-known humorist; and his grandson, Walter Farquhar Hook, D.D., Dean of Chichester (b. 1798; d. 1875), son of James, was a famous divine. W. H. H.

HOOPER, (1) EDMUND (b. Halberton, Devon, c. 1553; d. July 14, 1621), is said to have been a chorister in Exeter Cathedral; he became connected with the choir of Westminster Abbey about 1582, and on Dec. 3, 1588, was appointed master of the children. He was one of the ten composers who harmonised the tunes for 'The Whole Booke of Psalms,' published by East in 1592. He was employed similarly by Ravenscroft for his Psalter (1621) and two of his harmonisations for this were included in Sternhold and Hopkins's 'Whole Book of Psalms' (1721) (see PSALTER). On Mar. 1, 1603/04, he was sworn a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and on May 9, 1606, was appointed organist of Westminster Abbey. Three anthems by him are printed in Barnard's collection, and six others, and a set of Preces, Psalms and Responses are contained in Barnard's MS. collections in the R.C.M., and two anthems in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MSS. 7337 and 7340). He contributed two pieces to Leighton's 'Teares or Lamentacions,' 1614, and another to Thomas Myriell's 'Tristitia remedium' (1616). An Almaine and Coranto by him are in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book' (see VIRGINAL MUSIC). He was buried July 16, 1621, in the cloisters of Westminster.

His eldest son, (2) JAMES (d. Dec. 1651), was a lay-vicar of Westminster.

The following is a list of his church music in MS.:

HOPKINS, a family of English musicians, several of whom were distinguished organists. The head of the family was (1) EDWARD (b. 1757; d. 1790), a horn-player, whose two sons were (2) GEORGE (d. 1869), clarinetist, and (3) EDWARD (d. 1859), bandmaster of the Scots Guards.

George Hopkins had two sons (4) and (5) as follows:

(4) EDWARD JOHN (b. Westminster, June 30, 1818; d. London, Feb. 4, 1901) was for 55 years organist of the Temple Church, London, the composer of much church music, and an authority on organ construction, on which subject he was an important contributor to the first edition of this Dictionary.

He became in 1826 a chorister of the Chapel Royal under William Hawes. On quitting the choir in 1833 he studied under Thomas Forbes Walmisley. In 1834 he was chosen organist of Mitcham Church, in 1838 organist of St. Peter's, Islington, and in 1841 of St. Luke's, Berwick Street. In 1843 he was appointed organist of the Temple Church, the musical service of which under his care acquired great reputation. As an accompanist he was quite unrivalled. Hopkins composed many church services, anthems, chants and hymn tunes. Many of the last named hold an assured place in the repertory of English Church music. His anthems 'Out of the deep' and 'God is gone up' obtained the Gresham prize medals in 1838 and in 1840 respectively. He was also composer of 'May day' (duet) and 'Welcome' (trio), and author of The Organ, its History and Construction, an excellent treatise published in conjunction with Dr. Rimbault's History of the Organ in 1855; 2nd edit. 1870; 3rd edit. 1877. His articles on organ construction were an important feature of the first edition of this Dictionary. He edited Bennet's 'Madrigals,' and Weelkes's 'First Set of Madrigals' for the Musical Antiquarian Society, and the musical portion of 'The Temple Church Choral Service.' He received the degree of Mus.D. from the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1882. He had sung at the coronation of William IV. in 1831, and he lived to join the choir at the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria in 1897. On the completion of his fifty years' service as organist of the Temple, in May 1893, he had a presentation from the Benchers. He retired in 1898. He is buried in Hamstead Cemetery.

(5) JOHN (b. Westminster, Apr. 30, 1822; d. Rochester, Aug. 27, 1900), was a chorister of St. Paul's from Sept. 1831 to Sept. 1838. In Aug. 1838 (before quitting the choir) he was appointed to succeed his brother as organist of Mitcham Church. He afterwards became successively organist of St. Stephen's, Islington, June 1839; St. Benet's, Paul's Wharf, July 1841; Trinity Church, Islington, May 1843; St. Mark's, Jersey, Feb. 1845; St. Michael's, Chester Square, 1846; and Epsom Church, Jan. 1854. In May 1856 he succeeded his cousin, John Larkin Hopkins (6), as organist of Rochester Cathedral, a post which he held till his death. John Hopkins composed services, anthems, chants, hymn tunes, voluntaries, pianoforte sketches, songs and partsongs, a few of which have been published.

The family of Edward (2) included two sons and three daughters. Both the sons were organists. One of them, (6) JOHN LARKIN (b. Westminster, Nov. 25, 1820; d. Ventnor, Apr. 25, 1873), was a chorister of Westminster Abbey under James Turle. In 1841 he succeeded Ralph Banks as organist of Rochester. In 1842 he graduated Mus.B. at Cambridge. In 1856 he removed to Cambridge on being appointed organist to Trinity College and to the University. He proceeded Mus.D.¹ in 1867. He composed many services and anthems, and published a collection of his anthems. In 1847 he edited, in conjunction with the Rev. S. Shepherd, a collection of the Words of Anthems used in Rochester Cathedral.

Of the daughters of Edward (2) one, Sophia, married W. H. HANN (q.v.), the viola-player, another, Louisa, married Richard Lloyd and became the mother of Edward LLOYD (q.v.).

HOPKINSON, FRANCIS (b. Philadelphia, Penn., U.S.A., Sept. 21, 1737; d. there, May 9, 1791), was the composer of the first piece of secular music produced in America, the song 'My Days have been so Wondrous Free,' 1759. Although a lawyer by profession, he was deeply interested in music and a good player of the harpsichord as well as a composer. He composed several other songs (eight were published in a collection in 1788), and an instrumental march is attributed to him. He devised an improved method of quilling harpsichords (he is the 'English mechanic' mentioned by Pétis under his name in the Biographie universelle), provided Franklin's harmonica with a keyboard and invented a kind of metronome. He was active in political life, and was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence and a member of the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States.

HOPKINSON. The greater part of the pianoforte-making of this country has centred in London, and the firm of J. & J. Hopkinson—though founded and at first carried on exclusively at Leeds—cannot now be quoted as an exception. John Hopkinson established his workshops in Leeds in 1835, and removed them to London in 1846. The warerooms were at first in Soho Square, and were in 1856 removed to Regent Street, where the business was carried on until 1882, when it was removed to 95 New Bond Street. From 1892–1900 the business was carried on at 34 Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, and in the latter year it was moved back to the present address, 84 New Bond Street. Branch show-rooms at Kilburn were opened in 1900. From 1886–95 a music-publishing business was carried on in addition to the pianoforte trade. Hopkinson patented a repetition action for a grand pianoforte in 1850, and in 1862 he further patented a 'harmonic pedal,' producing the octave harmonics from the strings by the contact, at the exact half of the vibrating length, of a very slender strip of felt governed by a special pedal. The firm gained high distinction at the Exhibitions of 1862 and 1878—at the latter the Great Gold Medal. A similar distinction was conferred at the Music and Inventions Exhibitions of 1885. John Hopkinson retired in 1869, leaving his brother, James Hopkinson, the first place in the business. The latter's son, John, was a director of the company formed in 1895.

Later the firm was taken over by the Vincent Music Company, Ltd.

HOPPER, a name applied to the jack or escapement lever in the action of a pianoforte, or to the escapement lever with its backpiece, regulating screw, etc., complete. (See GRASS-HOPPER.) It is so named because this lever hops out of the notch against which its thrust has been directed, allowing the hammer to rebound, and leaving the string free to vibrate.

HORATIO DE PARMA is praised by Mau-gars, in a letter dated Rome, Oct. 1, 1639, as one who did wonders on the viola da gamba during the late 16th century. It appears that his real name was Bassani, and Scipio Cerreto mentions him in 1601 as a Neapolitan viol-player who was then dead. A few of his pieces, in MS., are in the B.M. Library (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello).

HORN, French Horn, (1) HAND HORN (Fr. cor, cor de chasse; Ger. Horn, Waldhorn; Ital. corno, corno di caccia; (2) VALVE HORN (Fr. cor-à-pistons; Ger. Ventilhorn; Ital. corno ventile). For illustration of the hand horn see PLATE LXXXIII., for the valve horn see PLATE LXXXIV.

The orchestral horn with or without valves is a brass instrument which is characterised by its tube coiled in circular form expanding into a wide bell and by being played with a funnel-shaped mouthpiece.

The horn in F, which appears to have been its pitch when it was first introduced into the orchestra, and which is still the pitch in which it is most used in England, is a tube of about 12 feet in length, including the 'F-crook.' At the end in which the mouthpiece is inserted its diameter is about a quarter of an inch, and the conical expansion, which, in proportion to its length, is much more gradual than on instruments of the bugle type, rapidly increases, or flanges out, at the bell mouth to a rim of about eleven inches diameter. The general lines of the cone are hyperbolic, but a certain portion of the tubing is cylindrical, owing to the provision to be made for changing the pitch by crooks or slides. The mouthpiece is about five-eighths of an inch across inside the rim, and its 'cup' is of a deep funnel-shape, in this respect differing greatly from the cup of the trumpet mouthpiece, which is almost hemispherical. The mouthpieces of bugles, cornets and saxhorns are intermediate in character between these two. (See MOUTHPIECE.)

Such an instrument as described is capable of giving the notes of the harmonic series up to about the sixteenth, although the prime is practically useless, and those above the twelfth are difficult. As a means of effecting slight changes of pitch for tuning purposes the instrument is fitted with a pair of slides connected by a U-shaped bow, and in some cases the various lengths of tube for the different pitches required are fitted to supplementary slides. The more usual construction, however, is one in which the body of the horn terminates in a conical ferrule at a length of about 90 inches from the rim of the bell. Into this ferrule various crooks or bent tubes fit, each one of which is of the size to receive the mouthpiece at its smaller end.

The notation used is that which represents the true sounds of an alto horn pitched in the 8-foot C. The parts are written in the treble clef, with the exception of occasional low notes: these are written in the bass clef, and formerly always an octave lower than they sound, thus (the prime, or first note of the harmonic series, which is barely obtainable, being omitted):

The horn is treated as a transposing instrument, and therefore the various crooks give sounds lower than the notation, according to the following table:

Horn in	Transposes
B \flat alto	a tone
A \natural	a minor third
A \flat	a major third
G	a perfect fourth
F	a perfect fifth
E \flat	a minor sixth
E \natural	a major sixth
D	a minor seventh
C	a major seventh
B \flat basso	a major ninth and to these are sometimes added crooks for A \natural and A \flat basso.

The following examples will serve to illustrate the relationship between the notation and the sounds produced: the prime being omitted in each case, the range of compass shown extends from the second to the tenth harmonic:

NOTES AS WRITTEN.

ACTUAL SOUNDS PRODUCED.

Writing out the scale fully for the proper tones from No. 1 to No. 16 we have the following:

Harmonic Series—

The notes Nos. 7 and 14 in the series are slightly flatter than shown by the notation, and the notes Nos. 11 and 13 cannot be strictly represented on the staff: their true pitch in each case lies between the notes under the brackets. The tone of the horn being very flexible, the flatness of the notes Nos. 7 and 14 can be corrected by the pressure of the lip, and by a slight degree of 'hand-stopping' a good F can be obtained from No. 11, and a good A \flat from No. 13. A is obtained from Nos. 7 and 14 by somewhat less stopping than is required for a semitone.

The method of stopping the horn is not by introducing the closed fist into the bell, but the open hand, with the fingers close together, some way up the bore. By drawing the fingers back, the natural sounds are again produced. The degree in which the horn is stopped is not the same for all stopped notes, there being half and whole stopping. In the first, by raising the hand the bell alone is, as it were, closed; in the second the hand is introduced as far as if it were intended almost to prevent the passage of air. The 'half-stop' is used to depress an open note by a semitone, and the 'whole-stop' in like manner gives a tone; more than this in the ordinary way cannot be done by stopping. In view of the fact that it has been frequently stated that stopping raises the pitch instead of lowering it, a brief explanation of the matter is necessary.

It is very easily proved that the insertion of the hand to a very limited extent in the bell-mouth of a wind instrument slightly flattens its pitch, and any other obstruction has the same effect; and it would appear to follow that an increase of the obstruction must increase the amount of that effect. Now, assume that by the introduction of the hand a note is obtained between C and D, the 8th and 9th harmonics: the question arises, Is the new note C sharpened to C \sharp , or D flattened to D \flat ? It seems unreasonable to assert that a course, which, when operating to a slight extent, undoubtedly causes flattening, should, when the extent is increased, suddenly cause sharpening; and probably this opinion would never have arisen were it not that, with the same insertion of the hand, a note a semitone higher than the 4th harmonic (or the C an octave lower than the 8th) can be produced, and many other notes also.

The real cause of the effect appears to be this: the introduction of the hand so modifies the general form of the bell-mouth as to give rise to an inharmonic, or disturbed harmonic, series of tones. In certain simple cases the possibility of such a series is easily proved by direct experiment, but the extreme flexibility of the horn makes the proof more difficult on this particular instrument. However, it is submitted that the apparent sharpening of the two C's, the 4th and 8th harmonics, the notes chosen for illustration, is really the production of the 5th and 9th proper tones, of a new inharmonic, or distorted scale.¹

Between the stopped or 'hand notes' and the open notes there is an obvious difference in character and quality which it is impossible wholly to suppress, but which may be sufficiently modified so as not to offend the ear. This object is attained by blowing the open notes softly, so as to reduce the contrast between their sonorousness and the closed or 'stuffed' (étouffé) character of those modified by means of the hand. But, on the other hand, in rapid melodic passages, the alternation of open and stopped notes tends to produce uncertainty and unevenness.

The introduction of the VALVE (q.v.) whereby the length of the tube could be instantaneously altered revolutionised both playing and writing for the horn. The three valves have placed a complete chromatic scale of even tone-quality at the service of the composer. The introduction of the valve-horn into the orchestra was gradual and there are scores in which parts are written for both types of instruments. Halévy, the first to use valve-horns, writes for both in 'La Juive,' and Wagner did the same in his early operas. The hand-horn is considered to be superior in that its lightness and vibratile power, together with the absence of abrupt bends and sinuosities in the bore, adds materially to the brilliancy of the tone. It would be as well if the older instrument could always be used for the performance of classical music.

The stopped notes on the valve-horn are of course freely used, produced either by the hand or by the introduction of a mute into the bell. This mute is usually made of metal, pear-shaped, and pierced axially for free passage of air, and is so designed as not to alter the pitch.

The part so to be played is usually marked con sordino (Ger. mit Dämpfer or gedämpft). These notes are piano tones. When great lip-pressure is used, their quality changes greatly, and the composer's intentions should be indicated by the placing of a small cross over the note with the word stopped (Fr. cui-vré or sons bouchés; Ger. gestopft).

Up to the time of Beethoven two horns were customary in the orchestra. He introduced three into the 'Eroica' symphony and later frequently used four. Mozart, however, had already used four in 'Idomeneo,' Cherubini also in 'Lodoiska' and Méhul in 'Mélidore et Phrosine.' Six and even eight horns are now commonly in request.

The valve-horn being normally provided with the 'F-crook' is written for as a transposing instrument, the part sounding a fifth lower. The practice is growing of giving the part a key-signature one flat less or one sharp more than the key of the movement. This saves the writing of accidentals and is convenient for the player, who, having to sense mentally the note before playing it, is helped by the indication of key or tonality in so far as such is suggested by the music. It is better nowadays when using the bass clef for the deep notes to write them in their proper octave.

HISTORY.—In popular language all instruments with cupped mouthpieces are frequently called either horns or trumpets. The two terms, however, even when used in the broadest sense, are not properly interchangeable, for 'horn,' as signifying any instrument having its origin in a natural horn, may be held to include the trumpet, but 'trumpet,' having a much more limited significance, cannot include the horn. By withdrawing trumpets (including with them, for this purpose, trombones) from the whole group of lip-blown instruments, we have left under the term horn a large variety of wind instruments, the mutual relationship and developments of which can be easily understood, and if we speak of horns and trumpets and not of horns or trumpets, we are using terms which can be defined with some accuracy, and which afford a useful means of classifying the two main divisions of brass instruments. (See WIND INSTRUMENTS.)

Among primitive races of men, the convenience both in war and the chase of some means of signalling more powerful than that afforded by the human voice must have led to the appreciation of some rude instrument fashioned from a conch-shell, an ox-horn, or an elephant's tusk. The interior form of all these objects is approximately conical, and such a tube, when blown with the lips at the small end, gives a succession of notes approximately in the harmonic series, the exact agreement between the notes obtained and this series depending chiefly upon the precise internal form of the horn. Other things being equal, the better the intonation of the horn, the greater is the ease of blowing, and the greater its carrying power; it is, therefore, not unreasonable to suppose that the more powerful horns would be particularly prized, and men's ears would become accustomed to the true intervals of the common chord. The gradual evolution of the best signalling instrument is, therefore, closely connected with music itself. This power of giving the common chord cannot be realised, however, on very short horns, and the instrument must be from three to four feet long for the first six harmonics. These on a horn of about four feet long are c, c', g', c'', e'', g''.

Horns of metal (see BUCCINA; CORNU) were used in the Roman armies, and also by the Greeks and other more ancient nations. Large war-horns (somewhat improperly called trumpets) were also used by the Norsemen, and drawings of interesting specimens of these are given in Du Chaillu's work, The Viking Age.

Coming to mediæval times, we find the bugle carried by knights was often made of ivory, richly carved, and known as the 'oliphant,' and various forms of forer's or hunting horns were in use. There were also Burgmote horns, the property of town corporations, and horns used for transferring inheritances in connexion with feudal proprietorship.

From these various instruments used either in war, in the chase, or for purely ceremonial purposes, our modern horns have grown. The ordinary fox-hunter's horn agrees most closely with a natural horn, but has no musical value. Longer than this are the various post- and coach-horns, on the best of which bugle-calls can be given. The military BUGLE (q.v.) ranks in this group. The SAXHORNS (q.v.) are essentially bugles, but differentiated by the introduction of valves from horns of the simple type. The orchestral or French horn in its most simple form, without valves, is the outcome of the longer horns used in hunting. The short horns or bugles were by degrees lengthened, the bore reduced in diameter, and the inconvenience of a long horn, especially on horseback, obviated by bending the instruments into one or more circular turns. In this form it is easily carried over the shoulder, and is known as the Cor de chasse or Waldhorn. It is difficult to say at what precise date this horn superseded the more ancient cornet of wood, horn or ivory, which was more akin to the bugle, and it is probable that all were used contemporaneously. Special hunting calls and fanfares in four and five distinct parts for horns in F as used by the huntsmen of the German princes are extant, and the gradual development of the instrument in France may be gathered from the following notes.

Louis XI. of France ordered the statue on his tomb to be dressed in the costume of a hunter with his cornet at his side. Dufouilloux dedicated a treatise on Venery to Charles IX., who had himself written a similar work. He therein praises the cornet, and imitates its sound by the word tran. In the woodcuts contained in his work, and in pictures of Louis XI.'s projected monument, the cornet appears to have only a single ring or spiral; being thus competent to produce only a few notes. In the edition of Dufouilloux published in 1628, however, the king and his lords are represented as having cornets with a second half-circle in the middle. Louis XIII., who was extremely fond of hunting the fox, invented a call, to distinguish that animal, containing several different notes, which show that for their proper intonation the instrument itself must have made progress, and increased in length. Louis XV., however, and his master of the hunt, M. de Dampierre, composed and selected the greater number of calls and fanfares used in the royal hunt, which are still employed up to the present time.¹

Three kinds of hunting airs are to be made out. (1) Calls (tons de chasse), of which there are about thirty-one. These are intended to cheer on the hounds, to give warning, to call for aid, and to indicate the circumstances of the hunt. (2) Fanfares, of which there is one for each animal, and several for the stag, according to his age and antlers. (3) Fancy airs performed as signs of joy or after a successful hunting.

The best-known calls are the Réveillée, the Lancé and Relancé; the Hourvari, or default; the Débuché; the Volcelest (when the fresh foot-mark of the animal is found); the Halali, and the Mort. Of fanfares there are the Royale, sounded for a stag of ten points—invented by Louis XV.; the petite Royale, sounded for the wild boar; various others distinguishing the wolf, fox, weasel and hare; and the Fanfare de St. Hubert, as the patron saint of hunting, only sounded on his day. (3) The third series approximates more than the others to regular musical performances, and furnishes the link between the use of the horn as a signal and as a melodious instrument. These airs are many and various, named after royal personages or distinguished hunters. Donner du cor is the term for sounding the horn.

The players of these hunting airs and calls, and the companies who heard them, thus became practically acquainted with the possibilities of their instruments both in melody and harmony. Towards the close of the 17th century the coiling of the huntsman's horn, which was sufficiently large to be worn obliquely round the body, resting on one shoulder and passing under the opposite arm, was modified so as to give the proportions of the orchestral horn as we now know it. The records of the Royal Theatre of Dresden show that there were two horns in the orchestra in 1711. It was introduced into the Imperial Opera at Vienna from 1712–40, and it appears that its use was then discontinued for a time. It was much objected to when first heard in the orchestra, as coarse and vulgar; and severe strictures were indulged in at the introduction of a rude instrument of the chase among more refined sources of sound, such as the violins and oboe.

In 1717 Lady Mary Wortley Montagu referred to the fondness of the Viennese for it, and said she considered it as a 'deafening noise.'

In consequence of this prejudice, when the horn was originally transferred in Germany from the hunting-field to the orchestra, it was suggested to introduce a mute or damper into the bell, for the purpose of softening the tone; this was at first made of wood, and afterwards of card-board. It was the custom to produce a like effect in the oboe by filling the bell, made globular for the purpose, with cotton-wool; a plan which suggested to Hampl, a celebrated horn-player at the court of Dresden about the year 1770, to do the same with the horn. To his surprise, the insertion of the pad of cotton lowered the pitch of the instrument by a semitone. Struck with the result, he employed his hand instead of the pad, and discovered the first and original method by which the intervals between the harmonic series of open notes could be partially bridged over. Hence the instrument itself came to be called the 'hand-horn.' Sir John Hawkins mentions a concerto played by an artist named Spandau with the help of the hand notes in 1773, 'attempering the sound by the application of his fingers in the different parts of the tube.' In France it was introduced into the orchestra by Campra in the opera 'Achille et Déidamie' in 1735, and probably before that date by Lully; in 1759 Rameau used a couple of hunting-horns in one of his operas. The horn was, however, first used in England as early as 1720 by the opera band in the Haymarket, in Handel's 'Radamisto.'

It may be noted that the only horn of which Praetorius gives an illustration in his Syntagma (published in 1618) is the closely coiled 'Jäger-trommet.' The horns of that period, whether coiled thus closely or in a wide circle to go over the shoulder, were not differentiated so distinctly from the trumpet as they subsequently were, and we find that about a century elapsed from the time of Praetorius to the time when, after modifications of the conical bore and of the mouthpiece, the instrument was fitted to take its place in the orchestra with its general proportions established substantially as we now have them.

HORN, JOHANN KASPAR (b. Feldsperg, Austria, 2nd half of 17th cent.), composed a large quantity of allemandes, courantes, etc., for viols with and without wind instruments, published between 1664 and 1678. (For list see Q.-L.)

HORN, (1) KARL FRIEDRICH (b. Nordhausen, Saxony, 1762; d. Aug. 5, 1830). After studying music under Schröter at Nordhausen, he came in 1782 (Mrs. Papendiek says, as a valet) to London, where Count Brühl, the Saxon Ambassador, patronised him, and introduced him as a teacher amongst the English nobility. Having published his first work, 'Six Sonatas for the Pianoforte,' he was appointed music-master in ordinary to Queen Charlotte and the Princesses, an office which he held until 1811. In 1808, in conjunction with Samuel Wesley, he began the preparation of an English edition of J. S. Bach's Wohltemperirtes Clavier, which was published in 1810. In 1824 he succeeded William Sexton as organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Horn composed some 'Military Divertimentos,' 'Twelve Themes with Variations for the Pianoforte, with an accompaniment for Flute or Violin,' and several sets of sonatas. He was also author of a Treatise on Thorough-bass.

His son, (2) CHARLES EDWARD (b. St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, 1786; d. Boston, Oct. 21, 1849), received his early musical education from his father, and in 1808 had a few lessons from Rauzzini. Returning to London, he endeavoured to obtain a position as a concert singer, but not succeeding he changed his course, and on June 26, 1809, appeared at the English Opera House, Lyceum, in M. P. King's opera, 'Up all night.' In the next year he composed and produced 'The Magic Bride,' upon which he quitted the stage and studied singing under Thomas Welsh. Horn's musical setting of Moore's second attempt at an opera libretto, 'M. P., or the Blue Stocking,' was produced at the English Opera House, London, Sept. 4, 1811, but was a failure. Shortly afterwards, a more successful work, 'The Beehive,' was produced at the same house. He arranged 'Allan Water,' which was introduced into his 'Rich and Poor' in 1812. In 1818 he wrote music for Moore's 'Lalla Rookh,' and had it performed in Dublin; it met with little favour. Four years later his 'Dirce' and 'Annetto' were given at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. In 1814 he reappeared as the Seraskier in Storace's 'Siege of Belgrade,' with great success. His connexion with the theatres both as composer and singer lasted for many years. His voice was poor, but of such extensive compass that he was able to undertake baritone as well as tenor parts. He visited Dublin again in 1823, bringing back with him, as an articulated pupil, M. W. Balfe. On the production of 'Der Freischütz' in 1824 at Drury Lane, Horn took the part of Caspar, displaying considerable histrionic ability. His 'Peveril of the Peak' (1830) had a passing popularity. In 1827-29 he was one of the composers at Vauxhall; in 1830 he played Fenton in The Merry Wives of Windsor at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. In 1831 and 1832 he was director of the music at the Olympic. In 1833 he went to America and introduced several English operas at the Park Theatre, New York, with marked success. A severe illness having deprived him of the use of his voice, he retired from the stage and began teaching, and established himself in business as an importer and publisher of music in connexion with a Mr. Davis. During his stay in America he produced an oratorio entitled 'The Remission of Sin.' In the beginning of 1843 Horn returned to England. In 1845 his oratorio, re-named 'Satan,' was performed by the Meloponic Society, and he was appointed musical director at the Princess's Theatre. In 1847 he again went to America, and on July 23 was elected conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston (q.v.). Early in 1848 he revisited England for a short time, and produced his oratorio 'Daniel's Prediction.' Upon his return to Boston he was re-elected conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society, June 10, 1848. His productions for the theatre include :

'The Magic Bride' and 'Tricks upon Travellers' (with Reeve), 1810; 'M. P., 1811; 'The Beehive' and 'The Boarding House,' 1811; 'Rich and Poor,' and 'The Devil's Bridge' (with Abraham), 1812; 'Godolphin, the Lion of the North,' 1813; 'The Ninth Statue' and 'The Woodman's Hut,' 1814; 'Charles the Bold,' 1815; 'The Persian Hunters,' 1816; 'The Election' and 'The Wizard,' 1817; 'Lalla Rookh,' Dublin, 1818; 'Dirce' and 'Annetto,' 1822; Songs in 'The Merry Wives of Windsor' (with Webbe, Jun., Parry, etc., including the popular duet, 'I know a bank'), and 'Actors al fresco' (with T. Cooke and Blewitt), 1823; 'Philandering,' 1824; 'The Death Fetch,' 1826; 'Pay to my order,' 1827; 'Peveril of the Peak,' and 'Honest Frauds' (containing the beautiful ballad, 'The deep, deep sea,' originally sung by the composer, and afterwards raised to the summit of popularity by the singing of Malibran), 1830.

He also composed 'Nourjahad,' the date of performance of which is uncertain; his last opera, 'Ahmed al Kamel,' was produced at the New York National Theatre in 1840 (D.N.B.); a cantata entitled 'Christmas Bells,' a set of canzonets, besides numerous single songs, glees, etc., and edited a collection of Indian Melodies. Some of his songs, 'Cherry ripe,' 'Thro' the wood,' 'I've been roaming,' and 'Ev'n as the sun,' were highly popular.

HORN BAND (Russian). In 1751 J. A. Maresch, a horn-player attached to the court of the Empress Elizabeth of Russia, conceived the idea of forming a band exclusively composed of hunting-horns. (See PLATE XXXV.) The instruments varied in length from one foot to seven feet, covered a distance of four octaves, and were thirty-seven in number. Most of the players could only produce the one fundamental tone, but a few of the smaller horns produced two notes. The difficulty of playing with precision by such a band as this must have been enormous; but nevertheless the first concert at Moscow in 1755 was a huge success. Horn bands became the rage with all the great nobles, and they frequently sold the bands—horns and players—to one another. In 1817 one of these bands visited Germany, and performed a Te Deum at Mannheim. Another band visited France and England in 1833. In the latter case there were twenty-two performers led by a clarinet. Two complete sets of these horns made of hammered copper were exhibited in the Vienna Exhibition, 1892. Further particulars may be found in Dalryell's Musical Memoirs of Scotland, p. 170.

HORNPIPE, in its present meaning, a step dance, also a particular type of melody in common time to which this is danced. The name appears to have been derived from a certain early rude instrument mentioned by Chaucer in his translation of the Romaunt of the Rose, the original of which is in date about the middle of the 13th century. Chaucer translates 'Estives de Cornouaille' into 'Hornpipes of Cornwailes.' The instrument of this day must have been a pipe made from the horn of an ox or other animal, which, from a primitive design, most likely culminated in the Stock and Horn (see STOCKHORN) in common use in certain districts of Scotland and Wales during the earlier portion of the 18th century.

Stainer and Barrett in their Dictionary of Musical Terms suggest that 'hornpipe' has been originally 'cornpipe,' named from a pipe of straw, and mentioned by Shakespeare in the line, 'When shepherds pipe on oaten straws'; but the present writer would rather refer it to its more obvious original, a pipe made from a horn (cf. PIBGORN).

As a dance the hornpipe was well known in this country in the 16th century. There is a 'Hornepype' by Hugh Aston¹ (temp. Hen. VIII.) in the B.M. MSS. Reg. Appendix 58. Barnaby Rich, writing in 1581, mentions its popularity, and Ben Jonson in the Sad Shepherd speaks of it as 'the nimble hornpipe.' Among the country people of Lancashire and Derbyshire the hornpipe was much cultivated, and for a long time after its disappearance in other parts, these counties were famous for it.

Hawkins names one John Ravenscroft, a Wait of the Tower Hamlets, who was especially noted for the playing and composition of hornpipes; he prints a couple of these (in date about 1700) in his History. All these early hornpipes are in triple time, and the method of dancing them is now unknown. As many are included in collections of country dances some would be danced as these are, but there is a probability that they were also, like the modern hornpipes, danced by a single performer to either a bagpipe or a violin. Though there are several books of hornpipes mentioned in the advertisements of early 18th-century music books, yet very few collections have survived in our libraries. One of the books of hornpipes so advertised² is called 'A Collection of original Lancashire Hornpipes old and new . . . being the first of this kind published. Collected by Thomas Marsden, price 6d.'³

The following is a fairly typical example of an early triple time hornpipe; it is found in several books of country dances issued about 1735 as—'Wright's Collection of 200 Country Dances,' vol. i., and one of Walsh's 'Compleat Country Dancing Master,' etc.

The London Hornpipe.

Earlier specimens may be seen under the titles 'Ravenscroft's Hornpipe' and 'Bullock's Hornpipe,' in the third volume of 'The Dancing Master' (Pearson and Young), c. 1726. The numerous hornpipes of Henry Purcell's⁴ theatrical and harpsichord music belong to this type.

About 1760 the hornpipe underwent a radical change, for it was turned into common time and was altered in character. Miss Anne Catley, Mrs. Baker, Nancy Dawson and other stage dancers, introduced it into the theatre, and they have given their names to hornpipes which are even now popular.

Dr. Arne included a couple of common time hornpipes into his version of 'King Arthur,' 1767.

A specimen of the late hornpipe is here given. It is named after one Richer, a rope and circus dancer of some celebrity in his day.

*Richer's Hornpipe.*⁵

The stage hornpipe was generally danced between the acts or scenes of a play even as late as 1840 or 1850.

The hornpipe's association with sailors is probably due to its requiring no partners, and occupying but little dancing space—qualities essential on shipboard.

The latest modern development of the hornpipe is to break up the regular time and even notes of the old common time ones, by making the bars up of dotted quavers and semiquavers, producing a sort of 'Scotch snap.'

HORSLEY, (1) WILLIAM (b. London, Nov. 15, 1774; d. there, June 12, 1858), having at the age of 16 chosen music as a profession, was articulated for five years to Theodore Smith, a pianist and minor composer, from whom he received but small instruction and much ill-usage. He profited greatly, however, by his intimacy with the three brothers Pring and Dr. Callcott, his association with whom led him to the practice of purely vocal composition, and he soon produced many excellent glees, canons and rounds, besides services and anthems. He became organist of Ely Chapel, Holborn, in 1794, and was made a member of the Royal Society of Musicians in 1797. In 1798 a suggestion of his resulted in the establishment of the CONCENTORES SODALES (q.v.). About the same time he was appointed assistant organist to Dr. Callcott at the Asylum for Female Orphans, upon which he resigned his appointment at Ely Chapel. On June 18, 1800, he graduated Mus.B. at Oxford, his exercise being an anthem, 'When Israel came out of Egypt.' On the revival of the Vocal Concerts in 1801, Horsley produced several new compositions, and for several years continued to supply them, not only with glees and songs, but also with instrumental pieces, amongst which were three symphonies for full orchestra. In 1802, Callcott having resigned the organistship of the Asylum, Horsley was appointed his successor. In 1812 he was chosen organist of the newly erected Belgrave Chapel, Halkin Street, Grosvenor Place, which he held in conjunction with the Asylum. He was one of the founders of the Philharmonic Society in 1813. In 1838 he succeeded J. S. Stevens as organist of the Charter House, still retaining his other appointments. He was elected member of the Royal Academy of Music at Stockholm in 1847. Horsley published five Collections of Glees (1801-07); a Collection of Hymn and Psalm Tunes, 1820; a Collection of forty Canons; a Collection of Psalm Tunes with Interludes, 1828; many single glees and songs, sonatas and other pieces for the pianoforte, and An Explanation of the Major and Minor Scales, 1825. He contributed several glees to Clementi and Co.'s Vocal Harmony, the second edition of which was issued under his care. He edited a Collection of the Glees, etc., of Dr. Callcott, to which he prefixed a memoir of the composer and an analysis of his works, and Book I. of Byrd's 'Cantiones Sacrae' (for the Musical Antiquarian Society). Horsley holds a deservedly high rank among glee composers. His 'By Celia's Arbour,' 'See the Chariot at Hand,' 'Mine be a Cot,' 'Cold is Cadwallo's Tongue,' 'O Nightingale,' and others, have long held, and will doubtless long continue to hold, a foremost place in the estimation of lovers of that class of composition. He married in 1813 Elizabeth Hutchins, eldest daughter of Dr. Callcott, who survived him until Jan. 20, 1875. He was buried in Kensal Green Cemetery. During Mendelssohn's visit to England in 1829 he began an acquaintance with the Horsley family which ripened into an intimate friendship, as is evident from the letters printed in Goethe and Mendelssohn.

Horsley's son, (2) CHARLES EDWARD (b. London, Dec. 16, 1822; d. New York, Feb. 28, 1876), instructed in music by his father and in the pianoforte by Moscheles, was sent, in 1839, on Mendelssohn's¹ advice, to study under Hauptmann at Cassel, whence he afterwards went to Leipzig, and enjoyed the friendship and instruction of Mendelssohn himself.² Whilst in Germany he produced several instrumental compositions, amongst them a trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, and an overture, the latter performed at Cassel in 1845. Returning to England he became organist of St. John's, Notting Hill, and produced several oratorios, 'David' and 'Joseph,' both composed for the Liverpool Philharmonic Society; and 'Gideon,' composed for the Glasgow Musical Festival, 1860; an anthem for the consecration of Fairfield Church, near Liverpool, 1854; and music for Milton's 'Comus,' besides many pieces for the pianoforte, songs, etc. In 1862 he quitted England for Australia, becoming organist of Christ Church, South Yarra, Melbourne; while there he wrote an ode entitled 'Euterpe,' for solos, chorus and orchestra, for the opening of the Town Hall, Melbourne, in 1870.³ After remaining in Melbourne for some time he removed to the United States, and died in New York. His body was brought back to England and buried in the family grave in Kensal Green Cemetery. He edited his father's Glees in 1873, and a Text Book of Harmony by him was published posthumously in Dec. 1876, by Sampson Low & Co.

Her musical knowledge was very slight, but in Drouet she had a clever musician for secretary, who has left an amusing account⁴ of the manner in which he was required to reduce into form the melodies which she hummed. Whether Drouet or the Queen of Holland were the real author of the pretty tune in question, it is certain that she will always be credited with it. M. C. C.

HORTUS MUSARUM, an interesting collection of lute music belonging to the library of Dunkerque (France), in 2 vols., published by Phalèse, Louvain, 1552-53. The first volume contains 16 fantaisies, 2 pieces without title: composers, A de Rota, Simon Sentler, Francesco da Milano, etc.; 92 transcriptions of motets and chansons. The second volume contains 26 transcriptions of the same. Composers: Crecquillon, Jehan Loys, Clemens non Papa, Josquin des Prés, etc. Of the latter's compositions, transcribed, are the Stabat Mater, Eya Mater, Benedicta, etc., for solo voice and lute.

HORWUD, JOHN (?) (late 15th and early 16th cent.), English composer of sacred music. An early 16th-century MS. in the Eton College Library contains the following motets by Horwud:

'Gaude flore virginall,' a 5; Salve Regina, a 5; 'Magnificat et exultavit,' a 5.

'An Inventorye of the Pryke Songys longynge to the Kyngys College in Cambraye' (1529), printed in The Ecclesiologist for Apr. 1863, refers to 'Horwud's gaude,' no doubt the same composition as that referred to above. W. Barclay Squire (see Archæologia, vol. lvi.) refers to a John Horwood, Horword or Harwood whose name occurs (1487) in Allen's Skeleton Collegii Regalis Cantabrigiensis, who became a fellow of King's in 1494, and who subsequently took holy orders. A William Horwode was appointed, in 1477, to teach singing and playing on the 'clavychordes' to the choristers at Lincoln.

HOSTE, SPIRITO L', of Reggio, from 1547 master of the music of Don Ferrante Gonzaga. He composed 6 books of madrigals, 3-6 v., and a book of church music (Magnificat, hymns, motets) between 1547 and 1568 (Q.-L.).

HOSTINSKY, OTOKAR (b. Martinov, Bohemia, Jan. 2, 1847; d. Prague, 1910), a writer on æsthetics and musical history, one of the first defenders of the Wagnerian principles in Bohemia.

Soon after completing his university course, he was appointed professor of æsthetics in the Czech University at Prague. His views on the subject of Wagner's reforms were shared by Smetana and Fibich, without prejudice to the strongly national tendency of the former. Early in his literary career Hostinsky wrote a reply to Hanslick's Vom musikalische Schöne entitled Die Lehre von den musikalischen Klängen (Prague, 1879). He acted as musical critic to various leading Prague newspapers. Hudební Listy (1870-72), Pokrok (1871), Politik (1872) and Národní Listy (1881-82). But his most valuable work was done in the sphere of æsthetics and history. It would be impossible to enumerate here more than a few of his articles and essays, but they are invaluable to students of Czech music, especially the analysis of Smetana's opera 'Dalibor' (in Dalibor, 1873), the article on Melodrama (Lumir, 1885), On the Present Condition of Czech Music and Czech Musical Declamation (both in Chvala's series Rozpravy Hudební, Fr. Urbánek, Prague), a series of articles on the Secular Folksongs of the Czechs, all as yet untranslated. His Brief Survey of Musical History (Stručný přehled dějin hudby, 1886) remains uncompleted. Apart from national music, Hostinsky wrote on Theatrical Representations in Ancient Athens, on Hector Berlioz, and on Mozart's 'Don Juan' and Artistic Progress. He furnished librettos for Fibich's 'Messinska nevěsta' (Bride of Messina) and Rozkošný's 'Popelka.' R. N.

HOTETERRE, a family of famous French players and makers of wood wind instruments. (1) JEAN (d. 1678) and his sons, (2) NICOLAS (d. 1694) and (3) MARTIN (d. 1712), are mentioned as 'symphonistes' (hurdy-gurdy players) playing in the orchestra of the ballet performances at the French court. (4) LOUIS (d. 1719 or 1720) and (5) NICOLAS, called Colin (d. Dec. 14, 1727), the sons of Nicolas (2), were famous flautists and oboists in Lully's orchestra. Their portraits appear with those of Lully and Marin Marais in Hyacintho Rigaud's fine picture in the National Gallery, London. Louis is mentioned as flautist at the French court in 1664 and continued until Jan. 22, 1714, when he ceded his place to his nephew, PIERRE CHEDEVILLE. His brother Nicolas (5) entered the royal music in 1666 or 1667 as oboist; in 1672 he was in the same capacity in the King's Musketeers. A MS., 'Recueil de branles,' etc., which belonged to Fétis, cannot be traced in the Brussels Library. The most illustrious member of the family was (6) JACQUES, called 'Le Romain' (b. ? Paris; d. there, c. 1761), the son of Martin (3), who after his father's death called himself Jacques-Martin. He received his surname apparently from a prolonged sojourn at Rome. He was probably born at Paris, where Martin had married. After his return from Italy, being already a musician-in-ordinary to the king, he was appointed, between 1705 and 1707, in the royal band of the 'Grande Écurie' as bass-oboist and violoncellist. He brought the playing of the transverse flute (German flute) to such perfection that it hastened the disappearance of the flûte-à-bec (recorder), and many members of the nobility and aristocracy became his pupils. Jacques was the author of a Traité de flûte (1707), which appeared in many editions, the last, augmented by Baillaux, after 1760. His L'Art de préluder sur la flûte traversière gives his name as 'Jacques H. Le Romain' in the privilegé, dated Dec. 12, 1711. He composed also several books of flute pieces, sonatas and suites for 2 flutes and basso continuo, as well as a Tutor and pieces for the musette (bagpipe). E. Thoinan gives his portrait from an engraving by B. Picart in Les Hotteterre et les Chedeville, wherein he corrects the grave errors concerning these families in all existing dictionaries, from documentary evidence. E. v. d. s.

HOTHBY, JOHN (b. England; d. there, Nov. 6, 1487), a learned musician of the Carmelite order. He was a graduate of Oxford and lectured there in 1435. William Worcester was his pupil there at that time, and calls him 'Friar John Hobby.' He is said to have travelled in Spain, France and Germany, and to have settled about 1440 in Florence; other accounts say that he lived for many years at Ferrara; he certainly left traces of his work in both of these places. Hothby, or Ottobi, as he was called in Italy, is known to have spent the greater part of the last seventeen or eighteen years of his life at Lucca, from about 1468 to Mar. 1486, in which year he was summoned back to England by his sovereign, Henry VII. He is said to have returned at once to England, and to have died there, Nov. 6, 1487. Certainly his death was announced to the chapter of Lucca on Nov. 16 in the latter year. He appears to have been invited there by the canons of St. Martin's to teach music in their schools, in which he was most successful, judging from the testimonial given to him by the Commune of Lucca on his departure. He was Doctor of Theology, and held several important ecclesiastical preferments in the town of his adoption. In addition to music in its various branches, he also taught grammar and arithmetic in the schools of St. Martin's. His known works are:

(1) 'Ars musica'. (2) a dialogue on music, in which the author quotes, among others, Dunstable, Dufay and even Okeghem; (3) a letter in Italian, rebutting the censures of Osmense, a Spaniard (of these three there are copies in the National Library at Florence); (4) 'La Calliopea legale' (copies in the same library; at Venice; and, in an uncoloured form, at the British Museum); (5) 'Regulae super proportionem' (copies in the libraries of the Liceo 'comunale' at Bologna, at Venice, and in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris—the latter dated 1471, and in the hand of a pupil of Hothby's); (6) 'De cantu figurato'; (7) 'Regulae super contrapunctum'; (8) 'Manus per genus distonorum declarata'; (9) 'Regulae de monochordo manuall' (copies of three last four at Bologna); (10) 'Quit est proportio' (copies at the B.M. and Lamb. Pal.); (11) 'Tractatus quarundam regularum artis musicae' (copies at Florence and at the B.M.); (12) another treatise on counterpoint, beginning 'Consonantia interpretatur sonus cum alto sonana' (in the Paris MS., immediately following the 'Regulae super proportionem', but without Hothby's name attached to it).

No. 4 has been published by Consemmaker in his Histoire de l'harmonie au moyen âge, p. 295; and Nos. 5-7 in his Scriptores de musica, vol. iii. pp. 328-34. The Bologna MS. is itself a copy of one at Ferrara (since lost), said to have been made by Padre Martini; the Ferrara MS. contained also a Kyrie, a Magnificat and other compositions by Hothby.

HOTMAN, see HAUTMAN.

HOTZ (HOTUS), PIERRE DU (d. Brussels, c. 1586), singer in the Spanish chapel of Charles V., c. 1556; maître de chapelle in 1559 to the governors of the Netherlands at Brussels, afterwards under Alba. Only two hymns of his composition are known so far; one, 'Herói canimus,' 6 v., in 'Vierteljahrsschrift f. Musikgeschichte,' ix. 404, is of great merit (Q.-L.).

HOVE, JOACHIM VAN DEN (b. Antwerp, late 16th cent.), a lutenist who published his first work, 'Florida sive cantiones . . .' for 2 voices and lutes, at Leyden, 1601; his second work, 'Delitiae musicae . . .' songs and dances arranged for lute, ib. 1612; a third book, 'Præ-ludia . . .' for lutes and viols, appeared at the Hague in 1616. HOVINGHAM FESTIVALS. These festivals were founded in 1887 by one of the ablest amateurs of his day, Canon Thomas Percy Hudson (afterwards Pemberton), a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, who became Rector of Gilling in the North Riding of Yorkshire. In the neighbouring village of Hovingham there is a riding-school attached to the mansion of Sir William Worsley, who willingly lent it for the concerts, and material help in the finance was afforded by John Rutson of Newby Wiske. The 12th of these festivals, which took place at irregular intervals, usually two in every three years, was conducted, as were its predecessors, by Canon Pemberton in 1903, and on his leaving the neighbourhood soon after there was a break in their continuity. In 1906 a 13th festival was held, under the general conductorship of Tertius Noble, then organist of York Cathedral, at which Canon Pemberton co-operated, conducting Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, but after this effort it was not found possible to continue these unique events. In the Mus. T. of Dec. 1903, a list is given of the chief works performed at these festivals, including novelties by Alan Gray, E. W. Naylor, T. T. Noble, Arthur Somervell, Mrs. Tom Taylor, Miss Alexandra Thomson and Charles Wood. Joachim was a frequent visitor, and many of the chief artists of the time appeared at these festivals, an enthusiastic and deserved tribute to which, and to their founder, will be found in Stanford's Interludes (1922), at p. 149 et seq. H. HOWARD, SAMUEL (b. 1710; d. London, July 13, 1782), a chorister of the Chapel Royal under Croft, and subsequently a pupil of Pepusch; was afterwards organist of St. Clement Danes, and St. Bride, Fleet Street. In 1744 he composed the music for 'The Amorous Goddess; or, Harlequin Married,' a pantomime produced at Drury Lane. In 1769 he graduated as Doctor of Music at Cambridge. He composed numerous songs and cantatas (many of which appeared under the name of 'The British Orpheus,' in several books, and others in various collections), sonatas and other pieces for instruments. He assisted Boyce in the compilation of his 'Cathedral Music.' An anthem of his, with orchestra, 'This is the day,' was published in 1792. A melodious song by him, 'O had I been,' from 'Love in a Village,' is given in the Musical Library, vol. iii. W. H. H.

HOWELL, (1) JAMES (b. Plymouth, 1811; d. Aug. 5, 1879). Possessing a fine voice he was, at an early age, taught singing, and at 10 years of age sang in public. He was brought to London in 1824, and in the next year admitted a pupil of the R.A.M., where he studied singing under Rovedino and afterwards under Crivelli, and the pianoforte and clarinet under T. M. Mudie. He subsequently learned the double bass under Anfossi, and made it his special instrument. Appointed a professor of the R.A.M., he soon took his place in all the best orchestras, and on the death of Dragonetti in 1846 succeeded him as principal.

His elder son, (2) ARTHUR (b. 1836; d. Apr. 16, 1885), was an excellent double-bass player and bass singer; and for some time was stage manager to the Carl Rosa Opera Company.

His younger son, (3) EDWARD (b. Feb. 5, 1846; d. Jan. 30, 1898), held the post of principal violoncello at the Royal Italian Opera, and in the principal orchestras for many years. He was educated at the R.A.M., at which he became professor of the violoncello. He was a member of Queen Victoria's Band and the Philharmonic Society, and appeared at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere as a soloist on many occasions. He adapted Romberg's treatise into A First Book for the Violoncello. He retired in 1896.

HOWELLS, HERBERT (b. Lydney, Gloucestershire, Oct. 17, 1892), composer. In 1905 he became a pupil of Herbert Brewer at Gloucester, was articled in 1909 and remained there until 1911. In the summer of 1911 he withdrew from Gloucester Cathedral in order to devote himself to composition, and although he was at that time entirely self-taught as regards the creative side of his art, the works he composed gained him, in Feb. 1912, an open Scholarship in composition at the R.C.M. There he studied composition under Stanford. In the following November he had the satisfaction of hearing the first public performance of one of his works in London, Richard R. Terry conducting his 'Mass in the Dorian Mode' at Westminster Cathedral. On July 10, 1913, his first orchestral work was heard, when Sir Charles Stanford conducted his Concerto in C minor for piano and orchestra at Queen's Hall.

In 1916-17 Howells contributed some articles on music to the Athenæum, and the former year saw the completion of the 'Lady Audrey's Suite' for strings. The same year the Carnegie Trust accepted the piano quartet in A minor, the first work published under its auspices, and several new chamber works were heard in London, a 'Phantasy String Quartet' being awarded a Cobbett Prize.

He was for a short time suborganist at Salisbury Cathedral, where his health broke down. Between 1917 and 1920 Howells spent most of his time alternately in Gloucestershire and at St. Thomas's Hospital. In 1920 he was appointed to teach composition at the R.C.M., and Sir Henry J. Wood included two small orchestral pieces of his, 'Merry-Eye' and 'Puck's Minuet,' in the programmes of the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts. The following year he visited South Africa and conducted at Cape Town, and in 1923 he travelled in Canada and the U.S.A. At the Gloucester Festival of 1922 an important work for soprano and tenor solo, organ and orchestra called 'Sine Nomine,' was heard for the first time, and at the Promenade Concerts of that year was produced an orchestral piece, 'Procession,' which was repeated at a Symphony Concert of the New Queen's Hall Orchestra on Oct. 14. The most important compositions of 1923 were a 'Pastoral Rhapsody' for orchestra; a sonata in E minor for violin and piano, dedicated to Albert Sammons; and a string quartet, 'In Gloucestershire,' produced by the Spencer Dyke Quartet on Jan. 30, 1924.

The chief work of 1924 was the piano concerto, dedicated to Harold Samuel. A slight but charming orchestral work, 'Paradise Rondel' was first heard at the Gloucester Festival of 1925.

The music of Howells, without being consciously 'national,' is unmistakably English in character. It betrays the composer's love of nature in its gentlest and most unostentatious aspects, and a certain affection for old traditions, which the composer respects for their original beauty and fitness; but he never resorts to them as the mere facile expedients into which long usage is apt to turn all artistic conventions. In Howells's chamber music, such as the quartet 'In Gloucestershire,' and the clarinet quintet, there is a tendency to reconcile classical form with impressions of the open air, while elsewhere the composer has made successful attempts at emulating the Elizabethan composers in their endeavour to infuse one single sustained mood into a whole work. The 'Procession' for orchestra may be cited as being successful in this respect. The actual idiom used by Howells is, of course, entirely modern, and traditional features are never introduced unless they are likely to expand his range of expression. 'Sine Nomine,' for instance, is a piece of true English cathedral music in spite of the fact that it has nothing in common with conventional Anglican church music, for, although couched in musical terms that belong to the present day, it is designed expressly for performance in a venerable edifice with which the composer has been intimately acquainted from his youth. Elsewhere Howells has experimented successfully with unusual orchestral combinations : in 'Procession' he makes effective use of piano and organ, and in 'Merry-Eye' and 'Puck's Minuet' curiously constituted small orchestras, both including piano parts, are used with the happiest results. HOWES, WILLIAM (b. near Worcester ; d. Windsor, Apr. 21, 1876), a singer in Windsor Chapel until the outbreak of the Revolution in 1642 ; afterwards at Christchurch, Oxford, and musician to Cromwell. After the Restoration he was cornet-player in the Royal Chapel. In 1657 he signed, with Hingston, the petition for a national college of music. A catch of his is in Hilton's 'Catch that catch can.'

HOWGILL, WILLIAM, organist at Whitehaven in 1794, and afterwards in London ; published 'Four Voluntaries, part of the third chapter of the Wisdom of Solomon for three voices, and Six favourite Psalm Tunes, with an accompaniment for the Organ' ; 'Two Voluntaries for the Organ, with a Miserere and Gloria Tibi, Domine,' and 'An Anthem and two preludes for the Organ.' W. H. H.

HOYLE, JOHN (d. circa 1797), was author of a dictionary of musical terms entitled Dictionary musica (sic), being a complete Dictionary or Treasury of Music, published in 1770, and republished with a varied title in 1790. It is a mere abridgment of Grassineau's Dictionary (see GRASSINEAU). W. H. H.

HOYOUL (HOYEUX, etc.) (b. Hainault, c. 1548), a choir-boy in Stuttgart court chapel. His voice broke in 1563. He was a pupil of Lassus from 1564-65 ; in the latter year he returned to Stuttgart as alto and composer. In 1587 he calls himself choir musician and composer to the Duke of Württemberg. He composed sacred songs in Latin, 5-10 v., 1587 ; 2nd book in German, 1589 ; motets and a Mass in MS. E. v. d. s.

HUBAY, JENO (originally known as EUGEN HUBER) (b. Budapest, Sept. 14, 1858), violinist and composer. From his father, Karl Hubay (Huber), violin professor at the Pest Conservatorium, and Kapellmeister of the Hungarian national opera, he received his first instruction, and was heard in public, in a Viotti concerto, at the age of 11. But though hailed by the Hungarian press as a wonder-child, his precocity was, fortunately, not exploited, and he was sent at the age of 13 to the Hochschule at Berlin, where he studied for five years under Joachim. During this period he was in the receipt of a Hungarian State stipend, and at its conclusion returned to Budapest. Subsequently (in 1878) he visited Paris, appeared with success at the Pasdeloup concerts, and made the acquaintance of Vieuxtemps, whose intimate friend he became, and whose posthumous works were edited and in some cases completed by him (shortly after the composer's death in 1880). In 1882 he was appointed to a post filled by many brilliant violinists, that of principal professor at the Brussels Conservatoire, but in 1886 he accepted, from patriotic motives, an offer to return to his native town to fill the position at the Conservatorium which became vacant on the death of his father. Both at Brussels and Budapest he formed quartets, in the one place with Josef Servais, in the other with Hegyesy (subsequently Popper) as violoncellists. He was knighted in 1907 and made an honorary doctor of the Klausenberg University in 1913. He has toured as a soloist in most European countries, and by virtue of a certain romantic quality to be noticed in his style and tone (he plays on a very fine Amati) has made a great name on the Continent. As a quartet leader he was enthusiastically praised by Brahms. He has composed several operas, of which the most successful has been a two-act version of Coppée's 'Luthier de Crémone' ; also several songs, four violin concertos (the 'Dramatique,' op. 21 ; in E, op. 91 ; in G minor, op. 99 ; and 'Concerto all' antica,' op. 101), a 'sonate romantique' for violin and piano and numerous violin pieces of which the 'Scenes from the Czardas' are the type, founded mostly on Hungarian national tunes. He has edited several books of studies and has been very successful as pedagogue, his pupils including the names of Szigeti, Vecsey, Erna Rubenstein, Eldering, Eddy Brown and Jelly d'Aranyi. W. W. C.

HUBER, HANS (b. Schönenwerd, Switzerland, June 28, 1852 ; d. Basle, Dec. 25, 1921), composer, received his first initiation into music from his father, an accountant and good amateur musician. At the age of 7 he was examined by Dr. Ulrich Munzinger of Solothurn with such brilliant results that he was allowed to follow a musician's career. He received his first systematic training at a religious institution attached to the order of St. Ursula at Solothurn, where he enlisted as a chorister under Cantor Aloys Walker. Not without uneasiness his ecclesiastical tutors saw him make such astonishing progress at the piano that, by the time he was 11 years old, he had scarcely anything more to learn from them. He now passed into the hands of a secular teacher, Carl Munzinger, grandson of his old patron, and on leaving school he remained at Solothurn for some time in the endeavour to make a living by giving private lessons. But his ambitions remained unsatisfied until, in 1870, he realised the plan of entering the Leipzig Conservatorium, where he remained until 1874, studying under Reinecke, Richter, Wenzel and Oscar Paul, but remaining uninfluenced by the conservative tendencies of the institution.

The next three years were devoted to teaching at Thann and Wesserling, in Alsace, and in Oct. 1877 Huber took up his residence at Basle. Here he began to make a name for himself as pianist and composer, but the Conservatorium, no less reactionary than that of Leipzig, did not see fit to bestow an appointment on the most significant musician in the city until 1889. In 1892 the University of Basle conferred on him the honorary degree of D.Phil., and in 1896 he succeeded Selmar Bagge as director of the Conservatorium, a post from which he only retired in 1918, compelled by the illness which was eventually to prove fatal.

Hans Huber is the most important Swiss composer of the second half of the 19th century. His musical idiom, although wavering between the influences of Brahms and Liszt, is not without distinctive features. His most characteristic works are his eight symphonies, some of which are successful attempts at continuing the line of development of the 'Programme Symphony' of Spohr and Raff. Huber's first symphony (op. 63, 1882) takes its subject from the history of William Tell; the second (op. 115) from the paintings of Arnold Böcklin; the third (op. 118) bears the sub-title of 'Heroic' and is partly based on the Death Dance of Holbein; the fifth that of 'Der Geiger von Gmünd'; and two others are entitled 'Ländliche' and 'Schweizerische Symphonie.' The last of the eight symphonies ('Frühlings-Symphonie') was finished in the course of 1920.

Huber wrote five works for the stage, including 'Weltfrühling' (Basle, 1894), 'Kudrun' (Basle, 1896), 'Florestan' and 'Die schöne Bellinda,' and the very extensive catalogue of his works further includes:

Cantatas, Masses, Oratorios ('Mors et Vita'); Sommernächte, a Serenade (op. 87), 'Arnoval' and 'Römischer Arnoval' for orchestra; Concertos for piano and for violin; a large number of chamber works, piano pieces and songs, etc.

HUBERMANN, BRONISLAW (b. Czenstochowa near Warsaw, Dec. 19, 1882), violinist. He received his first instruction from Michalowiec, a teacher in the Conservatorium, and performed, at the age of 7, Spohr's second violin concerto, besides taking the leading part in a quartet of Rode. After taking a short course of lessons under Isidor Lotto, a distinguished pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, he was taken by his father, in May 1892, to Berlin, where he studied for eight months under the direction of Joachim, and was able already in 1893 to make public appearances in Amsterdam, Brussels and Paris. Playing in London in May 1894, he attracted the notice of Adelina Patti, who introduced him the following year to an Austrian audience, engaging him to play at her farewell concert given at Vienna on Jan. 12, 1895. At this concert he made a sensation, and attracted the favourable notice not only of the capricious Viennese public, but also of Hanslick and Brahms. He then made tournees through Austria, Italy, Germany, Russia, America and England. An incident of his Italian journey was his engagement by the Municipality of Genoa to play, in one of the chambers of the Town Hall, on Paganini's Guarnerius violin, an honour he shares with the late Camillo Sivori. This took place on May 16, 1903. Hubermann is a resident of Vienna, but is heard at regular intervals in other musical centres. With an excellent technique, especially of the right hand, he is able to give a good account of all the great concertos and solos for the violin, but he is at his best in chamber music, for which he is pre-eminently suited by his interpretative gifts.

W. W. C.

HUCBALD (b. circa 840; d. 930). The musical work of this famous monk of St. Amand is confined to his treatise, De harmonica institutione. Gerbert in his Scriptores, i. 121-229 printed other treatises under his name, particularly an anonymous Alia musica and a group of treatises distinguished by a peculiar notation—the Musica Encheiriadis, the Scholia Encheiriadis and the Commemoratio brevis de tonis, etc. These are now generally described as Pseudo-Hucbald or attributed to Otger of Tornières (see OTGER). Hucbald's own Tract is of much less interest than these: and is mainly a description of the Gamut with a brief account of the Eight Modes. He was a prominent member of a learned group of writers in France during the second part of the 9th century, and he wrote a curious Eulogy of Charles the Bald. But his chief works were hagiographical.

W. H. F.

HUDGEPUT, JOHN, a London music publisher, who employed Heptinstall and other printers. His name is attached in 1679 to an exceedingly curious engraved work (probably unique), now in the Bodl. Lib.

A Vade Mecum for the Lovers of Musick shewing the Excellency of the Rechorder. MDCLXXIX. London, printed by N. Thompson for John Hudgeput, at the sign of the Golden Harp, and Hoebuy in Chancery Lane.

Obl. 8vo. In 1695 he published from Heptinstall's press the 'Songs in the Indian Queen . . . by Mr. Henry Purcell,' and in the preface he, with another bookseller who was concerned in the work, calmly confesses that it is published without knowledge of the author. 'Thesaurus musicus,' 5 volumes of songs by various composers, was issued by Heptinstall, 1693-96.

HUDSON, GEORGE, collaborated with Dr. Charles Coleman and Henry Lawes in the composition of a dramatic entertainment, the text by Sir Wm. Davenant, performed at Rutland House in Charterhouse Yard, May 23, 1656. This was written so as to evade the prohibition of stage plays (Hawkins, Hist. ii. 679). In 1661 he was a member of the royal private music, and in 1668 he was appointed composer to the court together with Mathew Locke. E. V. D. S.

HUDSON, (1) ROBERT, Mus.B. (b. London, Feb. 25, 1732; d. Eton, Dec. 19, 1815), was a tenor singer, and sang when a young man at Ranelagh and Marylebone Gardens. In 1755 he was assistant organist of St. Mildred, Bread Street. In 1756 he was appointed vicar-choral of St. Paul's, in 1758 a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and in 1773 almoner and master of the children of St. Paul's, which offices he resigned in 1793. He was also music-master at Christ's Hospital. Hudson was the composer of 'The Myrtle,' a collection of songs in three books, published in 1767; of a service and some chants, and many hymn tunes. He also set for five voices the lines on Dr. Child's monument at Windsor, beginning 'Go, happy soul.'

His daughter (2) MARY (d. Mar. 28, 1801) was, in 1790, and till her death, organist of St. Olave, Hart Street, and St. Gregory, Old Fish Street. She was the composer of several hymn-tunes, and set for five voices the English version of the Latin epitaph on Purcell's gravestone, 'Applaud so great a guest.' W. H. H.

HÜE, GEORGES ADOLPHE (b. Versailles, May 6, 1858). French composer, studied under Paladilhe (counterpoint and fugue) and Reber at the Conservatoire for composition, and competed for the Prix de Rome in 1878, when he obtained honourable mention, and the prize itself in 1879 for his 'Médée.' The 'Cressent' prize was awarded to him for 'Les Pantins,' an opéra-comique in 2 acts, performed at the Opéra-Comique, Dec. 28, 1881, and a mention was offered by the city of Paris for his 'Rübezah,' a symphonic legend in 3 parts (Concerts-Colonne, 1886). Hue is a master of the art of musical colour, and is also remarkably skilful in the development of his ideas; he excels in works of an elegiac character. His numerous symphonic works include:

Symphony, 'Rübezah,' symphonic legend in three parts (Colonne (concerts, 1886); 'Resurrection' (concerts du Conservatoire, 1892); 'Le Berger,' a 'ballade et fantaisie' for violin (Colonne (concerts, 1893); 'Jeunesse,' on a poem by Hettich (Colonne (concerts, 1897); etc.

His works for the stage are:

'Les Pantins,' opéra-comique, 2 acts (Opéra-Comique, Dec. 28, 1881); 'Cœur brisé,' pantomime (Bouffes Parisiens, 1890); 'La Belle au bois dormant,' incidental music (Théâtre de l'Œuvre, 1894); incidental music for 'Les Romanesques' (E. Bostand) (Comédie-Française, 1894); 'Sakuntala,' 'Le Trouvère,' 3 acts; 'Le Roi de Paris,' lyric drama, 3 acts (Opéra, Apr. 26, 1901); 'Le Miracle,' lyric drama, 3 acts (Opéra, Dec. 30, 1910); 'Siang Rin,' ballet-pantomime, 2 acts (Opéra, Mar. 19, 1924); 'Titania,' musical drama, 3 acts (Opéra-Comique, Jan. 20, 1903); 'Dans l'ombre de la cathédrale,' lyric drama, 3 acts (Opéra-Comique, Dec. 7, 1921).

On Mar. 4, 1922, he succeeded Saint-Saëns as member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts.

HUEFFER, FRANCIS, Ph.D. (b. Münster, May 22, 1843; d. London, Jan. 19, 1889), author and musical critic. After studying modern philology and music in London, Paris, Berlin and Leipzig, he fixed his residence in London and devoted himself to literary work. His first articles appeared in the North British Review, in the Fortnightly Review (when under John Morley's editorship), and in the Academy, of which he became assistant editor. At a time when England hesitated to acknowledge the genius of Wagner, Hueffer brought home to amateurs the meaning of the modern developments of dramatic and lyrical composition by the publication, in 1874, of his Richard Wagner and the Music of the Future. He was in 1878 appointed musical critic of The Times. He wrote librettos for several English composers. Thus 'Colomba' and 'The Troubadour' were written for Mackenzie, and 'The Sleeping Beauty' for Cowen. He made an excellent adaptation of Boito's libretto of Verdi's 'Otello.'

As early as 1869 Hueffer had published a critical edition of the works of Guillem de Cabestanh, which gained him the degree of Ph.D. from the University of Göttingen, and led to his election to the 'Felibrige,' or Society of modern Troubadours, of which Mistral (the author of Mireijo), Théodore Aubanel, and other distinguished poets were the leading spirits. The Troubadours, a history of Provençal life and literature of the Middle Ages, appeared in 1878; and a series of lectures on the same subject was delivered at the Royal Institution in 1880. A collection of Musical Studies from The Times, etc., was published in 1880, and soon appeared in various translations; The Life of Wagner, the first of the Great Musicians series, in 1881; Italian and other Studies in 1883. The Correspondence of Wagner and Liszt, a translation, followed soon after the publication of the Briefwechsel, by Breitkopf & Härtel in 1888. He made occasional contributions to the Quarterly and other reviews, and composed some songs from time to time. L. M. M.

HÜLLMANDEL, NIKOLAUS JOSEPH (b. Strassburg, 1751; d. London, 1823), a pupil of C. P. E. Bach, appears as harpsichord virtuoso in London in 1771. After visiting Italy, and living for some time at Paris, he returned to London at the outbreak of the Revolution in 1790. Fétis speaks highly of him as a performer. He composed a large number of sonatas for harpsichord and pianoforte with and without violin accompaniment, and wrote also Principles of Music and Instructions for the Pianoforte.

HÜNTEN, FRANZ (b. Coblenz, Dec. 26, 1793; d. there, Feb. 22, 1878). His father DANIEL was organist at Coblenz. In 1819 he went to the Paris Conservatoire, studying the piano with Pradher, and composition with Reicha and Cherubini. He lived by teaching and arranging pieces for the pianoforte, and in time his lessons and compositions commanded high prices, although the latter, with the exception of a trio concertante for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, were of little value. His Méthode nouvelle pour le piano (Schott) had at one time a reputation. In 1837 he retired to Coblenz, and lived on his means till his death. His two brothers, WILHELM and PETER, were for many years successful pianoforte teachers at Coblenz and Duisburg. F. G.

HUGHES, HERBERT (b. Belfast, Mar. 16, 1882), composer, collector and editor of Irish folk-song, received his musical education at the R.C.M. (1901). As an original member of the Irish Folk-song Society he helped to edit its early journals (1904), and also edited 'Irish Country Songs' (2 vols.). He has published many Irish songs collected by himself with tastefully designed piano accompaniments. As a composer he excels in works of the lighter kind, and his 'Rhymes' (studies in imitation) and 'Parodies' show a delightful sense of humour skilfully expressed in musical terms. Since 1911 Hughes has been a member of the musical staff of the Daily Telegraph. C.

HUGH THE DROVER, ballad opera in two acts; text by Harold Child, music by R. Vaughan Williams. Produced privately by R.C.M., July 4, 1924, and publicly by B.N.O.C., His Majesty's Theatre, July 14, 1924.

HUGO VON REUTLINGEN (HUGO SPECHTZHART (b. 1285 or 1286; d. 1359 or 1360), known by his treatise Flores musicae, published Argentinae, 1488, and many subsequent editions, the latest with a German translation by C. Beck, Stuttgart, 1868. He collected also the songs of the 'flagellanti' in 1349, which were republished by P. Runge (Monatshefte f. Mus. Gesch. 32, 147).

HUGUENOTS, LES, opera in 5 acts; words by Scribe and Deschamps; music by Meyerbeer. Produced Paris, Opéra, Feb. 29, 1836; in German, Covent Garden, June 20, 1842; in French, June 30, 1845; in Italian, Covent Garden, as 'Gli Ugonotti,' July 20, 1848; in English, Surrey Theatre, Aug. 16, 1849; New York, Astor Place Opera House, June 24, 1850. Like 'William Tell,' the opera is in England always greatly shortened in performance. In the early days of Harris's operatic management at Drury Lane, it was given with the fifth act, and lasted till nearly one o'clock in the morning.

For a remarkable criticism by Schumann, see the Neue Zeitschrift, Sept. 5, 1837, and Gesammelte Schriften, ii. 220. G.

HULL, ARTHUR EAGLEFIELD, Mus.D. (b. Market Harborough, Mar. 10, 1876), has written extensively on many musical subjects and has done much educational work in Yorkshire. He founded the Huddersfield Chamber Music Society in 1900 and a College of Music there in 1908. A wider public service was the foundation of the BRITISH MUSIC SOCIETY (q.v.) in 1918. In 1912 he became editor of the Monthly Musical Record (see PERIODICALS, MUSICAL). He revised W. T. Best's edition of the 'Complete Organ Works of J. S. Bach' (10 vols.), and has undertaken much other editorial work. His more important literary works include Modern Harmony (1914), an enterprising attempt to find a logical basis for the practice of modern composers, and monographs on Scriabin and Cyril Scott. In 1924 A Dictionary of Modern Music and Musicians was published under his editorship (see DICTIONARIES OF MUSIC). He is also a contributor to the present edition of this Dictionary. C.

HULLAH, JOHN PYKE, LL.D. (b. Worcester, June 27, 1812; d. London, Feb. 21, 1884), was an English musician conspicuous for his work in the cause of popular choral singing. He received no regular musical instruction until 1829, when he was placed under William Horsley. In 1833 he entered the R.A.M. for the purpose of receiving instruction in singing from Crivelli. He first became known as a composer by his music to Charles Dickens's opera, 'The Village Coquettes,' produced at the St. James's Theatre, Dec. 5, 1836. The whole of the music was destroyed in a fire at the Edinburgh Theatre soon after the production of the piece there. This was followed by 'The Barbers of Bassora,' a comic opera, produced at Covent Garden Theatre, Nov. 11, 1837, and 'The Outpost,' at the same theatre, May 17, 1838. In 1837 he became organist of Croydon Church, and composed some madrigals. Soon after this Hullah's attention was turned to popular instruction in vocal music; and attracted by the reports of Mainzer's success as a teacher, he visited Paris, only to find Mainzer's classes entirely dispersed. In 1839 he went to Paris, and remained for some time observing Wilhem's classes, then in the full tide of success. On his return to England he made the acquaintance of the late Sir James Kay Shuttleworth, then Dr. Kay, and undertook the instruction of the students in the Training College at Battersea, the first established in England, and just opened under the direction and at the cost of Dr. Kay and Mr. Edward Carlton Tufnell. On Feb. 18, 1840, he gave his first class-lesson at Battersea, and from that day dates the movement he originated.

On Feb. 1, 1841, he opened at Exeter Hall a school for the instruction of schoolmasters of day and Sunday schools in vocal music by a system based on that of Wilhem. Not only schoolmasters, but the general public flocked to obtain instruction, and country professors came to London to learn the system and obtain certificates of being qualified to teach it. The system was acrimoniously attacked, but it outlived all opposition. From his elementary classes Hullah formed two schools, an upper and a lower, and gave concerts in Exeter Hall, the members of his upper school forming his chorus, and the orchestra being completed by professional principalsingers and instrumentalists. Remarkable among these were four historical concerts illus trating in chronological order the rise and progress of English vocal music, given at Exeter Hall in 1847. At this time his friends and supporters determined on erecting and presenting to him a concert hall, and, having procured a piece of ground near Long Acre, the foundation stone of St. Martin's Hall was laid June 21, 1847. The hall was opened, although not entirely completed, on Feb. 11, 1850, and Hullah continued to give his concerts there until the building was destroyed by fire, Aug. 28, 1860. During the existence of the upper school he brought forward a large number of unknown works, old and new. From 1840-60 about 25,000 persons passed through his classes. In 1844 Hullah was appointed professor of vocal music in King's College, London, an office which he held till 1874. He held similar appointments in Queen's College and Bedford College, London, with both of which he was connected from their foundation. From 1870-1873 he was conductor of the students' concerts of the R.A.M. On the death of his old master, Horsley, in 1858, Hullah was appointed organist of the Charter House, where since 1841 he had carried on a singing-class. For many years he conducted the annual concert of the children of the Metropolitan Schools at the Crystal Palace. In Mar. 1872 he was appointed, by the Committee of Council on Education, Inspector of Training Schools for the United Kingdom, which office he held till his death. In 1876 the University of Edinburgh gave him the honorary degree of LL.D., and in 1877 he was made a member of the Society of St. Cecilia in Rome and of the Musical Academy in Florence. In 1880 and 1883 he was attacked by paralysis, and died in London, being buried in Kensal Green Cemetery.

Hullah composed many songs, some of which—such as 'O that we two were Maying,' 'Three Fishers,' 'The Storm'—were very popular. His literary remains, however, are of greater importance. They include:

A Grammar of Vocal Music (1843), A Grammar of Harmony (1852), and A Grammar of Counterpoint (1864), The History of Modern Music (1862), and The Third or Transition Period of Musical History (1865) (courses of lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain), The Cultivation of the Speaking Voice (1870), Music in the House (1877), and numerous essays and other papers on the history and science of music contributed to various periodicals. He edited Wilhelm's Method of teaching Singing adapted to English use (1841), The Psalter, a Collection of Psalm Tunes in four parts (1843), The Book of Praise Hymnal (1868), The Whole Book of Psalms, with Chants; and a large number of vocal compositions in parts, and other publications for the use of his classes. Amongst these should be named Part Music (reprinted as Vocal Music), for four voices, and Vocal Scores—two most admirable collections of the classics of choral music, full lists of which were published in the earlier editions of this Dictionary; Sacred Music (1867) The Singer's Library; Sea Songs, etc., etc.

A memoir by his second wife, published in 1886, has been used in correcting the above article.

HULLEBROECK, EMIEL (b. Ghent, 1878), pianist, singer and composer, has done notable work in reviving among the Flemings of Belgium and among the people of Holland the practice of communal singing. To nearly two hundred of the best type of popular lyrics by such writers as Lambrecht Lambrechts, René de Clercq, etc., he has set music of a simple and attractive character, and has himself taught large numbers of Dutch-speaking people in Europe and America to sing them, so that some of his songs are accepted as part of the corpus of Flemish folk-song. Many of them, including 'Hemelhuis' (Heaven, home), which is the most popular of all, are of a directly moral character, but there are also humorous songs, working songs, character songs and national songs of various types. Some of the melodies are based on older ones, but most are quite original. Their musical character is generally far above that of the average modern popular song.

HUME, TOBIAS (d. Apr. 16, 1645), an officer in the army, and an excellent performer on the viola da gamba; published in 1605

'The First Part of Ayres, French, Polish, and others together some in Tablature, and some in Pricke-song With Furies, Galliards and Almains for the Viols de Gamba alone . . . and some Songs to be sung to the Viols, etc., containing 116 airs in tablature and five songs.'

The title 'Musical Humors,' sometimes applied to the publication of 1607, is printed at the top of every page of the 'First Part of Ayres.' In 1607 he published

'Captaine Hume's Poetical Musick principally made for two basse-voies, yet so contrived that it may be played eight severall waies upon sundry instruments with much facilitie,' etc., containing eighteen instrumental and four vocal pieces. In 1642, being then a poor brother of the Charter House, he presented a 'True Petition of Colonel Hume' to the House of Lords offering his services against the Irish rebels, which he afterwards printed, but it is evident from its contents that he was labouring under mental delusion. There is no authority for his rank of colonel. (See ENG. SCH. OF LUTENIST SONG-WRITERS.)

HUMFREY, PELHAM (as he himself wrote his name, although it is commonly found as Humphry or Humphrys, with every possible variety of spelling) (b. 1647; d. Windsor, July 14, 1674). In 1660 he became one of the first set of Children of the re-established Chapel Royal under Captain Henry Cooke. Whilst still a chorister he showed skill in composition, as appears by the second edition of Clifford's 'Divine Services and Anthems,' 1664, which contains the words of five anthems 'composed by Pelham Humfrey, one of the Children of His Majesties Chappel,' the music of two of which is still extant. During the same period he joined Blow and Turner, two of his fellow-choristers, in the composition of what is commonly known as the Club Anthem.¹ In 1664 he quitted the choir and was sent abroad by Charles II. to pursue his studies. He received from the Secret Service money in that year 'to defray the charge of his journey into France and Italy, £200'; in the following year from the same source £100, and in 1666, £150. His studies were prosecuted chiefly in Paris under Lully. On Jan. 24, 1666-67, he was during his absence appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal in the room of Thomas Hazard, deceased. He returned to England in the following October, and on the 26th was sworn into his place. Amusing references to Humfrey's skill and conceit are in Pepys's Diary, Nov. 1667. Anthems by him were at once performed in the Chapel Royal. On the death of Captain Cooke, Humfrey was appointed his successor on July 15, 1672, as Master of the Children. On Aug. 8 following he had a patent (jointly with Thomas Purcell) as 'Composer in Ordinary for the Violins to His Majesty.' Humfrey died at the early age of 27, and, three days afterwards, was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey, near the south-east door. Humfrey was married, and his daughter, Mary, was buried in Westminster Abbey, Feb. 1673-1674. His will, proved July 30, 1674, by his relict, Catherine, is dated Apr. 23, 1674. It is short, leaving all to his wife except 20 shillings each to his cousin Betty Jelfe, Blow and Besse Gill for rings. He signs 'Humfrey,' and it is also signed by J. Blow.

Humfrey was the composer of several fine anthems, seven of which are printed, but without the orchestral parts, in Boyce's Cathedral Music. The greater part of these, together with six others and the Club Anthem, also an Evening Service in E minor, are contained in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MS. 7338), and others are extant at Ely, Salisbury, Windsor, Oxford and the Fitzwilliam Museum. Many are also in the R.C.M. Three Sacred Songs by him, and a Dialogue, composed jointly with Blow, are printed in 'Harmonia Sacra,' book ii. 1714. He composed two Odes for the King's Birthday, 'Smile, smile again,' and 'When from his throne,' and an Ode for New Year's Day, 'See, mighty sir.' Many songs by him are included in 'Choice Ayres, Songs and Dialogues,' 1676-84; and in the publication, called 'The Ariel's Songs in the Play call'd The Tempest,'¹ his setting of 'Where the bee sucks' is to be found. Important new light has been shed on Humfrey as a composer for the stage by the discovery of a MS. of the 17th century (undated) called 'The Vocal Musick in The Tempest by Mr. Pelh. Humfrey,' preserved in the library of the Paris Conservatoire (see TEMPEST, THE). The MS. has been fully described by Mlle. Pereyra.² Its contents, beginning with 'The Song of the 3 Divolls,' a trio in which recitative solo passages alternate with ensembles, and ending with the Masque of Neptune, shows the influence of Lully, and is a distinctive contribution to that evolution of English opera which Matthew LOCKE and Henry PURCELL (q.v.) pressed forward.

Humfrey's song, 'I pass all my hours in a shady old grove,' was printed in Playford's 'Choice Songs,' 1673, on a half-sheet in 1700, and then in the appendix to Hawkins's History. J. S. Smith included five songs by Humfrey in his 'Musica Antiqua,' amongst them 'Wherever I am and whatever I do,' composed for Dryden's 'Conquest of Granada,' part i. 1672. Humfrey is said to have been the author of the words of several songs published in the collections of his time, and to have been a fine lutenist.³ He introduced many new and beautiful effects into his compositions. He was the first to infuse into English church music the new style which he himself had learnt from Lully. A curious orchestral piece attributed to him in the Conservatoire of Brussels is mentioned in Q.-L. as being set for strings, oboes, trumpets and drums, but Eitner thinks it is hardly possible to assign it to so early a writer as Humfrey.

HUMMEL, (1) JOHANN JULIUS (d. Berlin, Feb. 12, 1798), a music publisher at Amsterdam (from c. 1766) and Berlin (from 1774), who published many important works. The business was dissolved in 1821. (2) JOHANN BERNHARD (b. Berlin, 1760; d. before 1806), son of Johann Julius, an excellent pianist and composer of pianoforte sonatas, etc., and songs; also a book on Modulation. He lived for some time at Warsaw, but returned to Berlin after his father's death.

HUMMEL, JOHANN NEPOMUK (properly Johan NEPOMUKA) (b. Nov. 14, 1778; d. Weimar, 1837), was the son of Joseph Hummel, the director of the Imperial School of Military Music at Presburg. He married Elisabeth Röckl, an opera singer (b. 1793; d. Weimar, 1883). He was a contemporary of Beethoven, Cramer, Kalkbrenner, Weber and Field.

For Johann's first musical studies his father selected the violin, but this only led to signal failure, and the boy was allowed to take up the piano instead. Upon this instrument he at once displayed a most remarkable facility,⁴ so much so that when, in the year 1785, the Imperial School at Presburg was dissolved, and Joseph Hummel obtained the position of conductor at Schikaneder's Theatre in Vienna, whither the boy accompanied him, Mozart was so struck with the child's playing that he offered to give him lessons, and for that purpose took him to live with him in his house in the Grosse Schulerstrasse. Here he remained for two years, and although his lessons were very informal and irregular he made immense progress, and Mozart predicted for him a brilliant future. At the close of the two years (1787) Hummel made his first appearance at a concert given by Mozart, and his success was so decided that his father resolved to take him on a concert tour through Germany and Holland; they then visited Edinburgh, where Hummel made a great success, and then went south to London, where they lived for about a year, the boy meanwhile receiving instruction from Clementi. On Oct. 27, 1788, he gave a concert at Oxford which included a quartet of his own. Hummel played with Cramer at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, London, in Jan. 1791, and at the Hanover Square Concert Rooms, May 5, 1792. The programme announced that 'Master Hummel' would play a Concerto (by Mozart), and the performance was given under the direction of Salomon. On the conclusion of the visit to London, Hummel made a short stay in Holland, and by way of that country returned to Vienna in 1793.¹ He now devoted himself to more serious study of composition under Albrechtsberger, who was now, at the age of 67 a veteran among teachers, but by no means superannuated. And in addition to the classic instruction of Albrechtsberger, and the advice of Haydn, Hummel also sought the assistance of Salieri for dramatic composition. It was presumably at this time that some, if not all, of his four operas were composed. Between this date and the year 1803 Hummel made a concert tour to St. Petersburg, where he was very well received. In 1803 he was back in Vienna, where he appears to have held an engagement in the Court Theatre; but in the following year, 1804, he accepted the very important post of Kapellmeister to Prince Esterhazy, a post rendered famous by Haydn. Hummel retained this post until 1811, and it was during his tenancy of office that Beethoven's Mass in C was first performed (1810), on which occasion some remark of Hummel's caused an unfortunate estrangement between him and Beethoven, which continued until the time when Hummel visited Beethoven in his last illness, and, almost in the shadow of death, the old enmity faded away. Hummel resigned his post in 1811, and for the last time returned to Vienna, where he lived, without appointment, as a teacher and concert player until 1816, in which year he once more undertook the duties of court Kapellmeister, this time at Stuttgart. However, the duties or the surroundings seeming uncongenial, he in 1820 exchanged his appointment for a similar one at Weimar. Frequent leave of absence was granted him, of which he took advantage to revisit St. Petersburg in 1822, and to visit Paris, on the conclusion of his Russian tour. It was about this time that Hummel began to give up public playing, and to turn his attention to conducting the orchestra. It is true he made a visit to Paris again in 1829 but, being coldly received, immediately came to London, where his playing still excited the former enthusiasm. After a short sojourn in Weimar (1831-33), he returned to London as conductor of the German Opera Company at the King's Theatre. Here he seems to have remained only for one season, for he was again in Weimar in 1833, and never again left that city, until in 1837 death closed a brilliant career.

³ On Mar. 10, 1665/6, he was appointed Musician for the lute in the Royal Band.

In appearance Hummel was large and rather ungainly, while his dress was the reverse of foppish. His face was that of a healthy business man with an abundance of common sense and savoir faire.

Considering that Hummel was the pupil of Mozart, Haydn, Salieri, Clementi and Albrechtsberger; the fellow-pupil of Beethoven, and the teacher of Czerny, Hiller, Henselt and Thalberg, to whom he doubtless transmitted his style, his music is almost exactly what might be expected from a brilliant virtuoso in such circumstances. Add to this the fact that he was a public player upon the piano with the old Viennese action, so eminently suited to a facile execution of light ornamentation, but deficient in expressing depth of emotion, and we have a pretty complete idea of Hummel's methods—and we no longer wonder at his making use of themes which at times were hardly worthy of the delicate and tasteful costumes in which he clothed them, or at his being apt to regard his music more from the standpoint of a virtuoso, than from that of a purely intellectual and emotional musician.

The same set of influences no doubt dominated Hummel's mind when he played; but it is hardly possible that a player, envied as he was by much of the finest talent the world has ever seen, can have been the mere animated machine that some would have us believe. Wherever he appeared as a pianist, Hummel achieved very distinct success; and in order to hold his own with credit in a city where, under the refreshing shadow of Mozart and Haydn, Beethoven reigned over an assemblage of ability, which contained Schubert, Moscheles and Ries (in addition to those already named), a man must have had more than mere cleverness and dexterity to recommend him. Besides, Hummel's strongest point was his remarkable power as an extempore player. In this department he was considered a rival to Beethoven, a fact which speaks for itself. Hummel did not achieve his reputation as a pianist by performing his own compositions only, and therefore he must have had the 'gift of interpretation,' as well as the gift of speech; and in this connexion it is pleasant to remember that the symphonies of Beethoven became known to many people, and perhaps were only known, through the medium of the excellent arrangements for piano duet, which were made by Hummel. In his later years Hummel published his celebrated Piano School (1824), in which he advocates a rational system of fingering. Although of course not free from the tradition that the thumb should be forbidden to play upon the black keys, he argued that, apart from this restriction, the same shaped passage or figure should be fingered in the same way wherever it occurred, thus foreshadowing the modern method of fingering, alike in all keys.

He tried to alter the manner of playing the shake (which had hitherto followed the tradition of C. P. E. Bach, in beginning upon the auxiliary note) by insisting that it should start upon the principal note: and when the principal note is an essential note of the melody, common sense would seem to be in Hummel's favour. He also tried to reverse the accepted meaning of the direct turn ~, and the inverted turn ~, and to reverse the accent in the 'simplified shake' when accompanied by holding notes as in the Rondo of the 'Waldstein' sonata. The object of these last two changes is not so obvious as that of the first, though the third was suggested by the desirability of all the accents being placed upon the notes which would have sounded with the melody note, had there been no shake; a view which would certainly meet with the approval of harmonists. Hummel also suggested the use of this mark Δ to indicate the use of the 'Celeste' Pedal, invented in its present form by Sebastian Erard, as distinguished from the 'shifting' Pedal, first used by Stein, which permitted the use of one, two, or three strings, at will. ('Nach und nach mehrere Saiten,' Beethoven Sonata, op. 101.) The Piano School altogether was a decided advance upon the previous methods, and a valuable contribution to the more logical development of the technique, which, already raised to a high degree of excellence by Clementi, was soon to receive such vast improvement from the methods of Czerny, Liszt, Schumann and Chopin. It should be remembered that Czerny was the pupil of Beethoven and Hummel, that the playing of Hummel was a 'revelation to him,' and that he was the teacher of Liszt, so that modern pianists, whilst acknowledging their indebtedness to C. P. E. Bach and Clementi, owe a great deal to the Viennese School and to Hummel in particular.

Hummel's compositions, which number 127, contain the following. There are a great many more without opus numbers, and in many cases the same number is attached to two different compositions (see Q.-L.).

HUMORESKE, a title adopted by Schumann for his op. 20 and op. 88, No. 2, the former for piano solo the latter for piano, violin and violoncello. Heller and Grieg have also used the term for pianoforte pieces—op. 64 and opp. 9 and 16 respectively. There is nothing obviously 'humorous' in any of these, and the term 'caprice' might equally well be applied to them. Many later composers have adopted the title. a.

HUMPERDINCK, ENGELBERT (b. Siegburg, Rhine provinces, Sept. 1, 1854; d. Sept. 27, 1921), a composer who rose with lightning rapidity to a very high pinnacle of popular fame and that mainly on the strength of a single opera, 'Hänsel und Gretel.'

After studying at the Gymnasium at Paderborn he entered the Cologne Conservatorium under Ferdinand Hiller in 1872, and while a student there he won (1876) the Frankfort Mozart Stipendium. By the aid of this fund he proceeded to Munich, where he was a pupil at first of Franz Lachner and later of Josef Rheinberger at the Royal Music School (1877–1879). Next Humperdinck won the Mendelssohn Stiftung of Berlin in 1879, and promptly went to Italy, where at Naples he met Richard Wagner. At Wagner's invitation Humperdinck followed him to Bayreuth, and materially assisted him during 1880–81 in the preparation for the production of 'Parsifal.' But having won still another prize in the latter year—the Meyerbeer prize of Berlin—he set out south once more, and after travelling again in Italy, France and Spain, he settled for two years at Barcelona, where in 1885–86 he taught theory of music in the Conservatoire. In 1887 he returned to Cologne, and from 1890–96 he was a professor at the Hoch Conservatorium in Frankfort; he was a teacher of harmony in Stöckhausen's Vocal School, as well as musical critic for the Frankfurter Zeitung. Meanwhile he had not been idle as a composer, for in 1880 he produced a Humoreske for orchestra, which enjoyed a vogue in Germany; in 1884 his popular choral work 'Das Glück von Edenhall' was first sung, and the choral ballade 'Die Wallfahrt nach Kevlaar' in 1887, as well as a large quantity of music in the smaller forms, for male or mixed choirs.

In 1893 his masterpiece, the opera 'Hänsel und Gretel' (libretto by his sister A. Wette), was brought to a hearing at Weimar on Dec. 23, and immediately captivated all music-lovers, so that it ran a rapid course the wide world over (London, Apr. 1895), and was warmly welcomed as an antidote to the then prevailing craze for the lurid work of the young Italian school of Mascagni, etc. This he followed up with another opera (originally a play accompanied with music throughout), 'Königskinder' in 1896, and 'Dornröschen' in 1902, neither of which made any success comparable with that of the first-named work. The full operatic version of 'Königskinder' appeared in New York, 1910, Berlin and London, 1911. A 'Maurische Rhapsodie' for orchestra was produced in 1898. In 1896 the Kaiser created Humperdinck professor, and in 1897 he went to live at Boppard, but in 1900 he was once again in Berlin, where he had been appointed head of a Meister-Schule for musical composition, and a member of the Senate of the Royal Akademie der Künste. His opera, 'Die Heirath wider Willen,' was brought out at Berlin, Apr. 14, 1905. Incidental music to a number of plays followed for productions in Berlin, namely The Merchant of Venice (1905), The Winter's Tale and The Tempest (1906), As You Like It (1907), Lysistrata (Aristophanes) (1908), The Blue Bird (Maeterlinck) (1910). That to The Miracle (London, 1911) attracted wider attention because of the magnificence of Reinhardt's production both in Europe and in America (1924). Two other operas, 'Die Marketenderin' (Cologne, 1914) and 'Gaudeamus' (Darmstadt, 1919), must be named. (See Riemann.)

HUMPHREYS, SAMUEL (d. Canonbury, Jan. 11, 1738), was employed by Handel to make additions to the libretto of his oratorio 'Esther,' to fit it for public performance in 1732. He subsequently provided him with the words of 'Deborah' and 'Athaliah.' He was also author of 'Ulysses,' an opera set to music by John Christopher Smith, and of a poem on the Duke of Chandos's seat at Canons. He died at Canonbury, aged about 40 years. W. H. H.

HUMPHRIES, JOHN (b. 1707; d. circa 1730), English violinist and composer. His first work was published, as he states in his preface, 'as the first-fruits of a young gentleman now not above 19.' This work is 'Six Solos for a violin, and a bass with a thorough-bass for the harpsichord, composed by John Humphries, published for the author 1726. Engraved on copper by T. Cross,' folio. His opera seconda was 'XII Concertos in seven parts for two Violins,' etc. etc., London, printed for, and sold by B. Cooke, folio. Another set was published as opus iii. by Cooke, and both sets were reissued by John Johnson. Hawkins speaks of Humphries as 'a young man of promising parts, and a good performer on the violin.' Alfred Moffat, who has published an arrangement of one of Humphries' violin pieces in his series 'Old English Violin Music' (Novello), has elicited the foregoing facts, and points out that Hawkins in part of his notice confuses John Humphries with J. S. HUMPHRIES (q.v.).

F. K.

HUMPHRIES, J. S., a composer for the violin. He published 'XII Sonatas for two Violins with a Thorough Bass,' opera prima, folio. These were first issued about 1734 by Thomas Cobb (who was successor to John Cluer) and afterwards reprinted by John Walsh.

HUMSTRUM, a rustic violin of the rebec type, now extinct. Apparently it was last in use in Dorsetshire (cf. Barnes' Poems in the Dorset Dialect, 1862), and a specimen exists in the County Museum, Dorchester.

The hollowed-out sound-box of the REBEC (q.v.) is replaced by a tin-canister, and the strings, four in number, are of wire. Ritson (Observations on the Minstrels) speaks of a man playing in the streets of London on the humstrum about the year 1800.

Bonnel Thornton (Burlesque Ode on S. Cecilia's Day) confuses the humstrum with the hurdy gurdy. He also says it was sometimes called 'The Bladder and String'; but this was a monochord known as the drone, bum-bass or basse de Flandres, a survival of jongleur days. F. W. G.

HUNEKER, JAMES GIBBONS (b. Philadelphia, U.S.A., Jan. 31, 1860; d. New York, Feb. 9, 1921), American critic and essayist. He studied the pianoforte with Georges Mathias in Paris and Rafael Joseffy in New York, becoming the latter's assistant in the National Conservatory of Music. His reputation was made, however, as a writer on music and the other arts, rather than as a pianist. Between 1891 and 1897 he was musical critic for short-lived daily journals. From 1900-12 he acted as art critic for The New York Sun, returning to music in 1917 as musical critic for The Philadelphia Press. In 1918 he took the place of the musical critic of The New York Times, absent in the war. On the latter's return Huneker went to The New York World, of which journal he was musical critic at the time of his death.

Huneker was a prolific author of books as well as of journalistic criticism, many of his volumes, however, being collections of his newspaper essays. He wrote also largely about the graphic arts and literature. His most important book is a Life of Chopin, with a detailed criticism of his music (1900). A similar volume on Liszt (1911) is much less successful. Huneker contributed to a number of publications in Europe and America, besides the daily newspapers. His style is facile, original and entertaining, frequently brilliant; and his writing is based on a wide range of knowledge in music, literature and art. Readers of a more sober point of view will balk at some of his judgments. His musical books, besides those mentioned, are:

HUNNIS, WILLIAM (d. June 6, 1597), a composer of sacred music, and a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, under Edward VI. In the following reign (in 1556) he was implicated in some Protestant plots against the Roman Catholic régime, and was dismissed from this post. He was restored when Elizabeth came to the throne, and had other posts given him, one of which was keeper of the gardens and orchards at Greenwich (appointed 1562). He was made master of the children of the Chapel Royal in 1566. On his death he was succeeded by Nathaniel Gyles. His compositions are now not considered of great merit; a portion of them still remains in manuscript in the Music School, Oxford. He versified the Psalms and some portions of the Bible, and his quaint titles are amusing, such as, 'A hyvefull of hunnye containing the first booke of Moses called Genesis turned into English meetre,' 'A Handful of Honisuckles, gathered by William Hunnis,' etc. In 1581 Hunnis issued 'VII Steppes to Heaven alias the VII Psalms reduced into meter,' of which the second edition appeared in 1583 as 'Seuen Sobs of a Sorrowful Soull for Sinne.' (These are the seven penitential psalms.)

HUNT, ARABELLA (d. Dec. 26, 1705), singer, lutenist, and singing-mistress, was the instructress in singing of the Princess (afterwards Queen) Anne. She was also a favourite of Queen Mary, who made her one of her personal attendants in order that she might have frequent opportunities of hearing her sing. Many of the songs of Purcell and Blow were composed for her. The beauty of her person equalled that of her voice. Congreve wrote an ode 'On Mrs. Arabella Hunt singing,' which is mentioned by Johnson as the best of his irregular poems. After her death an engraving from her portrait by Kneller was published, with some panegyrical lines by Congreve (not from his ode) subjoined.

HUNT, RICHARD, a viol and other instrument maker at the sign of the Lute in St. Paul's Church Yard, who from this address and in conjunction with Humphrey Salter published, in 1683, The Genteel Companion for the Recorder, ob. 8vo. According to Wheatley's new edition of Pepys's Diary, Pepys on Oct. 25, 1661, called at Hunt's about his lute, which was almost done, having had a new neck for double strings. Three days later he went to St. Paul's Church Yard to Hunt's, and found his theorbo ready, which pleased him, and for which he paid 26s., but is told that it is now worth £10, and as good as any in England. In Apr. and in Aug. 1663 Pepys again is in communication with Hunt seeing, first, a 'Viall' which he is considering whether to buy, and next, having bought it for £3, is assured that he has 'now as good a Theorbo. Viall, and Viallin as is in England.' F. K.

HUNT, ROBERT, is named as the composer of 2 motets, Ave Maria and Stabat Mater in PH.

E. H. F.

HUNT, THOMAS, fl. c. 1600, composer. He is stated by Barnard (R.C.M. MS. 1051) to have been organist of Wells, but no record of his name is now to be found in the Cathedral archives. A four-part service of his, including V., T. D., B., K., C., M., and ND., is at St. Michael's College, Tenbury (Tenb. MS. 786). A four-part setting of the Preces and Responses is attached to this service; the manuscript is beautifully written in a contemporary hand and very probably is Hunt's holograph. A single bassus part of his anthem 'Put me not to rebuke' is in the R.C.M. MS. 1051, and the words only of another anthem, 'O light, O blessed Trinity,' are given in B.M. Harl. MS. 6343. He contributed the madrigal 'Hark! did you ever hear?' to 'The Triumphs of Oriana,' in 1601. E. H. F.

HUNTER, ANNE (b. 1742; d. 1821), a Scotch lady, wife of John Hunter the surgeon, and sister of Sir Everard Home the physician. The Hunters lived in Leicester Square during Haydn's first visit, and were intimate with him. Mrs. Hunter wrote the words for his twelve Canzonets (1792), of which the first six were dedicated to her and the second six to Lady Charlotte Bertie. Hunter's death (Oct. 16, 1793) put a stop to the acquaintance. Mrs. Hunter published a volume of poems (1801; 2nd ed. 1803), which are condemned by the Edinburgh and praised by Blackwood. She was also probably the author of both words and melody of 'Lady Anne Bothwell's Lament.' She is mentioned in Robert Burns's MS. 'Edinburgh Commonplace-Book,' and two poems by her—'To the Nightingale, on leaving E[arl's] Court,' 1784, and 'A Sonnet in Petrarch's manner'—are there copied out by the poet, the only poems which received that distinction. G.

HURDY GURDY (Fr. vielle; Ital. lira tedesca, ghironda ribeca, stampella, viola da orbo; Ger. Bauernleier, Deutscheleier, Bettlerleier, Drehleier, Radleier; Latinised, lyra rustica, lyra pagana). This has now only a place among instruments like that of the dulcimer and the bag-pipes, as belonging to rural life, and quite outside modern musical art.¹ It is true that in the first half of the 18th century the hurdy gurdy or vielle contributed to the amusement of the French higher classes, but evidently with that affectation of rusticity so abundantly shown when mock shepherds and shepherdesses flourished. Engel² gives several titles of compositions wherein the vielle formed, in combination with bagpipes (musette), flutes (of both kinds), and hautbois, a fête champêtre orchestra. Chouquet³ adds, for the instrument alone, sonatas, duos, etc., by Baptiste and other composers, and two methods for instruction by Bouin and Corrette. This music of a modern Arcadia seems to have culminated about 1750 in the virtuosity of two brothers, Charles and Henri Baton, the former playing the vielle, which he had much improved, the latter the musette. Their father, a luthier at Versailles, was a famous vielle-maker, who about 1716-20 adapted old guitars and lutes and mounted them as hurdy gurdies. Other eminent makers were Pierre and Jean Louvet, Paris, about 1750; Lambert, of Nancy, 1770-1780; Delaunay, Paris; and Berge, Toulouse. The last popular street-player in Paris was Barbu; according to Louis Paquerre he was to be heard before 1871, and was also heard in London. He is supposed to have been shot during the Commune.

By some strange misconception, a common example of the erroneous nomenclature which exists among average non-musical persons regarding the lesser-known instruments, it has long been the practice, both in literature and in speech, to refer to the barrel and piano organs as 'hurdy gurdies.' This has probably arisen from the fact that the Italian street-boy, who in the 'twenties and 'thirties perambulated town streets with this instrument, in due course discarded it for a primitive form of organ which simulated the then popular cabinet piano. Out of this the modern piano organ has evolved.

The hurdy gurdy is an instrument the sound of which is produced by the friction of stretched strings, and the different tones by the help of keys. It has thus analogies to both bowed and clavier instruments. It is sometimes in the shape of the old viola d'amore (a viol with very high ribs), of the guitar, or of the lute. Four to six tuning-pegs in the head bear as many strings of catgut or sometimes wire, two of which only are carried direct to the tailpiece, and tuned in unison, and one or both are stopped by a simple apparatus of keys with tangents, which directed by the fingers of the player's left hand, shortens the vibrating length to make the melody. The chanterelle has two octaves from the tenor G upwards; the drones are tuned in C or G; G being the lowest string in either key.

When in the key of C, the lowest drone is tenor C. The lowest drones are called bourdons, the next higher open string is the mouche. The trompette, which is again higher, a copper string next the two melody-strings, may be tuned as indicated and used at pleasure.

One or other of the bourdons, shown as round black notes in the examples, is silenced by a spring, according as the key is C or G.

In the cut showing the wheel and tangents one string only is used as a melody string. The ebony keys are the natural notes, the ivory the sharps. From the position in which the hurdy gurdy is held the keys return by their own weight. The longer strings, deflected and carried round the ribs or over the table and raised upon projecting studs, are tuned as drones or bourdon strings. All these strings are set in vibration by the wooden wheel, which, being rosined, has the function of a violin bow, and is inserted crosswise in an opening of the table just above the tailpiece, the motor being a handle at the tail-end turned by the player's right hand. There are two sound-holes in the table near the wheel. The hurdy gurdy shown on PLATE LXXXVII. No. 11 is a modern French instrument ('en forme de viole'), 27 inches in length without the handle. Two of the drones are spun strings, and one, the so-called 'trumpet,' is of copper, and is brought upon the wheel at pleasure by turning an ivory peg in the tailpiece. There are also four sympathetic wire strings tuned in the fifth and octave. Like lutes and other mediæval instruments, the hurdy gurdy was often much and well adorned, as may be seen in the Victoria and Albert Museum; fancy woods, carving, inlaying and painting being lavishly employed. The hurdy gurdy has been sometimes called 'rota' (from its wheel), but the rote of Chaucer had no wheel, and was a kind of half fiddle, half lyre, with an opening (as in the CRWTH (q.v.)) for the hand of the player to touch the strings from the back.

The mediæval Latin name for the hurdy gurdy was 'Organistrum,' and under this title it is described by Odo of Cluny, who died in A.D. 942, in his tract Quomodo organistrum construat, or 'How to make an organistrum.' From this account,¹ we learn that the compass of the instrument was the diatonic octave from tenor C with the addition of b flat. The illustration given by Gerbert is unfortunately the work of a 13th-century artist. In the 12th century the organistrum was about five feet in length and two executants were required, one of them to turn the handle which moved the wheel (rotulus) and the other to manipulate the key-mechanism (pectra). There were three strings, the outer tuned in octaves, the middle one a fourth or fifth below the highest string. The mechanism consisted of small rods placed beneath the strings, each bearing a low flat bridge, and the projecting ends of the rods were turned by the executant, and thus a bridge was brought to bear on the three strings at any required point.

For this reason the much-beloved 'organum,' with its succession of consecutive fourths and fifths, could be played with accuracy and ease; hence the organistrum was greatly esteemed for church purposes.

The mechanism of the sliding rods with tangents, now seen on the hurdy gurdy and described above, was probably invented in the early 13th century, when the size of the instrument was reduced and it became the 'Symphony.' Although the introduction of the organ displaced it from its high ecclesiastical position, it seems to have given the idea which underlies that most sympathetic of all key-board instruments, the clavichord. HURÉ, JEAN (b. Gien, Loiret, Sept. 17, 1877), French composer and organist, has written chamber music: a sonata for PF. and violin (1900–01); 3 sonatas for PF. and vcl.; 2 string quartets (1913–17, 1921); a quintet (1907–08), etc.; a sonatina; a Te Deum; also stage music: 'Fantasio,' 'Le Bois sacré' (Odéon; Opéra-Comique). He has founded and directs the periodical L'Orgue et les organistes, and succeeded E. Gigout as organist of Saint-Augustin, Paris, in 1925.

HURLEBUSCH, HEINRICH LORENZ (b. Hannover, July 8, 1666; d. Brunswick), an excellent organist at St. Magnus, and from 1694 at S. Martin and S. Egidius. There are modern editions of some of his organ pieces by Marx and Seiffert.

HURLEBUSCH, KONRAD FRIEDRICH (b. Brunswick, 1696; d. Amsterdam, Dec. 16, 1765), a roving spirit and full of conceit, who went from one big town to another, visiting Italy and Sweden, returning to Brunswick in 1725, and after another sojourn at Hamburg becoming organist of the Reformed church at Amsterdam in 1737. He composed operas, cantatas, overtures, harpsichord pieces, a hymn-book and songs. E. v. d. s.

HURLSTONE, WILLIAM YEATES (b. London, Jan. 7, 1876; d. May 30, 1906), pianist and composer. Though coming of a family with artistic leanings (his grandfather was President of the Royal Society of British Artists), he did not enjoy the advantage of upbringing in a musical atmosphere. Yet at the age of 9 he published a set of 'Five Valses' for pianoforte solo, and at the age of 18 gained a scholarship at the R.C.M. In this institution he studied until 1898, under Stanford for composition, Algernon Ashton and Edward Dannreuther for pianoforte, and left the college a brilliant pianist, with exceptional gifts as a sight-reader, and performer of chamber music. In May 1904 a series of 'Fantasie-Variations on a Swedish air' for orchestra from his pen was produced at the first concert of the 'PATRON'S FUND' (q.v.), and received not only the applause of the public, but also the congratulations of the professors present. He further wrote for orchestra a pianoforte concerto in D (played by himself at St. James's Hall in 1896), and a fairy suite, 'The-Magic Mirror.' His chamber works include an early sonata for pianoforte and violin of conspicuous merit, another for violoncello and pianoforte, and a string quartet in E minor, all of which were produced at the British Chamber Concerts given in St. James's Hall in 1897-98-99; a quintet for pianoforte and wind instruments; and a suite for clarinet and pianoforte, frequently played by Clinton. Once more, in Dec. 1904, a work of his was chosen for performance at a Patron's Fund concert, this time a quartet for pianoforte and strings, and was well received. His Phantasy string quartet won the first of the prizes offered by W. W. COBBETT (q.v.) for works of this class. In Sept. 1905 he was appointed professor of counterpoint at the R.C.M. He was considered one of the most promising English musicians of his generation. For list of published works see B. M. S. Ann. 1920.

HUS-DESFORGES, PIERRE LOUIS (b. Toulon, Mar. 14, 1773; d. Pont-le-Voy, near Blois, Jan. 20, 1836), a distinguished violoncellist, pupil of Janson the Elder. After a varied career as player in orchestras, conductor and director of a music school, he became a teacher of violoncello at the music school at Pont-le-Voy. He composed a Mass, symphonies, chamber music and a Concerto, solos and a Tutor for violoncello (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello).

HUSK, WILLIAM HENRY (b. London, Nov. 4, 1814; d. there, Aug. 12, 1887), was librarian to the Sacred Harmonic Society, and compiled three editions of a catalogue of the books, the last (a most useful bibliographical work) being dated 1872. Before this he had published An Account of the Musical Celebrations on St. Cecilia's Day, London, 1857, and an excellent collection of Christmas Carols, with many of their airs, as Songs of the Nativity, 1864. His careful and conscientious work in the biographies given in the first edition of the present work needs no comment.

HUSS, HENRY HOLDEN (b. Newark, New Jersey, U.S.A., June 21, 1862), American composer and pianist. His first study was with his father; it was continued with Boise and with Rheinberger and Giehl in Munich. His compositions have been played by most of the American orchestras and many leading solo players. The more important ones are these:

Rhapsodie, FF. and orch., op. 3.
Concerto in B, FF. and orch., op. 10.
Concerto, C minor, vln. and orch., op. 12.
Sonata, vln. and FF., op. 19.
Sonata, v'cl. and FF., op. 24.
String quartet, G minor and E minor.
Numerous songs, choruses, and FF. pieces.

HUTCHESON, FRANCIS, see IRELAND.

HUTCHINSON, (1) RICHARD (d. 1646), church composer and organist of Durham Cathedral, 1614-44. It is probable that he held previously some appointment at Southwell Minster. An anthem, 'Behold how good,' the score of which is in the British Museum (Harl. 7340/63b), is described as by 'John Hutchinson, Organist of Durham Cathedral in y^e reign of James I.' As JOHN HUTCHINSON, his son (q.v.), was not born until 1615, and James died in 1625, he could not have been organist during this reign, and indeed is not known to have been organist of Durham at any time. The anthem¹ is therefore assigned to his father Richard, who did hold this appointment in James's time. Another anthem, 'O God my heart prepared is' (Durh. incomp.), is by Richard: the tenor cantoris part of this is also in B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478-9. Richard is possibly the composer of 'O Lord, I am not highminded,' as well as some other of the anthems included in the list under John Hutchinson.

His son, (2) JOHN (bapt. Durham Cathedral, July 2, 1615),² church composer. A man of this name was organist at York Minster in 1633 (West's Cath. Org.). The anthem, 'Behold how good,' assigned to him (Harl. 7340), is by his father. Some other of the following anthems may also be by Richard:

Grant, we beseech Thee. Durh.; B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478-9. Tenor cantoris part only.
Hear my crying. P.H.
Lift up your heads. B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478-9. Tenor cantoris part only.
O Lord, I am not highminded. Durh.; P.H.; B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478-9. Tenor cantoris part only.
O God the proud. Durh. Imp.; B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478-9. Tenor cantoris part only.
O Lord, let it be Thy pleasure. Durh. Imp.; B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478-9. Tenor cantoris part only.

HUTSCHENRUIJTER, (1) WOUTER (b. Rotterdam, Dec. 28, 1796; d. there, Nov. 18, 1878), at first studied the violin and horn, but subsequently devoted himself to composition and to the direction of various choral and other musical societies, the Eruditio Musica, the Musis Sacrum, and the Euterpe. He was also music-director at Schiedam, and was for many years a member of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome. He wrote more than 150 compositions of various kinds, of which the most important were: an opera, 'Le Roi de Bohême,' produced at Rotterdam, four symphonies, two concert overtures, an overture for wind instruments, several masses, cantatas, songs, etc. A fine sonata for piano and violoncello, op. 4, may also be mentioned.

(2) WOUTER (b. Rotterdam, Aug. 15, 1859), grandson of the above, was from 1890 2nd conductor of the Concert-Gebouw at Amsterdam, and subsequently conductor of the orchestra at Utrecht. Since 1917 he has been director of the town music school in Rotterdam. He is the composer of orchestral and chamber music works, and the author of a monograph on Richard Strauss, 1898, and other literary works (Riemann).

HUYGENS, (1) CONSTANTIN (b. The Hague, Sept. 4, 1596; d. Mar. 28, 1687). Following in the footsteps of his father, Christian Huygens, who had been secretary to William of Orange, Constantin became in 1625 military secretary to Prince Frederick Henry, a post he retained under William II. and William III. of the Netherlands until his death.

In 1618, soon after the conclusion of his studies at Leyden University, he made his first visit to London. Anxious to hear as much music as possible, he went twice a week

'chez Monsieur Biondi, où il y a un collège de musiciens tous italiens; autres m'ont promis de me faire entendre la Musique de la Reine, qui sont tous François, avecques des voix admirables, tellement que je me trouve ici entièrement en mon climat.' (Letter, dated June 12, 1618.)

He also by request played on the lute to King James. He seems to have been noted for the ingenuity with which he improvised accompaniments to songs, either on the lute or theorbo. In 1627 he married Susanne Van Baerle of Amsterdam, who died ten years later, leaving him with one daughter and four sons. He twice revisited England, and was also sent on diplomatic missions to Germany, Venice and Paris, where he was made a Chevalier de l'ordre de St. Michel, on Dec. 4, 1632, by King Louis XIII.

He came into contact with learned and distinguished people of all sorts, with whom he kept up a large correspondence. There are 533 letters in Latin and 1352 letters in French, the larger number autograph, preserved in the Amsterdam Royal Library alone. Ninety-four selected letters¹ touching on musical matters and people, preceded by an excellent biographical sketch, were published by MM. Jonckbloet and Land. They are written in French, sometimes delightfully racy in expression, with a curious intermixture of phrases in Spanish, Latin, etc., for Huygens had seven or eight languages at his command. Some extracts from his letters to Père Mersenne (B.M., Add. MSS. 16,912, f. 180), written from the military camp at Maldegheem in 1640, show yet another side of his many-sided character, his interest in physical science; for he minutely describes the sinking of a well, with diagrams to illustrate the methods adopted to prevent its being choked with sand.

He was also author and poet; his first poems were published at Middelburg as early as 1622. A collected edition of Latin and of Dutch poems called Olia was published at the Hague in 1625, and a collection of all his poetry entitled Koren-Bloemen in 1658. In 1653 he published an account in Dutch verse of his country life at Hofwijk (Vitaalium), the house he had built near the Hague in 1641, and where he principally resided. When over 80 years of age he wrote his autobiography in Latin; as it was intended for the use of his family only, it was not published till nearly 150 years later, under the title Constantini Hugenii. De vita propria sermonum inter liberos libri duo, Haarlem, 1817.

Throughout his life he always found time to devote to music, and was a competent performer on several instruments, such as the viol, harpsichord, organ, theorbo, guitar and lute. In one of his letters he says that by the time he was 79 years old he had composed 769 airs 'Sur les deux sortes de luths, le clavecin, la viole de gambe, et s'il plaist à Dieu sur la guitarrre,' as well as others 'pour plusieurs violes, et nommément pour trois violes basses en unison.' These all remained in manuscript. A letter to H. du Mont, organist of St. Paul, at Paris, dated Apr. 6, 1655, thanks du Mont for looking through his compositions, and incidentally mentions 'la pratique des Italiens, qui, à mon advis, ne sont pas les plus mauvais compositeurs du monde.' His friends in Spain, England and France were placed under contribution for his fine collection of music and of musical instruments; thus, with the lutenist Gautier's help, he obtained a 'luth de Bologne' from England; with the assistance of M. Chière, a guitar from Madrid. In a letter to Mademoiselle de la Barre, July 21, 1648, he writes that in his house are 'luths, tiorbcs, violes, espinettes à vous divertir, quasi autant que toute la Suède vous en pourra fournir.' He had also collected a large general library; after his death his three surviving sons added considerably to it, but they died between 1695 and 1699, and it was then sold at Leyden in 1701; a catalogue was published with the title, 'Bibliotheca magna et elegantissima Zuylichemiana, rarissimorum exquisitissimorumque librorum, in omnibus facultatibus et linguis, nobilissimi viri D. Constantini Huygens, Leyden, Sept. 26, 1701.'

In Huygens's autobiography is the marginal note 'Psalmi ad citharam in castris compositi, Lutetiae editi'; this refers to the work Pathodia sacra et profana occupati, published under the supervision of Sieur Gobert by Robert Ballard at Paris in 1647.¹ It contained twenty Latin, twelve Italian, and seven French compositions, for 'un seul tiorbe,' which he had written before 1627 while in camp. MM. Jonckbloet and Land (Correspondence, etc.) reprinted the volume in its entirety, with a facsimile page of music.

Another work by Huygens, cited by Mattheson,² was written on the use and misuse of the organ in the Protestant church; he held that it should be used only for the glory of God, and not played merely with a desire to charm the listeners as they leave church. According to Eitner, it was first published at Amsterdam in 1666. There are two editions in the British Museum:

'Gebruyck of ongebruyck van't orgel inde Kercken der Vereenighde Nederlanden, Leyden, Abraham Elsevier, 1641, 8vo.'

published anonymously; and

'Ghebruik, en Ongebruik van't Orghel, in de Kercken der Vereenighde Nederlanden, Beschreeven door Constantyn Huigens, Ridder, Heere van Zuylichem, Zeelhem, en de Monickeland, Eerste Raad, en Roken-meester van zign Hoogheide, den Heere Prince van Oranje. Verrijkt met eenighe Zanghen. Amsterdam, Arent Gerritsz van der Heuvel, 1669, 8vo.'

which gives the author's name and titles in full. The first engraved title-page in this volume has a small medallion portrait of Huygens, inscribed 'Constanten,' and is dated 1660. Another edition was published at Amsterdam in 1660.

An excellent portrait of Huygens was engraved by W. Delff from a painting by Michel Miereveld; it is inscribed 'Constanten, 1625, aetatis XXVII.' This is reproduced by Van der Straeten,³ who also mentions the well-known portrait painted by Antoine Van Dyck at a later date, and admirably engraved. There is another portrait of Huygens, with copious references in that stupendous Dutch book of Proverbs and fine copper-plate engravings (17th century), of Jacob Cats (a volume dear to Sir Joshua Reynolds's boyhood), wherein Huygens and Cats are seen with other dignitaries at the death-bed of 'Fred. Henrik, Prince van Oranje,' 1647.

Huygens is also mentioned in Evelyn's Diary. According to the 'Correspondence' he expresses a very high opinion of English musicians—and in one letter from Duarte⁴ (1648), he was evidently interested in the harpsichords made by Couchet, the clever grandson of RUCKERS (q.v.): in yet another, the purchase of a jewel is mentioned to him, for the Princess of Orange; the very youthful daughter of Charles I.

⁴ The Duartes were influential Portuguese Jews of high culture, living in Antwerp, and a Duarte was related to Catharine of Braganza, and her ambassador in England. They were highly gifted in music.

(2) CHRISTIAN, Constantin's second son (b. The Hague, Apr. 14, 1629; d. there, June 8, 1695), studied at the University of Leyden, and was distinguished both as a musician and as a mathematician. He wrote various scientific works; two dealing with musical matters were published after his death:

'Novus Cyclus harmonicus' and 'Christiani Hugentii Cosmotheoros sive de terris coelestibus, earumque ornatu, conjecturae. Ad Constantinum Hugentium, Fratrem: Guglielmo III. Magnae Britanniae regi, a secretis. The Hague, 1698, 4to.'

A copy is in the British Museum, also an English translation:

'The Celestial Worlds discover'd, or conjectures concerning the inhabitants, plants, and productions of the worlds in the planets. London, 1698.'

This work is distinctly entertaining. The author states that music, like geometry, is everywhere immutably the same.

'All harmony consists in concord, and concord is all the world over fixed according to the same invariable measure and proportion. So that in all nations the difference and distance of notes is the same whether they be in a continued gradual progression or the voice makes skips over one to the next. Nay, very credible authors report that there's a sort of bird in America that can plainly sing in order six musical notes: when it follows that the laws of music are unchangeably fixed by nature.'

Discussing the probability of other planets being inhabited, and of the inhabitants' possible interest in music, and invention of musical instruments, he continues:

'what if they should excel us in the theory and practick part of musick, and out-do us in consorts of vocal and instrumental musick, so artificially composed, that they shew their skill by the mixtures of discords and concords? 'Tis very likely the fifth and third are in use with them.' 'The inhabitants of the planets may possibly have a greater insight into the theory of musick than has yet been discovered among us. For if you ask any of our musicians, why two or more perfect fifths cannot be used regularly in composition; some say 'tis to avoid that excessive sweetness which arises from the repetition of this pleasing chord; others say this must be avoided for the sake of that variety of chords . . . But an inhabitant of Jupiter or Venus will perhaps give you a better reason for this, viz. because when you pass from one perfect fifth to another, there is such a change made as immediately alters your key, you are got into a new key before the ear is prepared for it, and the more perfect chords you use of the same kind in consecution, by so much the more you offend the ear by these abrupt changes.'

HYDE, WALTER (b. Birmingham, Feb. 6, 1875), English tenor, studied at the R.C.M. under Gustave Garcia, to whose insistence on technical work he bears grateful testimony. While still at the R.C.M. he found his true métier as a singer, taking part with distinction in public performances of 'Euryanthe' and Stanford's 'Much Ado about Nothing.' He started his professional career on the stage at the now-demolished Terry's Theatre in the light opera 'My Lady Molly,' and sang afterwards in musical comedy. The turning-point of his life came in 1908 when the 'Ring' was done at Covent Garden in English under Richter. His first night as Siegmund established his reputation. It also won him Richter's enthusiastic approval. In the following year he sang Walter in 'The Mastersingers,' Richter having gone through the whole part with him at the piano. Possibly finding the tessitura rather trying Hyde has avoided singing Walter in recent years. In no way inferior to his Siegmund is his Parsifal. He sang it, though not at the first performance, when Beecham did the work at Covent Garden in 1919, with Albert Coates conducting, and later—1922 and 1924—at Covent Garden and His Majesty's for the British National Opera Company, of which he is a director. Outside the Wagner operas, Hyde has a fairly wide repertory, and one season at Covent Garden he sang Pinkerton to the Butterfly of Emmy Destinnova. In frequent request in the concert room, Hyde sang at the Hereford and Birmingham festivals of 1909 and in many later festivals up to and including Leeds, 1925.

HYDRAULUS, the water-organ of the ancients, was invented by Ctesibius the Egyptian about 300–250 B.C., and after undergoing various additions and improvements became the popular instrument of the gladiatorial shows and musical contests, Nero himself, according to Suetonius, having been a performer on it. Owing to its close association with pagan customs it was proscribed as an element in Christian worship, and so entirely was it lost sight of, at any rate in Western Europe, that in the Middle Ages the details of its construction became a matter of conjecture, the keyboard and stop action having in fact to be re-discovered. The Pneumatica of Hero (2nd cent.) and the treatise De architectura of Vitruvius (1st cent. A.D.) contain descriptions of the instrument, but such drawings as accompanied them are unfortunately lost. The Hydraulus is frequently portrayed on coins, in sculpture and mosaic, but it was not until 1885, when a little model of the instrument and a player, moulded entirely in baked clay, was discovered in the ruins of Carthage, that its actual form could be accurately determined. The model (about 7 in. high) dates from the early 2nd century A.D. (See PLATE XXXVI.) It is now in the Museum of St. Louis at Carthage, and the fragment of the organist has enabled the proportions of the original instrument to be fairly ascertained. It appears to have been about 10 ft. high including the base, and 4½ ft. in its greatest width. The air was forced by side pumps through a valve to the wind-chest, and so into a 'compressor,' shaped like an inverted bell, standing in water held in a central container or water-box. The water, being expelled by the in-rushing air, reacted on it and compressed it in the same way and for the same purpose as the lead weights now used on the wind reservoir of pneumatic organs. In the model the details of the keyboard are very distinct. When perfect there were nineteen pivoted keys (about 8 in. long and 2 in. wide in the original), which on being depressed pushed in metal slides held in position by springs and pierced with holes corresponding to similar holes in the soundboard of the organ. Three ranks of metal flue pipes are shown placed on three cross channels, into which the wind could be admitted at will by stops in the form of taps placed at the side of the instrument as minutely described by Vitruvius. A working half-size reproduction (wind pressure $3\frac{1}{2}$ in.) has been made by the writer, and was exhibited at the Musicians' Company's Exhibition in the Fishmongers' Hall (1904), where a demonstration with extant specimens of Graeco-Roman music was given, showing the use of the Hydraulus for solo performances and also with the Kithara as an accompaniment to the voice. The writer also published a description of the instrument with photographs and diagrams in the Reliquary (July 1904) and the Scientific American (Nov. 19, 1904). The pipes, which are all of the same diameter, a peculiarity observed also in the bronze pipes of two small organs now in the Museum at Naples, are pitched as unison, octave and super-octave. Following the explanations of Greek writers and extant traces, the unison rank is formed of stopped pipes furnished with movable plugs; the other ranks are open and provided with tuning slides. The feet of the pipes may have been of wood. An anonymous writer of the 2nd century A.D. states that six tropes or scales were used for the Hydraulus, viz. the Hyperlydian, Hyperastian, Lydian, Phrygian, Hypolydian and Hypophrygian which was a perfect octave below the first. The notes (according to Westphal and others) required to give the last five of these scales are nineteen, corresponding to the nineteen pipes in the Carthage organ. They are as follows:

G A B \flat B \sharp c d e \flat e \sharp ff \sharp g g \sharp a b \flat b \sharp c' c \sharp ' d' e' the Hyperlydian trope being in this case played on the octave stop. Vitruvius mentions organs with more than three stops; in some cases reed-pipes were probably used. (See, besides treatises and papers already alluded to, articles ORGAN and PIPE; also Chappell, History of Music (1874); Loret, Revue archéologique (1890), Art. 'Hydraulus,' in Darenberg and Saglio's Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines; and an excellent article by Dr. C. Maclean in HYLLARY, THOMAS, a 16th-century English musician. His motet, 'Tota pulchra es,' is in MS. (Harl. 1709, Medius only). He is the same as Hillaire who figures in the Pepysian MS. at Magdalen College, Cambridge (Q.-L.).

HYMN (Gr. hymnos; Lat. hymnus; Ger. Kirchenlied, Kirchengesang; Ital. inno). The first hymn mentioned in the annals of Christianity is that sung by our Lord and His Apostles, immediately after the institution of the Holy Eucharist. There is some ground for believing that this may have been the series of psalms called Hallel (cxiii. to cxviii. of the Authorised Version), which was used, in the Second Temple, at all great festivals, and consequently at that of the Passover.

In early times, any act of praise to God was called a hymn, provided only that it was sung. Afterwards, the use of the term became more restricted. The psalms were eliminated from the category, and hymns, properly so called, formed into a distinct class by themselves. $\Phi\omega\varsigma$ $\lambda\alpha\rho\acute{o}\nu$, a composition sometimes attributed to Athenagenes (c. 169), and still constantly sung in the Offices of the Eastern Church, is supposed to be the oldest hymn of this description now in use. Little less venerable, in point of antiquity, is the 'Angelic Hymn,' Gloria in excelsis Deo, of which special mention is made in the Apostolic Constitutions, a document of the 4th century, but based on earlier writings. It was not, however, until the latter half of the 4th century that the immense importance of the hymn, as an element of Christian Worship, became fully understood. S. Ephrem of Edessa made many valuable contributions to the store of hymns already in use at that period. S. Chrysostom zealously carried on the work at Constantinople, like S. Ephrem, with the special object of counteracting heresy through the popularisation of orthodox hymns.

In the West sacred poems of the same sort were written increasingly, and those of S. Hilary and of the Irish monks are of special merit. To S. Ambrose, however, is due the honour of having first introduced the true metrical hymn into the services of the Western Church, and given it a place side by side with the psalms and canticles. His example was followed by S. Benedict and other monastic founders; and the hymns on being adopted into the monastic services speedily overcame opposition, and became general in Divine Service. Only in conservative Rome were they excluded, and the opposition to them there was not broken down until the 9th century. S. Ambrose's favourite species of verse was Iambic Dimeter—the 'Long Measure' of English Hymnology—which was long regarded as the normal metre of the Latin hymn. S. Gregory the Great first introduced Sapphics; as in Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes.

Some of the poems which Prudentius had written in the 4th century were utilised as hymns, and thus were introduced several fresh metres: Trochaic tetrameter catalectic, as in Corde natus ex parentis; Iambic trimeter, O Nazarene, lux Bethlem, verbum patris; and Iambic dimeter catalectic, Cultor dei memento. One of the earliest instances of a hymn in elegiac verse is found in the Cruz benedicta nitel of Venantius Fortunatus (530-609). Other metres came into use from time to time, but the Ambrosian metre remained dominant. When the Proses and Sequences were introduced at the Mass, the two forms of composition went on side by side without confusion. The difference in their structure and use was sufficiently marked to keep them distinct (see SEQUENTIA).

The authorship of the plain-song melodies of these hymns is very uncertain. The unbroken connexion which exists in many cases between words and melody makes it probable that in such cases both came from the same source. But melodies were not always linked permanently to the words with which they were first connected. Thus the tune universally associated with the Veni Creator had in earlier days belonged to S. Ambrose's Easter hymn Hic est dies verus Dei. On the other hand, it seems clear that the tunes of Vexilla regis prodeunt and Pange lingua gloriosi praelium certaminis must spring from the same occasion which produced the words, viz. the translation of the relics of the Cross to Queen Rhadegund's monastery at Poitiers, Nov. 19, 569.

The plain-song melodies are to be seen in the Antiphonal, and many of them in the Vespéral, with the modernised forms of the Latin words. Many of them appear in English dress in Hymns Ancient and Modern and in the English Hymnal, with the ancient melodies in the forms in which they are given in early English antiphonals and hymnals; these are in some cases more correct than the forms now current abroad.

The character of these plain-song melodies differs from that of measured tunes in the greater freedom of rhythm which the plain-song has, owing to the fact that its notes have in themselves no determinate time-value. On the other hand, plain-song melodies of this class, and especially those that are entirely or nearly syllabic, approximate more closely to measured music than those of any other class; since, being set to metrical words, they acquire from them a more regular rhythm than melodies set to prose can ever have.

After the invention of discant, these venerable hymn tunes, or phrases selected from them, were constantly used as canti fermi for masses and motets. In the year 1589 Palestrina turned them to still better account in his great work entitled Hymni totius anni—a collection of hymns for every festival throughout the ecclesiastical year, admirably treated, in the polyphonic style, for three, four, five and six voices, and bearing traces of the great composer's best manner on every page. From a fine tall copy of the original Roman edition of this work of Palestrina's, preserved in the British Museum, we transcribe a portion of the Hymn for Passion Sunday—*Vexilla regis prodeunt*¹—the well-known melody of which is combined, throughout, with contrapuntal treatment of the most masterly description, involving clever imitations, and closely-interwoven fugal points, so carefully concealed beneath the expressive harmonies which result from them that their ingenuity is quite forgotten in the indescribable beauty of the general effect. A few Latin hymns, such as those to be found among the works of Hassler, Tallis, Byrd and some other great composers, have been set, for four or more voices, in a similar manner: but, as a whole, Palestrina's magnificent Hymnal stands alone.

Long before the middle of the 16th century, the science of hymnology had already begun to attract an immense amount of attention, in widely different directions. Hymns, or rather carols, of a somewhat lighter character than those we have been considering, had been sung, for ages past, between the scenes of the Mysteries and Miracle Plays which form so conspicuous a feature in the religious history of the Middle Ages. Many of these—notably such as set forth the glad tidings commemorated at Christmas-tide—became, from time to time, extremely popular, and obtained a firm hold on the affections of rich and poor alike. Well knowing the effect of songs upon popular feeling, and fully appreciating the beauty of the Latin hymns to which he had been accustomed from his earliest youth, Luther turned these circumstances to account by producing a vast amount of German Kirchenlieder, which, adapted to the most favourable melodies of the day, both sacred and secular, and set for four, five and six voices (with the plain chant in the tenor) by Johannes Walther, were first published at Wittenberg in 1524, and re-issued, in the following year, with a special preface by Luther himself. Innumerable other works of a similar description followed in rapid succession. The vernacular hymn found its way more readily than ever to the inmost heart of the German people. The Choral was sung, far and wide; and, at last, under the treatment of John Sebastian Bach, its beauties were developed, with a depth of insight into its melodic and harmonic resources which is not likely ever to be surpassed. (See CHORAL.)

In France, the metrical psalms of Clement Marot, and Theodore Beza, were no less enthusiastically received than the hymns of Luther in Germany, though their popularity was less lasting. The history of the French Psalter has already been recounted in the article BOURGEOIS.

It was not to be supposed that the movement which had spread thus rapidly in France and Germany, would be suffered to pass unheeded in England. The Reformation had created here the like popular demand for a musical outlet for its religious enthusiasm, and moreover the study of the MADRIGAL (q.v.) had already brought part-singing to a high degree of excellence. Here, as in France, the first incentive to popular hymnody seems to have been the rendering of the psalms into verse in the mother tongue, and the English metrical Psalter of Sternhold and Hopkins met the need. (See PSALTER.)

Apart from the metrical Psalter there was little development of hymns properly so called, and nothing at all analogous to the German Chorals. The old Latin hymns disappeared for no other reason than that there was no one to put them into English dress. Archbishop Cranmer himself lamented the failure of his efforts in this direction. Thus the bald translation of the Veni Creator into common metre inserted in the Ordinal in 1550 represented the sum total of the result of the efforts of the Reformers to preserve the old office-hymns.

Attempts to introduce the German Chorals in an English dress were no more successful: Bishop Coverdale began them about 1539 with his Goostly Psalmes and Spirituall Songs: but the moment was not propitious, and he found no imitators in this direction. Indeed, his little book with its crude adaptations of German words and tunes is of excessive rarity, and it is doubtful if any copy exists except the one preserved in the Library of Queen's College, Oxford.

One great hindrance, no doubt, to the spread of the hymns was the objection, which had militated against the introduction of hymns in early days and now appeared afresh and with new force, against the use in public worship of anything that was not directly scriptural. The early metrical psalters, it is true, accepted into the Appendix, which mainly comprised the Bible canticles, some few pieces of a non-scriptural character. Besides the Te Deum and Veni Creator which had the authority of the Prayer Book to support them, there were, for example, the 'Lamentation,' 'O Lord, turn not Thy face away,' which survives in an altered form in Hymns Ancient and Modern, No. 103; and others of a penitential character—'The Complaint of a Sinner,' 'The Humble Suit of a Sinner,' together with a prayer for peace and occasionally some other 'prayer' or a thanksgiving at Communion. But it is noteworthy that apart from these, the Appendix drew direct upon German sources, not only for the metrical version of the Lord's Prayer but also for Luther's celebrated 'Pope and Turk' hymn, 'Preserve us, Lord, in Thy dear word, From Pope and Turk defend us, Lord'; but here the hospitality of the Appendix came to an end, and the metrical Psalter admitted for a hundred years or more no new guests.

Hymns existing apart from the metrical Psalter had little chance of being taken into public use. The Elizabethan period was not unproductive of such compositions, e.g. Hunnis's Handfull of Honisuckles (1583), but they gained no entrance to the Church Services. In 1623 a bold attempt to widen the sphere failed, though it was an attempt of a very high order. George Wither then published his Hymns and Songs of the Church—a volume in which he was prudent enough to begin with paraphrases of Scripture, of the recognised sort, before coming to the Hymns for Festivals or Special Occasions. He also secured for the music the co-operation of Orlando Gibbons, who provided sixteen tunes, set in two parts only, treble and bass, thus differing from the usual method of setting the psalm tunes. But in spite of these advantages the book was a failure. The work of Withers and Gibbons fell flat; subsequent generations recognised its worth, but it is only in the 1904 edition of *Hymns Ancient and Modern*¹ that Gibbons's tunes have received the full welcome due to them. When Playford tried to recover the church music after the Restoration, he was not content merely to reproduce the old Psalter, but he began to enlarge its scope. In his Psalms and Hymns of 1671, he introduced a hymn for Good Friday as well as 'Six divine songs for one voice to the organ.' Finding this publication too elaborate and musicianly for the low state of musical efficiency prevalent since the Rebellion, he published his simpler Whole Book of Psalms in 1677, which became the standard edition of Sternhold and Hopkins. To this he made further additions, including the translation which Bishop Cosin had made in 1627 of the hymn, 'Jam lucis orto sidere,' for his Collection of Private Devotions. Already his version of the Veni Creator had been adopted into the Prayer Book of 1661, from the same source; and no doubt this reflected a sort of authority on the other hymns in the same book.

When the New Version of the Psalter, written by Tate and Brady, was issued in 1696, it drew a sharper line at the psalms and cast the additional matter more definitely into a 'Supplement.' Within this section simultaneously, the number of hymns began a little to increase; and the Supplement was definitely authorised, with the Psalter, by the Crown in 1700. Thus there appeared for the first time the familiar hymn, 'While shepherds watched their flocks by night,' and with it, Easter hymns and Hymns for Holy Communion. Hymns for the latter occasion had appeared occasionally in the early Psalters—for example in Daman's Psalms of 1579, but henceforward they came into regular use throughout the 18th century.

The end of the 17th century had already seen one book win success in which the hymns had crept out from beneath the shelter of the psalms, and taken up a stand on their own account. This was Select Psalms and Hymns for St. James's, Westminster, 1697. But with the new century the position began entirely to change, and the hymns began a new career of self-assertion, which has ended in their ousting almost entirely the metrical psalms. The years immediately preceding had witnessed the real beginnings of English creative hymnody. John Austin had followed Cosin in setting hymns in his book of Devotions, and had gone beyond him in appending a larger collection. Bishop Ken had written his three immortal hymns; and, most important of all, the new liberty of worship conceded to Nonconformists had set free among them a great creative force of sacred verse and song. Baxter and Mason had begun the traditions, which were taken up by Watts and Doddridge, and handed on to the Wesleys. Among the Nonconformists, at any rate, the monopoly of the metrical Psalter was now broken down, and the hymns had won an established place for themselves.

Simultaneously, Playford and others began to gather up the results of a parallel activity on the part of the musicians. The first edition of The Divine Companion was designed as a supplement to the Psalter, and contained only novelties. These included six tunes by Dr. Blow, several by Jer. Clarke, and one by Croft. Of these, one by Clarke has since held the field—viz. the fine tune later called Uffingham.² In the second edition of 1709 there were great additions, including Clarke's Brockham, 'I will extol,' and St. Magnus, with Croft's 148th.³

The new hymn tune was marked by the same solidity and sterling character which had made the old psalm tunes so satisfying; and later books carried on these good traditions. Thus Gawthorn's Harmonia perfecta of 1730 contains a large part of the Ravenscroft Psalm tunes, together with a collection of the best new hymn tunes in the same style. Some tunes of earlier date were also recovered and perpetuated, such as Tallis's 'Canon,' and Gibbons's 'Angels.' A fine example of the new accessions is the massive tune Eltham.⁴ Side by side with the hymn-books there were also collections of tunes by individual authors, such as Battishill's 'Twelve Hymns' (1765), Hayes's 'Sixteen Psalms' (1774), and others. These made valuable contributions to the succeeding general collections.

But already before this there were signs that the frivolity which had spoilt the music of the Restoration period had not been without an effect upon the hymns. In 1708 there was published a curious collection under the title of Lyra Davidica. The chief interest of the book lies in the fact that it was a new and serious attempt to introduce the German Choral to England; but at the same time the preface expressed the hope that a 'freer air than psalm tunes might be acceptable.' The freest air given is the familiar 'Jesus Christ is risen to-day, Allelujah.'⁵ The hymn is such a favourite that one can but judge it indulgently and in its purest form, as given in Songs of Synon (1905), it is a good deal less florid than in the usual version; nevertheless it marks the introduction of a new and frivolous spirit into English hymn tunes, which gradually spread throughout the 18th century, and had disastrous results. The same criticism may be made of the famous tune Helmsley. (See CARTER; CATLEY.) The Church of England kept very close to the metrical Psalter; and indeed it was not until 1769 that the first church hymn-book for general use was published, viz. Madan's Collection of Psalms and Hymns, known as the Lock Hospital Collection. But long before this, books for Nonconformist use abounded, and in them grave and frivolous tunes were combined, secular and unsuitable music was adapted to sacred words, repetitions were multiplied which obscured the meaning of the words, and vocal exercises more suitable to the Italian opera of the day were introduced for the honour and glory of the singers. The following tune is not by any means an extreme instance:

Langdon.

T. FIRTH.

How pleasant, how di - vine - ly fair,

O Lord of hosts, Thy dwell - ings are,

With long desire my spir - it faints

To meet th'assem - bles of Thy saints.

In 1791 the collections began to be codified. Dr. Rippon, who had already published a collection of words, then with the help of T. Walker, put out his Selection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes; when this was received with enthusiasm, Walker further issued a Companion to Dr. Rippon's Tune Book; and these two stood out prominent among the many collections for Nonconformist use throughout the early part of the 19th century.

With the coming of the new century came an awakened interest in hymns among English Churchmen, and the publication of many collections of psalms and hymns; these were chiefly for local use, but a few attained a wider popularity. Little was done on the musical side; the old psalm tunes, and the solid hymn tunes still held their ground more or less successfully against the frivolous compositions, while on the borderland lay a number of tunes, of which Rockingham, Martyrdom, Abridge, Moscow, in triple time, Miles Lane, Truro, Duke Street, in common time, may be cited as representatives. These had not the solid quality of the early tunes, but they had a grace and attraction of their own, and were far from the triviality of the worse tunes.

From 1850 onwards the influence of the Church revival made itself felt, and a new era set in. Hymns from the Latin and the German became more frequent, and a protest arose against the unworthiness of many of the existing hymns and tunes. The Hymnal Nodet (1853) revived not only the Latin hymns, but also their plain-song melodies. The work of sifting the old collections was carried out by H. Parr, while Dr. Maurice and Canon Havergal, in addition to undertaking this task on a smaller scale, set themselves also to adapt and introduce the best German melodies. Meanwhile a new school of indigenous hymn-tune writers had grown up, imbued with the new spirit. Some, inspired by the ancient psalm tunes, produced solid tunes of a lasting character; others, while avoiding the frivolity of the 18th-century tunes, fell into similar snares, such as catchy melodies and luscious harmonies, and produced tunes more suitable for partsongs than hymns, which have enjoyed an immense but a waning popularity. Many of the writers produced work of both classes, notably Sir John Stainer and Dr. Dykes, whose tunes are among the best and among the worst of those written in the latter half of the 19th century. The Church Hymn and Tune Book, published in 1852, set a high standard of church hymnody; the music was brought out by Dr. Gauntlett, who had already proved himself a skilled writer of good tunes. Two years later this was followed by Mercer's Church Psalter and Hymn Book, which acquired a wide circulation, and was of a comprehensive character. The year 1861 saw the first appearance of Hymns Ancient and Modern, 1863 of the Chorale Book for England, the Bristol Tune Book, the Merton Tune Book and others. Meanwhile, among the Nonconformist bodies the production of hymns and tunes had gone on without diminution. Numberless books for various denominations have been produced; they have drawn to a large extent upon the hymns and tunes of the Church of England as well as of Roman Catholic writers such as Faber and Caswall, and have given back much in return. The level of some of this work has been high, but on the contrary much of it has sunk to levels untouched before; and it is difficult to describe the emptiness and vulgarity of much that has been produced in England and America for revival services, and even for use in regular Sunday worship.

Of late years the books have diminished in number from the survival of the fittest. Among Church books, Hymns Ancient and Modern, Church Hymns and The Hymnal Companion to the Book of Common Prayer have occupied the larger part of the field. Among Nonconformist bodies there has been a good deal of assimilation, notably among the Wesleyans. The Scottish Church has done good work in preserving many fine old tunes, and such commentaries as James Love's Scottish Church Music (1891) and The Music of the Church Hymnary by Cowan and Love (1905) are of great value. Reference should also be made to Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology (1892, 2nd ed. 1904).

In 1904 both Church Hymns and Hymns Ancient and Modern underwent a thorough revision; but in neither case has the result become popular. Since then The English Hymnal, The Oxford Hymn Book and The Church Hymnal have been added to the list of the Church of England hymn-books, besides a number of specialised hymn-books—for missions, for missionary meetings, for schools and the like; while Hymns Ancient and Modern, since the unpopularity of the revision of 1904, has been modified by addition and recasting without any omissions. Among the books of other churches, the Scottish Church Hymnary and Mission Hymn Book deserve special mention. The standard of taste and musical attainment is rising, though but slowly. All the popular hymn-books contain a certain percentage of matter that is on its trial, and some music, more or less in quantity, which should disappear from use.

Among the more important and typical collections of metrical hymns and tunes, published in this country for use in Divine worship during the last half-century, the following may be named:

National Psalmody, B. Jacob (Novello); Surrey Chapel Music, V. Novello (Novello). The Psalter with appropriate Tunes, John Hullah, 1843 (J. W. Parker). Church of England Psalmody, Rev. H. Parr, with List of Composers and Authorities, 1846-77 (Novello). The Standard Psalm-tune Book, H. E. Dibdin, 1852 (Shaw). The Union Tune Book, J. I. Cobbin, 1854 (Sunday School Union), with Supplement by John Hullah, 1879. The Hymnal Noted, Rev. T. Helmore, 1853 (Novello). The Church Psalter and Hymn Book (Mervin's), John Goss, 1867 (Nisbet). Hymns Ancient and Modern, W. H. Monk, 1861-1904 (Clowes). The Congregational Psalmist, Dr. Gauntlett, 1862 (Hodder & Moughton). The Choral-book for England, W. H. Bennett and Otto Goldschmidt, 1863 (Longmans). The Bristol Tune Book, 1868 (Novello). Kemble's Selection (1864). A Hymnal, chiefly from the Book of Praise, J. Hullah, 1868 (Macmillan). The European Psalmist (1872). The Hymnary, J. Barnby, 1872 (Novello). The Church Hymnal (for Ireland), Sir R. P. Stewart, 1873-78, with excellent Biographical Index by Major Crawford (Dublin, S.P.C.K.). Church Hymns with Tunes, A. Sullivan, 1874 and 1904 (London, S.P.C.K.). Yattendon Hymns (1889). Songs of Sion (1904). The English Hymnal (1906). The Oxford Hymn Book (1909). Nonconformist.—Wesley's Hymns and New Supplement, George Cooper and E. J. Hopkins, 1877 (Wesleyan Conference Office), and New Wesleyan Book, 1904. Scottish Psalmody, etc., authorised by the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, 1878 (Nelsons). The Book of Psalm and Scottish Hymnal, by authority of the General Assembly, W. H. Monk, 1879 (Edinburgh, Nelsons). The Presbyterian Hymnal of the U.P. Church, Henry Smart (A. Elliot). The Office of Praise (Baptist) (Hamilton, Adams & Co.). The Psalter and Hymn Book of the Presbyterian Church (Nisbet). The Christian Hymnal (Shaw). The Church Hymnary (1888), a selection of great merit. Roman Catholic.—Arundel Hymns, edited by C. T. Gatty (1898, etc.). America.—Hymns and Songs of Praise, John K. Paine, U. C. Burnap, and James Flint 1874 (New York, Blandolph). The Children's Hymn Book (1881). The Scottish Hymnal (1886). HYMN OF PRAISE, the English title of Mendelssohn's LOBGESANG (q.v.).

HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN. The originator of this hymnal, still the most representative collection of the average hymnody of the Church of England, was the Rev. Sir Henry Williams Baker, Bart., vicar of Monkland in the diocese of Hereford, who wrote and translated many of the hymns which it contains, and by his energetic discharge of the duties of chairman of its committee for twenty years, mainly contributed to its success. After ascertaining by private communications the widely spread desire of Churchmen for greater uniformity in the use of hymns and of hymn-books in the services of the Church, Sir Henry Baker early in 1858 associated with himself for this object about twenty clergymen, including the editors of many existing hymnals, who agreed to give up their several books in order as far as might be to promote the use of one.

In the autumn of that year an advertisement was inserted in the Guardian inviting co-operation, to which more than 200 clergymen responded. In Jan. 1859 the committee set to work. A specimen was issued in May of the same year. In 1860 the first edition was published, with the Imprimatur of Dr. Hampden, Sir Henry Baker's diocesan. The first 'Edition with Tunes,' under the musical editorship of Professor W. H. Monk, King's College, London, appeared Mar. 20, 1861, an 'Appendix' in Dec. 1868, and in 1875 'The Revised and Enlarged Edition' appeared, completing the work for the time being. In 1889 a fresh supplement was added, but almost at once negotiations between the proprietors and Convocation led to a fresh revision being set in hand. The result of this was the publication in 1904 of a new edition, with extensive alterations both in words and music. When this edition failed to win wide acceptance a revision was made to the older policy, and a second supplement of words and tunes was added. In connexion with the 1904 edition, an Historical Edition was issued (Dec. 1909), giving the history of words and tunes.

Since its first introduction many million copies of the book have been sold. Its publication has been carried on by the survivors of the original committee and others associated with them, as a body of trustees constituted by deed for its management. W. S. R.; addns. W. H. F.

HYPER- (Gr. ὑπέρ, 'over,' 'above'; Lat. super); a prefix, extensively used in the terminology of ancient Greek music—wherein it appears in the names of the five acute modes—and thence transferred to the musical system of the Middle Ages. The nomenclature of the one system must, however, be very carefully distinguished from that of the other; for, though the same terms are, in many cases, common to both, they are used to designate very different things. For instance, the discarded Locrian Mode (B, C, D, E, F, G, A, B) is often called the Hyper-æolian, in recognition of the fact that its range lies a tone above that of the true Æolian; but this Mode has no connexion whatever with the Hyper-æolian of the Greeks; neither have the Authentic Modes, as we now use them, the slightest affinity with the Greek acute forms, though the prefix 'hyper' has sometimes been very unnecessarily added to the names of all of them.

Greek authors constantly use the prepositions ὑπέρ and ὑπὸ in what we should now consider an inverted sense; applying the former to grave sounds, and the latter to acute ones. This apparent contradiction vanishes when we remember that they are speaking, not of the gravity or acuteness of the sounds, but of the position on the lyre of the strings designed to produce them.

W. S. R.

HYPO- (Gr. ὑπὸ, 'under,' 'below'; Lat. sub); a prefix applied, in ancient Greek music, to the names of the five grave modes. In the Middle Ages it was added to the names of the seven Plagal Modes—the Hypo-dorian, the Hypo-phrygian, the Hypo-lydian, the Hypo-mixolydian, the Hypo-æolian, the discarded Hypo-locrian and the Hypo-ionian—the range of which lies a fourth below that of their Authentic originals.

Early writers also add this prefix to the names of certain intervals, when reckoned downwards instead of upwards; as Hypo-diatessaron (= Subdiatessaron), a fourth below. Hypo-diapente (= Subdiapente), a fifth below. (See INTERVAL.)

IAMBIC. An Iamb or Iambus is a metrical foot consisting of a short and a long syllable—as bêfôre; or as Coleridge¹ gives it, ‘Iambics march from short to long.’

IBACH & SONS. Johannes Adolf Ibach (b. Barmen, 1766) was the founder of this firm of pianoforte makers. In his childhood he learnt music from the monks of Beyenberg, whose organ he restored in later years, this being the first piece of work to bring him notoriety. He began life by being a children's shoemaker, and then made pianos with his own hands, without aid from any one, in the day when pianos were only made to order. He thus founded the pianoforte and organ manufactory in Barmen in 1794. In the year 1811, the worst year of the war, it was his proud boast that he made and sold no fewer than fourteen pianos. The manufactory became a family concern, his wife and daughters even helping in the work. In 1834 his son Carl Rudolf, and in 1839 his son Richard, were taken into the firm, which in consequence became known as Adolf Ibach Söhne. At his death the firm was called Carl Rudolf and Richard Ibach; then in 1869 Richard took the organ building and Carl Rudolf's son continued the pianoforte business alone, under the title of Rudolf Ibach Sohn, bringing it into high repute, founding a branch at Cologne and being appointed purveyor to the Prussian court. The English business was established in 1880, and the premises in Wigmore Street were opened in 1886. Ibach, Ltd., now (1926) has premises in Welbeck Street, London.

IDOMENEO RE DI CRETA, OSSIA ILIA E ADAMANTE, opera seria in 3 acts; words adapted by Abbé Varesco from a French work by Danchet (which had been set by Campra in 1712); music by Mozart. Composed Salzburg, 1780; produced Munich, Jan. 29, 1781. It does not appear ever to have been heard in Paris or London.

IGNANIMUS, P. ANGELUS (d. Venice, 1543), a Dominican friar of Altamura, Calabria. According to Fétis, he acquired at Venice a high reputation as maestro di cappella, and published 3 books of madrigals, 3-6 v.; a book of motets, masses and vesper psalms; and a book of lamentations and responsoria, 3-6 v., for Holy Week. He also left in MS. at his convent at Altamura a treatise on plain chant and ‘Ricerche con l'intavolatura,’ composed chiefly on the preparation and resolution of the fourth and seventh. ILEBORGH, FRATER ADAM, left a MS. written during his rectorship at Stendall in 1448, containing some short pieces for a keyboard instrument, which Cummings, the one-time owner of the MS., declared to be organ pieces.

ILLUMINATO DA TORINO, an early 18th century Franciscan monk who wrote ‘Canto ecclesiastico diviso in iv libri,’ containing 24 masses (Venice, 1733); ‘Canto ecclesiastico diviso in 3 libri’ (Venice, 1742), with plain chants.

ILYINSKY, ALEXANDER ALEXANDROVICH (b. Tsarskoe Selo, Jan. 24, 1859), studied music in Berlin, first under T. Kullak (pianoforte) at the Conservatoire, and afterwards under Bargiel (theory) at the Königl. Akademie. In 1885 he returned to Russia, and held a professorship at the Music School of the Philharmonic Society, Moscow. His chief works are as follows:

ORCHESTRA.—Three suites: 1. Op. 4. 2. ‘A Village Holiday.’ 3. ‘Nour and Anitra,’ op. 13. A symphony. Symphonic scherzo, ‘Croatian Dances.’ Music to ‘Oedipus Rex’ and ‘Philoctetes’ of Sophocles. Overture to Count A. Tolstol’s ‘Tsar Feodor.’ Symphonic sketch, ‘Psyche.’

VOCAL AND ORCHESTRAL.—Two cantatas: ‘Strekoz’ and ‘The Roussalka’ (for female voices only).

OPERATIC.—‘The Fountain of Bakhchisarai.’

MISCELLANEOUS.—String quartet. Songs, op. 5. Pianoforte pieces, opp. 7, 13. Pieces for violin, op. 6.

IMBAULT, J. J. (b. Paris, Mar. 9, 1753), violinist and music publisher. He was a precocious violinist, and at the age of 10½ years was a pupil of Gaviniès and soon became his chief disciple. He was heard as soloist in Mar. 1770 at the third of the concerts organised by Gaviniès for the benefit of the drawing-school of Bachelier; and later at the Concert Spirituel, on a number of occasions, at the Concert d’Émulation (1786). He had the honour of performing thrice with their composer, the ‘Symphonies Concertantes’ of Viotti in the presence of Queen Marie-Antoinette. Shortly before the death of Gaviniès, in 1800, he gave two concerts for the benefit of his master, who gave him in gratitude his portrait drawn by Paul Guérin. He was a member of the Société Académique des Enfants d’Apollon over which he presided in 1819, and was nominated, in 1810, a member of the Imperial Chapel.

He has great importance as publisher of works of Haydn (edition of 56 quartets, with portrait, 1808), of Marpurg (treatises of fugue and counterpoint), of Viotti, Rode, Kreutzer, Clementi, Dupont, etc. His first privilege appears to date from 1787.

IMBERT, HUGUES (b. Moulins-Engilbert, Nièvre, Jan. 11, 1842; d. Jan. 15, 1905), French musical critic and littérateur, received his first lessons in music from his father, and was educated at the Collège Sainte Barbe in Paris, where he had violin lessons from Fauchaux and R. Hammer.

Notwithstanding the duties of an official career, he kept up his intimacy with musicians, and his first book of criticism, Profils de musiciens (consisting of articles published first in the Indépendance musicale in 1886), appeared in 1888. Another series of Profils de musiciens appeared in 1892; and in the previous year, under the title Symphonie, he published a volume of critical essays, mainly musical; Portraits et études (1894) contains, among other musical studies, a striking article on Brahms's Requiem, and a separate Étude sur J. Brahms appeared in the same year. Profils d'artistes contemporains (1897) deals with the younger French composers; Rembrandt et Wagner, le clair-obscur dans l'art (1897) is, as its title indicates, a contribution of some value to the Wagner literature, treating many questions from a fresh point of view. His other works are Ch. Gounod (1897), G. Bizet (1899), La Symphonie après Beethoven, a reply to Wein-gartner's pamphlet (1900), and the last of Imbert's volumes is a set of studies, literary and musical, called Médailles contemporains (1903). He contributed important articles to the Revue d'art dramatique, the Revue d'art ancien et moderne, the Revue bleue, L'Art musical, The Musician (his sketch of Vincent d'Indy and Rembrandt and Wagner being included in translations, in Studies in Music, 1901), and to the second edition of this Dictionary. From 1889 he was a regular contributor to the Guide musical, of which he shared the direction with Maurice Kufferath. He was a valiant champion of the cause of contemporary music, and while fostering the love of Berlioz and Schumann in France, may be said to have revealed the music of Brahms to the Parisian public. G. F.

IMBROGLIO, i.e. confusion, a passage in which the vocal or instrumental parts are made to sing, or play, against each other, in such a manner as to produce the effect of apparent, but really well-ordered confusion. The three orchestras in the ball-room scene of 'Don Giovanni' may be cited as an instance, and the end of the second act of 'Die Meistersinger' is perhaps the most elaborate example in existence.

IMITATION, a device of thematic development belonging to polyphonic music of all types, whereby a voice or part repeats a figure of melody previously heard in another voice or part.

Imitation may be held to include every form of CANON (q.v.) together with such recognised classical formulæ as the subject and answer of a fugal exposition and stretto. (See FUGUE and INVERTIBLE COUNTERPOINT.) It, however, covers more ground than any of these processes or all of them taken together. In modern music it does not necessarily entail any literal copying of the first statement. In the classical period of the sonata imitation was used freely, most frequently by preserving the rhythm and the general outline (rise and fall) of the melodic figure, while altering the intervals.

In this and countless parallel cases the melodic intervals of the figure are altered in conformity with the harmonic plan. But a new phase of imitation is to be noted in certain more recent works, where the imitations, so far from being modified in this direction, are deliberately arranged to avoid compliance with any harmonic scheme.

'Heldenleben.'—STRAUSS.

Here are two groups of imitation, (a) and (b), so designed that the tonality of each part conflicts with those about it. The passage is one of ironic humour, but it is typical of a style followed by many later composers without any numerous intention. Theorists have used such expressions as 'polytonality' and 'atonality' to describe it. (See HARMONY.) The noteworthy point here is that in such passages as this the imitative nature of the melody affords a principle of coherence which serves to mitigate the most extreme harmonic conflicts. (Cf. FORM.) c.

IMMORTAL HOUR, THE, opera in 2 acts; text adapted from Fiona M'Leod's play; music by Rutland Boughton. Produced by the Glastonbury Festival Players, Aug. 1914, and later elsewhere, and for a run, Regent Theatre, Oct. 13, 1922.

IMMYNS, (1) JOHN (d. Cold Bath Fields, Apr. 15, 1764), by profession an attorney, was an active member of the Academy of Ancient Music. Having in his younger days been guilty of some indiscretion which proved a bar to success in his profession, he was reduced to become clerk to a city attorney, copyist to the Academy, and amanuensis to Dr. Pepusch. He possessed a strong alto voice and played indifferently on the flute, violin, viola da gamba and harpsichord. At the age of forty, by the sole aid of Mace's Musick's Monument, he learned to play upon the lute. In 1741 he established the MADRIGAL SOCIETY (q.v.). In 1752, upon the death of John Shore, he was appointed lutenist of the Chapel Royal. He was a diligent collector and assiduous student of the works of the madrigal writers and other early composers, but had no taste whatever for the music of his own time. He died of asthma at his residence in Cold Bath Fields.

His son, (2) JOHN (d. 1794), made music his profession, became a violoncellist and organist, and was the first organist of Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars Road, which post he held for about a year, until his death. W. H. H.

IMPROMPTU. Originally no doubt the name for an extempore piece; but as no piece can be extempore when written down, the term is used for pianoforte compositions which have (or aim at) the character of extempore performances. The most remarkable are Chopin's, of which there are 4—opp. 29, 36, 51, and 66 (Fantaisie-Impromptu in C♯ minor). The two sets of pieces by Schubert known as impromptus—op. 90, Nos. 1 to 4, and op. 142, Nos. 1 to 4, mostly variations—were, the first certainly and the second probably, not so entitled by him. The autograph of the first exists. It has no date, and no title to either of the pieces, the word 'Impromptu' having been added by the publishers, the Haslingers, one of whom also took upon himself to change the key of the third piece from G♭ to G. The autograph of the second set is at present unknown. It was to these latter ones that Schumann devoted one of his most affectionate papers (Gesamm. Schriften, iii. 37). He doubts Schubert's having himself called them impromptus, and would have us take the first, second and fourth as the successive movements of a sonata in F minor. The first does in fact bear the stamp of a regular 'first movement.' Schumann himself has impromptus on a theme of his wife's, op. 5, and another impromptu among his Albumblätter. Neither Beethoven, Weber, nor Mendelssohn ever used the word. G.

IMPROPERIA, i.e. 'The Reproaches,' proper to Good Friday morning in the Latin Rite. The text is based on passages from Micah and other prophets, and the refrain is the Trisagion, sung both in Greek and in Latin.

The main thought is the sorrowful remonstrance of our Lord with His people, concerning their ungrateful return for the benefits He has bestowed upon them. The text was originally sung to well-known plain-song melodies, preserved in the Graduale Romanum, and still retained in very general use, both in England and on the Continent; but since the Pontificate of Pope Pius IV. they have been invariably chanted, in the Sistine Chapel, to some simple but exquisitely beautiful Faux bourdons, to which they were adapted by Palestrina in the year 1560.

No printed copy of the Improperia was issued, either by Palestrina himself, or the assignees of his son Igino. They were first published in London by Dr. Burney; who, on the authority of a MS. presented to him by the Cavaliere Santarelli, inserted them, in the year 1771, in a work entitled La musica della Settimana Santa, which has now become very scarce. Alfieri also printed them among his 'Excerpta,' published at Rome in 1840; and in 1863 Proske included them in the fourth volume of his Musica Divina. Burney's version was reproduced, by Choron, among his examples of the great masters, in 1836; and again, in 1840, by Vincent Novello, in Holy Week Music, as used at the Sistine Chapel at Rome. These, with Haberl's in the collected edition of Palestrina's works, were accepted as the principal authorities until in 1919 CASIMIRI (q.v.) discovered the original autograph score with Palestrina's own final corrections, and published it as 'Il Codice, 59.' This proved that none of the published versions from Burney to Haberl accurately represented the composer's intentions. The varied readings of Burney (1771), and of Alfieri (1840),

however, are both valuable and interesting, as records of the abbellimenti used in the Pontifical Chapel at the time of their transcription.

IMPROVISATION, see EXTEMPORISATION.

INCIDENTAL MUSIC is the term applied to music which proceeds during the action of a play, and is thus distinguished from overture, entr'actes, or interludes. Properly speaking, the name should be confined to the musical numbers which are 'incidental' to the action, such as 'marches, dances, or songs; but it is often applied to what is in Germany called 'Melodram.' (See MELODRAMA.)

That music of an incidental kind was in use in Shakespeare's time is proved by the first words of the Duke in 'Twelfth Night,' but none of this instrumental music has come down to us, and only a few of the many songs in the whole range of Elizabethan drama have carried with them the tradition of their original tunes. The 'Theatre Ayres' of Purcell and his contemporaries were of the nature of entr'actes, and therefore do not come under the head of incidental music (see ACT-TUNE); but such works of Purcell as 'The Fairy Queen' and 'King Arthur' seem to have been a kind of incidental music, although the whole scenes in which the music occurs were apparently intercalated in the drama, as a succession of interludes with vocal and instrumental music as well as action.

Beethoven's music to 'Egmont,' 'The Ruins of Athens,' 'King Stephen,' and 'Leonora Prohaska,' is known, at least by name, to all students; Weber's to 'Preciosa' has preserved that play in the repertory of many a German theatre; and Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music is considered by many good judges as among the very finest of his compositions. Later famous instances of the Continental stage are Humperdinck's music to 'Königskinder' (subsequently developed into an opera) and Bizet's music to 'L'Arlésienne.'

In the English theatre Hatton's compositions for the Shakespearean revivals of Charles Kean at the Princess's Theatre from about 1852-58 were among the most important things written by a distinguished musician for special occasions; and it was the incidental music to 'The Tempest' that first brought the name of Sullivan into prominence, although it was first played at the Crystal Palace apart from any revival of the play. During Irving's management of the Lyceum Theatre it became the fashion for managers to commission new incidental music for almost every play they produced or revived, thus giving opportunity to many excellent composers. Those who have gained special prominence in this kind of work include Sullivan, Stanford, Mackenzie, Edward German, Coleridge Taylor, Norman O'Neill. The last named, as musical director to the Haymarket Theatre, has made a close study of all the practical considerations involved. The results of his experience are summarised in a lecture, Music to Stage Plays, delivered before the Incorporated Society of Musicians, and reported in Mus. T., Feb. 1914, p. 113.

INCLEDON, (1) CHARLES BENJAMIN (b. St. Kevern, Cornwall, 1763¹; d. Feb. 18,² 1826), was the son of a medical practitioner at St. Kevern. At 8 years of age he was placed in the choir of Exeter Cathedral, where he received his early musical education, first from Richard Langdon and afterwards from William Jackson. In 1779 he entered on board the Formidable, man-of-war, ninety-eight guns, under Captain (afterwards Rear-Admiral) Cleland. On the West India station he changed his ship for the Raisonné, sixty-four guns, Captain Lord Hervey. His voice had now become a fine tenor, and his singing attracted the attention of Admiral Pigot, commander of the fleet, who frequently sent for him to join himself and Admiral Hughes in the performance of glees and catches. Incledon returned to England in 1783, when Admiral Pigot, Lord Mulgrave and Lord Hervey gave him letters of introduction to Sheridan and Colman. Failing to obtain an engagement from either manager he joined Collins's company and made his first appearance at the Southampton Theatre in 1784 as Alphonso in Dr. Arnold's 'Castle of Andalusia.' In the next year he was engaged at the Bath Theatre, where he made his first appearance as Belville in Shield's 'Rosina.' At Bath he attracted the attention of Rauzzini, who gave him instruction and introduced him at his concerts. Here he took the part of Edwin in 'Robin Hood.' In 1786 he made his first appearance in London at Vauxhall Gardens with great success, and during the next three years he was engaged there in the summer and at Bath in the winter.

On Sept. 17, 1790, he made his first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre as Dermot in Shield's 'Poor Soldier,' and from that time for upwards of thirty years held a high position in public favour, singing not only at the theatre and Vauxhall, but also at concerts, the Lenten oratorios, and the provincial music meetings.

² Date given by W. S. R. Feb. 11 was given by W. S. R.

He sang in the first performance of the 'Creation' on Mar. 28, 1800, at Covent Garden, and in 1803 at the Worcester Festival. In 1817 he visited America, and made a tour through a considerable part of the United States, where he was received with great applause, though his voice was past its prime. He returned to England in 1818, took his leave of the stage at the English Opera House, Apr. 19, 1822, and went to live at Brighton. In 1804 he started his melange, 'The Wandering Melodist,' which he gave in Dublin in 1805. Early in 1826 he went to Worcester for the purpose of giving his entertainment, where he was attacked by paralysis. He was buried in Hampstead Churchyard.

Incleton's voice and manner of singing were thus described by a contemporary:

'He had a voice of uncommon power, both in the natural and falsette. The former was from A to g', a compass of about fourteen notes; the latter he could use from d' to e' or f', or about ten notes. His natural voice was full and open, neither partaking of the reed nor the string, and sent forth without the smallest artifice; and such was its ductility that when he sang pianissimo it retained its original quality. His falsette was rich, sweet and brilliant, but totally unlike the other. He took it without preparation, according to circumstances either about d', e' or f', or ascending an octave, which was his most frequent custom; he could use it with facility, and execute ornaments of a certain class with volubility and sweetness. His shake was good, and his intonation much more correct than is common to singers so imperfectly educated. . . . He had a bold and manly manner of singing, mixed, however, with considerable feeling, which went to the hearts of his countrymen. He sang like a true Englishman. . . . His forte was ballad.'

All who had heard Incledon's singing of 'The Storm' (which he sang in character as a sailor) were unanimous in pronouncing it unique, both as a vocal and an histrionic exhibition. Of the songs written expressly for him it may suffice to mention Shield's 'Heaving the Lead' and 'The Thorn.' He was also famous in the fine song 'The Arethusa,' probably composed by O'Carolan.

(2) CHARLES VENANZIO (d. Bad Tüffer, 1865), his eldest son, originally engaged in agricultural pursuits, but on Oct. 3, 1829, appeared at Drury Lane Theatre as Young Meadows in 'Love in a Village,' and shortly afterwards played Tom Tug in Dibdin's 'Waterman.' Meeting, however, with but very moderate success he returned to his former avocation for a time, and afterwards lived at Vienna as a teacher.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS, THE, was founded in June 1882 by James Dawber, Mus.B., of Wigan, in conjunction with Dr. Henry Hiles, of Manchester, for the furtherance of the following objects: The union of the musical profession in a representative Society; the provision of opportunities for the discussion of matters connected with the culture and practice of the art; the improvement of musical education; the organisation of musicians in a manner similar to that in which allied professions were organised; and, by means of registration, the obtaining of legal recognition of qualified teachers of music as a distinctive body. Forming a 'Society of Professional Musicians' the promoters of the movement by visiting the neighbouring towns and obtaining the cordial support of the musicians of the district, and by extending their missionary work, succeeded in forming allied sections in Yorkshire and the Midland Counties.

In Jan. 1885 matters were considered sufficiently advanced to render combined action advisable by the union of the sections in one Society. A General Council was formed, with E. Chadfield, of Derby, as Honorary Secretary, and A. Page as Honorary Treasurer, and in Jan. 1886 it was resolved to hold a conference of the whole Society in London for the purpose of obtaining the adhesion of the London musicians to the movement. A meeting was held in the Charing Cross Hotel, under the presidency of Dr. F. H. Cowen, and the claims of the Society were advocated by Hiles, Prout and Chadfield, with the result that W. H. Cummings, C. Vincent, A. Gilbert, C. E. Stephens and many others joined the Society, and afterwards became some of its warmest advocates. The whole of England being thus included in the organisation, the word 'National' was added to the title of the Society.

In 1892 the Society was incorporated as an artistic association, and assumed its present title 'The Incorporated Society of Musicians.' The following year, 1893, the Duke of Edinburgh became President of the Society, a position which he retained until his death. Subsequent Presidents were Dr. A. H. Mann, Allen Gill and Sir Landon Ronald (1925). In the autumn of 1893 a missionary deputation visited Ireland and Scotland, and sections were formed embracing the whole of the sister kingdoms. Meetings are held periodically in the several sections, discussions on musical subjects take place, addresses are read and performances given, so that each section becomes a social and artistic centre for the musicians of the district. In addition an annual conference in one of the capitals, or one of the large cities of the United Kingdom, is held.

The examinations of the Society, both Local and Professional, are conducted by the General Council. The Society is governed by a General Council consisting of delegates elected annually by the various sections. An annual year book is published in which the affairs of the Society are fully described.

Most of the large sections of the Society have formed Benevolent Funds, and in 1897, in commemoration of Queen Victoria's Jubilee, the Society took over and has since continued the Orphanage for the Children of Musicians, first established by Miss Helen Kenway. The General Offices of the Society are at 19 Berners Street, London, W. Mr. Hugo Chadfield is the General Secretary.

INDIAN MUSIC. There is an Indian saying that music was born in the Carnatic, flourished in Oudh, and died in the Panjab. Like many another saying of that land, sometimes crystallised into myth which the historian does well not to ignore, this proverb contains a truth. The music of the Deccan, but especially of the Coromandel and Malabar coasts, can boast the oldest treatises (in Tamil), and has had time to reduce an original system of 22 tones to 12, whereas the music of the Panjab is the least systematised and the most cosmopolitan, while that of Lucknow or Gwalior, when Hindu and not Muhammedan, has the reputation of being the most typical.

India has been a land of invasions. How much the Aryans remembered of the songs of Mesopotamia (which is now thought to have been their original home), how much may be due to the peaceful penetration of Bactrian Greeks or the warlike invasion of Alexander, what influence may have come from the relations with China brought about by the Buddhist monks (whom there is no reason, however, to suspect of having been themselves musical), and how far the Mogul Court at Delhi succeeded in stereotyping Hindu music, all this is matter of conjecture based on sparse facts. One thing that is certain is that the European harmonium, at first imported but now home-made, is ruining that music, in the sense, at least, in which Kalidāsa (5th century) extolled, Jayadēva (11th) immortalised, Tyāgarāja (early 19th) served, and Rabindranath Tagore (20th) understands it.

THE SCALE.—All reading aloud in India is chanting. The Rigveda was and is chanted to three notes, and these were increased in the Sāmaveda, the oldest liturgy in the world, to five, six and seven. The Sāmans (sacrificial chants) may, though rarely, be heard nowadays, and they seem to comprise a scale, the two bracketed notes being usually alternatives, and the A at either end being sometimes included. These two alternatives, fourth and tritone, are the true basis of the Indian scale, as we shall see. There is no indication that the Sāmans were, as the chants in the Greek liturgy are, sung on a drone. Every song in a Rāg has a drone, but the Indians expressly say that though the Sāman notes are the same as those of the South Indian Rāg Abhogi, yet the Sāmans are 'not in a Rāg.'

At some time before the 4th century B.C.¹ the whole seven notes were taken upwards from C. In an early book of the Mahābhārata (perhaps 3rd century B.C.) the names by which they have always been known are first found:

B	Nishāda	.	.	abbrevd. NI
A +	Dhālvata	.	.	" Dha
G	Pañcama	.	.	" Pa
F	Madhyama	.	.	" Ma
E	Gāndhāra	.	.	" Ga
D	Rishabha	.	.	" Ri
C	Shādja	.	.	" Sa

and this C scale differs from ours only in the fact that the A is a little sharp, being taken as a whole tone from G instead of as a major third from F. A second scale was formed from this by sharpening the fourth, and the two were called Sa-grāma and Ma-grāma.² An important principle is involved in the way in which the second was derived from the first. The Ma-grāma was so called from its starting on Ma. But for its third note it was then confronted with the Dha which was too sharp. So this was directed to be flattened to the true third (A + to A). Now when it came to the sixth note (D), that was in the same relation to C as A + had been to G; and thus putting both scales on the same tonic, C, they differ only by the Sa-grāma having a natural and the Ma-grāma a sharp fourth. The Greek solution of the same problem by their διεζευγμένον and συνημιμένον differed only in detail. Of the names only Madhyama (central) and Pañcama (fifth) have any musical meaning, though Shādja (born of six) may refer to some early way of taking the scale; also that the Greeks were long settled in Gāndhāra (Kandahar), and that the Greek Doric, the foundation of their music, was an E scale, may have some bearing on our view of a mythical Ga-grāma (E scale). In the meantime another scale (C, D♭, E, F, G, A♭, B, C) is considered fundamental in South India.

MOOD.—Now it is clear that the Sa-grāma and Ma-grāma are modes of one another, and that from the two of them together no more than seven octave scales (murchaṇa) are to be won. But it is also clear that as far back as we have any records the modes were arrived at not so much by taking different notes for tonics as by flattening the notes other than C, F (or F♯) and G. In the Ratnākara (early 13th century) there are five terms for these flattenings applicable to D, E, A and B, viz. brilliant (dīpta), extended (āyata), soft (mṛdu), pathetic (karuṇa), and intermediate (madhya). For an interpretation of these see Int. Mus. Ges 9th Jahrgang, pp. 461-4, and for an analysis of the scale at that period E. Clements's Introduction to the Study of Indian Music. These five terms are also mentioned in the Nāṭya-sāstra (29. 30), but without definition.

Secondly, the scales were varied by 'extensions' (tāna), or what we call 'gaps'; any one of the seven notes might be omitted, or any one of five specified pairs of notes a fourth apart (Nāṭya. 28. 35). Lastly, owing to the sixth of both grāmas being a comma sharp on ours, and for similar reasons, the intonation of some of the Rāgs in North India (but not in the south) differs from ours. Hence the Rāgs are numerous. Bharata enumerates 63—about what an average musician knows and uses nowadays: the expert knows a good many more. That disposes of the widely accepted view of the 'quarternote'—that it is half a semitone, and that Hindus have 22 of these srutis to make a melody with! What they have is five, six, or seven notes to the octave, but 60 or more ways of disposing them. Their music sounds to us, after a little time, not so much 'out of tune' as a 'coloured' version of our own. It is not the different intonation that disturbs us, but the tritones and augmented seconds that are scattered freely over their melodies. As soon as such typical modes as become really familiar we suddenly are made aware of a strange beauty and pathos. The accidentals over the stave mean as a rule about a comma's difference. The sforzando, which happens here to be in each case on the third of the scale (though that varies with the Rāg), marks something that we might call the 'vocal tonic,' as opposed to the drone-tonic (C); and it is that principally that gives its character to the mode. This character is hinted at in the times of day to which they are assigned—the morning for adoration, the evening for merriment, midnight for calm and mystery. They feel this ethos so strongly that each of the famous Rāgs—a dozen or so—has its Rāgmāla, or picture, varying from daubs sold in the bazaar to a work of art, of the sort of things that might be happening to the sound of that music. The word Rāg—'colour'—means 'emotion' or 'passion.' In these Rāgs they have a wonderful apparatus both for making melodies and for classifying them. They give them names which describe their origin, real or supposed, in a locality, an occupation, a quality of mind, or some famous musician. An Indian of any education knows by the sound of them the principal Rāgs, associates them with one or another of the eight three-hour 'watches' or of the six seasons.

TIME.—Two time dimensions are recognised—the period (āvart, 'district') and the bar (vibhāg, 'division'). The period is almost always four-bar, and the few exceptions seem to be accidents. The principle of the time-units within the bar follows the varieties of prosodic feet. These are of one, two, three, or four syllables, and the times (tāl) are decided by the number of units (mātra) in each syllable (akshara) or beat (tāl). Thus common time (līnkāl) has eight units (our quavers) with three beats (against our two) arranged usually $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$, sometimes $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$ and $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$ and inside these every conceivable metrical variety for the voice; the beats meanwhile are for the hand on the knee or for the fingers on the drums. There are usually two drums, sometimes one. The former are tuned to the fifth, the two ends of the latter to the octave, but in either case they act as a drone-tonic. There is an elaborate system of drumstrokes, made with the four fingers singly, or variously combined, the ball of the thumb, the palm of the hand, in the centre or at the edge of the drumhead, on either or both drums, all giving different qualities of sound; and there are separate calls (bol) to name these. These calls combine into a phrase (theka) co-extensive with the bar, and the phrases have ornamental variants (parand). The whole provides a rhythmical counterpoint to the melody. The following times are a few only (out of many dozens) which are in common use. The names for N(orth) and S(outh) India are here translated:

N. Tintāl. "Three beat."	S. Rūpaka. "Beautiful."	N. Chantāl. "Four beat."
N. Dādrā. (Muhammedan.)	N. Jhāp. "Jumping."	S. Jhampa. "Jumping."
6 $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$	10 $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$	8 $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$
N. Surphakta. "Crooked."	N. Rūpak. "Beautiful."	N. Tevra. "Triangular."
5 $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$	4 $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$	14 $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$

It must be understood that these notes represent the main drumbeats only, but that the melody and the theka can each take any shape. $\frac{4}{4}$ and both forms of $\frac{3}{4}$ are exceedingly common everywhere; $\frac{3}{8}$ is only used in Muhammedan songs, but any bar of $\frac{3}{4}$ may, and quite commonly does, resolve into one of $\frac{3}{8}$ and $\frac{7}{8}$ are common enough in the forms Jhāp and Tevra; the others are rare. $\frac{9}{8}$ exists, but only as $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$, and a common way of drumming common time is $\text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩} \text{♩}$.

It will easily be seen that the Hindu (not so much the Muhammedan) is never happy unless his drum gets a cross-rhythm with the melody. A friendly rhythmical contest between singer and drummer is much appreciated. Another device is by 'convergence' of two different times. Here is one out of many dozens of ways in which this might be done:

Right hand.

FORM.—The aria (kīrtanam) is at home in the south. It consists of—

1. First subject (pallavi) constructed round the vocal tonic (amsā).
2. Second subject (anupallavi) usually a fifth higher.
3. Development (caranam), phrases taken from 1 and 2.
4. Return to 1 and close on the drone-tonic (sruti or kharaj) or the fifth above (abhoga or coda).

Here are some fragments of a kīrtanam.

The theme is Deśādī. Ritigaula.

The time is Deśādī, that is, common time (South Indian Adi, the 'first' time) in its foreign form (Deś), i.e. the phrase beginning on the last of the bar. The mode is Ritigaula, which is usually given as

E♭ is amsā, with B♭ as the consonant to it; there is a slight tendency to omit the G, and more than a slight tendency to sharpen the A♭. A Rāg is not a scale but a melody-type, and the pallavi given here illustrates well the disjunct intervals of the type; the question of whether those intervals are prescribed for ascent or descent is not taken too strictly. Notice that the A♯ occurs in this melody in descent only, and has nothing of the leading note or of a change of key about it.

Then follow twelve variations of this, of which the last are—with only two variations, and after these a Svarā, or sol-fa'ed passage, by way of a cadenza then the Caranam, or, first and second subject combined, e.g.:

and so back by another Svarā to the Pallavi, and Fine.

The Kīrtanam is not uncommon in Bengal, but the more typical form in the north is the rondo, under the name of Khyāl. A singer, either alone or with the help of a ripieno, will take twenty minutes to half an hour over one of these, and perhaps you will not once notice his taking breath. Singing (chīja) and playing (gati) are not far apart; most things that are played can also be sung.

INSTRUMENTS

The Viṇā, as old as the Vedas, where it is called 'seven-stringed,' rests on the left shoulder and right knee of the seated player (see PLATE XXXVII.); the strings (four—two of steel, two of brass—with twenty-four semitonal, fixed, metal frets) are stopped by the left hand and plucked by the right finger-nails, which are grown long for the purpose. Three open strings, off the finger-board, are played as an upper drone by the little finger, and used to mark the time. The strings on the finger-board are tuned in one of three ways—G, c, g, c'; F, c, f, c', and G, d, g, d'. The compass is about three octaves. The tone is soft and plaintive. Two main kinds of grace note are obtained, (1) by a slide, as on the violin, (2) by a lateral pull (analogous to the finger pressure on the clavi-chord), and these raise the pitch by as much as three or four notes.

The SITAR is the instrument of Bengal. The frets of the sitar are movable, and are set for the octave-scale of the required rāg. The tone is louder and less pure than from the viṇā. The strings vary from three to seven and are tuned for four strings, g, c', f', c'', and for other numbers similarly. The SURBAHAR (Calcutta) has sympathetic strings, a mellow tone, is fatiguing to play and expensive to buy; otherwise, like the sitar.

The SĀRANGI has three thick strings, bowed; it is played for dancing and hence is of low caste; it has a viola tone and is much liked.

The TAMBURA has three open strings (G, d, g, provided with a capo tasto) and is used to give the drone note for singing (see PLATE LII. No. 1).

The TAUS, ESRAJ, RABAB, and other stringed instruments are of local repute; the dulcimer (qanun) is not often found outside the Panjab. The flute (vaṃṣa) has enjoyed prestige in the past, but is now the instrument of the jungle, where it can be made of bamboo in an hour. This has a low, sweet tone, like a tenor flute. The musician's instrument is the Surnai (N. or nāgasāram S.), a kind of oboe with something approaching a bassoon reed and a tone that sounds best, like that of the bagpipe, on the slope of a neighbouring hill. Military bands are recruited from surnai-players. The bagpipe (moshuq) belongs to N. India. The conch (sāṅkha), of few but mellow notes, is used in the temple, as also the bell (ghaṇṭa). The horn (śringa) is used in every village by the watchman, and had once a reputation as one of the 'five great sounds' (panca-mahā-śabdā) granted to dignitaries political or ecclesiastical.

Next to the viṇā in importance is the DRUM. It is the 'father of instruments.' It has many scores of forms. Details must be sought elsewhere; a few principles may be stated here. The typical drums are the tabla (right, and left hand wedged in the crook of the knee) and the dhol (slung like a muf). For tuning, both have braces and wedges; also the centre of the drumhead often has a plaster (āṭa) the size of a flerin, composed of flour and iron filings, which lowers the pitch and improves the resonance. Variety of tone quality rather than volume of sound is sought after. Secrets pass from end to end of India by means of the drum. To become a good drummer is a life work.

The characteristics of the music are those of the language (Sanskrit), of the architecture, the painting, the dancing—of the whole man, in fact. There is first an elaborate fancy for, and a loving touch in, detail, evidenced in the minute differences in time and tune of the different modes which are as firmly insisted on in their own localities as they are repudiated in any other. With this goes a comparative inability to generalise (in theory) or to construct (in practice) on a large scale. Behind this love of detail and indifference to structure lies a reflective spirit which thinks in emblems and symbols and regards all manifestations sub specie æternitatis. An audience will sway and tremble and shed tears. 'Bande Mātaram' at the beginning of the 20th century was more powerful even than 'Lilliburlero' at the end of the 17th.

Indian melody is more elaborately articulated than any purely melodic system that we know of. That may be because not much has reached us of the Chinese, which is older, or ever will reach us of the ancient Greeks, who perhaps embodied the Mediterranean civilisation. It has been singularly true to itself for two thousand years certainly, and probably for much longer; for it is doubtful whether the earliest records describe anything essentially different from what may still be heard at the courts of native princes. The Muhammedan invasion popularised it, and, in the process, blurred its distinctions. The English occupation, owing to our unfamiliarity as a nation with, if not our indifference or obtuseness to, artistic ideals, has slighted it. This has had a deeper effect than our mere introduction of equal temperament, the evil of which has been exaggerated, though it exists. For if ever music spoke the soul of a people, this music does. It has its light moments, its charlatans and its academics, like others, but when it is good it is then most Indian, and reveals man in the presence of God. We do not and we shall not make much of it without patience and practice, but it is worth both. We say no less, but we can say no more, of our own.

AN INDIAN VINA PLAYER

From Days Music & Musical Instruments, etc By permission of Messrs Novello & Co., Ltd

INDY, PAUL MARIE THÉODORE VINCENT d' (b. Paris, Mar. 27, 1851), eminent composer and teacher, came of a family of ancient nobility originating from the Vivarais, department of Ardèche. He was brought up by his paternal grandmother, Mme. Théodore d'Indy, a good musician.

He studied from 1862-65 under L. Diémer, attended Marmontel's piano classes and learnt harmony and composition from A. Lavignac. In 1867 he became acquainted with the Traité de l'instrumentation of Berlioz through his uncle, the composer Wilfrid d'Indy. Two years later he met H. Duparc, who was to initiate him into Wagner's music. In 1870 he composed, without having learnt composition seriously, his opp. 1 and 2, 'Trois Romances sans paroles' (piano) and 'La Chanson des aventuriers de la mer'; and sketched a grand opera, 'Les Burgraves.' He served throughout the Franco-Prussian War, and wrote a pamphlet (now extremely rare): Histoire du 105^e bataillon de la garde nationale en l'année 1870-71 (Paris, 1872). After the armistice he returned to musical studies and submitted to César Franck a quartet, in the hope of overcoming the objections to the musical profession which were expressed by his family. Franck, recognising much promise in the work, recommended him to pursue his studies diligently. From that moment (1872) he counted amongst the latter's pupils.

In 1873 d'Indy, who was now a first-rate pianist, entered Franck's organ class at the Conservatoire, where he obtained a second accessit in 1874, and a first in the following year. In 1875 he became successively organist at St. Leu and chorus-master under Colonne, and in order to obtain experience of orchestral detail took the position of second drummer, which he retained for three years, at the end of which time he began to devote himself entirely to composition. He was extremely helpful in organising Lamoureux's concerts and in directing the rehearsals, which led to such fine results as the performance of 'Lohengrin' (1887). Like many another musician, d'Indy owes the first performance of his works to Pasdeloup, and his overture 'Piccolomini' (Concert Populaire, Jan. 25, 1874), revealed a musician of lofty ideals, whose music was full of melancholy sentiment and rich orchestral colouring. This overture, altered and joined to the 'Camp de Wallenstein' (Société Nationale, 1880), and the 'Mort de Wallenstein' (Concert Populaire, Mar. 14, 1880), forms with 'Max et Thecla' (1873) the trilogy of 'Wallenstein,' (op. 12) a work inspired directly by Schiller, and one of the composer's most remarkable productions in that period. The entire trilogy was performed for the first time at the Concerts Lamoureux, Feb. 26, 1888. After this work he produced a symphony, 'Jean Hunyadi' (1875); an overture to 'Antony and Cleopatra';

'La Forêt enchantée' (1878), symphonic ballad after Uhland; a quartet for piano and strings in A; 'La Chevauchée du Cid' (1879), scena for baritone and chorus; 'Saugefeurie' (1884), legend for orchestra; a suite in D for trumpet (1886), two flutes and string quartet; 'Symphonie sur un chant montagnard français,' called 'Symphonie cévenole,' op. 25 (1886), for piano and orchestra (Lamoureux Concerts, 1887), a work of importance in the evolution of the symphony in modern times. A 'fantaisie' for orchestra and oboe solo, op. 31, on French themes, was played at the Lamoureux Concerts in 1888; 'Tableaux de voyage,' a suite for orchestra (unpublished), op. 36, was given at Angers in 1891; a set of symphonic variations, 'Istar,' op. 42, at the Ysaÿe concert in Brussels in 1897; a 'choral varié' for saxophone and orchestra is op. 55; and a second symphony in B flat, op. 57 (1902-03), was played at the Lamoureux Concerts in 1904.

D'Indy's first work for the stage was a small opéra-comique entitled 'Attendez-moi sous l'orme,' produced at the Opéra-Comique on Feb. 11, 1882, with but little success, but he made up for its failure by the dramatic legend 'Le Chant de la cloche' (1879-83), which gained the prize at the competition of the city of Paris in 1885, and was performed three times in 1886 under Lamoureux's direction. It placed its author in the first rank among the French modern school. His important opera 'Fervaal' (1889-95), op. 40, in three acts and a prologue, was given at Brussels, Mar. 12, 1897; and 'L'Étranger' (1898-1901), op. 53, in two acts, at the same theatre, Jan. 7, 1903.

Amongst other works may be mentioned a 'Lied' for violoncello and orchestra; piano pieces, 'Poème des montagnes,' op. 15; 'Helvetia,' op. 17; 'Schumanniana,' op. 30; 'Tableaux de voyage,' op. 33; a sonata (PF.), op. 63; 'Menuet sur le nom de Haydn,' op. 65, etc.; choruses, songs, sacred music (canticles, motets, cantatas), organ music. His chamber music works consist of 3 quartets, op. 7 (PF. and strings); opp. 35, 45 (strings); a trio (PF., clar. and v'cl.), op. 29; the above-mentioned trumpet suite, 'Chansons et danses' (wind instruments), op. 50; a sonata, PF. and vln., op. 59; a quintet, op. 81 (1924), first performance at the Société nationale, 1925. Opp. 68, 69, 73, 74 consist of numerous PF. pieces, amongst them some written for children. He has written incidental music to various plays, such as 'Kardec,' op. 34 (Théâtre Moderne, 1892), and 'Médée,' op. 47 (Th. Sarah Bernhardt, 1898).

Special attention must be directed to such works as the second symphony, 'Jour d'été à la montagne,' op. 61 (1905); 'Souvenirs,' op. 62 (1906); 'Le Poème des rivages,' op. 77 (1920-1921) (Paris, Rouart et Lerolle), as showing the evolution of the composer's symphonic style. A third symphony, 'Sinfoniae brevis de Bello Gallico,' op. 70, was composed from 1916-18. 'La Légende de Saint-Christophe,' op. 67 (1908-15) (Rouart et Lerolle), first performed at the Paris Opéra, June 9, 1920, represents a new aspect of its author in dramatic composition. Half oratorio, half musical drama, it combines various styles recalling in turn the cantata, the opera, the symphony. Plain-chant melodies, as in other of his works, play an important part. It is a vast fresco of exceptional grandeur, depth and powerful effect. His most recent compositions (1925-26) are: 2 motets (2 and 3 v.), op. 83 (Paris, Art Catholique); a sonata for v'cl. and PF. (op. 84); 'Thème varié, fugue et chanson' for piano (op. 85); 'Conte de fées,' suite for piano (op. 86); 'Diptyque méditerranéen,' for orchestra (op. 87).

D'Indy's considerable output has extended to all forms of the art—even including a musical comedy, 'Le Rêve de Cynias' (op. 80) (libretto by X. de Courville (1922-23)). He has never at any time of his life cared to please the public ear; with him nothing is left to chance, his music shows profound science united with a lofty ideal. If, generally speaking, he may be termed a master-musician, it is through his 'dramatic expression, orchestral colour and science of style.'¹

His musical activity is boundless; a teacher without equal, he has taught composition at the Schola Cantorum, which he founded, from its beginning, and directs it now. (See under PARIS, SCHOLA CANTORUM; also BORDES.) His monumental Cours de composition (2 vols., Durand) in collaboration with A. Sérieyx, is based on historical study of every art-form. He has issued recently '100 Thèmes d'harmonie,' op. 71 (Roudanez). Conductor, lecturer, propagandist, editor, all his life is devoted to music. His name is closely associated with those of Bordes and Guilmant through the movement which has led in France to the revival of old music and the renovation of Gregorian plain-chant. He has made innumerable transcriptions, revisions, harmonisations, reconstitutions of ancient music, popular songs, etc.; 90 Chansons populaires du Vivarais, op. 52 (1900); 3 Chansons populaires françaises (Rouart et Lerolle), etc.; Destouches, 'Les Éléments'; Monteverdi, 'Orfeo,' 'L'incoronazione di Poppea,' 'Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria' (not published), etc.; Rameau: 'Dardanus,' 'Hippolyte et Aricie, Zals' (Paris, Durand); Gluck, 'L'Invrogne corrigé' (1925).

His contribution to musical literature has been very important: biographies of César Franck (1906), Beethoven (1911); contributions to a great number of periodicals (La Tribune de St. Gervais, S.I.M., L'Art moderne (Brussels), The Musician (Boston), The Weekly Critical Re- view, Le Courrier musical, etc.). He has been secretary of the Société Nationale de Musique, then president from 1890 onwards; member of foreign academies (Belgium, Holland, England), etc. He directs the orchestral class at the Paris Conservatoire, notwithstanding his duties at the Schola Cantorum.

His artistic personality has, as it were, sprung from the romanticists, Weber, Schumann, Berlioz, and, like all musicians of his generation, he was at first inevitably influenced by Wagner—a superficial influence, however, from which he soon emancipated himself. The essence of his music is quite different; it is French. Amongst C. Franck's pupils he is the most eminent and the most representative; amongst his own pupils may be cited, D. de Séverac, Roussel, M. Labey, G. Samazeuilh, P. le Flem, J. Canteloube, G. de Lioncourt.

INÉGALES (NOTES), 'unequal notes.' The expression represents a very curious peculiarity of notation in music of the French School between 1650 and 1800, where in each bar certain categories of notes written as equal were in performance dotted in pairs: for example, in quadruple time or C, the group  would become very nearly . There are passages where the process makes the notes extremely unequal, and others where they are, in fact, less so. The taste of the player is the ultimate judge of the extent of this inequality.

The following table shows which notes are treated as inégaux in each kind of time:

In $\frac{3}{4}$ time the crotchets are inégaux.

In 2, 3, $\frac{3}{4}$, $\frac{2}{3}$, $\frac{2}{4}$, $\frac{1}{2}$ time the quavers are inégaux.

In 4, C, $\frac{1}{4}$, $\frac{2}{4}$, $\frac{3}{4}$, $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{3}{8}$, $\frac{1}{8}$, $\frac{1}{16}$ time the semi-quavers are inégaux.

In $\frac{1}{8}$, $\frac{3}{8}$, $\frac{1}{4}$, $\frac{1}{2}$ time the demi-semiquavers are inégaux.

In duple time (C), the quavers are sometimes equal, sometimes unequal, according to the character of the piece. If, however, the notes which ought to be inégaux involve disjointed movement, or are intermixed with notes of lesser value, they are ordinarily made equal.

To avoid all uncertainty, authors frequently made use of the expression notes égales or notes inégales. The notes become equal again if they have over them staccato marks (dashes), or if they are accompanied by the indication dé tachées.

INFANTAS, FERNANDO DE LAS (b. Córdoba, 1534; d. Paris? after 1609), a Spanish composer and theologian, who had an important influence on the reform of the Graduale Romanum. He came of a noble family. One of his ancestors, Don Juan Fernández de Córdoba, was appointed guardian to the three daughters of Peter the Cruel after his death at the battle of Montiel (1369). He conveyed two of the Infantas to Bayonne, then in English occupation, and both were married to English barons, Doña Constanza to John of Gaunt, and Doña Isabel to Edmund Langley, his brother. Don Juan seems afterwards to have accompanied the Infantas to England; and in reward for these services his descendants were permitted to bear the name 'de las Infantas.'

Don Fernando de las Infantas grew up at a time when music was greatly encouraged at Córdoba, through the Bishop, the Archduke Charles of Austria, who was himself a keen musician. His earliest known work is a motet for 5 voices, 'Parce mihi Domine,' on the death of the Emperor Charles V. (1558). In 1565 he composed a motet, 'Congregati sunt,' to celebrate a victory over the Turks at Melilla. It is set for 7 voices, one of which sings independently, after the manner so much favoured by Morales. In the same way he celebrated the battle of Lepanto (1571) by a motet, 'Cantemus Domino,' for 5 voices, one being independent. By this time he had migrated to Rome, where, in 1575, he composed a setting of Ps. xcix. for the 'Anno Jubilei'; it is a monumental work for 6 voices, one of which (independent of the others) sings the theme treated in the same way by Morales in his cantata on the peace of Nice. Owing to his position, Fernando de las Infantas was able to take a step which had some influence on the history of church music. Through his intervention the reform of the Graduale was suspended; he wrote personally to Philip II. on the matter, and definite instructions were sent to the Spanish Ambassador. In 1578-79 Infantas published three books of motets, 'Sacrarum varii styli cantionum,' at Venice, and a treatise on counterpoint entitled 'Plura modulationum genera.' Then in 1584 he took orders—a step caused, he said, through his buying and reading the Psalms of David. With this episode his artistic career ended. He left Rome 'after 25 years continuous residence,' and in 1601 a 'Tractatus de prædestinatione' from his pen was published in Paris. As a member of the Church he no longer found favour with the ecclesiastical authorities. In 1607, and again in 1609, he addressed memorials to Philip III., stating that he was in poor circumstances and desired some modest retreat in which he could end his long life. The date and place of his death are not known. (See

INFLEXION. Whenever sentences are to be uttered loud for many people to hear, in the open air or in a large building, there is a natural tendency, for distinctness' sake, to say the greater part on one note, that is, in monotone. It is not, however, natural to say the whole at one pitch; nor is it pleasing, for then monotone becomes monotonous. It is natural and pleasing to make at the opening some short gradual ascent to the note in question, to make at the close some gradual descent from it; and if the phrase is long, possibly also to make some variation of the monotone in the middle of its course. The foregoing statement contains the germ out of which a great part of plain-song has developed; the simpler developments denoted by the term inflexion will be treated in this article, the more elaborate ones under RESPONSORIAL PSALMODY.

The simplest method of singing a religious service, or part of one, may then be described as 'monotone with inflexions'; and three classes of inflexion above indicated have their technical names as follows: the ascent to the monotone is called the intonation, the descent is called the cadence or ending; the variation that may occur between these two is called the mediation. The Gregorian Tones afford an excellent illustration of this; for in their normal form each of them consists precisely of these elements. An intonation leads up to the monotone, which is broken by a half close expressed in the mediation; the monotone is then resumed, till it ends with the closing inflexion called the ending. Of these three ways of varying the monotone, the cadence or ending is the most universal, the intonation is the one most readily foregone (see INTONATION). This, too, is shown by Psalmody; for in the ordinary singing of Psalms the intonation is used but once, while the mediation and ending are used at every verse. But turning from PSALMODY, which is fully treated in its own place, it is well to see how these principles affect other simple parts of the service—the reading of lessons, the saying of collects, the singing of versicles and responses, and the like. In all such matters as these, experience soon showed that it was necessary to lay down rules; the individual officiant could not be trusted in all cases to use melodious or pleasing inflexions or cadences if left to himself and the light of nature; it was necessary to define those that were to be used. Still more was such definition necessary in the case of responses and chants in which a large body of singers had to unite.

Similar rules for the lessons prevail elsewhere.

6. The Chapter had similar inflexions, but differently arranged :

The drop of the diapente was modified like the semiditonus in case of a monosyllable. When sentences containing a question occurred, the reciting note was altered; the bulk of the sentence was said a semitone lower, and a rise took place at the end to the normal reciting note. Guidetti gives a special inflexion for the Chapter.

7. The descent of three notes already noted above was used also in the normal form of the but many elaborate forms of 'Benedicamus' were and are still in use, which are distinct melodies borrowed from elsewhere, and not inflected monotone.

8. The singing of the Epistle and Gospel follows the lines already indicated; but the forms are more elaborate. The form used at Salisbury comprised a mediation (metrum) and an ending (punctum) for each sentence. The metrum is the same for Epistle and Gospel,

thus :

The punctum differs; that for the Epistle is

The final sentence has a special form of its own, common also to the Gospel, thus :

The punctum for the Gospel is a mere drop of voice, a semitone on ordinary days, a semiditonus, or minor third, on great days. The treatment of interrogatives is the same here as in the case of the ordinary lessons.

The Benedictines have preserved the same forms as those used at Salisbury, in a slightly different shape. Guidetti gave a very poor substitute for them, which has become sadly common since. He prescribed monotone for the Epistle, except in case of a question; this, however, is sometimes varied by the rise of a tone on the last accented syllable of the last sentence and a descent again to the reciting note. For the Gospel he ordered no metrum, and the following conclusion :

Of the Ambrosian inflexions it can now only be noted that they are very many and very different from those given above. To describe them adequately would require another long article. They may be seen in one form in La regola del canto fermo ambrosiano (Milan, 1622). W. H. F.

INGANNO (Ital), 'Deception.' See CADENCE, INTERRUPTED.

INGEGNERI, MARCO ANTONIO (b. Verona about middle of 16th cent.; d. Cremona, July 1, 1592), received his musical instruction there from Vincenzo Ruffo, then choirmaster of the Verona Cathedral. Some time before 1572 Ingegneri became choirmaster of the Cathedral at Cremona, in which position he seems to have remained till his death. At Cremona he had the celebrated Claudio Monteverdi for his pupil. Ingegneri is chiefly noticeable as being the composer of a set of 27 Responsoria for Holy Week, which passed for a long time as the work of Palestrina. They were received into the complete edition of Palestrina's works, among the Opera dubia in the 32nd Volume. But in 1897, the original printed work of Ingegneri dated 1588, from which they were taken, turned up at a sale, and the ascription of them to Palestrina was thus proved to be erroneous. Haberl subsequently republished them under the name of their true author. In themselves these Responsoria are very beautiful devotional music, and quite worthy to be ranked with the works of Palestrina, although there occur in them harmonies and modulations foreign to the usual style of Palestrina. Ingegneri's other works are two books of masses, 1573 and 1587; three books of motets, 1576-89; one book of hymns, and eight books of madrigals not all completely preserved. Besides the Responsoria the only other works of Ingegneri republished in modern times are three motets, 'Surrexit Pastor Bonus,' a 5, in Dehn's Sammlung älterer Musik; 'Duo Seraphim,' a 8, in Commer's Musica sacra; and 'Haec dies' in Haberl's Musica sacra, 1898. INGENHOVEN, JAN. (b. Breda, North Brabant, May 19, 1876), Dutch composer and conductor. At 16 he was director of a male voice choir, his musical education being then obtained chiefly by practical experiment. Later he became a pupil of L. F. Brandts Buys and Felix Mottl. In Munich and other German towns as well as in his own country he won an excellent reputation as an orchestral conductor, particularly in the works of Mozart. He has at various times been conductor of the Münchener Philharmonisch Orchester, Münchener Madrigal-Vereinigung and other bodies, and has toured Europe as conductor, tenor singer, pianist and clarinetist. As a composer his output is not large, while the extreme difficulty of much of his music has prevented it from becoming popular. His style is rhapsodical, though generally melodious, and he has a strong feeling for rich harmony that seldom transgresses the old rules. In his chamber-music he is fond of 'harp' effects which, however, he is content to produce from the piano or string instruments. His principal compositions are:

2 Lieder: 'Abendständchen,' 'Der träumende See.'

4 String Quartets (unpublished).

4 Quatuors à voix mixtes sans accompagnement.

Symphonic Fantasia on 'Zarathustra's Nachtlied,' for orch. and low voice.

'Klaus Tink,' ballade for baritone voice and small orch.

Symphonische Tonstücke, No. 1. Lyrische, for orch.

Do, No. 2. Dramatisch, for orch.

Do, No. 3. Romantisch, for small orch.

'St. Jan's Vier,' for a cappella choir.

Sonata in G, for viol. and PF.

Sonata in C, for vln. and PF.

INGHELBRECHT, D. E. (b. Paris, Sept. 17, 1880), conductor and composer. He first became known as a composer through some charming works of minor importance, such as the two sets of piano duets, 'La Nursery,' based upon French folk-songs. Soon, however, his special aptitude as a conductor caused him to be esteemed primarily in that capacity. In this he was aided by his association with modern composers, and especially Debussy, who found in him an able interpreter at a time when his works were not in every conductor's repertory. More recently he conducted the performances in Paris and London of the Swedish Ballet, for which he composed a ballet 'El Greco,' inspired by the paintings of that 'father of modern art.' This is his most important work, the next in rank being the 'Cantique des créatures de Saint François,' for chorus and orchestra. Apart from these he has composed a sonata for flute and harp and numerous works in the smaller forms, notably piano pieces ('Suite petite-russienne,' etc.) and songs.

INGLOTT, WILLIAM (b. 1554; d. Dec. 1621), became organist of Norwich Cathedral in 1608. He was distinguished for his skill as a performer on the organ and virginals. Two of his pieces for the latter instrument are in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book,' vol. ii. pp. 375 and 381, and the organ part of a To Deum is at Christchurch, Oxford (Cat. Pt. I. 1001). He died at the age of 67, and was buried, Dec. 31, in the cathedral, where, on the west side of the southern pillar adjoining the entrance to the choir, a painted monument to his memory was placed, June 15, 1622. Nearly ninety years afterwards the monument, having become dilapidated, was restored at the expense of Dr. Croft. An engraving of it in its restored state is given in The Posthumous Works of Sir Thomas Browne, 1712.

INNIG, a word used by Beethoven during his German fit (op. 101, 1st movement; 109, last do.; 121 b), and Schumann (op. 12, 'Des Abends'; op. 24, No. 9; op. 56, Nos. 2 and 4, Manfred music, No. 2, etc.) to convey an intensely personal, almost devotional, kind of expression.

IN NOMINE, a term very prevalent among English composers of the 16th century as the heading of instrumental works having no distinctive title. There is no suggestion of style to distinguish the 'In Nomine' decisively from the FANCY (q.v.). It is found in Mulliner Book¹ (c. 1560), which includes 'Taverner's In Nomine,' and is frequent in both consort music and VIRGINAL MUSIC (q.v.) throughout the latter part of the century.

The origin of the term is unknown. Various attempts have been made, not unnaturally, to link the instrumental 'In Nomine' with some vocal form of church music. The suggestion has also been made that it began as an abbreviation of a pious ascription, such as 'In Nomine Domini,' analogous (though at a much earlier date) to J. S. Bach's use of 'J. J.' at the beginning of his compositions, secular as well as sacred. But this is only conjectural. What is certain is that by the time we find the term in practical music it had become generic, and that in the period spanned by Taverner and Byrd it was generally accepted as a species of composition.

IN QUESTA TOMBA OSCURA. A song by Beethoven for contralto, with PF. accompaniment, to words by Carpani, written probably at the invitation of the Countess von Rzewuska, and forming one of 63 compositions to the same words by various musicians, professional and amateur. Among the most eminent of the contributors are Salieri, Sterkel, Cherubini, Asiol, Righini, Zingarelli, Weigl, Dionys Weber, Tomaschek, Aloys Förster, Paër, Eberl, Czerny. Zingarelli sent ten versions with quartet accompaniment. Czerny's single setting occupied eleven folio pages. Beethoven's was the last in the volume, and is the only one which has survived. The A.M.Z. for Oct. 19, 1808, in announcing the publication, prints two of the settings, by Salieri and Sterkel, and in Jan. 1810, two more by Reichardt. For another joint-stock volume in which Beethoven took part, see VATERLÄNDISCHE KÜNSTLER-VEREIN.

INSANGUINE, GIACOMO (b. Monopoli, near Naples, between 1740 and 1744; d. Naples, c. 1795), a Neapolitan composer, called also Monopoli from his birthplace. He was a pupil of the Conservatorio of Sant' Onofrio, where he studied with Cotumacci, being appointed second professor of the school in 1774. Besides masses, psalms, a setting of the Passion, and several motets, he wrote about 15 operas (list in Florimo and Pétis), of which the following are extant: 'Didone abbandonata' (1772), 'Arianna e Teseo' (1773), 'Adriano in Siria' (1773), 'Le astuzie per amore' (1777), 'Medonte' (1779), 'Calipso' (1782), and 'Lo funnaco revotato,' the undated score of which is in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge. Insanguine also wrote part of an opera, 'Eumene,' with Majo (1771). (Q.-L.) M.

INSCRIPTION (Lat. inscriptio, Ital. motto), a motto, or sign, or combination of both, placed at the beginning of a canon, to indicate, more or less clearly, the manner of its resolution.

During the latter half of the 15th century, the founders of the Flemish School—by whom the more abstruse forms of imitation were assiduously cultivated—seem chiefly to have aimed at rendering the solution of their Enimmes, or enigmatical canons, impossible. Some of their most extravagant conceits are presented in the shape of crosses, circles, squares, triangles, rainbows, chess-boards, sun-dials, and other equally fantastic designs, without the addition of any clue whatever to their hidden meanings. (See examples in Hawkins's Hist. chap. 67.) But, more frequently, they are written in a single line—called the Guida—headed by some old proverb, or well-known quotation from Holy Scripture, which, though ostensibly vouchsafed for the purpose of giving the student some little insight into the secret of their construction, tends rather, as a general rule, to increase his perplexity. Headings, such as these, are called Inscriptions: and so obscure is their occasional meaning, that even Glareanus calls one of them τῆς σφίγγος ἀλγύμα.

Foremost among the composers of these ingenious works, and high above them all, stands Josquin des Prés, the refinement of whose scholarship is as clearly proved, by the grace of his Motti, as his quite exceptional genius is by the smooth flow of the canons to which they are prefixed. In the second Agnus Dei of his 'Missa L'Ami baudichon' he intimates that the tenor is to be silent by the pretty inscription, 'Agnus secundum non est cum grege.' In another place he veils the same meaning under the Greek proverb, βατραχος ἐκ Σερίφου, in allusion to Aelian's statement that the frogs on the island of Sériphos do not croak. Other writers have contented themselves with 'Vox faucibus hæsit.'

To show that the second voice is to begin at the end, and sing backwards, Hobrecht says, plainly enough, 'Ut prius, sed dicitur retrograde.' Pierre de la Rue more sternly exclaims, 'Vade retro, Sathanas.' Another quaint old composer writes, 'Canit more Hebraeorum,' referring to the custom of reading Hebrew from right to left. Josquin sums up the whole matter in a single word—'Cancriza,' i.e. walk like a crab (see CANCRIZANS). Equally terse is the motto prefixed to the third Agnus Dei in his 'Missa L'Homme armé'; where the omission of all rests, in one of the parts, is indicated by the direction 'Clama ne cesses.' Sometimes he gives us a French motto, as in his 'Missa de Beata Virgine,' where 'Vous jeunerez les quatre temps' shows that one part is to wait four semibreves before taking up the subject—a direction which is less poetically expressed by another writer, in the words 'Fuga in epidiapason, post duo tempora'—'a canon in the octave above, after two semibreves.'

Some of Obrecht's inscriptions are very obscure. 'Accidens potest inesse et abesse præter subjecti corruptionem' implies that the part may be sung, or omitted, at will, without injury to the music. 'Decimas reddo omnia quae possideo' shows that the (unwritten) bass must sing a tenth below the Discant. 'Tu tenor cancriza, et per antifrasin canta' indicates that the tenor is to sing backwards, and with all the intervals inverted. Not less oracular is Mouton's 'Duo adversi adverse in unum,' which means that two singers are to stand opposite each other, with the canon between them, each reading it upside down from the other's point of view—an arrangement which is also dictated by 'Respice me, ostende mihi faciem tuam.' More mysterious still is 'Justitia et Pax osculatae sunt'—indicating that the two performers are to begin at opposite ends, and meet in the middle.

When black notes are to be sung in the time of white ones, we sometimes find 'Nigra sum, sed formosa'; or, 'Noctem in diem vertere'; or, 'Dum habetis lucem credite in lucem.' By 'Crescit in duplum' (or 'triplum') we understand that the notes are to be sung in double (or triple) augmentation. 'Tres dent sex voces' means that each of the three written parts is to be doubled, in canon, so as to form a composition for six voices.

The list of these hard sayings is interminable; and the hardness of many of them is increased by the signs of Mood, Time and Prolation, with which they are sometimes accompanied. For instance, a semicircle, a semicircle with a bar drawn through it, and a circle with a point in the centre, would, if placed one above the other, at the beginning of a stave, serve to indicate that one voice was to sing four crotchets in a bar, another, four minims, and the third, three semibreves. In the last Agnus Dei of Pierre de la Rue's 'Missa L'homme armé,' we find a combination of no less than four such signs.

Following the example of Palestrina, the great composers of the golden age cast all these pedantries aside, and wrote their really beautiful canons in notation which any singer could readily understand. Palestrina himself delights in making two voices sing in canon, while three or four others carry on the subject in close imitation, or complicated free fugue, as in the lovely second Agnus Dei of his 'Missa Brevis,' and many others, equally beautiful. In all these cases, the voices to which the canon is committed are expected to sing from a single part; but the inscription prefixed to that part is so plain that they find no difficulty whatever in doing so. Thus, 'Symphonizabis' (Missa Brevis as above) indicates a canon in the unison.

Canon in Diapason 'or' 'Epidiapason,' a canon in the octave above, and so on. The sign, S, or some similar figure—called the Presa—indicates the place at which the second voice is to begin; and a pause, ∩, is placed over the note on which it ends. The two voices can therefore sing just as easily from a single part as from two separate copies.

In modern editions the matter is still further simplified, by writing out the canon in full; though, in the best copies, the inscription is still carefully retained.

INTERLUDE (Ger. Zwischenspiel), literally, something played between the parts of an occasion, whether that occasion be a church service, a dramatic performance or itself a musical work.

(1) In the church the performance of interludes has been an important function of the organist in various times. In England, in the early part of the 19th century, a good extempore interlude, or short voluntary, between the verses of a hymn or metrical psalm, was regarded as no unfair test of an organist's ability. Thomas Adams (1785-1858) had a peculiar talent for voluntaries of this kind: and he, as well as other organists of the period, published specimens of their interludes.

In French cathedrals a long and elaborate interlude is usually played, at Vespers, between the verses of the Magnificat, as well as those of the Hymn: and, at Notre Dame, S. Sulpice, and other churches built on the same grand scale, where the organ in the choir is supplemented by a larger one at the western end of the nave, a fine effect is produced by the alternate use of the two instruments, the smaller one being employed for the accompaniment of the voices, while the larger is reserved for the interludes alone.

In the Lutheran churches of North Germany interludes, not between the verses of the Choral, but between the separate lines of each verse, had an important result in producing the figured treatment of the Chorals of which J. S. Bach became the supreme master.

(2) In the theatre it has been either a piece of instrumental music (see ACT-TUNE) or a variety of musico-dramatic entertainment. (See INTERMEZZO (1).)

INTERMEZZO (Fr. intermède, entr'acte;

Old. Eng. enterlude). (1) A dramatic entertainment, of light and pleasing character, introduced between the acts of a tragedy, comedy, or opera; either for the purpose of affording an interval of rest to the performers of the principal piece; of allowing time for the preparation of a grand scenic effect; or, of relieving the attention of the audience from the excessive strain demanded by a long serious performance.

The history of the intermezzo bears a very important relation to that of the opera; more especially to that of the opera buffa, with the gradual development of which it is very intimately connected. The origin of both may be traced back to a period of very remote antiquity. It is, indeed, difficult to point out any epoch, in the chronicles of dramatic art, in which the presence of the intermezzo may not be detected, now in one form, and now in another. Its exact analogue is to be found in the Satirae of the old Roman comedy. In the mysteries and miracle plays of the middle ages—those strange connecting-links between old things and new—it assumed the form of a hymn, or carol, sung, either in chorus, or by the Angelo nunzio, to a sort of chant which seems to have been traditional. In a rare old work, by Macropedias, entitled Bassarus, fabula festivissima (Utrecht, 1553), some verses, adapted to a melody by no means remarkable for its festive character, are given at the close of every scene. And the popularity of the tune is sufficiently proved by its persistent reiteration in other works of nearly similar date.

These rude beginnings contrast strangely enough with the highly finished intermezzi decennially presented in the course of the Passion-Play at Ober-Ammergau. But the Passion-Play is known to have undergone many important improvements within a comparatively recent period; and its case is, in every way, so exceptional that it is no easy task to determine its true position as an historical landmark.

Almost all the earlier Italian plays were relieved by intermezzi. Many of these were simply madrigals, sung by a greater or less number of voices, as occasion served. Sometimes they were given in the form of a chorus, with instrumental accompaniment. The most favourite style, perhaps, was that of a song, or canzonetta, sung, by a single performer, in the character of Orpheus. In no case was the subject of these performances connected in any way with that of the pieces between the acts of which they were interpolated. Their construction was extremely simple, and their importance relatively small. We find them assuming grander proportions, at Florence, in the year 1589, on the occasion of the marriage of the Grand Duke Ferdinand with Christine de Lorraine. To grace this ceremony, Giovanni Bardi, Conte di Vernio, produced a new comedy, entitled L' amico fido, with intermezzi, à grand spectacle, prepared expressly for the festival, and presented with a degree of splendour hitherto unknown. For the first of these, called 'The Harmony of the Spheres,' the poetry was written by Ottavio Rinuccini, and the music composed by Emilio del Cavaliere and Cristofano Malvezzi. The second, also written by Rinuccini and called 'The Judgment of the Hamadryads,' was set to music by Luca Marenzio. For the third, called 'The Triumph of Apollo,' invented by Bardi, and written by Rinuccini, the music was composed, partly by Luca Marenzio, and partly, it is said, by the Conte di Vernio himself. The fourth, entitled 'The Infernal Regions,' was written by Pietro Strozzi, and accompanied by sombre music, composed, by Giulio Caccini, for violins, violes, lutes, lyres of all forms, double harps, trombones and 'Organs of Wood.'¹ The fifth—'The Fable of Arion'—was written by Rinuccini, and set to music by Cavaliere and Malvezzi.

The intermezzo steadily continued to advance in interest and importance. Guarini (1537–1612) wrote intermezzi to his own Pastor fido, in the form of simple madrigals. In 1623 L' amorosa innocenza was produced at Bologna, accompanied by Intermezzi della coronazione di Apollo, per Dafne convertita in Lauro, set to music by Ottavio Vernizzi. This work introduces us to a new and extremely important epoch in the history of this branch of dramatic art. By degrees, the intermezzi were made to embody a little continuous drama of their own. Their story—always quite unconnected with that of the principal piece—was more carefully elaborated than heretofore. Gradually increasing in coherence and interest, their disjointed members rapidly united themselves into a consistent and connected whole. And thus, in process of time, two distinct dramas were presented to the audience, in alternate acts; the character of the intermezzi being always a little lighter than that of the piece between the divisions of which they were played, and on that very account, perhaps, better fitted to win their way to public favour. The merry wit inseparable from the Neapolitan school undoubtedly did much for them; and, before long, they began to enter into formidable rivalry with the more serious pieces they were at first only intended to relieve. Their popularity spread so widely that, in 1723, a collection of them was printed, in two volumes, at Amsterdam; and so lasting was it, that for many years a light Italian operetta was frequently called an Intermezzo in musica.

The next great change in the form of the intermezzo, though really no more than the natural consequence of those we have already described, was sufficiently important, not only to mark the culminating point in its career, but to translate it, at once, to a sphere of art little contemplated by those who first called it into existence. Already complete in itself, all it now needed was independence: an existence of its own, apart from that of the graver piece to which it owed its original raison d'être. Such an existence was obtained for it by the simple process of leaving the graver piece—whether tragedy, comedy or serious opera—to depend upon its own resources, while the Intermezzo, with its once disconnected links united in unbroken sequence, was performed as a separate work, in one act. This revolution was effected chiefly by the genius of one composer, Pergolese, whose art-life is identified with the ultimate fate of the intermezzo. His first important composition—a sacred drama, called 'San Guglielmo d' Aquitania,'—was diversified by intermezzi of a playful character, introduced between its principal divisions. His greatest triumph—'La serva padrona'—was itself an intermezzo, pur et simple. This delightful work—the whole interest of which is centred in two characters, whose voices are accompanied only by a stringed band—was first produced, in Italy, between the acts of another piece, in the year 1733. Its success was unbounded. It soon found its way to every capital in Europe; and, everywhere but in France, was received with acclamation. The French, however, were slow to appreciate it at its true value. Its first performance in Paris, Oct. 4, 1746, was little short of a failure: but when, Aug. 1, 1752, it was played between the acts of Lully's 'Acis et Galathée,' it originated a feud between the 'Lullistes' and the 'Bouffonnistes,' scarcely less bitter than that which raged, at a later period, between the rival followers of Gluck and Piccini. National vanity forbade the recognition of the Italian style: national good taste forbade its rejection. Rousseau, with characteristic impetuosity, threw himself into the thick of the fray; fought desperately on the Italian side; declared French opera impossible; and stultified his own arguments by the immediate production of a French intermède—the well-known 'Devin du village.' Long after this, the controversy raged, with unabated fury; but, in spite of the worst its enemies could do, 'La serva padrona' exercised a salutary and lasting effect upon French dramatic music—indeed, upon dramatic music everywhere. In 1750 it met with an enthusiastic reception in England. Its success was as lasting as it was brilliant; and, even to our own day, it has kept its place upon the stage, not between the acts of a serious opera, but as an independent piece; marking the critical period at which the history of the intermezzo merges, permanently, into that of the OPERA BUFFA (q.v.), its legitimate heir.

The intermezzo having so far outgrown its original intention, something else must needs be found to supply its place. The dance was unanimously accepted as a substitute; and soon became exceedingly popular. And thus arose a new species of interlude, which in England, at any rate, attained its height under Lumley's management at Her Majesty's Theatre, where, night after night, a ballet divertissement, with Cerito, or Carlotta Grisi, for its principal attraction, was given between the acts of a grand opera. W. S. R.

(2) In 19th century Italian opera the intermezzo, in the form of a piece of orchestral music having no special reference to the plot of the opera, was made fashionable by the success of such a piece in Mascagni's 'Cavalleria rusticana.' It is distinguished from the entr'acte by the fact that it is played without lowering the curtain and indicates passage of time in the play. C.

(3) The word is also used for a short movement, serving as a connecting-link between the larger divisions of a sonata, symphony or other great work, whether instrumental or vocal, as in No. 4 of Schumann's 'Faschingsschwank aus Wien' (op. 26). The beautiful intermezzo which, under the name of 'Introduzione,' lends so charming a grace to Beethoven's 'Waldstein Sonata' (op. 53) is said to be an afterthought, inserted in place of the well-known 'Andante in F major,' which, after due consideration, the great composer rejected, as too long for the position he originally intended it to occupy. The term is, however, used for larger movements: as by Mendelssohn for the third movement in his F minor PF. quartet (op. 2), or for the 'grand adagio' which, under the name of 'Nachruf,' he specially composed in memory of his friend Ritz, and inserted in his quintet (op. 18), in lieu of the previous minuet (Letter, Feb. 21, 1832); or for the entr'acte expressive of Hermia's search for Lysander in the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music. The second movement of Goetz's Symphony, virtually a Scherzo, is entitled Intermezzo.

(4) Schumann and Brahms, again, and many modern composers following them, have both used the word to denote independent pieces of small dimensions, the former in his opus 4—six pieces usually consisting of a main theme and an 'Alternativo'; and the latter in his opp. 76, 117, 118 and 119, for PF.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL SOCIETY (Internationale Musikgesellschaft). This Society, which was inaugurated in 1899 by Professor Oskar Fleischer with the assistance of Dr. Max Seiffert and others, had for its object a federation of the musicians and musical connoisseurs of all countries, for purposes of mutual information on matters of research or on more current matters.

Its method was first of all to promote group-action in the shape of local bodies (Ortsgruppen), meeting for lecture, debate or social and musical intercourse; secondly to combine these and other units for administrative purposes in larger sections (Sektionen) corresponding to nationalities; and thirdly to federate the whole by means of publications issued in four alternative languages, or occasionally by General Congresses. Two large Societies already existing, the Musical Association of Great Britain, and the Vereeniging voor Noord-Nederlands Muziekgeschiedenis of Holland, consented to act under certain conditions as Ortsgruppen of the Society, and therefore became 'allied societies' (Kartell-Vereine). By the side of the Local Groups numerous separate members (einfache Mitglieder) were enrolled. National Sections (Sektionen), for administrative purposes, were organised and included:

Austria, Baden, Bavaria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Great Britain and Ireland, Holland, India, Italy, North Germany, Russia, Saxony, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Thuringia, United States of America.

The Sectional administration in the case of Great Britain and Ireland was by means of a body called the 'English Committee.' The whole Society was controlled by a Governing Body (Präsidium), consisting of the aggregate of the heads of the different National Sections. The four alternative languages of the publications were German, English, French and Italian. The publications consisted of (a) a Monthly Journal, (b) a Quarterly Magazine, (c) Book-publications. The Monthly Journal (Zeitschrift) varied in size from 32 to 72 pages; it usually contained official announcements of the Society, three or four leading articles, reports of current events, records of performances of ancient music, records of lectures, occasional notes, book-reviews, music-reviews, lists of newspaper articles on music in all countries, notes and queries among members, etc. The Quarterly Magazine (Sammelbände) averaged 170 pages per quarter, and contained large articles of scientific value. A yearly Index of Journal and Magazine combined averaged 70 pages. The Book-publications (Beihefte) consisted of articles too large for the Magazine; the publishers, Messrs. Breitkopf & Hartel of Leipzig; the publications controlled by an Editing Committee (Redaktions-Kommission) appointed by the Governing Body. The Editing Committee in turn appointed one or more editors (Redakteure). Corresponding Members (Korrespondierende Mitglieder) were appointed by the Governing Body. At the General Congress of 1904, held in Leipzig, the organisation was slightly altered in the direction of strengthening the control of the Governing Body. Further Congresses were held at Basle (1906), Vienna (1909), London (1911), and Paris (1914). The war (1914) broke the existing organisation, and on Sept. 30, 1914, the publishers, Breitkopf & Härtel, issued a statement¹ which declared the Society to be dissolved. Certain sections maintained independent existence or formed new societies for similar work. An international congress met at Basle in 1924 with the object of reviving the Society.

INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR CONTEMPORARY MUSIC. This Society was formed as the result of a festival given by young Viennese composers at Salzburg in the summer of 1922. It was there decided that a permanent organisation for giving the new music of all nations should be formed; Edward J. DENT (q.v.) was elected president, and the constitution of the Society was settled at a congress held in London in January 1923. National sections were formed, and in England the contemporary music centre of the BRITISH MUSIC SOCIETY (q.v.) became the British section of the International Society. Annual festivals have since been held in several continental cities; works are submitted by local committees and the programmes chosen by an international jury appointed annually by the council of delegates from the national sections.

INTERRUPTED CADENCE, see CADENCE (II.), section (5).

INTERVAL. The rates per second of the vibration to and fro of two strings are expressed by numbers. An interval is, physically, a ratio between two of these numbers. Psychologists and aestheticians are not yet agreed as to what interval means as such, but intervals differ from one another in the blend or discrepancy of their constituent notes, i.e. in consonance or dissonance. This contrast of views is important; the instrument-maker needs the physical knowledge, the instrumentalist is the better for a little of it, the composer can afford to ignore it. No physical conclusion is of musical value which the ear does not endorse.

VIBRATION AND RATIO.—The ratio of vibrations of an interval is the reciprocal of the ratio of the two string lengths. Thus, E is produced on a C string by stopping at $\frac{1}{2}$ of its length, i.e. allowing $\frac{1}{2}$ to sound; then, if the C string is 15 inches long, E will be given by $\frac{1}{2}$ of it (12 inches), and if C has 132 vibrations then E will have $\frac{1}{2}$ of that (165 vibs.) Intervals are, in common musical parlance, added to and subtracted from one another; a third is 'added' to a fourth to make the major sixth, or 'subtracted' from it to make the diatonic semitone. Ratios, which represent them in physics, are multiplied or divided; $\frac{1}{2} \times \frac{1}{2} = \frac{1}{4}$ (maj. sixth) and $\frac{1}{2} \div \frac{1}{2} = 1$ (diat. semit.).

JUST INTONATION posits three primary intervals, octave, fifth and major third (1st, 3rd and 5th partials) and no others. They are called here O[ctave], Q[uint] and T[ierce]. All Just intervals can be stated algebraically in terms of O, Q and T, as they are in Riemann's Dictionary, sub voc. Tone, Determination of; and there is a fuller list in the Appendix to Ellis's Helmholtz, Sensations of Tone. The number is theoretically infinite, but music employs little more than a couple of dozen within the octave (see the Table on p. 719). Exceptional ears can detect beyond these three partials the 7th and 11th also, intervals formed from which, though they have as much right to be called Just as those formed from O, Q and T, are dissonant to them and cannot therefore be embraced in a common system with them.

7TH AND 11TH PARTIALS.—It has been thought that the acknowledged euphony of the dominant seventh, GBDF, comes from the ear's acceptance of G-F as the 7th partial, ignoring the dissonance of B-F (969.386 = 583 cents), which is actually an augmented fourth, 590 cents, rather than a diminished fifth, 610 cents. This derivation from the 7th partial is unlikely, however, for (1) in its musical meaning B-F is certainly a diminished fifth, i.e. the notes tend to approach, not to fly apart as they would if it had been an augmented fourth; (2) although logically we speak of GBDF as the 'root' position, it is historically a development from other positions, such as DFGB or FGBD, in which F-B (not B-F) was accepted as the augmented fourth and F-G as the major tone, and (3) Equal Temperament with 1000 cents represents the minor seventh (996) rather than the 7th partial (969).

An attempt was also made by Scriabin to introduce the 11th partial, or 'trumpet Fourth.' (From C, Just F \sharp is a major tone above E and a diatonic semitone below G, whereas the trumpet F \sharp is three-quarters of a tone from both; see MUHAMMEDAN MUSIC.) But he did not construct the keyboard which should contain the required notes nor did he show how an orchestra brought up on Just intonation was to find them.

TABULATION OF INTERVALS.—Pitches, then, are expressed by the vibration numbers, and the ratio between them by a fraction, vulgar, decimal or algebraical. Each of these has its advantage; vulgar fractions are the plainest statements of fact, decimals are useful for comparing one ratio with another in point of size, and algebraical show the genesis of the ratio. But the manipulation of these is cumbersome, and it is better to substitute logarithms, by which multiplication becomes addition and division subtraction. Thus unison = 1 and the octave = 2, and the logarithms of all intervals within the octave lie between the logarithms of these, 0 and .30103. For ordinary purposes a few places are enough, and the French employ logarithms correct to three places under the name of 'savarts.'

CENTS.—But since it is sometimes useful to compare ratios with those of equal temperament, it is the custom in England and Germany to use 'cents.' The octave is arbitrarily taken as 1200 cents, and each equal semitone, therefore, as 100. The cents of any ratio are obtained by multiplying its logarithm by $\left(\frac{1200}{.30103} =\right)$ 3986.

REDUCTION OF RATIOS TO CENTS.—(a) By logarithms. A useful table of logarithms for the reduction of ratios to cents and vice versa is given in Ellis's article on 'The Musical Scales of Various Nations' in the Journal of the Society of Arts for March 1885. (b) By arithmetic. For the reduction of ratios to cents (but not vice versa) the following rule is practically correct. There are three cases :

- (i.) The ratio is less than $\frac{1}{2}$.
- (ii.) The ratio is between $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{3}{4}$.
- (iii.) The ratio is greater than $\frac{3}{4}$.

Then

(i.) Multiply 3462 by the difference of numerator and denominator and divide by their sum.
Ex. : The ratio is $\frac{1}{2}$, multiply 3462 by 1 and divide by 19. Result, 182. If this quotient is over 262 add 1

 " 378 " 2
 " 448 " 3.

(ii.) Multiply the larger number by 3 and the smaller by 4, proceed as in (i.) and add 498.
Ex. : The ratio is $\frac{1}{2}$. Multiply 45 by 3 and 32 by 4, giving $\frac{1}{2}$, difference 7, sum 263. Then $\frac{3462 \times 7}{263} = 92$. Add 498. Result, 590.

(iii.) Multiply the larger number by 2 and the smaller by 3, proceed as in (i.) and add 702.
Ex. : The ratio is $\frac{1}{2}$. Multiply 7 by 2 and 4 by 3, giving $\frac{1}{2}$. Then $2 + \frac{1}{2} = 2.5$. Since 266 is more than 262, add 1 as well as 702. Result, 969.

A few typical intervals with their various forms of statement are given below :

QUARTERTONE AND MICROTONE.—'Quarter-tone' is the popular name for an indeterminate interval ranging from one-third to one-half of a semitone, i.e. from 37 to 56 cents. The objection to its use in music is not its small size but its indeterminateness; there can be no guarantee that voice or string would take it twice in the same way. Busoni thought that it might be produced on a special keyboard, but he did not show to what use it could be put in harmonic music. His theoretical interval was 33 cents.

A microtone is a determinate interval less than a tone. Music accepts the two semitones, the diatonic greater, the chromatic less, than half a tone; the first has long been recognised as a harmonic interval, e.g. in 'Elijah' at the words 'But the Lord'; the second was familiar as such to the Elizabethans (see Fellowes's English Madrigal Composers, p. 99, and Weelkes's 'Noel, adieu, thou Court's delight') and to Purcell; and Ravel (sonata for violin and violoncello) and Stravinsky ('Firebird') make great play with it. Also the minor tone is heard in such a chord as GBDE, between the D and E. There are other microtones which music rejects because of the complexity of their derivation. The diesis (42 cents) would make a good 'quarter-tone' if any ear were able to hear C \sharp and D \flat in simultaneity or even in immediate succession.

A table is appended of the intervals in actual use. The twelve notes of the scale are in heavier type. The upper tetrachord is almost always to be obtained from the lower by multiplying by Q or its equivalent, or adding 702 cents; but the notes of the scale do not always correspond in the two tetrachords.

The column marked 'Position' indicates the notes of C major (capitals) or C minor (small letters) on which these intervals can only stand or do typically stand. The chromatic semitone and diminished octave may stand anywhere.

THE ÆSTHETIC ASPECT.—Intervals are limited, upwards and downwards, in size. We confuse sounds which are octaves apart by what is called 'the fringe of the ear'; striking suddenly C at the bottom of the keyboard and C \sharp at the top, we are not at once sure that it is not a consonance that we hear. On the other hand, our ear declines to unravel the harmonic complexity of anything smaller than the chromatic semitone.

We classify the octave, fifth, fourth and unison as 'perfect,' recognising chromatic alterations of them ('augmented' or 'diminished') as 'imperfect.' The seconds, thirds, sixths and sevenths are either 'major' or 'minor,' with augmented or diminished intervals on either side of them. Others, again, as shown in the foregoing diagram, correspond to slightly different ratios and have special names. Voices and strings sharpen and flatten these Just intervals for effect, and equal temperament no doubt blunts our sense of them. But the distinctions are there; and the systems of harmony which would flout them and the schemes of notation which would ignore them are hardly likely to have more success than phonetic spelling, which has never made any real headway against the historical sense of language.

The æsthetic effect of major and minor has always been something of a puzzle. Historically, the minor third was first heard as the residue of the tone and the fourth, as, for instance, in the well-known figure, and, from its occurrence as the third of the scale in modes that were accounted jubilant, we gather that it conveyed no feeling of sadness. To us, the minor third in that position is 'sad' or 'desolate' or 'isolated' primarily by contrast with the major. But the particular effect in harmony is lost in the general effect of the tonality, as we see when we con-contrast the minor effect of , where both intervals, third and sixth, are major, with the major effect of , where both are minor.

But then, again, the minor six-three just quoted is so frequently used as a suspension of the major triad (as in the first bar of the andante of Schubert's A major sonata, op. 120) that we can only say that the æsthetic effect depends on the context; in other words, that an interval or chord has little, if any, æsthetic effect per se.

Particular intervals come into and go out of fashion or acquire a local prestige. On the banks of the Severn and the Niger the major third is indigenous. The Chinese use that form of pentatonic scale which begins with the major third, while Scots seem to prefer the dominant form of that scale (i.e. with no third at all). The North American Indians construct their song on the notes of the triad. Russians favour the fourth, Icelanders the augmented fourth. In the Near and Middle East the augmented second is characteristic. The Swedes sing principally in the 'ascending' minor. The Irish, as musical as any of them, show no decided preference for any particular interval.

Harmony seemed at first to be possible only with fourths, and then fifths, admitting thirds as exceptions. These were cultivated independently in the GYMEL (q.v.) at one time peculiar to this island. The two were merged in Faburden, and the thirds were the chief carriers of classical harmony. Chopin familiarised us with Hungarian augmented seconds and fourths; Sinding exploited augmented sixths. Later we seem to have swung back to the fourth as a basis, possibly influenced by the Russians, probably as a virile contrast to the sweetness of the thirds, certainly not as a revival of the Organum.

INTONATION. (1) The initial phrase of a plain-song melody. For the intonations of the psalm tones see the article PSALMODY, and for other intonations in simple inflected monotone see the article INFLEXION. But the term is applied more widely to the opening phrases of other plain-song melodies besides those that grow out of inflected monotone; this is due to the fact that such melodies as antiphons, hymns, etc., were 'precented,' that is, the opening phrase was started alone by the Precentor or other skilled musician, or by some one else under his direction. This secured a right opening and a suitable pitch. Other pieces were precented by the celebrant, and the intonations of the Credo and the various settings of Gloria in excelsis were inserted in the Missal for his guidance.

(2) The word is also used of singing or playing in tune. Thus, we say that the intonation of such and such a performer is either true, or false, as the case may be. For a detailed account of the conditions upon which perfect tune depends see JUST INTONATION, INTERVAL, SCALE and TEMPERAMENT. W. S. R.

INTRADA (ENTRATA), a term used for an opening movement, as by Beethoven for the introductory piece of the 'Battle Symphony' of his Battle of Vittoria, or for the first movement of the serenade, op. 25. 'Intrade' is used by Mozart for the overture of his 'Bastien' (K. 50); and 'Intrada o concerto' by Bach for an independent movement (Cat. No. 117). (See ENTRÉE 2.) G.

INTRODUCTION, a term specially used in connexion with symphonic music, where it means anything from a single preparatory chord to a highly developed movement (generally in slow time) leading up to the main subject-matter, generally a quick movement or allegro.

Parry, in earlier editions of this Dictionary, pointed out that in the more primitive examples of symphony or sonata, and notably in certain of the string quartets of Haydn,¹ the introduction had the character of a 'simple signal to attention.'

The development in the musical importance of the introduction may be traced through the Salomon symphonies of Haydn to the outstanding examples presented by the first, second, fourth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven. Parry notes that 'in the Symphony in A [Beethoven, No. 7] the idea of the independent introduction culminates. It has a decidedly appreciable form and two definite subjects.'

The later tendency has been to incorporate the introduction with increasing decision into the structure of the movement or work as a whole. Here, too, Beethoven gave the lead as early as op. 13, the 'Sonate pathétique' for pianoforte, where the introductory theme is interpolated at successive crises of the allegro.²

Tchaikovsky built on the idea in his 4th and 5th symphonies, using the introduction to state a 'motto' theme which punctuates, as it were, not only the movement immediately succeeding it, but later movements as well. Schumann's symphony in C and Brahms's in C minor turn it to more subtle uses. The introductions to both the opening and the finale of Brahms's C minor are specially noteworthy. The former deals with the principal subject-matter of the succeeding allegro; the latter picks up the same subject-matter and weaves it together with ideas anticipatory of the finale. Innumerable instances of a similar suggestiveness could be quoted from modern music. Two from salient English works deserve mention here, namely, Elgar's first symphony and Vaughan Williams's 'London' symphony. Of these, the former may be compared with the emphatic method of Tchaikovsky, the latter with the reflective one of Brahms. C.

INTROIT (Lat. introitus, antiphona ad introitum, ingressa). An antiphon and psalm, sung by the choir at the beginning of Mass.

The words of the antiphon, or introit proper, come almost universally from Holy Scripture. The psalm has been curtailed until one verse only is sung, followed by the Gloria Patri. The antiphon is repeated in full at the conclusion of the Gloria, and, according to English custom, before it also. Proper introits are appointed for every day in the ecclesiastical year; and from the first words of these many Sundays derive the names by which they are familiarly known—as 'Laetare Sunday,' the fourth Sunday in Lent; 'Quasimodo Sunday,' the first Sunday after Easter (Dominica in Albis—the 'Low Sunday' of the old English Calendar). The music to which the introit is sung forms part of the Gregorian chant (see GREGORIAN MUSIC) and is to be found in the gradual. The psalms are sung to special forms of the Gregorian tones, more elaborate than those used for the Gospel canticles. The introit for the first Mass on Christmas Day is a remarkably fine specimen of the style.

The First Prayer Book of King Edward VI. (1549) appointed for an introit an entire psalm, followed by the Gloria Patri, but sung without an antiphon. At first sight the rubric, 'Then shall he say a Psalm appointed for the Introit,' would lead to the supposition that the psalm in question was not intended to be sung by the choir: this idea, however, is disproved by the fact that the music for it is supplied in Merbecke's 'Booke of Common Praier Noted,' printed in 1550, and adapted, throughout, to King Edward's First Book. This provision of an introit ceased in the second Prayer Book (1552), and has not been renewed. But of recent years the use of an introit has been restored in many Anglican churches, and many of the plain-song introits have been adapted to English words. W. H. F.

² See also Haydn's 'Drum roll' Symphony.

INVENTION. A term used by J. S. Bach, and probably by him only, for fifteen small pianoforte pieces—each in two parts, and each developing a single idea. The companion pieces in three parts are, for some not very obvious reason, called ‘Symphonien.’ G.

INVERSION (Ger. Umkehrung). The word bears, in musical terminology, five different significations.

(1) Intervals are said to be inverted when their lowest notes are raised an octave higher, and thus placed above the highest ones, or vice versa, thus—

In order to ascertain the inversion of a given interval, add to it as many units as are necessary to make up the number nine. The sum of these units will represent the inverted interval. Thus:

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8
8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

The process of inversion not only changes the name of an interval, but, in certain cases, and to a certain extent, influences its nature. Major intervals, for instance, become minor by inversion; and minor intervals, major. Augmented intervals become diminished, and diminished ones augmented. But the essential character of the interval survives the operation unchanged, and asserts itself, with equal force, in the inversion. In whatever position they may be taken, consonant intervals remain always consonant; ¹ dissonant intervals, dissonant; and perfect intervals, perfect. (See INTERVAL.)

(2) A chord is said to be inverted when any note, other than its root, is taken in the lowest part.

Thus—

If the same process be applied to the chord of the seventh we shall, by successively taking the third, fifth and seventh, in the bass, obtain its three inversions, the 6-5-3, the 6-4-3 and the 6-4-2.

¹ Although the Perfect Fourth—the Inversion of the Perfect Fifth—is classed, by contrapuntists, among Dissonants, it only forms an apparent exception to the general rule; since it is admitted to be a consonance, when it appears between the upper parts of a chord.

(3) A pedal point (point d'orgue) is described as inverted when the sustained note, instead of being placed in the bass, is transferred to an upper part, as in Mozart's pianoforte fantasia in C minor (op. 11):

—or, to a middle one, as in the following passage from Deh vieni, non tardar (Nozze di Figaro), where the inverted pedal is sustained by the second violins:

In these, and similar cases, the characteristic note (whether sustained or reiterated) forms no part of the HARMONY (q.v.), which remains wholly unaffected, either by its presence or removal.

(4) Counterpoint is said to be inverted when the upper part is placed beneath the lower, or vice versa: thus (from Cherubini)—

(a) Double Counterpoint for 2 Voices.

(b) Inversion.

We have, here, an example of what is called ‘Double Counterpoint in the Octave,’ in which the inversion is produced by simply transposing the upper part an octave lower, or the lower part an octave higher. But the inversion may take place in any other interval, thus giving rise to fourteen different species of double counterpoint—those, namely, invertible in the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth, either above or below. In order to ascertain what intervals are to be avoided in these several methods of inversion, contrapuntists use a table, constructed of two rows of figures, one placed over the other, the upper row beginning with the unit, and the lower one (in which the numbers are reckoned backwards) with the figure representing the particular kind of counterpoint contemplated. Thus, for inversion in the ninth, the upper row will begin with one, and the lower with nine, as in the following example :

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9
9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

By this table we learn that, when the relative position of two parts is reversed, the unison will be represented by a ninth; the second, by an eighth; the third, by a seventh; and so on to the end: and we are thus enabled to see, at a glance, how every particular interval must be treated in order that it may conform strictly to rule, both in its normal and its inverted condition. In this particular case the fifth, being the only consonance which is answered by a consonance, is of course the most important interval in the series, and the only one with which it is possible to begin, or end, as in the following example from Marpurg:

(a) Double Counterpoint in the Ninth.

(b) Inversion—the upper part transposed a Ninth lower.

For practical use of this principle see INVERTIBLE COUNTERPOINT. W. S. R.

(5) In Counterpoint the term inversion is also used to signify the repetition of a phrase or passage with reversed intervals, or, as it is sometimes called, by contrary motion;¹ e.g.:

Subject, or theme.

Inversion of subject, or theme.

This is a device very frequently adopted in the construction of fugues in order to secure variety. In J. S. Bach's fugues are many

¹ This device of inversion should be carefully distinguished from the kindred device (which might be termed reversion) used in all cases of retrograde imitation (see RECRE ET RETRAO and ROVESCIO), wherein a melody or phrase is not inverted interval by interval but from beginning to end, the last note standing first and the first last. The exact distinction may be seen in the following short example:

The association of this last effective device with laborious artifices, in many cases ineffective, seems rather to have obscured its practical value in short phrases. H. W. D.

magnificent instances of the effective use of this contrivance—as in the 'Wohltemperirtes Clavier,' Nos. 6 and 8 of Part 1. Sometimes the answer to the subject of a fugue is introduced by inversion—as in Nos. 6 and 7 of Bach's 'Art of Fugue'—and then the whole fugue is called 'a fugue by inversion.' Canons and Imitations are often constructed in this way. As examples see the Gloria Patri in the Deus Misereatur of Purcell's Service in B \flat , and the Chorus, 'To our great God' in 'Judas Macabaeus.' (See CANON, FUGUE, INSCRIPTION, INVERTIBLE COUNTERPOINT.) F. A. G. O.

INVERTED CADENCE, see CADENCE (I.), section (3).

INVERTIBLE COUNTERPOINT. Counterpoint is called invertible when its parts may effectively change places, the higher taking the lower place, and vice versa.

Invertible counterpoint in two parts is called double counterpoint:

From Boyce's Anthem 'Turn Thee unto Me.'

Let me not be con-found ed.
INVERSION.

When three-part writing is so constructed as to be completely invertible—that is, when each part in turn will make an effective bass, while the other two standing above it may still change places—the result is called triple counterpoint:

From BACH's 'Wohlt. Clav.,' No. 22.

Whereas double counterpoint offers only two possibilities—the original and its inversion, triple has six—the original and five different inversions²; and obviously the addition of a fourth invertible part—making quadruple counterpoint—will give exactly four times the six versions of triple, viz. twenty-four. Similarly, quintuple counterpoint has a hundred and twenty possibilities (five times that of quadruple); sextuple has seven hundred and twenty, and the range may be carried indefinitely into regions which become alarmingly vast only as they become unpractical.

² If the three subjects be called 1, 2 and 3, the following formula makes clear the six possible arrangements of parts: 1 2 3 3 2 1 3 1 2 2 1 3 1 2 3 2 1 3 2 1

There is a second important manner of inversion. When parts in counterpoint change places as described above, they undergo what may be called harmonic inversion. But a melody can be subjected also to an inversion which may be termed melodic. (See INVERSION, 5.) The following free but excellent instance of this melodic inversion taken from Brahms's German Requiem shows the effect it has upon the melody itself :

It will be seen that all intervals are reversed, so that every rise becomes a fall, and vice versa—a process in itself so artificial that it is naturally used with much care by the great composers, and in moderation even by the greatest master of it, Bach himself. The mere melodic inversion of one part, as in the Brahms example, cannot, however, be said to constitute invertible counterpoint; in this at least two parts are necessarily involved. It is true that instances may be found of the melodic inversion of one part, while the other part or parts remain unaltered. There is a striking though fragmentary example in the counter-subject of one of Bach's 'Forty-eight' (No. 24 in B minor), of which the following various forms have a distinctly experimental effect :

No. 24 of the 'Forty-eight.'

But it may soon be seen that when one of two parts is melodically inverted, it is both natural and easy to invert the other also. And further, it is an important and not an immediately obvious fact that two parts cannot be effectively invertible in this melodic sense without being harmonically invertible also; and the double inversion, like a double reflection, restores their relationship to each other in a way that will be made clear by the short example which follows.

This is a fragment of counterpoint and three different inversions :

(a) is the model; (b) an ordinary inversion in the harmonic sense only; (c) an inversion in the melodic sense only, or, as it is often called, inversion by contrary movement. In both of these it will be observed that the intervals between the two parts in the model are inverted—sixths turning into thirds, thirds into sixths, a second into a seventh, and so forth. But in the double inversion (both harmonic and melodic) at (d), all the intervals are restored, being exactly what they were in the model.¹

Conversely, a movement downwards of the upper of two parts will have the same effect (of approximation) as the corresponding movement upwards of the lower part.

Therefore, if two parts be melodically inverted (every downward step being turned into an upward one and vice versa), it is only necessary to invert them harmonically as well to restore their relative positions towards each other.

This being so it is only natural that though ordinary inversion flourishes separately, the rarer and more artificial melodic sort is closely associated with ordinary inversion; and in quite early treatises, to be mentioned later, it was taught as a second and difficult variety of double counterpoint inverted in both senses. Latterly it does not appear to have been as systematically taught as its real importance would warrant.

THE TWO MANNERS OF INVERSION CONTRASTED.—The essential difference between the two styles of inversion is as important as it is interesting. While both bear the stamp of ingenuity rather than spontaneity, their application in composition has widely different effects. One is pre-eminently useful and seldom very significant; the other is usually highly significant and has, in some cases, quite fantastic, even dangerous possibilities. A glance at the Boyce example quoted above will show that its invertibility simply makes for increased utility rather than for increased significance. The feeling of the passage is in no way changed; it is only in a subtle way amplified; and a composer who plans an effective piece of invertible counterpoint is only like a wise builder who chooses well-planned sizes and patterns of building material with a view to very extensive and varied use. Indeed, for this reason, an extended contrapuntal movement is scarcely to be conceived without some traces of double counterpoint. But melodic inversion, on the other hand, makes rather for new emotional significance than for mere utility. Useful it may be, but significant in most cases it must be; sometimes it is startlingly so. It is easy to account for this. The rise and fall of a melody are strongly associated with the feeling that underlies it, just as the rise and fall of the speaking voice are dependent upon the feeling of the speaker, so that often a melody which is practically unaffected by ordinary inversion becomes vitally transformed by melodic inversion, in a way that ingenious contrapuntists may sometimes be apt to overlook. While almost any melody will bear transplanting from a higher to a lower part, it is hardly too much to say that some of the greatest melodies ever written would sound as inappropriately grotesque when melodically inverted as a great verse of poetry if read line by line backwards.

Two notable instances from Bach show more clearly than words the exact type of subject most suited for melodic inversion. The first is the famous one from his 'Art of Fugue,' which is probably more extensively subjected to this kind of inversion than any ever penned:

The work of which it forms the text is a monument of skill. The subject itself has underlying emotion, but it is restrained and equable; it also has a certain amount of rhythm which is easily recognisable; and it shows a third qualification not yet mentioned but highly significant—its harmonic import is not materially disturbed by inversion. For these reasons, nothing in its many inversions seems to distort or even to disturb the spirit of the subject. The second instance to be quoted is of a very different kind, and is inserted here to show that even an emotional melody of a certain type can be inverted without disturbance of its expressive qualities. It is not an example of regular inversion, but one in which Bach has taken the two limbs of a fugue subject (that of No. 16 from the 'Forty-eight') and used them, rather freely inverted, as the counter-subject:

Subject.

Answer.

Counter-subject.

Instances need not be further multiplied to prove the striking and consequently dangerous nature of melodic inversion, or to show its best use. Neither need further quotations be made to prove that its dangers are not shared by ordinary harmonic inversion. The contrast of the two, however, would not be just, or at all complete, if we omitted to point out, that, although the prevailing characteristic of ordinary inversion is its extreme usefulness, there are rare instances in which it also achieves a certain delicate expressive significance of its own. One such is to be found in a movement in Part I. of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio,' where two oboe parts which stand thus in the introduction:

acquire a new thoughtfulness in their inverted form¹ at the close of the movement:

Some account of the earlier stages of the art of inversion, as expounded by two notable 16th century theorists, and exemplified in the works of the greatest composer of the golden age, may be appropriately attempted here.

EARLY USE OF INVERTIBLE COUNTERPOINT.—The custom, in the early days of Organum and Diaphonia, of freely doubling the vox organalis an octave above or the vox principalis an octave below (see DIAPHONIA), forms virtually the prototype of ordinary inversion. It seems probable that its practical origin lies in the natural conditions of vocal compass. When the words of a motet or mass were passed from part to part, their musical counterpart would go with them; the accompanying parts would then fall into other relative positions, and inversion of some sort would soon be discovered and prove useful. The other (melodic) manner of inversion doubtless first arose with the mere exercise of contrapuntal ingenuity; it is safe to assume that it was greatly fostered by the canonic devices so dearly loved and diligently cultivated in the 14th century, if, indeed, it did not originate then. It might perhaps have been expected that the usefulness and fascination of inversion would have claimed for it greater attention in the earlier days than it actually received. Its use in the 16th century, as will be seen presently in the extracts from Palestrina, was quite masterly but never very systematic. As to the theorists, Ornithoparcus (in 1516) has apparently no mention of the subject of inversion at all in his delightful Micrologus; but a limited number of artificial manners were sufficiently common to be minutely dealt with by Zarlino in 1558. Of these some details may be here given, especially as our own Morley explained the subject to English students in his Plaine and Easie Introduction (1597) as—

‘A manner of composition used among the Italians, which they call contrapunto doppio, or double descant, which being sung after divers sortes, by changing the partes, maketh diverse manners of harmony: and is found to be of two sortes.’

Both Zarlino's and Morley's two sorts prove to be really three, as their first sort is divided into two manners, one of which (as the former author says in his Istitutioni armoniche), ‘when the parts are inverted continues with the same intervals,’ the other ‘with variations.’ Both theorists proceed to suggest that in the first manner the inversion is to be effected by transposing the higher part a fifth lower and the lower an octave higher, while in the second manner the higher part should be taken a tenth lower and the lower an octave higher. These two kinds are virtually double counterpoint in the twelfth and tenth respectively, indeed, Morley gives them these names; and the description of the latter as being ‘with variations’ simply refers to the modifications of intervals necessary to preserve tonality when transposing any part a tenth. The other sort of ‘double descant,’ described by both theorists, is practically inversion by contrary movement, already referred to at length in this article; but some of the examples are planned, by an accumulation of device, not only to invert in a variety of ways, but also to make strict canon, sometimes direct and sometimes by contrary movement. A clear idea of the evolution of this art is only to be given by rather extensive quotation. Morley's examples of the first two sorts are too long to quote in full, but a few bars will give an idea of their vigorous character as well as show their exact method of inversion as laid down by both Zarlino and Morley himself:

Double descant in the twelfth (MORLEY).

Inversion.

Double descant in the tenth (MORLEY).

Inversion.

Morley's rules for the first sort are concise and practical, and agree closely with those given by Zarlino, the chief being that no sixth is to be used, the compass of a twelfth is not to be exceeded, and the parts are not to cross. He adds directions for the avoidance of special progressions, which would involve false relations in inversion. For the second sort the chief rule given is that no consecutives of any kind are to be written, but curiously enough the parts are allowed to cross to the extent of a third.

Both Zarlino and Morley make interesting attempts to write a counterpoint at once invertible in all three ways. Space compels us to quote only that of the English master:

But the greatest cleverness is exercised by both theorists in their third kind of inversion. In this manner, an example is given, by each, of what Morley calls a 'canon made *per arsin et thesin*¹ without any discord in binding manner' in it.' The object of this device may be thus explained: When any two parts are written without suspended discords, they can be inverted in the double sense (melodically and harmonically), as was shown earlier, in such a way that all the intervals between them will be exactly restored. But if the two parts be also constructed so that, apart from this inversion, the one forms with the other an exact canon by contrary movement, the inversion, when it takes place, will have this simple and surprising result: the part that was the consequent may lead, and the leading part may follow as a new consequent. This use of double counterpoint is worth quoting at length here, as it seems to represent the height of what may be styled practical ingenuity in this direction. The principal or model is given in full in each case, but only a few bars of the reply are indicated, as these may easily be completed by the reader:

Morley after his effort adds: 'Thus you see that these wayes of double descant carie some difficultie, and that the hardest of them all is the Canon.'

Still, in spite of such ingenuity as this, the art of inversion seems scarcely to have been very highly developed or prosperous in the 16th century. The arbitrary choice of a few artificial devices out of so many—though these few were certainly of the most typical and practical kinds—and the minute correspondence of description in both authors,¹ together with the slender consideration they each give the subject as compared with the rest of their work, and the air of relief with which they both declare that genius can discover other new and beautiful inventions of the same kind—all these things point rather to the fact that invertible counterpoint was not very systematically formulated at the time, and that theorists were content to be more suggestive than didactic on the subject. The omission of any mention of double counterpoint at the octave or fifteenth seems remarkable; it suggests that this may have been so obvious a use as not to be included among 'artificial kinds of counterpoint' nor to deserve Zarlino's description as 'composition so ingeniously arranged that it may be sung in several ways.' Whether at that time it was not even dignified with the name of contrapunto doppio, as it has been since, is not clear.

To turn to the practical application of the art of inversion in the 16th century, it may be said that Palestrina's use of it is more moderate and perhaps less systematic than might be expected. His great fluency of parts, his faithfulness to melodic outline, and his minute reproduction of the emotion of the words in each part, all seem to point to invertible counterpoint as the one art which would give him absolute freedom. For when melodious phrases pass repeatedly from voice to voice, counterpoints that will not fall naturally into the vacated places above or below the chief melody must needs be modified, or perhaps abandoned altogether. This may be a real hindrance to inspiration; and it is even possible, without heresy, to imagine that Palestrina and his contemporaries, had they chanced to study this particular art more, might have attained to their great heights with even greater ease. But it is perhaps truer, and certainly pleasanter, to believe that Palestrina's erudition was in such complete subjection to his spirit that learned devices of inversion, though fully at his command, were modified or abandoned altogether, only because, when the time came, a more beautiful note or part or progression suggested itself. He seems rarely to take a subject from a high to a low voice, or vice versa, without the process of adorning or completely changing its accompanying counterpoints. Strict inversions are to be found; but they are always beautiful rather than learned in effect, and since they are clearly the exception in his works, they seem to prove his rule of freedom. It needs a well-read disciple of the music of that period to speak authoritatively—and this the writer cannot claim to be; but it seems doubtful whether a more complete or typical example of the 16th-century use of inversion in practical composition could be found than chances to be easily accessible in Palestrina's motet, 'O beata et gloriosa Trinitas,' from which the following examples are taken. The first is a double counterpoint in the twelfth, and its first occurrence (which may be called the model), with its three subsequent inversions, are here set down:

It is difficult to speak with sober moderation of this and like examples of Palestrina's art. It will be seen that the model is capable of exact inversion, that it never once received it at his hands, and yet the effect of exact inversion is virtually produced. The modifications in each case have a practical reason behind them which the merest tyro can grasp, but in each case they put on an inspired grace. The next extract may be cited as a like instance of free triple counterpoint :

A - le - lu - ja,
Al - le - lu - ja,
Al - le - lu - ja, etc.

The chief subject passes from treble to tenor ; it is twice modified, yet its spirit is entirely preserved ; the inversion of the other parts is free, beginning at the fifth and twelfth respectively, but merging into what, while it cannot be called an inversion, yet gives the feeling of one.

The third example is in four parts, and, as the bass remains the same, it affords what would seem a rare instance of an inversion in which all the four parts are reproduced note for note :

ve - ra, sum - ma,
ve - ra, sum - ma,

Those who know Palestrina's method will realise that these phrases form the counterpart of each other ; but they are each part of a five-bar phrase, and in the rest of the phrase they have only one part strictly in common. The last quotation affords a practical application of strict double counterpoint at the octave which seems really rare in Palestrina. The point of great interest is the flexibility and freedom of the bass part which accompanies each inversion, while the great beauty and masterly freedom of the final cadence are so typical, and they so enhance the whole treatment, that they are here included :

THE HARMONIC ERA IN INVERTIBLE COUNTERPOINT.—Fux (1660–1741) in his Gradus treats of double counterpoint in general in connexion with double fugue. He considers it (1) in the octave, (2) in the tenth, (3) in the twelfth, (4) by contrary motion—distinguishing what he calls simple contrary motion and strict contrary motion under the names al rovescio and al contrario riverso respectively. His book is still fairly accessible (in its old English translation) and need not be quoted at any length here. It makes clear the fact, as was to be expected, that no striking advance in the art of inversion was made during the 17th century. But momentous things were happening during that time, amongst them one which would have an important bearing upon inversion, viz. that the bass or lowest part began to assume a character very different from the upper parts and one definitely its own. In early days a bass could be as ductile as a treble, as may be seen in some of the instances from Palestrina quoted above : and although the harmonic style of bass was even then often present (sometimes as regulated and mature as anything written in the 18th century), yet it still enjoyed a sort of happy irresponsibility as compared with the stereotyped harmonic passages of the age of figured basses, and it was not until the powerful progression of dominant to tonic had fully asserted itself, ascended its throne, and assumed its sway, that such basses as the following became the rule :

These, it will be seen, are not such as will comfortably invert. In the days between the death of Palestrina and the birth of Bach, the key kingdom became more or less established and the way prepared, so that when the latter arrived with his stupendous gifts, it was possible for him and for his contemporaries and followers completely to restore melodic flexibility to all the parts without any violation of the absolute rule of key. This was the new polyphony, and it bestowed fresh vitality upon the act of inversion as upon every other contrapuntal device.

It is scarcely too much to assert that in Bach's lifetime this particular art made as much progress as it had made in the whole of its previous existence, and it has not greatly advanced since. Bach's characteristic freedom of melodic style, together with his extraordinary clearness of harmonic purpose, were specially favourable to it ; indeed, they furnished him with just the two requisites for success ; and doubtless the diligence with which he constructed parts that were invertible reacted favourably upon his style. He found the simple harmonic scheme of tonic, dominant and subdominant, awaiting him, and attained complete mastery over it, establishing and extending it by all he wrote. It is not intended to suggest here that harmonic root basses, such as those cited above, belonged only to the early days of harmonic rule, or that they were altogether abolished by Bach in favour of more flexible and melodious basses. They are, of course, as indispensable to-day as they were in the hands of any early Italian harmonic writer, such as Vivaldi, and nothing can replace them for strength and real grandeur of effect. Moreover, Bach and Handel used, to great advantage, basses as angular and incapable of inversion as any of their predecessors had used. The pre-eminent achievement, however, of Bach's polyphony was to reconcile harmonic strength with melodic grace in one and the same part whenever he needed both, and this is clearly the whole problem of modern invertible counterpoint. Innumerable are the melodies of beauty and the basses of strength which will not invert ; but let parts be combined which are strong enough to be basses and beautiful enough to be melodies, and the two great commandments of invertible counterpoint are fulfilled. It is this fact which makes Bach's fugues, and notably the Forty-eight and the collection called the Art of Fugue, the finest text-book on inversion.

For a detailed exposition of all the varieties of inversion and their peculiarities, the reader must be referred to the many works on the subject since that of Fux, amongst which may be named those of Marpurge, Azzopardi, Cherubini, Albrechtsberger ; and in England, in modern times, the little Primer by Bridge, and the much larger one by Prout, have done much to help the student. Many modern German treatises, too, are devoted to double counterpoint ; one by J. E. Haberl (Leipzig, 1899) deals in much detail with the rarer inversions. Here no more can be attempted than to add some general remarks as to the three most useful and common kinds of inversion, together with a few practical hints on inversion by contrary movement.

INVERSION AT THE OCTAVE OR FIFTEENTH (in two, three or more parts).—This inversion is the most natural and serviceable, and is by far the most common. It has already been made clear that the all-important point, whether in double, triple or manifold counterpoint of this kind, is to imply the harmonic progression so unequivocally as to secure it in all inversions from ambiguity or from actual distortion. But the practical difficulty, as is pointed out by every theorist from Fux onwards, generally centres upon the ambiguous nature of the perfect fourth¹ and upon the unnatural restrictions which consequently limit the use of its inversion, the fifth. A fifth (or possibly a fourth if between two upper parts) may form at one moment an innocent concord, and at the next, when inverted as a fourth from the lowest part, it may become a discord, with a different root. For a fourth from the bass ordinarily implies a delayed third, just as a seventh implies a sixth or a ninth an octave. The rough-and-ready rule to obviate this difficulty is to exclude the fifth, because of the difficulty of its inversion as a fourth, or else, in view of its becoming a discord, to prepare it by suspension or cautious conjunct movement.² But this is clearly not the best method, nor does it produce results to be compared with Bach's finest examples of double or triple counterpoint. There are innumerable instances of well and freely planned fifths and fourths; to know how these may be written the student must probably adopt the more circuitous course of studying all the devices by which a deliberate harmonic basis may be made perspicuous, and that not only in four or three parts, with more or less complete chords, but in the implied harmonies of two parts, and even in a single melody without accompaniment. Some of these devices may be briefly indicated. Thus the leap of a fourth upwards or a fifth downwards to an accented note implies the root progression whether accompanied or not; and the inevitable progression of leading note to tonic—perhaps plain, perhaps adorned by the conventional shake or changing note or other adornment—is easily recognisable whenever it occurs.

² It is also possible to write the complete 6-5 fearlessly, and simply to avoid the inversion which converts it into an unsatisfactory 6-4. This Bach has done, for example, in the case of the chord marked * in the triple counterpoint quoted at the beginning of this article.

Still more conspicuous among melodic devices, by which harmonic intention is implied, is that which in all its forms may be called the arpeggio device, i.e. moving from note to note of a chord till it be completely inferred.

In these instances of inferred diminished and dominant sevenths it will be seen that it is enough to indicate the two characteristic notes of each chord, the rest being omitted. This principle is easier to embody in two-part writing, where all the melodic devices just enumerated may be supplemented by a characteristic note in the second part that shall make the progression still clearer. For instance, if the dominant seventh be added to the leading note in the example at the top of this page, the progression is confirmed, and a sure foundation for good double counterpoint will be formed.

The same principles of harmonic implication evidently guided Bach in his construction of such masterly triple counterpoint as the following:

From No. 4 of the 'Forty-eight.'

in which a bold leap to C sharp in the second bar enables him to retain the vigour and fullness of a complete common chord without the smallest risk of ambiguity. The reader will have perceived that in an important sense it becomes really easier to write good invertible counterpoint in many parts than in two. For, as the parts increase, the means of harmonic clearness manifestly increase also. Thus, a chord of the dominant or diminished seventh is not liable to the ambiguity in inversion that besets a plain common chord. And from this the student may argue backwards and discover that in three-part counterpoint, and even in two, incomplete or implied chords of the seventh will often serve far better than complete or implied common chords, and will make his harmonic purpose quite clear. A splendid instance of this device is to be found in the following triple counterpoint taken from Bach's great G minor organ fugue:

which is chiefly built on incomplete chords of the seventh.

Of the many varieties of inversion at other intervals (mentioned in the article INVERSION) two are to be singled out as the most useful.

DOUBLE COUNTERPOINT AT THE TENTH.—The chief claim of this variety to special consideration is to be found in the fact, pointed out by the 16th-century theorists as well as those of to-day, that it is possible to use the model (or principal) and its inversion (or reply) simultaneously, thus making a three-part result. Before Palestrina was born, Ornithoparcus wrote: 'The most famous manner of the Counter-point (as saith Franchinus) is, if the Base goe together with the Meane, or any other Voyce, being also distant by a tenth, whilst the Tenor doe goe in Concord to both.' To achieve this, consecutive thirds and sixths are obviously banned in the model. This is its chief condition, and two parts in well-planned contrary and oblique motion generally allow not only of this valuable inversion in its simple form, but also of various applications of what are known as added thirds, in which the advantages of lucidity and economy are combined with those of richness and strength which the subjects naturally gain by being doubled in thirds or sixths. The great usefulness of this kind of counterpoint is also well illustrated in such learned fugues as the A minor from Bach's Forty-eight quoted above. The following fragment of double counterpoint, which appears at the second and third entries of the subject, is enlarged into this at the fourth entry :

and an analysis of the whole fugue reveals its almost inexhaustible possibilities.¹

DOUBLE COUNTERPOINT AT THE TWELFTH.—The chief practical points to note in this inversion are : (1) that, in it, thirds become tenths and vice versa, so that consecutive thirds and tenths may be freely used ; (2) octaves and fifths are also interchangeable, each inverting into the other ; (3) sixths are to be used with peculiar caution as they invert into sevenths. Its chief characteristic, and probably its chief usefulness, are both to be found in its power to effect or suggest a subtle modulation to a nearly related key (the dominant or subdominant, as the case may be), since while one of the parts remains stationary, the other is transposed a twelfth up or down. Special allowance for this effect should be made in the model, especially at the cadence.² The device of a falling fifth adopted by Morley in the fourth bar of the passage already quoted (at p. 725), is excellent and should be noted, as when the lower part is transposed a twelfth higher a perfect cadence in D minor is effectively secured. The following fragment is so planned as to infer three different cadences (in A minor, F major and C major respectively) in its model and two inversions :

It is not always necessary, however, to suggest modulation. It may be avoided either by careful omission of the note that would effect the modulation in inversion (subdominant or leading note), or else by deliberate alteration of that one note in the inverted form. This Bach has done in the following beautiful triple counterpoint, an instance of particular grace and significance :

From No. 17 of the 'Forty-eight.' BACH.

INVERSION BY CONTRARY MOVEMENT.—So much has already been said in the first part of this article on this important variety that it only remains to name the chief points to be observed in construction, and the ways in which inversion may best be effected.

(1) Concords must prevail at the accented points, and only passing discords may be introduced. Naturally no suspended discords are possible, for the simple reason that in the inversion the suspension would fall upwards, and though the laws of gravity seem less immutable in music than in physics, such a suspension can only sound forced and unnatural. (2) The beginning and ending, but especially the ending, must be regulated by the scale on which the melodies are inverted, as will be seen below.

The possible scales on which any melody may be inverted are obviously seven. The scale of C, for example, may be inverted in the following positions :

² It is the cadence in all double counterpoints that naturally needs closest attention, for it is there that clearness is most desirable.

Of these the first, third and fifth possess special harmonic advantages, for in each the chief harmonies (tonic and dominant) upon which the model is built may, to a large extent, remain unchanged in the inversion. In none is it possible to achieve this completely. The scale which most favours the dominant is least favourable to the tonic chord. Thus in No. 6 the dominant triad coincides completely, and a subject built upon it would fare excellently in inversion till it came to the tonic :

Similarly, scale No. 5 completely favours the tonic, but the dominant triad in it is answered by the subdominant. Nos. 1 and 3 effect compromises, having points of coincidence in each triad as seen in this fragment :

And if the dominant seventh be used for a basis of the model, as it is in numberless cases, these two scales (together with No. 5, if the dominant ninth be a feature) form by far the most useful.

Of these No. 3 justly takes first place (in the major mode), for it alone combines with its harmonic advantages the exact melodic coincidence of every interval in inversion, tone coinciding with tone, semitone with semitone, and —most important of all—tritone with tritone.

In the harmonic minor mode the conditions are modified ; but the superior advantage of two scales, Nos. 3 and 5, are beyond need for discussion :

In conclusion, it may be said that the common reputation of invertible counterpoint is that of an exercise of ingenuity rather than an important part of a composer's equipment.

Yet it is certain that few technical powers give such freedom to inspiration as the mastery of part-writing. Bases that will make good trebles, melodies that are possible as basses, and inner parts that are worthy to take the place of either treble or bass, are neither always possible nor always desirable. But the power to write them at will, which the art of inversion teaches, is invaluable. It is obviously perfected constructive ability that favours perfect expression of feeling. Exact balance of that which we call construction with that which we call inspiration is rare indeed. There have been many composers, and indeed whole periods of musical development, preponderantly intellectual, while others have been distinguished for almost reckless emotional enterprise. It is to the works of men who, like Palestrina and Bach, reconcile both sides of the art that we may well turn for the true examples of such musical mechanism as invertible counterpoints. They bring their best inspiration to the best construction of which they, or rather their age, may be capable. They show us how to combine the joy of freedom with the dignity of restraint. They are servants of laws not less than we are, but they find their service perfect freedom. They not only instil abounding life into every intellectual device, but they assiduously cultivate the latter for the sake of the former. They obey old laws and silently enact new ones, setting their own particular seal of permanence upon things hitherto only tentatively expressed or scarcely even apprehended, making their own fine attempts to express a perfect thing perfectly. Towards this high end the art of invertible counterpoint is not the least important contributor. H. W. D.

INVITATORIUM. The Invitatory, as sung at matins, stands alone among all the chants of the breviary services. It is a refrain which is sung in conjunction with the 95th Psalm, 'O come let us sing,' at the beginning of matins ; and this with its refrain is a survival of the old responsorial singing. The Psalm itself is sung by solo voices ; the refrain is repeated by the choir ; sometimes the whole, sometimes only the second part, is intercalated between the verses, which are grouped for this purpose very differently from the natural arrangement of the Psalm in the Psalter. These Invitatories form part of the antiphonal ; but they, together with the special chants (appropriate to each mode) to which the Psalm is sung, are often collected in a separate volume, and have been so collected and printed at Solesmes. It is proposed to insert some invitatoria in the revision of the Prayer Book under consideration (1927).

The term Invitatory has been sometimes applied to the 95th Psalm itself, especially by writers who were dealing with the English Prayer Book since the refrain was given up at the Reformation. The term, however, properly belongs to the responsorial refrain, and not to the Psalm. W. H. F.

IPERMESTRA. A libretto of Metastasio which has proved very attractive to a long list of composers. The Dictionnaire lyrique of Clement gives no less than 18 settings of it by Galuppi, Sarti, Jommelli, Hasse, Gluck, and other eminent musicians. (See METASTASIO.)

IPHIGENEIA. The story of Iphigeneia, the daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra—in the two episodes of her deliverance from sacrifice at Aulis, and her rescue of her brother Orestes from the same fate at Tauris, which formed the subject of Euripides's two tragedies—has been a favourite subject with the composers of operas. Not to speak of the two masterpieces of Gluck, noticed below, we may say here that the opera of 'Ifigonia in Aulide,' by Apostolo Zeno, has been, according to the Catalogue in the Théâtre Lyrique of F. Clement, set to music by no fewer than twenty composers between 1713 and 1811—D. Scarlatti, Caldara, Porpora, Abos, Traetta, Majo, Guglielmi, Jommelli, Salari, Sarti, Martin y Solar, Prati, Giordani, Zingarelli, Bertoni, Mosca, L. Rossi, Trento, Mayer, Federici. The opera of 'Ifigenia in Tauride' (author unknown, but possibly Vinci) has been composed by nine separate composers—D. Scarlatti, Orlandini, Vinci, Jommelli, Mazzoni, Agricola, Monzi, Tarchi and Carafa. An 'Iphigénie en Tauride,' words by Duché and Danchet, music by Desmarost and Campra, was given in Paris at the Académie de Musique, May 6, 1704. G.

IPHIGÉNIE EN AULIDE, a 'Tragédie-opéra' in 3 acts; words by the Bailli du Rollet, after Racine; music by Gluck. Produced at the Académie, Apr. 19, 1774. Wagner made a special arrangement of it, revising the text and instrumentation, and altering the end. His version was performed at Dresden, Feb. 22, 1847. The score of his close to the overture was published in 1859. G.

IPHIGÉNIE EN TAURIDE. (1) 'Tragédie lyrique' in 4 acts; words by Guillard, music by Gluck. Produced at the Académie, May 18, 1779; St. James's Theatre, by a German company, 1840; New York, Metropolitan Opera House, Nov. 25, 1916. (2) Tragedy by Dubreuil, music by Piccinni, was produced at the Opéra, Jan. 28, 1781. On the first night, the chief actress being obviously intoxicated, a spectator cried out, 'Iphigénie en Tauride! allons donc, c'est Iphigénie en Champagne!' G.

IPOLITO, see BARTHÉLEMON, François Hippolyte.

IPPOLITOV-IVANOV, MICHAEL MIKHAILOVICH (b. Gatchina, Nov. 19, 1859), composer and conductor, was a son of a mechanic employed in the palace. From 1876-82 he studied at the Conservatoire of St. Petersburg, and passed through the composition class under Rimsky-Korsakov. On completing his studies he was appointed director of the Music School and conductor of the Symphony Concerts at Tiflis (in connexion with the Imperial Russian Musical Society). Here he made a close study of the music of various Caucasian races, more especially that of the Georgians. His book, On the National Songs of Georgia, is considered an authority on this subject. In 1893 he accepted a professorship at the Moscow Conservatoire, and for five years conducted the Moscow Choral Society. In 1899 he became conductor of the Moscow Private Opera, an enterprise which has exercised an important influence upon musical life in Russia. Ippolitov-Ivanov's style is essentially lyrical, straightforward and agreeably melodious. His works comprise:

ORCHESTRA.—1. Overture on a Russian theme, 'Yar-Khmel,' op. 1. 2. Symphonie scherzo, op. 2. 3. Suite, 'Caucasian Sketches,' op. 10 (1895). 4. Rinfonietta (originally sonata for pianoforte and violin, op. 8), op. 34 (1902). 5. Overture, Spring. 6. Overture, Medea. 7. Suite, 'Iveria,' op. 42. 8. Symphony in E minor, op. 46. 9. Armenian Rhapsody, op. 48. 10. Symphonie Poem, 'Misty,' op. 54. VOCAL WORKS WITH ORCHESTRA.—'Coronation Cantata,' op. 12. 'Twelve Characteristic Pictures' for chorus and orchestra, op. 18. Cantatas in memory of Pushkin, Gogol and Joukovsky. IRELAND, FRANCIS, the pseudonym adopted by FRANCIS HUTCHESON (b. Dublin, Aug. 13, 1721; d. there 1780), a medical man who was also an amateur composer. He graduated B.A. in Dublin 1745, M.A. 1748, and M.D. 1762. As early as 1750 he had published a medical work at Glasgow. In July 1760 he was appointed lecturer in Chemistry at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1775 was elected consulting physician to the Rotunda Hospital.

He adopted the pseudonym of Francis Ireland, fearing to injure his professional prospects by being known as a composer. Under this name he produced in the latter half of the 18th century many vocal compositions of considerable merit. The Catch Club awarded him three prizes, viz. in 1771 for his catch 'As Colin one evening'; in 1772 for his cheerful glee 'Jolly Bacchus'; and in 1773 for his serious glee 'Where weeping yews.' Eleven glees and eight catches by him are printed in Warren's collections. His beautiful madrigal, 'Return, return,' is well known.

IRELAND, JOHN (b. Inglewood, Bowden, Cheshire, Aug. 13, 1879), composer, derives his descent from Fifeshire on the father's side, and Cumberland on the mother's. His father was a well-known literary man, editor of the Manchester Examiner and Times, and author of the Book-Lover's Enchiridion.

Ireland attended the R.C.M. (1893-1901), and is one of the many composers who owe their training to Stanford. Between 1901 and 1908 he wrote many compositions, including four orchestral works, two string quartets, two violin sonatas, a sextet for strings, clarinet and horn, a trio for piano, clarinet and violoncello, a piano sonata, shorter pieces for piano, numerous songs, and some choral music. All these have since been withdrawn as not being representative, but the experience gained in them is one of the reasons why his list of works begins with compositions showing a mature stage of development. This list opens in 1908 with a fantasy-trio in A minor for piano, violin and violoncello, written for an early Cobbett Competition, and followed a year later by a sonata in D minor for violin and piano, after which there is an interval of three years. Both works were revised as occasion arose to reprint them. Though the idiom is not that of the later works, they contain much that is characteristic. A holiday spent in Jersey in 1912 seems to have stimulated the composer, and both the works dated the following year are in some measure born of it. These are an orchestral Prelude, 'The Forgotten Rite,' and three piano pieces, 'Decorations,' to which are appended quotations from Arthur Symonds and Arthur Machen. These pieces convey a suggestion of impressionism and associate themselves readily with the mystic naturalism that is an undercurrent in much of Ireland's work. In 1914 he completed a trio in E minor in three movements, which, after performance, was put back for revision, and remains unpublished. It is not to be confused with the later trio in one movement, in the same key. The next work which calls for mention is the characteristically austere but ruggedly powerful rhapsody for piano of 1915. This falls in the war period, which inspired a few songs ('The Cost,' 'The Soldier,' 'Blow out, you Bugles'), but influenced in a more subtle manner the two works bearing the date 1917—the one-movement trio mentioned above, and the second sonata for violin and piano.

It was the latter work which, on its first performance by Albert Sammons and William Murdoch in Mar. 1917, attracted so much attention that it may be said to date Ireland's rise to fame. It is in three movements, the first dramatic, the second lyrical, and the third suggesting a relaxation of the prevailing tension. In some indefinable way it reflected the psychology of the period, and within a short time it had an unprecedented number of performances. The trio, which is in the form of a set of free variations, has a grim atmosphere and an underlying bitterness which corresponds with another feeling prevalent at the time and since. The two sets of piano pieces which followed, 'Preludes' and 'London Pieces,' are in reality accumulations. The first of the former belongs to 1914, and the third of the latter did not appear until its two predecessors had long been familiar. They were followed in 1920 by a pianoforte sonata, and a year later by the symphonic rhapsody which bears the title 'Mai-Dun,' from the prehistoric 'camp' which will be familiar to readers of Thomas Hardy's Wessex novels. The violoncello sonata of 1923 is perhaps the composer's best work since the A minor violin sonata, and a comparison of the two is instructive in showing a progressive tendency towards compression and compactness.

Ireland's style is based securely upon classicism and upon the well-tested principles of construction which tradition has handed down from the 16th century. It is diatonic, almost to the point of severity, which does not impede freedom in the use of unessential notes, especially in the form of additions to the harmonic texture. In common with some of his contemporaries, he inclines to the major (or Dorian) sixth in the minor key, but his use of it does not suggest the prevailing tendency to flirt with the modes. More personal is his use of the sharpened (or Lydian) fourth in the major key. His artistic integrity is the main reason why his output is not more voluminous, even in the smaller lyrical forms. He is disinclined to write unless strongly moved to do so, and still more disinclined to part with a work until satisfied. Of the three moods which are most clearly expressed in his best work, the lyrical, the rugged and the communing with nature, the first finds the readiest expression, whilst the last is sometimes less easy to penetrate. Examples of it are 'The Forgotten Rite,' the rhapsody for contralto entitled 'Earth's Call,' and the finale of the piano sonata. His harmonic texture is generally close-woven, but clarity is preserved by the sharpness of the outlines. Of his numerous songs, 'Sea-Fever,' has attained the widest popularity.

IRIS. Opera in 3 acts; text by Luigi Illica, music by Mascagni. Produced Costanzi Theatre, Rome, Nov. 22, 1898; a revised version, La Scala, Milan, 1899; Philadelphia, Oct. 14, 1902; Covent Garden, July 8, 1919.

IRISH MUSIC. Ireland was in early times the seat of Christianised learning and a remarkable artistic civilisation. In the 5th century Shiel (Sedulius) composed many hymns, and also the Introit 'Salve Sancte Parens,' still included in the Roman Gradual. John Scotus Erigena, an Irishman (d. circa 875), is the first to allude to descant or organum. Another Irishman, St. Cellach (Gall) (d. 646), founded the great monastery of St. Gall in Switzerland. Somewhat later flourished St. Mailduff, the Irish founder of Mailduffsburgh, or Malmesbury, who taught St. Aldhelm, a renowned Saxon musician. St. Helias, an Irish monk, was the first to introduce the Roman chant at Cologne about the year 1025. The music of Ireland, and in particular her ancient school of harp-playing, have from early times been in high repute, having been lauded in the writings of Brompton, Giraldus Cambrensis, Dante and John of Salisbury (12th century). The last-named writes thus :

'The attention of this people to musical instruments I find worthy of commendation, in which their skill is beyond comparison superior to that of any nation I have seen.'

Fuller's words are equally strong :

'Yea, we might well think that all the concert of Christendom in this war (the Crusade conducted by Godfrey of Boulogne) would have made no music if the Irish Harp had been wanting.'

Fordun (14th century), Clyn (1340), Polidore Virgil and Major (15th century), Vincenzo Galilei, Bacon, Spenser, Stanihurst and Camden (16th century) speak with equal warmth.

Three Irish airs appear in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book'—(1) 'The Ho-hoane' (Ochone), (2) an 'Irish Dumpe' and (3) 'Callino Casturame,' the last set by William Byrd. They are all in 6-8 measure, and seem to possess the characteristic features of Irish melody. To the last air there is an allusion in Shakespeare, 'Henry V.,' act iv. sc. 4, where Pistol addresses a French soldier thus : 'Quality ! Calen o custure me !'—an expression which has greatly puzzled the critics. It is evidently an attempt to spell as pronounced the Irish phrase 'Cailinog a stuir me'—'young girl, my treasure !'

For the earliest published collections of Irish music see the bibliography below. But these, being for flute or violin, supply no idea of the polyphonic style of the music for the Irish harp, an instrument with many strings of brass or some other metal : the harp preserved in Trinity College, Dublin (commonly but erroneously called the harp of Brian Boru), having thirty strings; that of Robin Adair, preserved at Holybrook in co. Wicklow, thirty-seven strings; and the Fitzgerald harp, incorrectly called the Dalway harp (1621), fifty-two strings. (See HARP.) During the incessant wars which devastated the island in the 16th and 17th centuries the art of music languished and decayed : there had indeed been many famous performers upon the harp, the national instrument had appeared on the coinage of Henry VIII.,² and had also been appended to some State Papers A.D. 1567; but the powers of the law had been brought to bear upon the minstrels who sympathised with the natives struggling at this time against the English power. When the wars of Elizabeth, Cromwell and William III. ceased, the distracted country had peace for a while. Soon afterwards the Hanoverian Succession was settled, and foreign musicians visited Ireland, and, remaining there, introduced the music of other countries; the nobility and gentry too, abandoning their clanish customs, began to conform to the English model; and the Irish melodies went out of fashion for a time.

Some of the celebrated harpers of the 16th and 17th centuries were Rory Dall O'Cahan (whom Sir W. Scott makes the teacher of Annot Lyle); John and Harry Scott; Miles O'Reilly (b. 1635); Thomas and William O'Connell (1640); Cornelius Lyons; O'Carolan (1670); Denis Hempson (1695), who in 1745, when fifty years old, went to Scotland and played before Charles Edward; Charles Byrne (1712); Dominic Mongan (1715); Daniel Black (1715); Eehlin Kane (1720), a pupil of Lyons, before named—Kane, who travelled abroad, also played for the Pretender, and was much caressed by the expatriated Irish in Spain and France; Thaddæus Elliot (1725); Owen Keenan (1725); Arthur O'Neill (1734); Charles Fanning (1736); and James Duncan, who, having adopted the profession of a harper in order to obtain funds to carry on a law-suit in defence of his patrimony, was successful, and died in 1800, in the enjoyment of a handsome competence.

Among efforts to arrest the decay of the Irish Harp School may be mentioned the 'Contentions of Bards' held at Bruree, co. Limerick, 1730-50, under the presidency of the Rev. Charles Bunworth, himself a performer of merit; a meeting of harpers at Granard, co. Longford, organised by an Irish gentleman, James Dungan of Copenhagen, in 1781, and carried on till 1786; and the assemblage of harpers at ² It is found much earlier on the coinage of King John.

Belfast, July 11-13, 1792, when the promoters engaged the subsequently well-known collector, Edw. BUNTING (q.v.), to write down the music as performed. From this arose Bunting's three volumes of Irish music, dated 1796, 1809 and 1840: accurate drawings, biographical notices and some hundred airs have been left on record by Bunting, to whom indeed the subject owes whatever elucidation it has received. Ten performers from different parts of Ireland attended the meeting of 1792, and their instruments, tuning and use of a copious Irish musical vocabulary agreed in a remarkable manner. The compass of the harps was from C to d'''. Their scale was sometimes C, but mostly that of G. Each string, each grace, each feature had a name peculiar to it. It was proved that the old harpers had played with their nails, not the fleshy tip of the fingers. They used other scales besides those above, but agreed that G major was the most ancient: in this lies 'The Coolin' (temp. Henry VIII.):

One of the most striking of the Irish airs is that called 'Colleen dhas,' etc., to which Moore's lines, 'The valley lay smiling,' are adapted; it lies on a scale from A to A, but with semitones between 2-3 and 6-7,¹ as follows:

It was of course to be expected that singers, pipers, whistlers or violinists would not always adhere to the fixed semitones of a harp scale; hence this air is sometimes corrupted and its pathetic beauty impaired by the introduction of G♯.

An example of the scale E to E, semitones between 2-3 and 5-6,² is found in the fine Irish air, 'Remember the glories of Brian the Brave!'

² Compare Æolian mode.

Here again, in careless performance, D♯ may have been used instead of D; once or twice.

Very plaintive airs are found in the fourth scale, D to D, semitones between 3-4 and 6-7.³ In this scale lies the air 'Weep on!'

Moore seems to have noticed the peculiar wail, thrice repeated, of the second strain, but to have been unaware of the true cause, when he says:

'We find some melancholy note intrude—some minor third or flat seventh, which throws its shade as it passes and makes even mirth interesting.'

The old Irish BAGPIPE (q.v.) was blown by the mouth,⁴ like the Scottish, but the later bagpipe, the Uilleann, mis-called Union, pipe, blown with a bellows, became popular in Ireland: from this cause, and the delicacy of its reeds, the tone is softer. Dr. Burney remarked upon the perfection of the intervals of the Irish chanter (or melody-pipe), which he had never met with in the pipes of North Britain. The scale of the Irish bagpipe is from C below the treble stave to C above it, with all the semitones. The Irish instrument is also furnished with regulators, a sort of tenor harmony of chords:

There generally are two drones in the Scottish pipe, A and its octave; and three in the Irish instrument, generally C, c, and c'. The ancient Irish bagpipe, like that of Scotland, was an instrument of shrill and warlike tone, by which, as Stanihurst tells us, the natives were animated—as other people are by trumpets. The bagpipe, perhaps the oldest and most widely known instrument in the world, still subsists in Ireland; the harp, however, is almost extinct: both have been in a great degree superseded by the violin and flute, which are cheaper, more readily repaired, and, above all, more portable; most of the ancient minstrels of Ireland found it necessary to maintain attendants to carry their harps.

Dismissing the bagpipe, ancient or improved, we find among ancient Irish wind-instruments the following: (1) the Bennbuabhal (pronounced Ben-Buffal), a real horn, generally that of a wild ox or buffalo; (2) the Buinne, a primitive oboe, and (3) the Guthbuinne, a primitive bassoon; (4) the Corn, a pipe—Chaucer's 'Corne-pipe'; (5) the Sloc, a smaller trumpet; (6) the Sturgan, another small trumpet; (7) the Feadan, a flute or fife. It is singular that all these pipes were curved.¹ (8) Some large horns were discovered, of which the embouchure, like that of the Ashantec trumpet, was at the side. Singular to say, the Irish possessed an instrument very similar to the Turkish crescent or 'Jingling Johnny' once used in the British army; it was called the 'Musical Branch,' and was adorned with numerous bells.² There were single bells called clothra: the so-called crotals are merely sheep-bells of the 17th and 18th centuries. It should be remarked that the tympan was not a drum, as was formerly supposed, but a stringed instrument, and by the researches of the antiquary O'Curry it is proved to have been played with a plectrum or bow. The ochtitedach is an eight-stringed Nabla or Psalterium. Some other allusions to music are found in Irish MSS., viz. the aibse, a union of all voices, a vocal tutti as it were: this was called cepóc in Scotland. The certan was some sort of chirping sound by female singers: the dordfiansa, a warlike song accompanied by the clashing of spears after the Greek manner. An interesting example was the Irish Cronan or drone bass, after the manner of the 'Ground' of Purcell's day. The Cronan was softly sung by a Chorus,³ while the principal voice sustained the solo.⁴ The following song, 'Ballinderry,'⁵ is a famous instance of the type. The words refer to places on the banks of the Bann and Lagan rivers:

'Tis pretty to be in Ballinderry,
'Tis pretty to be at Magherallin,
'Tis pretty to be at the castle of Toome,
'Tis pretty to be at Aghalee,' etc.

¹ There are specimens of straight pipes in the National Museum, Dublin. W. H. O. P.

² O'Curry describes the Grasbh ciuil and the Grann ciuil as forms of a 'Musical branch' or cymbalum, not bells, as here stated.

³ This explains the passage about the wild cats in the story of Conall (Campbell's Fairy and Legends of the West Highlands, i. 107).

⁴ There are seven Irish words signifying concerted singing or playing.

⁵ See Stanford's arrangement in 'Songs of Old Ireland,' and compare his adaptation of the refrain to 'O Boys, listen to Shamus' in the opera 'Shamus O'Brien.'

To all of which the Cronan softly furnishes the bass, 'Och-hone! Och-hone!'

A few words about the dances of Ireland will not be out of place. These are (1) the Planxty, or Pleraca, 6-8 time, with strains of unequal number of bars. (2) The Jig, or Rinnce, with an equal number of bars (cf. Gigue): of these there were (a) the Double Jig, (b) Single Jig, (c) Hop Jig, and (d) Moneen, or Green-sod Jig. (3) The Reel, similar to that of Scotland, of which it is the national dance. (4) The Hornpipe. (5) Set dances, chiefly by one dancer, and (6) The Country dance. The Rinnce Fada, or Long Dance, has become again very popular in Ireland. It was danced before James II. in 1689 in Dublin. There are 16th-century allusions to the 'Irish Hey' and the 'Irish Trot,' of which examples are given in Playford's Dancing Master. The 'Cake Dance' is met with in 1680 and onwards. Many of the dances in 6-8 measure were originally march tunes; for it is remarkable that the 'slow march,' as used by other nations, never prevailed among the Irish, whose battle music was frequently in the 6-8 measure, with two accents in the bar.

Every civil occupation in Ireland had also its appropriate music; thus milking the cows (an occupation in which the ancient Irish took peculiar delight), spinning and ploughing had each its tune.

Such are a few of the characteristics of a native minstrelsy second to none in the annals of aboriginal art. But the lines of demarcation by which national peculiarities were preserved are being daily obliterated; steam and electricity have worked many wonders, of which this is not the least remarkable.

A bibliography of collections and works on Irish music is given below; few of them are really trustworthy, save those of Petrie and Bunting, both honoured names in the annals of Irish music. It is to George Thomson, of the Trustees' Office, Edinburgh,¹ who was much interested in national airs from 1792–1820, especially those of Scotland, and engaged Pleyel, Kozeluch, Haydn, Beethoven, Hummel and Weber as arrangers of them, that we owe the Irish music arranged by Beethoven, 1810–13. Among sixteen national airs, with variations, as duets for violin (or flute) and piano (opp. 105, 107), are three Irish melodies—‘The Last Rose’ (a very incorrect version of the air), ‘While History’s Muse’ and ‘O had we some bright little isle.’ Although interesting in their way, these little works of Beethoven are very inferior to his vocal collections. Of these, ‘12 Irish airs with accompaniments of piano, violin and violoncello’ (obligato) were published in 1855 by Artaria & Co. of Vienna, as proprietors of Beethoven’s MS. It is likely that Messrs. Power, owners of Moore’s copyright songs, refused Thomson permission to publish them along with Beethoven’s arrangements, for in the new edition of Breitkopf & Härtel, of which they form No. 258, the melodies are adapted to verses (some comic, and of extreme vulgarity) by Joanna Baillie and others; three are arranged as vocal duets; two have a choral refrain. Another collection of twenty-five Irish airs forms No. 261 of Breitkopf & Härtel’s edition: they are arranged in similar form and are equal in excellence; some are found in Moore, others are of doubtful authenticity; of the air called ‘Garry-one’ (Garryowen), Beethoven has different arrangements in each. It was Dr. J. Latham, a musical amateur of Cork, who about 1802–05 supplied George Thomson with the corrupt versions of the Irish airs for Beethoven. His carelessness or incompetence will appear on comparing the air ‘Colleen dhas,’ as found in No. 9 of Artaria’s edition, with that already given in this article; not only is the scale destroyed and the air deprived of its pathetic peculiarity, but whole strains are omitted altogether.

The following extended and corrected bibliography of the fountain-heads of Irish traditional music will, it is believed, be found fuller than any before published:

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- c. early 17th century. ‘Flawilliam Virginal Book’ (already noticed above) contains three Irish airs, the earliest examples of Irish national music which we possess.
- 1650–1728. Playford’s ‘Dancing Master’ has several Irish airs scattered through its different editions.
- 1698–1720. ‘Pills to purge Melancholy’ contains some Irish tunes adapted to English songs.
- 1700–1800. The 18th century Country Dance Collections issued by Walsh, Johnson, Rutherford, Thompson, Waylett, Bride, Longman and many other London music publishers have numbers of Irish air, and this may also be said of the ‘Tutors’ for different instruments issued by them.
- c. 1727. ‘Aria (sic) di Camera, being a choice collection of Scotch, Irish and Welsh airs for the violin and German flute by the following masters: Mr. Alex. Urquhart of Edinburgh, Mr. Dermot O’Connor of Limrick, Mr. Hugh Edwards of Carmarthen. London, printed for Dan Wright near the Sun Tavern in Holborn, and Dan Wright, Junr., at the Golden Bess in St. Paul’s Churchyard.’ (Instructions and seventy-five Tunes, pp. 75, pp. 48. 12mo, engraved throughout.)

- (This extremely rare volume, in the present writer’s own library, is especially curious, as containing a number of Irish airs, several by ‘Carrolan.’ There are other works issued about 1730 by the Wrights, father and son, with Irish airs. The date of the ‘Aria di Camera’ is fixed by the title of one air, ‘Wood’s Lamentation on ye refusal of his half-pence.’)
- c. 1730–35. Neale’s of Dublin. In ‘The Second Part of the Beggar’s Opera,’ a work issued by these publishers after 1734 (date ascertained by advertisement of the opera ‘Merlin’ acted in 1734, or a later year same name in 1736), is advertised ‘A Book of Irish Airs.’ Bunting mentions (1840 ed.) three early Irish collections. ‘One by Burke Thumoth in 1720, another by Neill of Christ Church Yard soon after, and a third by Carolan’s son in 1747.’ Petrie in his work, 1865, pp. 39, 150, 157, speaks of a collection of Carolan’s tunes issued by ‘O’Neill of Christ Church Yard, Dublin.’ As the dates of this or these publications and their titles are given vaguely it would be very desirable if something more definite could be ascertained about them. No trace appears to be left of the works themselves, except these unsatisfactory references. The earliest definite record of the Neale family, the music-sellers of Christ Church Yard, Dublin, is 1742, when they had the business management of Handel’s performances of the ‘Messiah’ (see NEALE).
1731. ‘The Beggar’s Wedding, a new opera as it is acted at the theatre in Dublin . . . by Chas. Coffey.’ Fourth edition. London: Knappton, 1731. 8vo.
- (One of the earliest operas based on Irish air; produced in 1728. Several others of this first period of ballad opera contain Irish airs. They were published chiefly by J. Watts.)
- c. 1740. Burk Thumoth. ‘Twelve Scotch and twelve Irish airs with variations set for the German flute, violin or harpsichord, by Mr. Burk Thumoth.’ London: J. Simpson.
- Ditto. ‘Twelve English and twelve Irish airs.’ Book the second. London: J. Simpson. Ry. 8vo.
- (These two collections were afterwards reprinted by Thorowgood and by Thompson.)
- c. 1745–50. James Oswald. ‘The Caledonian Pocket Companion.’ Twelve books. London. Ry. 8vo.
- (This work has several Irish airs included, as have other collections by Oswald.)
- 1764, etc. ‘Midas,’ 1764. ‘The Golden Pippin,’ 1773; and ‘The Poor Soldier,’ 1783, with some others of the second period of English ballad opera, use Irish airs. ‘The Poor Soldier’ consists almost entirely of them.
- c. 1780. Carolan. ‘A Favourite Collection of the so much admired Irish Tunes, the original and genuine composition of Carolan the celebrated Irish Bard.’ Dublin: John Lee. Folio, pp. 28.
- (This collection of Carolan’s airs may possibly be a reprint from an earlier issue by Samuel Lee, which in its turn may be taken from the collection made by Carolan’s son in 1747, now lost sight of. John Lee’s Carolan collection was re-published by Hime, a later Dublin music-seller.)
- 1775, etc. Aird, J. ‘A Selection of Scotch, English, Irish and Foreign Airs, adapted to the flute, violin or German flute.’ James Aird, Glasgow: six small oblong parts of various dates. Vol. I, revised with vol. II, 1782; later issues, 1788, 1794, 1797, etc.
- 1784, etc. Gow. ‘A Collection of Strathspey Reels’ and ‘A Complete Repository of Original Scots Mow Strathspeys.’ Folio.
- (The various ‘Collections’ and ‘Repositories’ published by the Gow family contain many Irish airs not before published.) 1786. Walker, J. C. ‘Historical Memoirs of the Irish Bards.’ 4to. Dublin, 1786. Ditto, second edition, 2 vols, 1818.
- c. 1790. ‘Jackson’s Celebrated Irish Tunes.’ Dublin: Edmund Lee. Ob. Folio. (Possibly a reprint from an earlier source.)
- c. 1790. Bryson, J. ‘A Curious selection of favourite Tunes with Variations, to which is added fifty favourite Irish Airs.’ Edinburgh, printed for J. Bryson. Ob. Folio.
- c. 1790. ‘The Hibernian Muse, a Collection of Irish Airs including the most favourite Compositions of Carolan.’ London: Thompson. Ob. 4to.
- c. 1795. M’Fadyen, John. ‘The Repository of Scots and Irish Airs, Strathspeys and Reels.’ Glasgow. Ob. 4to. Another work under the same title was issued by M’Goun, also of Glasgow. Ob. 4to. Also several other Scottish collections, issued both in Edinburgh and Glasgow, contain Irish airs, named as such, not elsewhere printed.

ISAAC, HEINRICH (b. circa 1450; d. 1517), whose association with the Imperial court permits him to be regarded as the first of Germany's masters of music, was born probably c. 1450. Nothing is known of his early life, and until recently his nationality also was in doubt. Heinrich Loris (Glareanus), in his Dodecachordon (1547), written thirty years after Isaac's death, positively names him 'Henricus Isaac Germanus', adding, 'hic Isaac etiam talis notus fuit.' Othmar Nachtigall (Luscinius), somewhat earlier (1536), in his Musurgia, seu praxis musicae as definitely declares Isaac's German origin: 'ex Germanis nostris Henricus Isaac'; and Dr. Otto Kade (1881) adduces the testimony of 'alle älteren Schriftsteller' to establish Isaac's German birth. Others assert a Bohemian parentage, a tradition based partly on the fact that families bearing Isaac's namesurvived in Prague, partly on his familiarity with Bohemian folk-song. On the other hand, Egidius Tschudi (1515-72), in his Musiker Verzeichniss, records him as 'Henricus Ysaac Belga Brabantius,' a statement whose correctness is confirmed by the third and last will of Isaac, executed at Florence on Dec. 4, 1516, in which he is described as 'excellētissimus musicae professor magister Arrighus,' quondam Ugonis de Flandria, generaliter nuncupatus Arrigus Ysach.' Isaac was a native of Brabant or East Flanders, a region whose subjection to the German Kaiser made his designation 'deutsch' or 'tedesco' not inaccurate. Two interpretations of 'quondam Ugonis de Flandria' have been offered. The first equates 'Ugonis' with the Flemish Huygens or Huysgens and supposes it Isaac's original name. If so, why did he change it? The editors of D.T.Ö., Bd. v. (1) conjecture that, finding it unepuniphonous to Italian ears, he adopted that of Isaac, already perhaps associated with his family. The assumption is extravagant: 'Isaac' was as little agreeable as 'Huygens' to the Italians, who, in fact, called him neither one nor other, but 'Arrigo tedesco,' i.e. Heinrich the German. The preferable interpretation supplies 'filius' before 'Ugonis.' Heinrich, that is, was the son of Hugo Isaac, a Netherlander whose death occurred between 1502 and 1512, the dates of Isaac's first and second wills, in the second of which only Hugo is described as 'quondam.' The name Isaac is known at Bruges in 1381, but no evidence regarding Heinrich's birthplace is available.

Not a fact survives to connect Isaac's activities with the land of his parentage. But his exceptional talents must have been widely notorious if the statement of Nicolo de Pittis in 1514 is credible, that he was 'mandato per insino in Fiandra' by Lorenzo de' Medici to Florence. Lorenzo succeeded his father Piero on Dec. 3, 1509; he was then twenty-one years old. If Isaac was at first employed to teach Lorenzo's children, his arrival in Florence can hardly have taken place earlier than 1480, when Lorenzo's eldest son Pietro was in his ninth year (b. 1471). There is reason, however, to suppose that Isaac's association with Florence did not begin until 1484, and that he arrived there, not directly from Flanders, but in answer to a summons which reached him at Innsbruck. In the Raibuch (fol. 56) for that year in the Tirol Statthalter Archive an entry occurs:

'Heinrich Ysaac componisten am Mittwoch nach Exaltationis Crucis (Sept. 15) durch Bevelch Malster Hannsen Fuchsmagen von Gnaden wegen (geben) Inhalt seiner Quittung vi. gulden.'

It was natural that a young musician in search of employment, or upon his road to Italy, should visit Archduke Sigismund, Duke of Tirol, where Paulus Hofhaimer (1459-1537) was Hoforganist and a considerable musical establishment was maintained. It is probable that Isaac acknowledged the Duke's hospitality by the composition of a piece of music, but the 'Innsbrucklied' probably belongs to a later occasion. Leaving Innsbruck in the middle of Sept. 1484, and halting at Ferrara, where the prospect of employment also offered itself, Isaac probably reached Florence before autumn had passed into winter.

Isaac remained in Lorenzo's service, but with intermissions, for ten years. Lorenzo's eldest son Pietro was 14 in 1484, his brothers, Giovanni (the future Pope Leo X.) and Giuliano, 10 and 6 respectively. In 1489, when perhaps his tutorial duties were no longer exacting, he visited Rome bearing letters of introduction from Lorenzo to Pope Innocent VIII. and others. At about the same time Cornelius, a Florentine Cantor, recommended him to Ercole d'Este, Duke of Ferrara, as the composer of a Mass on the melody J'ay pris amours. The recommendation bore fruit later. Meanwhile at Florence Isaac was Cantor and organist of the Cappella di San Giovanni, for which he received five gold ducats monthly, and then or later held similar posts in the churches of Santa Maria del Fiore and the Annunciation, with an additional monthly stipend of three ducats. These posts made claims upon him as a composer, but not exclusively. In 1488 he provided the music to a religious drama, 'San Giovanni e San Paolo,' written by Lorenzo and performed in his household. The statement¹ that the MS. of the work once existed in the library of Christ Church, Oxford, appears to rest upon no credible evidence. Isaac collaborated with his patron in a work of another character. Lorenzo, a writer of style and finish, displayed his merits and defects alike in Carnival songs sung, actually by the author himself, in the streets of Florence. Isaac set many of these songs to music, as appears from the Preface to Tutti i trionfi, carri, mascherate o canti carnascialeschi andati per Firenze dal tempo di Magnifico

Lorenzo de' Medici fino all'anno 1559, which mentions

'Il primo Canto, o Mascherata che si cantasse in questa guisa, fu d'huomini che vendevano Berriccoli, e confortini; composta a tre voci da un certo Arrigo Tedesco, maestro all' hora della Capella di San Giovanni; e musico in quel tempi reputatissimo.'

Upon the death of Lorenzo in 1492 Isaac collaborated with Angelo Poliziano in a four-part 'Monodia': 'Quis dabit capiti meo aquam, quis oculis meis fontem lacrymarum dabit, ut nocte fleam? ut luce fleam?' etc.

The fall of his pupil Pietro de' Medici in Nov. 1494 and the Puritan severity of the revived Republic affected Isaac's position in Florence and inclined or compelled him to seek employment elsewhere, though his marriage with Bartolomea, daughter of Pietro Bello, a Florentine butcher or meat-storekeeper, who brought as dowry the half of a 'podernzza' and a house,² indicates the close ties that bound him to the Tuscan capital. But the constantly published story of his journey across the Brenner to seek service with Maximilian, lately (Aug. 1493) become sole ruler of Germany and head of the Habsburg system, is neither probable nor in accord with Maximilian's recorded movements. Summoned across the Alps by the French invasion of Italy, in Oct. 1496 the Emperor was at Pisa, prepared with a small and ill-equipped army to besiege Livorno, Florence's last maritime outlet. Here, in Nov. 1496, Isaac was presented to a sovereign whose interest in the arts matched that of Lorenzo himself. Maximilian had already (1496) begun to transfer his Kapelle from Augsburg to Vienna. The proffered service of so distinguished a musician as Isaac was opportune, and on Nov. 13, 1496, Isaac and his wife were directed to proceed to Vienna and await instructions. As Maximilian, little satisfied with the course of his campaign, himself hastened homewards, it is probable that Isaac travelled with the court. At Innsbruck, on Apr. 3, 1497, he received appointment as Hofcomponist, with a salary of 150 Rhenish gulden, and the promise of a pension of 50 gulden to his widow, payable quarterly out of the Austrian Treasury at Innsbruck. On the same day, being the Monday following the First Sunday after Easter (Quasimodogeniti), Isaac signed an acknowledgment:

'I hold myself bound by faith, honour, and promise deliberately given to devote my art to His Majesty's Kapelle, and to do further all that may be required of a faithful composer and servant to his sovereign.'³

Only the signature is autograph. Riemann (1922) and Adler (1925), repeating a less probable interpretation of the circumstances, suppose that Isaac's introduction to Maximilian took place at Innsbruck, and that he then received appointment to the Augsburg Kapelle. The inference is founded on the fact that the Pisa instruction of Nov. 13, 1496, also directed Hans Kerner, the cantor, and other members of the Augsburg Kapelle, to proceed to Vienna. Since Isaac and his wife are named in the same document it is possible, but improbable, that they also were then at Augsburg.

In the 1550 edition of the 'Choralis Constantinus' Isaac is described as 'Symphonista regius' (Hofcomponist, court composer). Being neither court Kapellmeister nor organist he was not required closely to attend the court, and therefore, though he retained his post and title till his death, he was able to spend large periods of time elsewhere, in Italy and Switzerland. Until his return to Florence in 1502 it is probable that Innsbruck was Isaac's headquarters, though he certainly resided also at Neustift near Brixen, and was an associate member of the Augustinian monastic community there. In a MS. of that monastery (in Innsbruck Univ. Lib. Cod. 142) his death is recorded ('ob. 1517') in a list of its lay members: 'Mgst. Heinrich Ysac Cesaree maiestat. archimusicius.' His association with Innsbruck is especially commemorated by the four-part (A.A.T.B.) setting of the folk- or Wanderlied 'Innsbruck ich muss dich lassen,' published by Georg Förster (Alte und neue Teutscher liedlein, Nürnberg, 1539), and sixty years later attached to Johann Hesse's hymn, 'O Welt, ich muss dich lassen' (1598), founded upon the original secular words. It is as little probable that the melody was composed by Isaac as that the words are Maximilian's. Heinrich Rietsch¹ conjectures that Isaac harmonised a familiar tune in compliment to Paulus Hofhaimer, who may have invited it by using his influence in Isaac's behalf in 1497. The setting (as in von Winterfeldt, Bd. i. No. 100) is as follows:

Inns-bruck ich muss dich las-sen, Ich fahr da-hin mein' Stra-ssen In fremd-de Land da-hin; Mein' Freud' ist mir ge-nom'

men Die ich nicht weiss be-kom-men Wo ich im E-land bin.

Isaac also put the melody to ecclesiastical use. It appears in the 'Christe eleison' of the 'Missa carminum,' which Philipp Wolfrum (Entstehung des deutschen evangelischen Kirchenlieds, p. 53) describes as 'der Quodlibet—Volksliedermesse'; with other masses it was printed by Georg Rhaw in 1541. It is possible that Isaac's association with the Augustinian community at Brixen inspired its composition.

There is considerable evidence that Isaac also frequented Constance. Sicher's 'Orgelbuch' contains a four-part piece thus annotated:

'Hainricus Isaac ex peticione Magistri Martini Vogelmayr Org. tunc temporis Constantie,' a statement which places Isaac in Constance some time before Whitsuntide 1504. Again, a note in the six-part mass 'Virgo prudentissima' states: 'Isaac Constantiae posuit sex vocum.' Maximilian resided for some time at Constance, where he planned his attack on Venice in Feb. 1508. To this period probably belongs Isaac's monumental work, the 'Choralis Constantinus,'² a collection of 58 four-part settings of the Offices based on the Constance Use—Introit, Gradual (or Tract), Sequence, Communion—for the whole ecclesiastical year. The compilation is one of the most precious monuments of the Gregorian Choral; for the liturgical melody is used throughout, though Isaac shows originality in his preference of a descant over a Tenor cantus. Completed by his pupil Ludwig Senfl, and copied under his direction (c. 1531), the greater part of the work (51 Offices) was published by Johann Ott at Nürnberg (1550-c. 1555) in 3 vols., and by the D.T.Ö. (Vienna), Bd. v. (1) (1898) and xvi. (1909). Senfl's pupilage under Isaac naturally connects itself with the older master's Swiss residence. Senfl's acknowledgment of his debt to Isaac is made handsomely in an acrostic composed by him in 1533:

Er ist in aller welt bekannt,
Lieblich an kunst, frölich im thon.
Seyn melody war gstellt gar frey,
Darob man sich verwundern thatt,
Es war gut ding zu singen ring,
Kunstlich darzu die gnad es hatt.

After, apparently, six years' absence, Isaac returned to Florence before Aug. 15, 1502, when he executed there his first will. His return was probably encouraged by the election of Piero Soderini as Gonfaloniere and the promise of greater stability in the affairs of the distracted Republic. But ten years elapsed before the Medici resumed their former authority, and they were spent by Isaac at the court of Ercole I. at Ferrara and elsewhere. Ercole's brilliant servants included Josquin des Prés, whose reputation may have attracted Isaac. Whether he received an appointment is not determined: Ercole negotiated with both musicians, offered Isaac 120 ducats yearly, and received from Josquin a demand for 200. Isaac asked a month to consider the offer, an interval of delay which suggests that now, as later, his mission in Italy was partly diplomatic, and that Vienna's permission needed to be sought. Ercole's death in 1505 closed Ferrara against Isaac's contemplated service. That he attended Maximilian at Constance in 1507-08 has been suggested already. Otherwise there is no record of his movements until Nov. 21, 1512, when he executed his second will at Florence, where Pietro de' Medici was restored, while in 1513 Isaac's other pupil, Giovanni, was elected Pope as Leo X. The restoration of his old patrons encouraged Isaac to attempt the recovery of his Florentine emoluments and, with them, release from his obligations to a distant master. On May 13, 1514, with his approval, Nicolo de Pittis, Prior of the Sistine Chapel, addressed a letter from Rome to Lorenzo expressing the Pope's interest in Isaac, 'cantore et compositore singularissimo, alias servitore carrissimo della buona memoria di Lorenzo de' Medici,' and suggesting the restoration of his former emoluments. The appeal apparently was ineffectual, for on the following Nov. 4 (1514) the Vienna archives record:

'Hainrichen Yssaac componist geben am vierdn tag November an seiner an vordrung zu Handren Hrn Jörgn Bischoff zu Wienn laut d. quittung 2 gulden.'

Though Pittis's letter described Isaac as 'old and unwilling to return to Germany,' it must be supposed that he had undertaken the long journey in order to make a personal appeal to his sovereign. He succeeded. On Jan. 27, 1515, Maximilian consented to Isaac's permanent residence at Florence, where he could observe and report at close quarters the fluctuation of Italian politics. The concession was granted on the following grounds:

1 D.F.T., Jhrg. III. Bd. II., Leipzig, 1903. 'Sens's Werke': ed. Adolf Thüring, Introda.

'doch dass er [Isaac] uns an unserm Hof diennen soll. Dieweil er aber sein gelgenheit diser Zeit nit aus ursachen unns deshalben angezeigt, also daz er unns zu Florenz nuzer [more serviceable] dann an unsern Hof ist.'

He was to receive a stipend of 120 gulden as long as he proved his utility in the capital of the Medici (La Mara, loc. cit.).

Approaching his seventieth birthday, and secured in a competent income, Isaac spent his remaining years at Florence, high in favour and reputation. Pietro Aron, who knew him at this period, names him (Libri III de institutione harmonica, 1516) among the 'summos in arte viros . . . quibusdam mihi Florentiae familiaritas et consuetudo summa fuit.' On Dec. 4, 1516, being then 'sanus pro Dei gratia mente, sensu et intellectu,' but 'corpore languens,' Isaac executed his third and last will at Florence. Describing him as dwelling 'in populo S. Marci de Florentia,' it devised his whole estate to his wife, burdened with a bequest to the 'construttrioni murorum civitatis Florentie et opere S. M. del Fiore . . . eiusque nova sacrestie,' and an obligation binding his wife to provide an annual mass in his memory in the Church of S. Maria de Servis 'cum triginta fratribus vel aliis sacerdotibus.' Since the obligation was imposed upon Bartolomea 'and her heirs,' it is clear that there were no, or no surviving, children of the marriage. Isaac directed his body to be buried in the Church of Santa Maria de Servis, in the sepulchre of the Society of S. Barbara, of which he was a member. He did not long survive: his death may certainly be placed in the year 1517, when his pupil Senfl succeeded him as Hofcomponist at Vienna.

COMPOSITIONS.—Isaac's genius, versatility and fecundity place him among the great musicians. He was fertile in every mode of musical expression practised in his period, sacred and secular.

His secular works, besides those already mentioned, include a large number of Lieder (2, 3, 4 parts)—22 German, 5 French, 10 Italian, 5 Latin; 58 instrumental pieces in 3, 4 and 5 parts; 29 pieces of 'Hausmusik' in 2, 3 and 4 parts. Of the German Lieder two were printed by Erhard Öglin in 1512 ('Liederbuch'; new edn. as Jhrg. IX. Gesell. f. Musikforschung), one by Hans Neusiedler in 1536 ('Lautenbuch'), four by Georg Förster in 1539 (op. cit., supra), one by Melchior Kriestein in 1540 ('Selectissimae cantiones ultra centum'), one by Johannes Petrejus in 1541 ('Tricinia'), ten by Hans Ott in 1544 ('115 gute und neue Lieder'; new edn. as Bde. i.-iv., Gesell. f. Musikforschung). Five of the French-Italian Lieder were printed by Ottaviano Petrucci in 1501-3 ('Harmonicae musices Odhecaton'). one by Hieronymus Grapheus in 1538. The whole of Isaac's extant secular music is included in D.T.Ö. xiv. (1) and xvi. The MS. of one of the Lieder—'Tmeiskin was jonck'—is in the British Museum (Add. MSS. 35,087), where also (Add. MSS. 11,582, 11,585) are a number of motets scored by Dr. Burney, who inserted some of them in his History, and the motet, 'Anima mea liquefacta est' (Royal 8 G. vii. Vellum 1519–23, fol. 59b).

Of Isaac's sacred music, besides the 'Choralis Constantinus,' Kade catalogues 49 motets. Their popularity is attested by the fact that all but 18 of them were printed in 16th-century collections (Ottaviano Petrucci, 1506; Wyrung, 1520; Hans Ott, 1538; Georg Rhaw, 1538; Johannes Petrejus, 1538–41; Heinrich Loris (Glareanus), 1547; Christian Egenolff, 1551; Johann Montanus, 1554–64; Clem. Stephan Buchav, 1568; and Lodovico Zacconi, 1596). One, not elsewhere printed, is in Ambros (infra, No. 38). Of Isaac's masses less than one-third are in print, all of them in four parts in 16th-century collections: two in 'Choralis Constantinus,' tom. iii., five in Petrucci, 1506, two in Ott, 1539, one in Petrejus, 1539, and two in Georg Rhaw, 1541. The Bayer. Staatsbibliothek possesses the MSS. of three unpublished four-part masses (duplicates in the Vienna National-Bibliothek, Hs. 18,745): 'M. de Martyribus,' 'M. de Confessoribus,' 'M. de B. Virgine'; of eight in five parts: 'M. paschalis,' 'M. solennis,' 'M. de B. Virgine' (I. and II.), 'M. de Apostolis,' 'M. de Martyribus,' 'M. de Confessoribus,' 'M. de Virginibus'; of seven in six parts: 'Virgo prudentissima' (I. and II.), 'Wolauff-gesell von hynnen' (I. and II.), 'M. solennis,' 'M. de Apostolis,' 'M. de B. Virgine.' In the Vienna National-Bibliothek the following masses also are unpublished: 'Pascale (ad organum),' 'Dominicale quadragesimale,' 'Solenne (ad organum),' 'Mane Deus (ad organum),' (all in Hs. 18,745); one without Kyrie and Gloria (Hs. 1783); and (lacking words) 'Misericordias Domini cantabo in aeternum' (Hs. 11,883). The Bibliothèque Royale, Brussels, possesses a MS., 'M. de assumptione B. Virginis' (No. 6428), a duplicate of the Munich 'Virgo prudentissima' (Cod. 6, No. 1), and a six-part motet, 'Optime pastor' (No. 1809 Fétis Catalogue). A number of Introits (Rhaw, 1545), settings of the 'Credo' and 'Benedictus' (Ambrosius Wilphlingseder, 1563; Jakobus Faber, 1550; Petrucci, 1538); Hymns (Rhaw, 1542); Sequences, Proses (Sebald Heyden, 1537; Loris, 1547); and an 'Oratio Jeremiae' (Lamentation) for four voices, are in the Bayer. Staatsbibliothek or in print as indicated above in brackets. Examples of Isaac's music are in Burney, ii. 521, 523; Hawkins, i. 322; Forkel (1801), ii. 671, 676; Ambros, Nos. 38–41.

ISABEAU. Opera in 3 acts; text by Luigi Illica (based on the story of Lady Godiva), music by Mascagni. Produced Buenos Aires, June 2, 1911; Milan and Venice, Jan. 20, 1912.

ISABELLA, LA, see GIRARDEAU.

ISELIN, LUDWIG, a 16th-century lutenist who made and copied a collection of lute pieces now contained in the Bâle library.

ISHAM (occasionally spelt ISUM), JOHN, Mus.B. (b. circa 1680; d. June 1726), was educated at Merton College, Oxford,¹ and was for some years deputy-organist for Dr. Croft. On Jan. 22, 1711, he was elected organist of St. Anne's, Soho, on Croft's resignation. On July 17, 1713, he graduated as Bachelor of Music at Oxford, and on Apr. 3, 1718, was elected organist of St. Andrew's, Holborn, with a stipend of £50 per annum, upon which he resigned his place at St. Anne's, the vestry objecting to his holding both appointments. Shortly afterwards he was chosen organist of St. Margaret's, Westminster. He composed some anthems, two of which are in Croft's 'Divine Harmony,' and joined with William Morley in publishing a joint-collection of songs, Isham's two-part song in which, 'Bury delights my roving eye,' was very popular in its day, and is reprinted by Hawkins in his History, ii. 799 (ed. 1853). He was buried on the 12th of June in St. Margaret's church. W. H. H.

ISHAQ, AL-MAWSILĪ (b. Mosul, 767; d. Baghdād (?), 849–50), a famous Persian musician immortalised in The Arabian Nights. His father, Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, also a singer and poet, came from Kufa, but emigrated to Mosul, where his son was educated. Ishaq established himself at Baghdād at the court of the Caliph Hārūn ar-Rashīd (786–809). His performances on the lute and his powers of memory have been the subject of numbers of Arabic stories; his voice is said to have had a compass of four octaves. His best pupil was Ziryāb, whom he found to be a serious rival and persuaded to leave Baghdād for Spain. He compiled a book of 900 airs partly collected by his father, but no MS. of it has survived. The stories about him in The Arabian Nights, Yāqut's Dictionary of Learned Men, and elsewhere, often have considerable interest as musical historical documents, and throw light on the tuning of instruments and the methods of composition practised in those times. J. B. T.

ISNARDI, PAOLO (2nd half of 16th cent.), musician at the ducal court and maestro di cappella (c. 1573) at the cathedral of Ferrara, composed between 1568-90: 5 books of masses, 4-8 v.; psalms, motets, a Magnificat, etc.; 4 books of madrigals; also secular songs. E. v. d. s.

ISOUARD (ISOARD), NICOLO, usually known as NICOLO (b. Malta, Dec. 6, 1775; d. Paris, Mar. 23, 1818). His father was a merchant at Malta and secretary of the 'Massa Frumentaria,' or government storehouses. Nicolo was taken to Paris as a boy, and educated at the Institution Berthaud, a preparatory school for the engineers and artillery. Much of his time was taken up with the study of the pianoforte under Pin, but he passed a good examination for the navy. He was, however, recalled before receiving his commission, and on his return to Malta in 1790 was placed in a merchant's office. His pianoforte-playing made him welcome in society; and encouraged by this he went through a course of harmony with Vella and Azzopardi, and with Amendola of Palermo—where he passed several years as clerk to a merchant—and completed his studies under Sala and Guglielmi at Naples, where he was employed by a German banking firm. He now determined to become a composer, and abandoning commerce, much against his father's wish, produced his first opera, 'L' avviso ai maritati,' at Florence in 1795. After this date he called himself simply Nicolo, in order not to compromise his family, and it was under this name that he made his reputation. From Florence he went to Leghorn, and composed 'Artaserse,' an opera seria, which procured him the cross of San Donato of Malta. He succeeded Vincenzo Anfossi as organist of St. John of Jerusalem at Malta, and on the death of San Martino became maître de chapelle to the Order, retaining both posts until the occupation of the island by the French (June 10-13, 1798). During these early years he acquired that facility which was afterwards one of his most marked characteristics. There was not a branch of composition which he did not attempt, as a list of his works at this date will show: nine cantatas; masses, psalms, and motets; vocal pieces for concerts; and eight or nine operas which it is not necessary to enumerate.

At this time he was strongly urged to go to Paris.¹ On his arrival he found a useful friend in Rodolphe Kreutzer, and the two composed, conjointly, 'Le Petit Page' (Feb. 14, 1800), and 'Flaminus à Corinthe' (Feb. 28, 1801). At the same time Delrieu rewrote the librettos of two of his Italian operas, which were performed under their original titles, 'L'Impromptu de campagne' (June 30, 1800), and 'Le Tonnelier' (May 17, 1801). Isouard also made considerable mark in society as a pianist. To his friendship with Hoffmann and Étienne he owed not only sound advice, but a series of librettos upon which he was able to work with a certainty of success. Thus favoured by circumstances, he produced in sixteen years no less than thirty-three operas. The following list is in exact chronological order:

'La Statue, ou la femme avare' (Apr. 26, 1802); 'Michel-Ange' (Dec. 11, 1802); 'Les Confidences' (Mar. 30); 'Le Balser et la quittance' (June 17), with Méhul, Kreutzer and Boieldieu; 'Le Médecin turc' (Nov. 19, 1803); 'L'Intrigue aux fenêtres' (Feb. 24); 'Le Déjeuner de garçons' (Apr. 24); 'La Ruse inutile' (May 30); 'Léonce' (Nov. 18, 1805); 'La Prise de Passau' (Feb. 8); 'Idalia' (July 30, 1806); 'Les Rendez-vous bourgeois' (May 9); 'Les Créanciers' (Dec. 10, 1807); 'Un Jour à Paris' (May 24); 'Cimarra' (June 28, 1808); 'L'Intrigue au sérail' (Apr. 26, 1809); 'Cendrillon' (Feb. 22, 1810); 'La Victime des arts' (Feb. 27), with Rollé and Berton; 'La Fête du village' (Mar. 31); 'Le Billet de loterie' (Sept. 14); 'Le Magicien sans magie' (Nov. 4, 1811); 'Lullit et Quinsell' (Feb. 27, 1812); 'Prince de Catane' (Mar. 4); 'Le Français à Venise' (June 14, 1813); 'Bayard à Mézières' (Feb. 12), with Cherubini, Catel and Boieldieu; 'Jocunde' (Feb. 28); 'Jeannot et Colin' (Oct. 17, 1814); 'Les Deux Maris' (Mar. 18); and 'L'Une pour l'autre' (May 11, 1816).

To this long list must be added 'Aladin, ou la lampe merveilleuse,' which he did not live to finish, but which was completed by Benincori, and produced Feb. 6, 1822; also a one-act piece, 'Die Haasen in der Haasenheide,' mentioned in Q.-L. as existing in the Munich opera-house.

Isouard had the gift of melody, and remarkable skill in disposing his voices so as to obtain the utmost effect. Instances of this are—the quintet in 'Michel-Ange,' quite Italian in its form; the ensemble and trio in the 'Rendez-vous bourgeois'; the quartet in the second act of 'Jocunde'; the trio in the same opera, and that of the three sisters in 'Cendrillon'; the finale in the 'Intrigue aux fenêtres'; the trio and the duet in 'Jeannot et Colin,' and many others. To these qualities must be added the originality and unadorned simplicity of his music, which gave it a kind of troubadour character. His later works, composed when Boieldieu was running him hard, are manifestly superior to the earlier ones, when he had no competitor. 'Jocunde' far surpasses 'Cendrillon,' though inferior to 'Jeannot et Colin.'

Another of Isouard's good points is that his comedy never degenerates into vulgarity. In Boileau's words, this composer—

Distingua le naïf du plat et du buffon.

He strictly observed the proprieties of the stage, and thoroughly understood the French public. In his own way he continued Grétry's work, but being no originator was eclipsed by Boieldieu and afterwards by Auber. The successes of his rival provoked him beyond control, and when Boieldieu was elected by the Institut in ¹ Fayolle, in his Dictionnaire des musiciens, states that General Vaubois took him to Paris as his private secretary, but a comparison of dates will show this to have been an impossibility. General Vaubois was in command of the French at Malta, and with a garrison of 4000 men maintained his position against the blockading forces of the allies without and the Maltese themselves within, for two years from 1798. Isouard, on the other hand, reached Paris with his family in 1799. Féta, followed in Q.-L., has reproduced this error.

1817 to succeed Méhul in preference to himself, his mortification was extreme. It was, perhaps, to drown the remembrance of this defeat, and of the triumphs of his opponent, that he plunged into a course of dissipation which ruined his health and brought on consumption, from which he died.

Several portraits of Isouard have been published, but they are of no artistic merit. From one of them was executed in 1853 the marble bust belonging to the foyer of the Opéra-Comique.

Isouard is little known in England. The only two of his pieces which appear to have been brought out on the London stage are 'Les Rendez-vous bourgeois' (St. James's, May 14, 1849), and 'Joconde,' English version by Santley (Lyceum, Oct. 25, 1876). G. C.

One of Nicolo's daughters, Mme. Ninette Nicolo Isouard (d. Paris, Oct. 6, 1876), was musical, and composed several songs.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT. Oratorio by Handel, who was probably himself responsible for the selection of the words. Composed in 1738 and first performed Apr. 4, 1739. First heard in Germany at the Singakademie, Berlin, Dec. 8, 1831; revived by the Sacred Harmonic Society, Mar. 16, 1838.

ISTESSO TEMPO, L', 'the same pace,' is an indication used when, owing to a change of key or to the analogy of some previous similar passage or for some other reason, there might be an inclination to change the pace. The 'same' pace means that the new bar takes the same time to perform as the old. Instances are: Beethoven, op. 111, where $\frac{3}{4}$ (for which $\frac{6}{8}$ is written in error);¹ his op. 130, where $\text{C} = \frac{4}{4}$, and the finale of Schumann's second symphony, where $\text{C} = \frac{3}{4}$.

Beethoven's Bagatelle (op. 126, No. 1), where the new time-unit is equal in pace to the old (and the bar different), is an exception. But the intention is clear. It is a written out accelerando, by which one bar of $\frac{3}{4}$ becomes, seven bars later on, one and a half bars of $\frac{3}{4}$, and these may be read as two bars of $\frac{3}{4}$ or one of $\frac{6}{8}$; that is, the new $\frac{3}{4}$ = the old $\frac{3}{4}$, but the figure has been accelerated from quavers to semiquavers, thus:

The modern plan is to write $\frac{3}{4}$ = $\frac{3}{4}$ (or whatever may be required) meaning that a $\frac{3}{4}$ of the old = a $\frac{3}{4}$ of the new. That leaves no doubt. But this indication is also used when the pace is intended to be altered, as for instance $\frac{3}{4}$ = $\frac{3}{8}$ or $\frac{3}{4}$ = $\frac{3}{16}$. That also leaves no doubt, as long as both the time units are not common to both the old time and the new. Thus in the ninth of Brahms's Paganini Variations the indication ' $\frac{3}{4}$ wie vorher die $\frac{3}{4}$ ' is clear even without the explanatory words, because $\frac{3}{4}$ is the unit of the eighth but not of the ninth variation. But for the fourth and tenth variations ' $\frac{3}{4}$ = $\frac{3}{8}$ ' is given, and clearly, from the context, this means that in the fourth variation the old $\frac{3}{4}$ = the new $\frac{3}{8}$, and that in the tenth the old $\frac{3}{4}$ = the new $\frac{3}{16}$.

ITALIANA IN ALGIERI, L'. Comic opera in 2 acts; words by Anelli, music by Rossini. Produced San Benedetto, Venice, 1813; Paris, Feb. 1, 1817; London, Jan. 27, 1819; in English, Dec. 30, 1844. G.

IVANHOE. Romantic opera in 3 acts; libretto by Julian Sturgis, music by Sullivan. Produced for the opening of the Royal English Opera House (now the Palace Theatre), Jan. 31, 1891. For another opera on the same subject, see TEMPLER UND JÜDIN.

IVANOFF (IVANHOFF), NICHOLAS (b. Pultowa, 1809; d. Bologna, July 8, 1880), an Italianised Russian, appeared in England in the season of 1834. He was a pupil of Mme. Fodor in Naples, where he appeared at the San Carlo Theatre as Percy in 'Anna Bolena' in 1832.¹ He was also a pupil of E. Bianchi. He had a very beautiful tenor voice, 'a chaste and simple style of singing, but little execution.'² On the other hand, Chorley wrote:

'Nothing could be more delicious as to tone—more neat as to execution. No such good Rodrigo in "Otello" has been heard since I have known the opera.'

and Moscheles, in his Diary, says,

'He attracted the public by his great flexibility of voice, but he displeased my German ear by using his head-voice too frequently, particularly when singing Schubert's Serenade.'

He reappeared in London in 1835 and 1837, but he never fulfilled the promise of his first season, and soon retired. With others of the Italian troupe he had taken part, but without effect, in the Festival at Westminster Abbey in 1834.

IVANOV, MICHAEL MIKHAILOVICH (b. Moscow, Sept. 23, 1849), musical critic and composer. On leaving the Technological Institute, St. Petersburg, in 1869, he studied for a year at the Moscow Conservatoire under Tchaikovsky (harmony) and Dubuque (piano). From 1870-1876 he lived chiefly in Rome, where he associated with Liszt and his pupils. On his return to Russia he took up musical criticism, and his name was best known in connexion with his weekly article in the Novoe Vremya. The majority of his compositions were performed, but not published. They include—two operas; a Requiem; a symphony, 'A Night in May'; three orchestral suites; several cantatas, songs and pianoforte pieces. IVE (IVES), (1) SIMON (b. Waro, 1600; d. Christ Church parish, Newgate Street, July 1, 1662), was a vicar choral of St. Paul's cathedral, and organist² of Christ Church, Newgate. In 1633 he was engaged, together with Henry and William Lawes, to compose the music for Shirley's masque, 'The Triumph of Peace,' performed at court by the gentlemen of the four Inns of Court on Candlemas day, 1633-34, for his share in which he received £100. On the suppression of choral service he became a singing-master. At the Restoration he was installed as eighth minor prebendary of St. Paul's (1661). His elegy on the death of William Lawes, 'Lament and mourn,' appeared in separate parts at the end of H. and W. Lawes's 'Choice Psalmes,' 1648. It is given in score in J. S. Smith's Musica antiqua. Many catches and rounds by Ives are printed in Playford's 'Select Ayres and Dialogues,' 1669; Hilton's 'Catch that Catch can,' 1652, and Playford's 'Musical Companion,' 1672; 'Si Deus nobiscum,' 3 in 1, is given in Hullah's 'Vocal Scores.' Songs by him are to be found in various collections. His instrumental works include pieces in 'Musick's Recreation,' 1652 and 1661, and in 'Court Ayres,' 1655: fantasias in B.M. Add. MSS. 17,792, 31,423-4. A son, (2) SIMON, was a student of Clare Hall, Cambridge, in 1644, and probably died young. One of the pieces in 'Musick's Recreation,' above mentioned, is attributed to him. IVOGÜN, MARIA (b. Budapest, c. 1890), operatic soprano. Her father was an officer in the Hungarian army; her mother, Ida von Günther, a well-known singer, from whose name she devised her nom de théâtre. Bruno Walter, who in 1913 procured her her first engagement for the Mozart Festival at Munich. The beauty of her voice, the extraordinary neatness and brilliancy of her coloratura, added to her personal charm and unmistakable musical talent, quickly gained for her a widespread continental reputation. One of her warmest admirers was Richard Strauss, who selected her for the part of Zerbinetta in the first performance in the 1916 version of his 'Ariadne auf Naxos' at Vienna. She justified the choice by a triumph so remarkable that Strauss made a point of having her engaged for this delightful character wherever his opera was produced or revived in Germany and Austria. It was as Zerbinetta that she made her début at Covent Garden during the summer season of 1924, and both in this and the rôle of Gilda she achieved successes that made a deep impression. She has sung in America, but down to 1925 only on concert tours. Her most important work so far was associated with the opera at Munich, where she created the parts of the Nightingale in Walter Braunfels's 'The Birds,' of the boy Ighino in Hans Pfitzner's 'Palestrina,' and of Laura in Erich Korngold's 'King des Polykrates.' She married the Munich tenor, Erl.

IVRY, MARQUIS RICHARD D' (b. Beaune, Feb. 4, 1829; d. Hyères, Dec. 18, 1903), was an enthusiastic amateur composer, whose works obtained more general recognition than generally falls to the lot of dilettante musicians. After various essays in operatic composition ('Fatma,' 'Quentin Matsys,' 'La Maison du docteur,' 'Omphale et Pénélope') he wrote his best work, 'Les Amants de Vérone,' in 1864, and brought it out under the nom de plume of 'Richard Yrvid' in 1867. Unluckily the opera of Gounod on the same subject, though written later, was performed in public before the Marquis D'Ivry's, and it was through the interest of Capoul, who was then director of the Salle Ventadour, that it was eventually presented in public, at that theatre, on Oct. 12, 1878. Capoul sang the principal part, and introduced the work to the English public at Covent Garden, on May 24, 1879. The composer made various improvements in the score for the purpose of the public production, thus showing that he had some power of self-criticism. A lyric comedy, 'Persévérance d'amour' was composed long after the other opera, and was in course of publication when the composer died. M.

JACCHINI, GIUSEPPE, a 17th-18th century violoncellist at S. Petronio, Bologna, where he was made a member of the Accademia dei Filarmonici. He composed 'Concerti per camera a 3 e 4 stromenti con violoncello obbligato,' op. 4; also a sonata for violin and violoncello (Q.-L.).

JACHES, GALLIGO, or JACOMO BRUMEL, famed not as a composer but as an organ-player, was probably a son of Antonio BRUMEL (q.v.). He was organist to the Duke of Ferrara, and had charge of the music in Modena and Reggio. Documents in the Modena Archives, dated from 1543 up till 1559, register payments to him 'pro recompensa introitum capellarum Mutine et Regii,' and also for the keep of a horse used apparently for the journeys between Ferrara and Modena. He is named variously 'Domino Jaches, organiste gallico'; 'Maestro Jacomo Brumello, detto Jaches, organista'; and 'Domino Jaches, gallico, organiste ducali.'¹

Few references to Jaches Brumel are to be found in contemporary works, but Corsini in the dedication of his Primo libro de motetti, 1571, to the Duke of Ferrara, mentions that he himself had first studied music in Ferrara under Giaches Brumel—

'Io tengo ancora questo particolare con vostra eccellenza illustriss. di haver appreso i primi semi della musica nella sua honorata città di Ferrara e da Messer Giaches Brunel suo servitorc,'² etc.

As Jaches da Ferrara he seems to have been better known. Dentice, in the second Dialogo della musica, Napoli, 1553, records hearing beautiful music, and that Giaches da Ferrara was among the performers. Cinciarino³ quotes 'Mosser Jaches, organista dell' eccell. et illustriss. Sig. Duca di Ferrara' as an authority on the way to play the organ.⁴ A tribute to Jaches's fine organ-playing is to be found in Bartoli's Ragionamenti accad., Venice, 1567, p. 38, where a query about 'Jaches da Ferrara che è hoggi tenuto sì raro e sì eccellente' is answered—

'Io non hò lo conosciuto, ma io hò ben sentito dire al Moschino che a tempi suoi non ha sentito sonatore alcuno che gli piaccia più di lui, parendoli che egli suoni con più leggiadria, con più arte, e più musicalmente che alcuno altro, e sia qual si voglia.'

Jaches Brumel was apparently no longer living when this was written. C. S.

JACHET. A bewildering number of musicians, each and all commonly known by the Christian name of Jaches or Jachet, were living in the 16th century. Even the publishers of that time seem often to have been doubtful as to which Jachet they were dealing with. Careful research on the part of Haberl and others has unravelled the tangle to a certain extent. It is possible to distinguish between Jachet da Mantua who dates from about 1527-1559; Jachet flammingo, or Jacobus Buus, about 1539-64; Jachet gallico, or Jacomo Brumel, about 1543-59, also known as Jaches da Ferrara (see JACHES); Jachet Berchem (16th century) (see BERCHEM); Jacobus Vaet, in Vienna 1564-67 (see VAET); Jaches de Wert (b. 1536; d. 1596) (see WERT).

(1) JACHET DA MANTUA was connected with the Cathedral of San Pietro, Mantua, from 1527-1558, at first as a singer and then as maestro di cappella. He is given the latter title in the volumes of his motets published in 1539, where mention is also made of his great reputation as a musician. Haberl⁵ prints an interesting document found by Professor Davari in the Gonzaga Archives at Mantua, dated Apr. 20, 1534, which gives Jachet's surname and place of birth:

'Jacobus Collebaudi de Vitre Gallus Rhedonensis diocesis cognomento Jachettus Cantor artis musice peritissimus hac in civitate nostre Mantue,' etc.

This finally and negatively settles the question as to whether this particular Jachet is to be identified with Jachet Berchem. A comparison of their compositions also proves them to be different persons. Neither must Jachet of Mantua be confounded with Jacobus de Wert, organist at St. Barbara's, Mantua, from 1565-1596. Jachet da Mantua must have died before the end of 1559.⁶ He is variously described as in the service of the Cardinal or the Duke of Mantua.

There are many allusions to him in Italian 16th-century treatises: Lanfranco, Scintille di musica, Brescia, 1533, includes 'Jachetto' among musicians then living. Zarlino, Le istituzioni armoniche, Venetia, 1558, pp. 264-265, 332, gives instances of the way in which 'Jachetto' used the canto fermo in his motets. Cinciarino, Introdutorio, Venetia, 1555, p. 13, writes:

'Questa regola si usa in assai domi . . . massime nel domo di Mantua e di questo dice Jachetto, huomo molto dotto, et eccellente et maestro di capella del detto domo e dell' illustriss. et rev. Cardinale di detta città,'⁷ etc.

Bartoli, Ragionamenti accad., Venetia, 1567, Libro 3, p. 36 of dialogue:

'Ma ditemi un poco havete voi conosciuto un certo Giachetto da Mantova?' 'Conobillo & quanto a me, la musica sua mi diletta grandemente, & mi pare ch'ella habbia di quello andare delle composizioni di Adriano.'

This, of course, was written after Jachet's death. In lib. ii. p. 34, Delle lettere di M. Andrea Calmo, Venice, 1572, both Jachet da Ferrara 'e quel de Mantova' are mentioned.

Jachet da Mantua was the 'Jaquet' or Jachet whose name constantly appears in the various collections of vocal music of that century. So early as 1532 motets by Jaquet were included in the second book of 'Motetti del fiore,' for five voices, published by Moderne at Lyons. An important series of masses, Magnificats and motets published in conjunction with Gombert and Morales begun in 1540, including the masses by Jaquet super: 'Ave prima salus'; 'In illo tempore'; 'Mon triste desplaisir'; and 'Si bona suscepimus' in 1542, this last republished in 1547; and the Magnificats Tertii and Octavi Toni in 1542, and Quarti Toni in 1562. The motets included those in Gombert's Pentaphthongos harmonia, 1541, and again in 1550, and the 'Motetta trium vocum ab Jacheto Gallico, Morales,' etc., 1543, and again in 1551. Some of his motets were also included in Cipr. de Rore's third book of 'Motetti a cinque voci,' 1549, in the fourth book of 'Motetti del Laberinto a cinque voci,' 1554, and in 'Motetta Cipr. de Rore . . . quatuor vocibus,' in 1563.

In Willaert's 'Hymnorum musica,' 1542, are two compositions by Jaquet; and in 1550 appeared: 'Di Adriano e di Jachet, i salmi appartenenti alli vesperi.' A similar work, 'I sacri et santi salmi che si cantano nella santa romana chiesa all' hora di Vespero, in Canto figurato. Composti da Cipr. Rhore e Jachet da Mantoa,' was also published in Venice in 1554.

MSS.

Three of the masses published in 1561: 'Vado ad eum'; 'Enceladi'; and 'Alla dolce ombra' are in MS. 32, and some motets in MS. 92 of the Munich Library (Maier's Cat.). The masses 'Enceladi' and 'Alla dolce ombra' are also in MS. 23 of the Stuttgart Landesbibliothek (Halm's Cat.).

The 1561 'Missa quarti toni' is in MS. Sign. 148 f. of the Lorenz-kirche Bibl., Nuremberg (H. Botschberger). The three masses: 'Si bona suscepimus'; 'Surge Petre' (by 'Giacchetto'); and 'Choro e fresche e dolce aigue'; the Magnificat quarti toni; and some motets are in the library of the Cappella Sistina, Rome.

An incomplete copy of the Mass 'Si bona suscepimus' is in the Zwickau Ratschulbibliothek (Vollhardt's Cat.).

In the Bologna Liceo Musicale are MSS. of some of the motets published in 1539, one with the extremely early date, if correct, of June 10, 1518 (Parisi, Cat. II. 341, II. 5). MS. copies of various motets are also in the libraries at Breslau, Dresden, Stuttgart, Modena and Cambridge (Fitzwilliam).

(2) JACHET BUUS (1539-64) was of Flemish extraction. Van der Straeten¹ suggests that he originally came from Bruges, where at the beginning of the 16th century a 'Meester Jooris Buus, orgelmakere,' was living, and also a 'Jacobus de Boes,' musician and singer at the church of St. Saviour's. The name of Jaques Buus first appears in works published at Lyons by Jaques Moderne; two of his French songs for four voices are in the third book of 'Le Paragon des chansons,' 1538, others in the sixth, ninth and tenth books, 1540-43; while a motet for five voices is in the 'Quartus liber mottetorum,' 1539. Like so many other Flemish musicians, Buus was drawn to music-loving Italy; on July 15, 1541, he was elected an organist at San Marco, Venice, in succession to Baldassare da Imola, for a large majority of votes had decided 'che uno maestro Jachet, Fiamengo, sia il più eccellente de tutti gli altri competitori in quell' arte.' 'Mistro Jaceth, fiamengo,' as he is also called in the same document, was to receive a yearly salary of eighty ducats. Among the papers of San Marco is one dated 1550, which gives his name in full: 'Jachas Bus, Flamengus, sonator organi in ecclesia S. Marci.' (Venice State Archives, see Van der Straeten.) The years spent in Venice were important as regards Buus's development as a composer; the following works were published there:

Il primo libro di canzoni francese a sei voci. Venetis: Ant. Gardane, 1543. Six partbooks in the Wolfenbüttel herzog. Bibl. Ricercari da cantare, & sonare d'Organo & altri Strumenti. A quattro voci. Venezia: Ant. Gardane. Libro I. 1547; Libro II. 1549. Contained ten and eight Ricercari respectively.

Intabulatura d'organo di Ricercari . . . notatamente stampata con contrapuncto. Libro I. impresso et facto d'Antonio Gardane: Venetia, 1549. Obl. 4to. In the British Museum.

Primo libro de' motetti a quattro voci di M. Jaques Buus organista de la Illus. Signoria di Venetia in San Marco. Venezia: Gardane, 1549. Four part-books in the Vienna Hofbibliothek.

Il primo libro di canzoni francese a cinque voci. Venezia: Gir. Scotto, 1550. Obl. 4to. Five partbooks in the Munich Library.

The 1547 volume of Ricercari, one of the earliest books of organ music to be printed, is of great interest, for it shows a distinct striving towards genuine instrumental composition. From the Ricercari were gradually to develop the Canzona, Fantasia and Toccata, culminating in the Sonata.² Buus was accepted as an authority on this type of composition: 'I Ricercari di Jaques Bus' are mentioned in the

Dialogo del Pietro Pontio, Parma, 1595, 2^{da} parte, p. 48, and Cerone¹ writes: 'Quien dessea ver Tientos ò Ricercarios bien ordenados, vea los de Jaques Bus.' etc.

Doni² gives the two canto parts of a Canzona a otto di Jaches: 'A tous jamais d'ung vouloir, "il quel penso io chi vi sodisferà per essere una gran musica mirabile."' In the list of composers 'Jaches Buus' is entered, also 'Giachetto Berchem.' A madrigal, 'Questi soavi fiori,' for four voices by Buus is in the 'Primo libro di madrigali de div. autori,' Venice, Gardane, in the 1542 and 1548 editions; the latter also included six madrigals by Berchem.

Towards the end of 1550 Buus obtained a four months' leave of absence; the time elapsed, but he did not reappear in Venice. The procuratori of San Marco at last wrote (Mar. 30, 1551) to the Venetian ambassador, Federigo Badoer, at Vienna, where apparently they knew Buus was to be found, to ask if he intended to return or not. Badoer replied that Buus had spoken most affably of the happiness of those who served the glorious city of Venice, but that he would only return if his salary were raised to 200 ducati a year. This the procuratori would not accede to, and they appointed Parabosco in his place. Buus remained in Vienna as organist to Ferdinand I.; his name under the form of 'Jac. von Paus' appears in the list of the Court Kapelle³ from 1553 until 1564, when Ferd. I. died. Nothing more is heard of Buus after this date; he seems to have composed little in this later period. In the Tertius tomus Evangeliorum, Noribergae, 1555, is a motet for four voices by him, also two motets by 'Jachet' and one by Jac. Vaet; this shows that neither Buus nor Vaet is to be identified with the Jachet or Jacquet whose name so frequently appears as a composer at this date. The Sextus tomus Evangeliorum also contains one motet by Buus and one by Jachet, while the Thesauri musici tomus tertius, Noribergae, 1564, has a motet for six voices by Jacob. Buus and five motets by Jacob. Vaet.

Musical manuscripts in the Munich Library include a motet for six voices (MS. 132) and a song, 'Tant de travail,' for five voices (MS. 205) by Giaches Buus. c. s.

JACK (Fr. sautereau; Ger. Docke, Springer; Ital. saltarello.) In the action of the harpsichord tribe of instruments the jack represents the plectrum. It is usually made of pearwood, rests on the back end of the key-lever, and has a movable tongue of holly working on a centre, and kept in its place by a bristle or metal spring. A thorn or spike of crow-quill projects at right angles from the tongue. On the key being depressed the jack is forced upwards, and the quill is brought to the string, which it twangs in passing. The string is damped by the piece of cloth above the tongue. When the key returns to its level, the jack follows it and descends; and the quill then passes the string without resistance or noise. In some instruments a piece of hard leather is used instead of the quill in certain stops for special effects. In cutting the quill or leather great attention is paid to the gradation of elasticity which secures equality of tone. A row of jacks is maintained in perpendicular position by a rack; and in harpsichords or clavecins which have more than one register, the racks are moved to or away from the strings by means of stops adjusted by the hand; a second rack then enclosing the lower part of the jack to secure its position upon the key.

We have in the jack a means of producing tone very different from the tangent of the clavichord or the hammer of the pianoforte. The jack, in principle, is the plectrum of the psaltery, adjusted to a key, as the tangent represents the bridge of the monochord and the pianoforte hammer the hammer of the dulcimer. We do not exactly know when jack or tangent were introduced, but have no reason to think that the invention of either was earlier in date than the 14th century. By the middle of the 16th century the use of the clavecin instruments with jacks had become general in England, the Netherlands and France; and in Italy, from whence they would seem to have travelled. They were used also in Germany, but the clavichord with its tangents asserted at least equal rights, and endured there until Beethoven's time. The first years of the 18th century had witnessed in Florence the invention of the hammer-clavier, the pianoforte; before the century was quite out the jack had everywhere ceded to the hammer. Although leather for the tongue of the jack has been claimed to have been the invention of Pascal Taskin of Paris in the 18th century (his much-talked of 'peau de buffle'), it has been found in instruments of the 16th and 17th; and it may be that leather preceded the quill, the introduction of which Scaliger (1484-1550) enables us to date approximately. He says (Poetices, lib. i. cap. lxiii.) that when he was a boy the names clavicymbal and harpsichord had been appellations of the instrument vulgarly known as monochord, but that subsequently points of crow-quill had been added, from which points the same instrument had become known as spinet—possibly from the Latin 'spina,' a thorn, though another and no less probable derivation of the name will be found under SPINET. In the oldest Italian jacks metal springs were used instead of bristles, and possibly metal plectra, of which an example is to be found in the upright spinet in the Donaldson Museum¹ (R.C.M.).

Shakespeare's reference to the jack in Sonnet cxxviii. is well known and often quoted:

' . . . When thou gently swayest
The wiry concord that mine ear confounds,
Do I envy those jacks that nimble leap
To kiss the tender inward of thy hand; ' but appears to mean the keys,² which as the 'sweet fingers' touch them make 'dead wood more blest than living lips.' A nearer reference has been preserved by Rimbault (The Piano-forte, London, 1860, p. 57) in a MS. note by Isaac Reed to a volume of old plays. Lord Oxford said to Queen Elizabeth, in covert allusion to Raleigh's favour and the execution of Essex, 'When jacks start up, heads go down.'

JACKSON, JOHN (d. Mar.³ 1688). One Jackson, who in 1669 held the office of 'Instructor in Musick' at Ely Cathedral for three months, has been conjectured to be identical with the John Jackson who in 1674 was appointed nominally a vicar-choral, but in fact organist of Wells Cathedral.⁴ An anthem, 'The Lord said unto my Lord,' is in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MS. 7338); a Service in C, in the choir-books of Wells, and four chants are found in a contemporary MS. organ part in the library of the Sacred Harmonic Society (R.C.M.). An anthem exists at Ely, two appear in Playford's 'Cantica sacra,' and there are organ parts of eight anthems in a MS. at the R.C.M.⁵ The last-named MS. contains the organ parts of the Service in C and eight anthems, and in the choir-books at Wells are some odd parts of an anthem and a single part of a Burial Service. JACKSON, THOMAS (b. circa 1715; d. Nov. 11, 1781), became a member of the Royal Society of Musicians, organist of St. Mary Magdalen, and master of the song school at Newark-on-Trent. He wrote the psalm tune 'Jackson's'; also 'Twelve psalm tunes and 18 double and single chants . . .' (1780); and a favourite lesson for the harpsichord (Q.-L.; Brown and Stratton).

JACKSON, WALTER, the most noted composer of tunes for the Irish pipes during the 18th century. His melodies (of great excellence) were among the most popular tunes of the day both in Ireland and in England. They include 'Over the Water,' 'The Morning Brush,' 'The Maids in the Morning,' 'Jackson's Turret' (named from a tower he constructed), 'Welcome Home' and others of merit. These were reprinted over and over again in collections of the period. Edmund Lee of Dublin issued, about 1790, an oblong folio collection of Jackson's Irish tunes. Practically nothing is known of his biography save that he was living in Ireland and composing in the middle of the 18th century. There is a passing reference to him in O'Keeffe's Reminiscences, 1826 (vol. i. p. 183), by which it appears that he was 'a fine gentleman of great landed property.' Bunting, Ancient Music of Ireland, 1840 (p. 100), states that Jackson lived in county Monaghan, and that his 'turret' (see above) in Ballingarry, county Limerick, was destroyed by lightning in 1826. A selection of his airs was published in 1774.

JACKSON, WILLIAM (Jackson of Exeter) (b. May 29, 1730; d. July 5, 1803),⁶ son of a grocer in that city, received a liberal education, and having displayed a strong partiality for music, was placed under John Silvester, organist of Exeter Cathedral, for instruction. In 1748 he removed to London and became a pupil of John Travers. On his return to Exeter he established himself as a teacher. In 1755 he published a set of 'Twelve Songs,' which were so simple, elegant and original that they immediately became popular throughout the kingdom. He afterwards produced 'Six Sonatas for the Harpsichord,' 'Elegies for three male voices' and a second set of 'Twelve Songs.' These were followed by an anthem, a setting of Pope's ode The Dying Christian, a third set of 'Twelve Songs' and a setting of Warton's Ode to Fancy. In 1767 he composed the music for a dramatic piece called 'Lycidas,' altered from Milton's poem, on the occasion of the death of Edward, Duke of York, brother of George III., and produced at Covent Garden on Nov. 4, but never repeated. He next published 'Twelve Canzonets for two voices,' which were highly successful, and one of which, 'Time has not thinned my flowing hair,' enjoyed a long career of popularity. To these succeeded 'Eight Sonatas for the Harpsichord' and 'Six Vocal Quartets' (1780). In 1777 Jackson received the appointments of subchanter, organist, lay-vicar and master of the choristers of Exeter Cathedral. In 1780 he composed the music for General Burgoyne's opera, 'The Lord of the Manor,' which was produced at Drury Lane, Dec. 27, with great success, and kept possession of the stage for more than half a century, mainly owing to Jackson's music. In 1782 Jackson published ⁴ In some cathedral statutes do not specify an organist as an officer of the church. In such the custom is to assign to one of the vicars-choral the performance of the duty of organist.

*Thirty Letters on various subjects'—three of them relating to music, which were well received, and in 1795 reached a third edition. 'The Metamorphosis,' a comic opera, of which Jackson was believed to be the author as well as, avowedly, the composer, was produced at Drury Lane, Dec. 5, 1783, but performed only two or three times. In 1791 Jackson published a pamphlet entitled Observations on the present State of Music in London. In 1798 he published Four Ages, together with Essays on various subjects, intended as additions to the Thirty Letters. His other musical publications comprised a second set of 'Twelve Canzonets for two voices,' 'Twelve Pastorals,' a fourth set of 'Twelve Songs,' 'Hymns in three parts,' 'Six Madrigals,' and 'Six Epigrams' (1786). His cathedral music was collected and published many years after his death (about 1820) by James Paddon, organist of Exeter Cathedral. Paddon states that the service 'Jackson in F' is not by Jackson. Be that as it may, it is by the fame of 'Jackson's Te Deum,' and nothing else, that the name of 'Jackson of Exeter' has been kept alive for more than a century after his death.

Jackson employed much of his leisure time in painting landscapes in the style of his friend Gainsborough, in which he attained considerable skill. Whilst much of his music charms by its simplicity, melodiousness, refinement and grace, there is also much that sinks into tameness and insipidity; his church music especially is exceedingly feeble. Jackson died of dropsy. W. H. H., with addns.

JACKSON, (1) WILLIAM (Jackson of Masham) (b. Jan. 9, 1815; d. Apr. 15, 1866), was son of a miller. His passion for music developed itself at an early age, and his struggles in the pursuit of his beloved art read almost like a romance in humble life. He built organs, learned to play almost every instrument, wind and string, taught himself harmony and counterpoint from books, until at length, in 1832, when he had reached the mature age of 16, the lord of the manor of Masham having presented an organ to the church, Jackson was appointed organist with a stipend of £30. In 1839 he went into business at Masham as a tallow-chandler, and in the same year published an anthem, 'For joy let fertile valleys ring.' In 1840 the Huddersfield Glee Club awarded him their first prize for his glee, 'The Sisters of the Sea'; and in 1841 he composed for the Huddersfield Choral Society the 103rd Psalm for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. In 1845 he wrote an oratorio, 'The Deliverance of Israel from Babylon,' and soon afterwards another entitled 'Isaiah.' In 1852 he made music his profession and settled in Bradford, where, in partnership with William Winn, the bass singer, he entered into business as a music-seller, and became organist, first, of St. John's Church, and afterwards (in 1856) of Horton Lane Chapel. On Winn's quitting Bradford, Jackson succeeded him as conductor of the Choral Union (male voices only). He was chorus-master at the Bradford festivals in 1853, 1856 and 1859, and became conductor of the Festival Choral Society on its establishment in 1856. For the festival of 1856 he again set the 103rd Psalm, and for that of 1859 composed 'The Year,' a cantata, the words selected by himself from various poets. He compiled and partly composed a set of psalm tunes, and harmonised The Bradford Tune Book compiled by Samuel Smith, and Congregational Psalmody, 1863. Besides the works already mentioned, he composed a Mass, a church service, anthems, glees, partsongs and songs, and wrote a Manual of Singing, which passed through many editions. His last work was a cantata entitled 'The Praise of Music.' His son WILLIAM (2) (b. 1853; d. Ripon, Sept. 10, 1877) was bred to the profession of music and became organist of Morningside Parish Church, Edinburgh. W. H. H.

JACOB, called POLONAIS (b. circa 1545; d. Paris, c. 1605), lutenist. He has been identified with Jakob Reiss. He is known to have been master of the lute at Tours. Fuhrmann (Testudo gallo-germanica, Nürnberg, 1615) published some of Jacob's works, as well as Vanhove (Deliciae).

JACOB, BENJAMIN (b. London, Apr. 1, 1778; d. Aug. 24, 1829), was at a very early age taught the rudiments of music by his father, an amateur violinist. When 7 years old he received lessons in singing from Robert Willoughby, a well-known chorus-singer, and became a chorister at Portland Chapel. At 8 years of age he learned to play on the harpsichord, and afterwards studied that instrument and the organ under William Shrubsole, organist of Spa Fields Chapel, and Matthew Cooke, organist of St. George, Bloomsbury. At 10 years of age he became organist of Salem Chapel, Soho, and little more than a year afterwards was appointed organist of Carlisle Chapel, Kennington Lane. Towards the latter end of 1790 he removed to Bentinck Chapel, Lisson Green, where he remained until Dec. 1794, when the Rev. Rowland Hill invited him to assume the place of organist at Surrey Chapel. In 1796 he studied harmony under Dr. Arnold. In 1799 he became a member of the Royal Society of Musicians. In 1800 he conducted a series of oratorios given under the direction of Bartleman in Cross Street, Hatton Garden. As he advanced in years he became more and more distinguished as one of the best organists of his time, and in 1808 and subsequently, with the co-operation of Samuel Wesley and Dr. Crotch, gave a series of performances at Surrey Chapel, of airs, choruses, and fugues played upon the organ alone, without any interspersing of vocal pieces. In that and the following year Samuel Wesley addressed to him, as to a kindred spirit, a remarkable series of letters on the works and genius of John Sebastian Bach. These letters, now at the R.C.M., were published in 1875 by Miss Eliza Wesley, the writer's daughter.

In Nov. 1823 he quitted Surrey Chapel for the newly erected church of St. John, Waterloo Road. This led to a dispute between him and the Rev. Rowland Hill, resulting in a paper war, in which the musician triumphed over the divine. Jacob died of consumption and was buried in Bunhill Fields. His compositions were not numerous, consisting principally of psalm tunes, and a few glees. He edited a collection of tunes, with appropriate symphonies, set to a course of psalms, and published under the title of 'National Psalmody' (1817). W. H. H.

JACOBI, GEORGES (b. Berlin, Feb. 13, 1840; d. London, Sept. 13, 1906). At the age of 6 he began to study the violin under Edward and Leopold Ganz in Berlin. In 1849 he went to Brussels, studying under De Bériot until that master became blind, when he removed to Paris, where Halévy heard him play, and sent him to Auber, then director of the Conservatoire. There he joined Massart's class, at the same time studying harmony and composition under Réber, Gevaert and Chéri, and in 1861 obtained first prize for violin-playing. After playing for two years in the orchestra of the Opéra-Comique he became, by competition, first violin at the Opéra, where he remained nine years, and played, amongst many other notable productions, in that of Wagner's 'Tannhäuser.' He also formed a stringed orchestra of sixteen members, and gave highly successful concerts, performing from a platform in the centre of the room, in the picture-gallery of the Société Nationale des Beaux-Arts on the site of which now stands the Théâtre des Nouveautés. In 1869 he left the Opéra and assumed the bâton at the Bouffes Parisiens, where Offenbach was then the rage. In 1871-1872 he accepted John Baum's offer of the conductorship of the orchestra at the Alhambra Theatre, London, and during the twenty-six years that he was associated with the theatre composed no fewer than 103 grand ballets and divertissements, many of which were reproduced in the cities of America, in Brussels, Berlin, Munich, Rome and Paris. Besides these he composed comedy-operas, of which 'The Black Crook' had a run of 310 performances, and 'La Mariée depuis midi,' written for Mme. Judic, was played by her all over Europe; incidental music to Irving's productions at the Lyceum of 'The Dead Heart' and 'Robespierre': two concertos for violin; a concertino for viola; many violin pieces, songs, and music to tableaux vivants. After leaving the Alhambra (on Apr. 30, 1898), Jacobi directed the orchestra of the summer theatre at the Crystal Palace and wrote two ballets for it. At the opening of the London Hippodrome he was appointed conductor, but gave up the post after a short time. Of his most successful ballets may be mentioned

'Yolande,' 'The Golden Wreath,' 'Hawaya,' 'The Swans,' 'Melusine,' 'Dredina,' 'The Seasons,' 'Antiope,' 'Irene,' 'Asmodeus,' 'Ortella,' 'Al Baba,' 'Titania,' 'Lochinvar,' 'Blue Beard' and 'La Tzigane.'

Jacobi was appointed in 1896 a professor at the R.C.M. He was twice elected President of the Association of Conductors in England, was made an 'Officier de l'Académie' by the French government, and was presented by the King of Spain with the order of Isabel the Catholic, of which he was Knight Commander. H. V. H.

JACOBI, MICHAEL (17th cent.), led a life full of adventure; as soldier, singer, violinist, lute and flute-player he travelled all over Europe from Rome to Denmark and Sweden. In 1648 he was cantor at the town school of Kiel, where he married. In 1651 he was town cantor at Lüneburg and cantor at the Johanneum, 1651-1663. He was a prolific song composer, mostly to poems by Rist. (See list in Q.-L.)

E. V. D. S.

JACOTIN, according to Burbure, JACOB GODEBRIE, JACQUES GODEBRYE or (latinised) JACOBUS GODEFRIDUS (d. Mar. 24, 1528), was a chaplain-singer in Notre Dame at Antwerp from 1479-1528. Mention, however, is made of another Jacotin or Jacotino, who was singer at the ducal court of Milan from 1473-94, and Eitner suggests that some of the compositions ascribed to the former may really belong to the other. It is just possible the two may be one and the same, since we know that Flemish singers and composers were greatly in request in Italy at that particular time, and often continued to hold church benefices while residing elsewhere. If, however, we are to distinguish between the two Jacotins it would be natural to ascribe the motets published by Petrucci in the 'Motetti della corona,' 1519, to the Italian Jacotin, while the French chansons and other works published by the French house of Attaignant would belong to the Antwerp master. Ambros (Gesch. iii. 260) refers to a masterly 8-voice setting of 'Sancta Divinitas unus Deus' in Ulhardt's Collection of 1546, as showing Jacotin to be a composer of importance, also to the Psalm Credidi as notable for the careful declamation of the text. (Ambros misnames one of Jacotin's Motetti in Petrucci; the Psalm Judica is by Caen, Jacotin's other Motet is Michael Archangel, etc.; see Eitner, Bibliographie.) French chansons¹ constitute the larger part of Jacotin's works, of which only two are accessible in modern reprints, one in H. Expert's reprint of the Attaignant collection of 1529, 'Trop dure m'est ta longue demeure,' another still more attractive, 'Mon triste cœur,' in Eitner's Selection of Sixty Chansons, 1899. Jacotin is one of the company of 'Joyeux musiciens' mentioned by Rabelais.

JACOVELLI, MERCURIO OF RIETI, where he lived in 1588, composed a book of Canzonette a 4 v. (1588).

JACQUARD, LÉON JEAN (b. Paris, Nov. 3, 1826; d. there, Mar. 27, 1886), eminent violoncellist; studied at the Conservatoire, where he obtained the second prize for violoncello in 1842, and the first prize in 1844. In 1876 he married Mlle. Laure Bedel, a pianist of distinction, and at the end of 1877 succeeded Chevillard as professor of his instrument at the Conservatoire. Jacquard was eminently a classical player, with a pure and noble style, good intonation, and great correctness: he was somewhat cold, but his taste was always irreproachable, and his séances of chamber music were well attended by the best class of amateurs. He composed some fantasias for the violoncello.

G. C.

JACQUET, ELISABETH-CLAUDE (b. Paris, c. 1666¹; d. there, June 27, 1729) belonged to a family of professional musicians; her father was an organist and 'maître de clavecin'; her brother Pierre played the organ of St. Louis en l'Île. A precocious child, she gave, from the age of 5 years it appears, 'des marques d'une science infuse pour le clavecin.'² She was presented at the court and Louis XIV. interested himself in the gifted girl. He always treated her with benevolence, and the majority of her works were dedicated to the king. Some years later, about her fifteenth year, Mme. de Montespan took control of her, and charged herself with completing Elisabeth's education. When she was 10 the Mercur had announced her compositions, and during her sojourn at Versailles a Pastoral of hers was played (1685) in the Dauphin's apartments which Louis XIV. wished to hear repeated several times.

She only left the court to be married to Marin de La GUERRE (q.v.), organist of St. Louis des Jésuites, St. Séverin, and later of the Sainte-Chapelle. Soon after her marriage (1687) she published her first book, a collection of clavecin pieces, of which unhappily not a single copy appears to exist to-day. The year 1691 appears to be the date of her ballet 'Les Jeux à l'honneur de la Victoire,' prepared to celebrate the taking of Mons, and which does not seem to have been produced. She composed an opera for the Académie de Musique, 'Céphale et Procris,' with a libretto by Duché. This work, which the Mercur announced in 1691, was played in 1694, but only with moderate success. Leaving dramatic music, she (still called 'Mademoiselle' de La Guerre, the title of Madame being reserved for women of quality) was smitten, like Couperin, by the Italian sonatas, the introduction of which into France had excited at that time the musicians and the concert-going public. She composed from this time her most notable works: new clavecin pieces, published 1707; sonatas in three parts about 1695, of which the manuscript copies are in the Brossard Collection; sonatas for violin and bass, of which six were printed in 1707; and finally cantatas. Of these the first two books are dated 1708 and 1711. The third, belonging to the time after 1715, is dedicated to the Elector of Bavaria, who appears to have appreciated Mme. de La Guerre and for whom, according to Brossard, she also wrote a pastoral, 'La Musette, ou les Bergers de Suresne,' published anonymously 1713. She assisted at that time at the Théâtre de la Foire, and there occurs in Le Sage's 'La Ceinture de Vénus' a comic duet of hers which had a great success. Amongst vocal religious works of hers which have not been published is a Te Deum, for full choir, sung in the Chapel of the Louvre, 1721, to celebrate the recovery of Louis XV.

She lived in L'Île St. Louis, at the corner of the Rue Regratière, at least after 1704, the date of her husband's death. There she gave periodical concerts, which were much sought after and which ceased 1716-17. Her skill as a clavecinist, together with her compositions and her remarkable talent for improvisation made her attractive to all. Later she lived in the Rue des Prouvaires, parish of St. Eustache, in which church she was buried, June 28, 1729, having died the previous day.

Her contemporaries have not belittled her; her fame was great, and even outside her own country. Her opera and also her pastoral 'Les Bergers de Suresne,' if it really is by her, do not show a great deal of personality. One finds the pure style of Lully, with a gracious melodic vein, utilised not without spirit. But her clavecin pieces give evidence of subtle harmonic sentiment and refinement. They rank, without doubt, with the clavecin compositions of the school of Chambonnières. Her sonatas, on the other hand, must stand amongst the best of those which the imitation of Corelli produced in France quite at the end of the 17th century. The sustained interest which presents their well-ordered development and their often original modulations puts them by the side of Couperin's sonatas. Her cantatas were amongst the first to be published in ¹ If the Mercur did not delicately rejuvenate her in making her 10 years old in July 1677 and 20 in Mar. 1687, Elisabeth Jacquet was born in 1667 or 1668.

France, where this form, imitated like the sonata from Italy, had in the 18th century an enormous vogue. A dozen of them (the two first books), are written to words of the poet Houdard de La Motte, and their subjects are taken from the Bible. The three others are secular. For the most part they present, with brilliant symphonic interludes, airs of graceful form and varied expression, always closely allied to the texts which the author has chosen. The duet of 'Raccommodement de Pierrot et de Nicole,' composed for the Théâtre de la Foire, which was published at the end of the 3rd volume, has a pleasant vis comica.

LIST OF WORKS

* Céphale et Procris, tragédie mise en musique par Mademoiselle de La Guerre. (Paris, Ballard, 1694.)

* Pièces de clavecin qui peuvent se jouer sur le violon, composées par Mademoiselle de La Guerre et gravées par H. de Baussen. (Paris, 1707), contains 2 suites, 14 pieces in all.

JADASSOHN, SALOMON (b. Breslau, Sept. 3, 1831; d. Leipzig, Feb. 1, 1902). His years of study were passed partly at home under Hesse, Lüstner and Brosig, partly at the Leipzig Conservatorium (1848), partly at Weimar under Liszt, and again, in 1853, at Leipzig under Hauptmann. From that time he resided in Leipzig, first as a teacher then as the conductor of the Euterpe concerts, and lastly in the Conservatorium as teacher of harmony, counterpoint, composition and the pianoforte. In 1887 he received the honorary degree of D.Ph. from the Leipzig University, and in 1893 was appointed Royal Professor. His compositions are varied and numerous, reaching to well over 100 opus numbers. His skill in counterpoint is shown in an orchestral serenade in canon, op. 35; in two serenades for piano, opp. 8 and 125; in the ballet-music, op. 58 for piano duet, and in the vocal duets, opp. 9, 36, 38 and 43. Four symphonies, orchestral overtures, and serenades, two piano concertos, four trios, three quartets, three quintets, a sextet for piano and strings, two string quartets, are among his instrumental works; and of his choral works the following may be mentioned: Psalms xliii. and c. (8-parts), 'Vergebung,' 'Verheissung,' 'Trostlied,' 'Johannistag' and 'An dem Sturmwind.' As a private teacher Jadassohn was highly esteemed, and his many theoretical works have passed through many editions, and have been translated into English, French and Italian. The chief of these are his Harmonielehre (1883), Kontrapunkt (1884), Kanon und Fuge (1884), Die Formen in den Werken der Tonkunst (1889), and Lehrbuch der Instrumentation. g.; addns. JADIN, a family of musicians. (1) JEAN, a violinist and composer, settled at Versailles at the instigation of his brother; (2) GEORGES, a performer on the bassoon attached to the chapel of Louis XV. (3) LOUIS EMMANUEL (b. Versailles, Sept. 21, 1768; d. Paris, Apr. 11, 1853), son of Jean, was the most considerable member of the family. After being 'page de la musique' to Louis XVI., he was in 1789 appointed second accompanist, and in 1791 chief maestro al cembalo at the Théâtre de Monsieur, then in the Rue Feydeau. This post gave him the opportunity of producing 'Joconde' (Sept. 14, 1790), a comic opera in 3 acts. Jadin's industry was extraordinary. Though fully engaged as composer, conductor and teacher, he lost no opportunity of appearing before the public. He composed marches and concerted pieces for the Garde Nationale; patriotic songs and pièces de circonstance such as 'Le Congrès des rois,' in conjunction with others; 'L'Apothéose du jeune Barra,' 'Le Siège de Thionville' (1793), 'Agricol Viola ou le jeune héros de la Durance,' for the various fêtes of the Revolution; and 38 operas for the Italiens, the Théâtres Molière and Louvois, the Variétés, the Opéra, and the Feydeau.

In 1802 he succeeded his brother as professor of the pianoforte at the Conservatoire, and was 'Gouverneur des pages' of the Royal Chapel from the Restoration to the Revolution of 1830. He received the Legion of Honour in 1824. To the close of his life he continued to produce romances, nocturnes, trios and quartets, string quintets and other chamber music. Of his orchestral works 'La Bataille d'Austerlitz' is the best known. He composed works for two pianos, and was noted as the best accompanist of his day. In private life he was a good talker and fond of a joke.

His brother, (4) HYACINTHE (b. Versailles, 1769; d. Paris, Sept. 5, 1802), a pupil of Hüllmandel, and a brilliant and charming pianist, played at the Concerts Feydeau in 1796-97, and was a favourite with the public. On the foundation of the Conservatoire he was appointed professor of the pianoforte, but had barely time to form pupils. He composed much both for his instrument and the chamber, four concertos and sonatas for two and four hands for PF.; sonatas for PF. and violin; string trios and quartets, etc.

G. C.

JÄGER, (1) JOHANNES (b. Schlitz, Hesse, Aug. 31, 1748), one of the greatest violoncello virtuosos of his time, who was chiefly self-taught. In his early youth he was oboist in a Dutch regiment, and cultivated the horn as his favourite instrument. About 1775-77 he was engaged as violoncellist in the court orchestra at Stuttgart, where he benefited by the advice of Jommelli, Seeman and Deller, and appeared with great success as soloist at Frankfurt-on-Main. In 1776 he was appointed chamber virtuoso to the court of Anspach-Bayreuth. He toured for a number of years in Europe and visited London in 1781. Schubart speaks of his powerful but unbridled imagination, finding expression in his concertos and sonatas, great and noble in character, which, however, had to be revised by other composers to bring them into proper form. He speaks enthusiastically of his power and delicacy of expression, and declares him to be the only violoncellist capable of surmounting the difficulties of Duport's compositions. His sons, (2) JOHANN ZACHARIAS LEONHARDT (b. Anspach, 1777) and (3) ERNST (b. 1800), were both eminent violoncellists. The latter, a pupil of B. Romberg, was appointed solo violoncellist in 1725 to the court at Munich, where his father followed him in 1726 (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello).

JÄHNS, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (b. Berlin, Jan. 2, 1809; d. there, Aug. 8, 1888). The first important event in his musical life was the first performance of 'Der Freischütz' (June 18, 1821), which not only aroused his enthusiasm for music, but made him an adherent of Weber for ever. After some hesitation between the theatre and the concert-room, he finally chose the latter, and became a singer and teacher of singing, in which capacity he was much sought after. In 1845 he founded a singing society, which he led for twenty-five years. In 1849 he was made 'Königliche Musikdirector'; in 1871 'Professor'; and was subsequently decorated with the orders of Baden, Saxony, Bavaria and Hanover. He composed and arranged much for the piano, but the work by which he will live for posterity is his Thematic Catalogue of Weber's works (C. M. von W. in seinen Werken, 1871), imitated from Köchel's Catalogue of Mozart, but much extended in limits beyond that excellent work. It is in fact a repertory of all that concerns the material part of those compositions, including elaborate information on the MSS., editions, performances, Weber's handwriting, etc., etc.—a large vol. of 500 pages. A biography of Weber was published in 1873, and in 1881 Jähns was appointed teacher of rhetoric in Scharwenka's Conservatorium in Berlin. G., with addns.

JAELL, ALFRED (b. Trieste, Mar. 5, 1832; d. Paris, Feb. 27, 1882), pianist, began his career at 11 years old as a prodigy, and seems to have acquired his great skill by constant performance in public. He appeared at the Teatro San Benedetto, Venice, in 1843; in 1844 he was brought to Moscheles at Vienna, and in 1845 and 1846 he resided in Brussels, next in Paris, and then, after the Revolution of 1848, went to America for some years. In 1854 he returned to Europe. In 1862 he played at the Musical Union in London, and on June 25, 1866, at the Philharmonic Society; from that time he played frequently in England.

In 1866 Jaell married Fräulein MARIE TRAUTMANN, (b. Steinseltz, Aug. 17, 1862; d. Paris, Feb. 4, 1925), a pianist of ability, and the author¹ of several works on pedagogics and æsthetics. His published works consist of transcriptions, potpourris and other salon pieces. He always showed himself anxious to bring forward new compositions; and played the concertos of Brahms and of Raff at the Philharmonic, at a time when they were unknown to that audience. G., with addns.

JÄRNEFELT, ARMAS (b. Viborg, Finland, Aug. 14, 1869), having studied at Helsingfors, Berlin and Paris, and held minor positions as a conductor in the theatres of Germany, became (1898-1903) orchestral conductor in his native town, and then director of the opera at Helsingfors. In 1907 he went to Stockholm as conductor of the opera, and settled there. He is regarded as a representative Finnish composer, and he has produced works for orchestra, for chorus with orchestra ('Laula vuoksella,' 'Suomen syntä,' 'Abo slott'), as well as pieces for male voice choirs, and songs.

He became known in England through his 'Praeludium' for orchestra (Promenade Concerts, 1909), a clean-limbed and cheerful little piece which became exceedingly popular in London. His suite from incidental music to a play, 'The Promised Land,' was played at the Promenade concerts in 1921. C.

JAHN, OTTO (b. Kiel, June 16, 1813; d. Göttingen, Sept. 9, 1869), the biographer of Mozart, a distinguished philologist, archæologist and writer on art and music. He studied at Kiel, Leipzig and Berlin; took his degree in 1831; visited Copenhagen, Paris, Switzerland and Italy; in 1839 settled in Kiel; in 1842 became professor of archæology and philology at Greifswalde, and in 1847 director of the archæological museum at Leipzig. He was dismissed for political reasons during the troubles of 1848-49, and in 1855 settled at

Bonn as professor of classical philology and archaeology, and director of the university art-museum. Here he remained till 1809, when he retired during his last illness to Göttingen. Jahn wrote important books on all the subjects of which he was master, but his musical works alone concern us. Foremost among these is his W. A. Mozart (Leipzig, Breitkopf & Härtel, 4 vols., 1856-59; 2nd ed. 2 vols., 1867, with portraits and facsimiles; 3rd ed. by H. Deiters, 1889-91; English translation by Miss Pauline Townshend, 1882; and 4th ed. also by Deiters, 1905-07). His picture of the great composer is scarcely less interesting and valuable than his description of the state of music during the period immediately preceding Mozart, while the new facts produced, the new light thrown on old ones, and the thorough knowledge of the subject evinced throughout, all combine to place the work at the head of musical biographies.¹

Jahn intended to treat Haydn and Beethoven on the same scale, and had begun to collect materials, but these projects were stopped by his death.² Jahn also published an essay on Mendelssohn's 'Paulus' (Kiel, 1842); and an accurate comparative edition, with preface, of Beethoven's 'Leonora' ('Fidelio') for PF. (B. & H., Leipzig, 1851). For the Grenzboten he wrote two spirited reports of the Lower Rhine Musical Festivals of 1855-56; an article on the complete edition of Beethoven's works, full of sound criticism and biographical information; and two controversial articles on Berlioz and Wagner. These and other contributions of the same kind were published as Gesammelte Aufsätze über Musik (Leipzig, 1868). His four collections of original songs (three and four from Groth's Quickborn, Breitkopf & Härtel), also evince the possession of that remarkable combination of a highly cultivated sense of beauty with scientific attainments, which places him in the first rank among writers on music. Köchel's Catalogue of Mozart is with great appropriateness dedicated to Jahn.

JAMBE DE FER, PHILIBERT (b. Lyons,³ first half of 16th cent.; murdered there, St. Bartholomew's night massacre, Aug. 27-28, 1572). In 1549 he lived apparently at Poitiers, and c. 1556-64 he was a music publisher at Lyons. He composed several books of psalms; a motet and 2 chansons are contained in collective volumes. He also wrote the first known Tutor for flutes, viols and violins, Epitome musical (Lyons, 1556), the first book in which the violin is mentioned (Q.-L.; Riemann).

JAMES, IVOR (b. London, Oct. 12, 1882), violoncellist, was educated at the R.C.M. and has gained distinction not only as a fine executant but as a chamber-music player. As violoncellist in the ENGLISH STRING QUARTET (q.v.) he became widely known in England (though he has not toured abroad) as an interpreter of classical chamber music, and as an artist who has participated in the production of many new works by contemporary composers. In 1919 James joined the teaching staff of the R.C.M.

C.

JAMES, JOHN (d. 1745), organist, noted for his skill in extemporaneous performance. After officiating for several years as a deputy he obtained the post of organist of St. Olave, Southwark, which he resigned in 1738 for that of St. George-in-the-East, Middlesex. His published compositions consist of a few songs and organ pieces only.

W. H. H.

JAMES, W. N., a flautist, pupil of Charles Nicholson, was author of a work entitled A Word or two on the Flute, published in 1826, in which he treats of the various kinds of flutes, ancient and modern, their particular qualities, etc., and gives critical notices of the style of playing of the most eminent English and foreign performers on the instrument. He also wrote The Flutist's Catechism (1829), and The German Flute Magazine (1835).

JANÁČEK, LEOŠ (b. Hukvaldy, North Moravia, June 3, 1854), is professor of composition in the Master-school at the State Conservatoire of Brno (Brünn), composer, collector of folk-music, and author of theoretical books.

He was the seventh child of a poor family. His grandfather and father were village schoolmasters, typical of that class of conscientious and music-loving men to whom Bohemia is indebted for her general culture and widespread practice of the art of music. In 1865 Leoš was accepted as a chorister in the Community of the Austin Friars at Brno. Here he worked under KŘÍŽKOVSKÝ (q.v.), the precursor of Smetana, and the composer of much highly dramatic choral music in the national style. When his master was appointed organist at the cathedral of Olomouc, Janáček, still in his teens, took over his position as choirmaster in the Community Church. Later on he attended the Organ School in Prague, but poverty hindered his musical education, and he was 25 before he succeeded in entering the Leipzig Conservatorium, where he studied conducting and theory under Reinecke. He passed rapidly through the classes, but, perhaps because of his mature age and the teaching experience already gained at Brno, the conditions of pupilage irked him. Before leaving Leipzig he made one public appearance, at a Gewandhaus Concert, playing his own Variations on an Original Theme. He then went to Vienna, where he devoted himself chiefly to the piano with the idea of following a virtuoso's career. Fortunately circumstances forced him to give up this plan. He married in 1881, and in the following year returned to Brno, where he was appointed conductor of the Philharmonic Society. At the same time he founded the Organ School (afterwards the Conservatoire) and became director of it. Janáček became, and still remains, an active force in the musical life of the Moravian capital. He established popular concerts at prices which enabled the working classes to enjoy choral and orchestral music. He also began the persevering researches into the psychology of the folk-music, and the relations between song and the folk-speech, from which he has deduced his own characteristic style. Meanwhile his creative gift was ignored outside his immediate circle. His opera 'Její Pastorkyňa' (Her Foster-daughter), destined to travel far afield under its German title 'Jenufa,' was produced in Brno as early as 1904, twelve years before it became known in Prague. But the first performance of the work at the Národní Divadlo, on May 26, 1916, immediately brought Janáček into prominence as the most discussed composer in Bohemia.

Henceforward his life, uneventful externally, but wonderfully productive both on the musical and literary sides, becomes merely a chronicle of first performances of his works and tardy acknowledgments paid to his genius. The jubilee of his seventieth birthday was duly celebrated by the musical branch (Hudební Matice) of the Society of Arts (Umělecké Beseda) in Prague, and on Jan. 24, 1925, he was made Doctor of Philosophy, honoris causa, of the Masaryk University, Brno. He visited England for the first time in April 1926, when a concert of his chamber music was given in London.

CHORAL WORKS.—Janáček's choral music should be considered first, because his whole style seems to have grown out of it. In his partsongs and choruses he carries forward the work of Křižkovsky, whose dramatic gifts, stifled by the monastic life, seem to have flowered afresh in his pupil. Most of Janáček's early choral works are written for male voices. The comparative neglect of the mixed voice choir is a peculiar feature of Bohemian musical life. It is intelligible that Křižkovsky should have composed for the medium he could most easily command; but perhaps we must look to the social and political difficulties which beset the Czechs for centuries in order to account for the fact that the best choirs in the country consist of the stronger sex. Janáček therefore was only following custom when, at the beginning of the century, he wrote his first important cycle of partsongs (op. 13, dedicated to Dvořák) for male voices. The 'Four Male Voice Choruses,' op. 23, followed shortly after the composition of the opera 'Jenufa,' and show a reaction from the strenuous emotionalism of that work. They are characteristically humorous, and are now interesting as foreshadowing the music of the forest life in his animal opera 'The Cunning Little Vixen' (1925). But it was not until he produced the group of unaccompanied vocal works inspired by the harrowing ballads of the Silesian labour poet, Peter Bezruč, that he raised the whole level of Czech choral music—high as it already was. Of these three short masterpieces it has been aptly said that they were not so much partsongs as miniature music dramas, not intended to be enacted on the stage, but in the imagination. The three poems by Bezruč all deal with episodes in the tragic existence of the small body of Czech-speaking Silesians, mostly engaged in the mining and metal industries in the district of Ostrava, and the much-disputed region round Těšín. Like the work of Russian reformers such as Nekrassov, these ballads are tendentious, but also true poetry; terse, burning expostulations against cruelties and injustice now happily of the past. 'Maryčka Magdónova' (1908) tells how the eldest of five orphans, arrested for gathering sticks in the forests of the Marquis Gero, escaped from the police by throwing herself into a ravine. '70,000' (1911) is the sinister requiem for a minority race, treated in a kind of variation form, which suits the emotional changefulness of the text, its moods of apathy, despair and wild gaiety. 'Teacher Halfar' (1917) is the story of a promising lad, guilty of the crime of speaking his native language, suspected by officialdom, kept year after year in a subordinate position, until youth and love are lost and his only refuge is the village taproom; finally, he is found hanging in the orchard. These are not salon subjects; but their expressive power is indubitable. Bezruč's strong laconic verse, set to Janáček's trenchant, instinctive, musical phrases, shatter the artificial atmosphere of the concert-room and bring us face to face with life. Hearing these, we understand why some of his critics accuse his art of being 'kino-dramatic.'

The early organ works (1884) show that he was already evolving that characteristic ejaculatory idiom which he used in these choruses with such power, and continued to develop further in his operas. Later on, the results of his researches into 'speech-melody,' entered more and more into his music. He says: 'To every word the folk utter is attached a fragment of the national life . . . therefore the melody of their speech should be studied in every detail.' These fragments gathered from the market-place, the harvest-field, the village green or the drawing-room, are 'invaluable for individual characterisation.' With these veristic tendencies, and a nature which shrinks from no logical issues, Janáček has forged a tone-speech which expresses itself in swift, eruptive figures, close-knit and elliptical. His idiom is the same for his instrumental as for his choral music. It is instantly penetrating. There is no spinning out of the lyrical material, no time spent upon musical dissertation; the dramatic climaxes are driven home and clinched with breathless rapidity. The phrases—vocal or instrumental—whether they follow each other continuously or are broken by pregnant pauses, whether they are urgent with passion or languid with sorrow, tensely emotional, or all but quiescent—are always natural and convincing. The fact that the diction is rooted in the Moravian dialect need not trouble the hearer, because, in spite of the strongly localised accent and lilt, it is all emotionally intelligible. What actually disconcerts listeners who cannot think and feel spontaneously is this refusal to dally with the emotional crises, or to indulge in musical commentaries. Erwin Schulhoff says of Janáček's music: 'It is so strenuous, intuitive and unfabricated that it compels us not merely to lend an ear, but to live in it for the time being.' These remarks, which are specially applicable to the poignantly dramatic settings of Bezruč, are equally pertinent to Janáček's music as a whole.

He atoned for his early neglect by composing three short but characteristic choral works for women's voices: 'Hradčanské Písničky' (Songs of the Hradčany) (1916), 'Vlčí Stopa' (Wolf Tracks), (1917) and 'Kašpar Rucký' (1922). Max Brod calls the first of these choral works Janáček's contribution to national history—a miniature 'Ma Vlast.' But while Smetana's strings are attuned to heroic measures and songs of ultimate victory, Janáček's modest work sounds an elegiac note, a sigh of regret for the past splendours of the Hradčany. The words, by F. S. Procházka, give three little pictures of the Castle and its precincts: (1) 'The Golden Street,' (2) 'The Weeping Fountain,' (3) 'The Belvedere.' The setting is for three-part chorus, unaccompanied, except for a flute in No. 2 and harp in No. 3. The ballad of Kašpar Rucký, the disgraced alchemist at the court of Rudolph II. (1612), who, with a band of evil spirits, periodically revisits the haunts of his prosperity, touches the extreme limits of choral technique.

Before passing on to Janáček's operas, mention must be made of a work which has a close connexion with drama: his Song-cycle, 'The Day-book of one who Vanished' (Zápisník zmizelého). The poetic basis purports to be the work of a young peasant who mysteriously vanished from his native village in East Moravia. In the loft which used to serve as his bedroom a little book was found containing a series of short poems which explained the mystery: the innocent, fresh-hearted lad had been seduced by a beautiful gipsy girl. The boy's passionate love and moral suffering are revealed in these brief poetic outbursts. He knew that his parents would never forgive his bringing into their respectable homestead a 'raggle-taggle' gipsy as daughter-in-law; so finally he shouldered his burden and threw in his lot with the tsiganes. The psychological drama is gradually unfolded in twenty-two lyrics (for tenor voice) which cover a wide range of emotion. The songs are broken by a duet for the lovers, a few phrases for a female trio (off the platform), representing the voice of conscience, and a pianoforte interlude. The whole effect is original and deeply touching. It is a monodrama which shows a surer touch than Berlioz's 'Lelio'; but it needs vivid interpretation.¹

THE OPERAS.—These choral works were warning flashes of the dramatic force slumbering in Janáček, unsuspected outside a small provincial circle of disciples. Apparently this power was suddenly manifested in the opera 'Její Pastorkyňa' (Her Foster-daughter), now better known abroad under the German title 'Jenufa.' Here was a folk-music drama the purpose of which was not the exploitation of popular folk-tunes, nor the display of local costumes and dances, but a revelation of human nature closely observed by the composer in the race with which he was most familiar. That the authorities of the National Opera in Prague made a grave mistake in delaying the production of the work for twelve years after its first performance in Brno is undeniable. In justice, however, it must be remembered that in the Bohemian capital the traditions of Smetana's style were venerated as a cult, and that in 'Jenufa' Janáček scattered these traditions at a stroke. On the other hand, the opera had no affinity with Wagnerian music drama. Its principles of style and methods of expression were new. While it won the public, it puzzled the theorists and critics. In Germany its success was largely due to the charm of its novelty and its convincing sincerity; and also to its concurrence with the contemporary reaction from Wagner. 'Jenufa' is based upon a plain tale of Moravian village life in which there is none of the idealism which distinguished Smetana's idyllic operas. The well-known authoress of the tale, Gabrielle Preissová, handles the subject with something of the frank realism with which Eden Phillpotts depicts the west-country peasantry in his novels. Two half-brothers, Steva and Laca, are in love with Jenufa. She is fascinated by the former, a handsome and graceless village Lothario, who ruins and leaves her. Her foster-mother, a self-righteous woman, the caretaker of the village church, broods over the disgrace which threatens to befall her household. Finally, while half-crazy with brooding on the situation, she does away with Jenufa's child and, for a time, allows the guilt to be laid at the mother's door. 'Anguish, harrowing fear, heart-crazing crime,' overshadow the opera until near the end, when Jenufa is saved by the all-forgiving love of Laca. Although in this work Janáček makes considerable use of the characteristic figural style of tone-speech already described, the music is not entirely a mosaic of sounds overheard in nature. Sustained passion and tenderness forge their own melodies, although these may in the first instance germinate from a mere fractional motive; a 'melodic curve,' as Janáček would call it, of love, hate, or suffering. Jenufa's opening song, the 'Ave Maria,' the final duet between Laca and herself, are all 'singable' music; although they are not detachable from the whole in the sense of conventional operatic numbers. In 'Jenufa' broad human emotions are depicted within the definite framework of national character.

Janáček did not wait for Prague's verdict upon 'Jenufa' before setting to work in 1914, on a totally different kind of subject based upon Svatopluk Čech's fantastic satire, 'The Excursions of Mr. Brouček.' This time the work was at once accepted by the National Opera in Prague, and produced on Apr. 23, 1920. Kovařovic was then incapacitated by illness, and the work was conducted by O. Ostrčil. In 'Mr. Brouček, householder,' Čech has satirised a type of Bohemian bourgeois of last century; opportunist and materialist, yet—under the influence of good Pilsener beer—given at times to heady dreams and futile enthusiasms: a Czech Oblomov. The prologue to the opera takes place in the picturesque Hradčany (the precincts of the Castle) at Prague, where there still exists an old inn, the 'Vikarka,' once the favourite resort of the artists of the town. One of Brouček's pet theories is that the moon is inhabited, and that a 'householder' might be spared the minor worries of terrestrial life if he could get there. In 'a rosy mood,' induced by beer, he falls asleep on the castle steps, and the music indicates his translation to a new sphere. Unhappily he finds the same bores in the moon who annoyed him on earth, and etherialised physical conditions much less congenial to a Brouček. The leading motives used on earth now reappear, very cleverly modified to suit the moonshine atmosphere. This material is sufficient for one evening's entertainment, but Janáček, now influenced perhaps by the success of 'Jenufa,' proceeded to set the second part of Čech's satire, 'Mr. Brouček's Excursion to the XV. Century.' Indulging in another of his flighty theories—the existence of a subterranean passage leading from the 'Vikarka' inn into the hidden treasury of Wenceslaus IV., Brouček finds the secret door and tumbles not merely into the treasure-house but into the 15th century itself. The characters from the prologue, now in their third metamorphosis, are awaiting him. The music, although linked thematically at some points with that of 'The Excursion to the Moon,' is more weighty and logical, as befits the stern period of the Hussite Wars.

Until the production of 'Kat'a Kabanova,' it hardly seemed possible that Janáček could carry emotional and musical concentration a step further in opera. This work, based upon a masterpiece by the Russian dramatist Ostrovsky (1823-86), was first given at the National Opera, Brno, in 1921, and the Prague first-night took place the following year. The sombre light in which the plot is unfolded is focussed almost entirely upon the heroine, and the rôle offers a grand opportunity to that rara avis of contemporary opera—a singer who is also a fine tragic actress. Ostrovsky's drama—called in Russian 'Burya' (The Storm)—deals with Russian provincial life in the sixties of last century, when the methods of Ivan the Terrible were still reflected in the family life. Kat'a Kabanova, mystical, high-flown and sensitive, dwells body and soul a captive in the house of her mother-in-law, Widow Kabanova, a 'spiritual descendant' of the tyrant. Kat'a's weak husband, Tikon, loves his wife, but he, too, is in subjection to his autocratic old mother. Inside the house, suspicion, cruelty and religious superstition create a dark atmosphere. Outside, the Volga flows in eternal movement, and the voice of the mighty river which speaks of limitless freedom, and promises a refuge in the last resort, plays the part of chorus in a Greek tragedy. Two strongly contrasting love intrigues run through the opera. The love of Varvara and Kudryash, a young tutor, is full-blooded, gay and impermanent. Kat'a's unwilling, but fated, passion for the rather colourless neighbour, Boris, who, like herself, is the victim of family tyranny, is full of apprehension and scruples. The storm, from which Ostrovsky's play takes its title, breaks out in the third act and brings about the catastrophe. A crowd is sheltering on a terrace overhanging the Volga. The lightning, which illuminates the darkening landscape, penetrates the hearts of the chief characters assembled and discovers the secret workings of individual temperament. Kat'a, unnerved, throws herself on her knees when the tempest reaches its climax and confesses her guilt. Distraught, she flees from her mother-in-law's lacerating tongue, and her husband's belated compassion. After a last unhappy scene with Boris, Kat'a casts herself into the Volga.

Janáček's methods differ somewhat in 'Kat'a Kabanova' from those employed in 'Jenufa.' Here, the leading motives are more frequently engendered by the orchestra; and although their germs may have originated in some fragment of melodic speech, they are first introduced by the instruments and undergo a process of extension and development, re-appearing at appropriate moments together with the characters they represent. Also the whole emotional tissue is different, and woven from other melodic strands than those which prevail in 'Jenufa,' or the humorous 'Mr. Brouček.' The lilt of the tone-speech is as Russian as that of 'Jenufa' is Moravian. Here we notice for the first time an occasional likeness to the style of Moussorgsky, whose 'Boris Godounov' was, however, as yet unknown to Janáček. Each of these three operas opens with a short introduction which is not so much a thematic exposition as a preparation of the mind and emotions for what follows; and each opera contains orchestral interludes—miniature symphonic poems that are enjoyable as such. The orchestration owes nothing to the Russian, or any other, school of instrumentation. It has a primordial quality, as though it grew out of the composer's profound observation of natural sounds,¹ and, like his harmony, it is involved in the far-reaching results of his rhythmic subtlety. He employs a comparatively small orchestra, and his instrumental colour is transparent and used with reserve. Even in his wildest climaxes it is never glaring, or vulgarised. With Janáček the chief object of the orchestra is to reinforce and underline the psychological situations in opera: not to paint tone pictures, since he rules out the descriptive element in the conscious and constructive sense. His progress in the art of instrumentation has, however, been remarkable. It is given to few composers to mix new colours on their orchestral palette at 70; yet this is what Janáček has done in his opera 'Lyška Bystrouška' (The Cunning Little Vixen), produced at Prague, May 18, 1925.

In the choice of an 'animal' subject for this work Janáček has not been guided by the same motives which prompted the brothers Čapek in 'The Insect Play,' or Rostand in his 'Chanteclair.' Satire or caricature are not his aim. His animals are not moralists as in the Fables of Lafontaine. The animal and human protagonists in 'The Cunning Little Vixen' play distinct parts and only meet at such points of juncture as might occur in real life. The libretto is based on a tale by the Moravian writer Těsnohlídek, and the incidents from it—apparently chosen for no other reason than because they suggested congenial musical ideas to Janáček—are rather loosely strung together. Much is merely suggested; much is eliminated. Those who demand that an operatic libretto should be a schedule accounting for every emotion and action shown on the stage resent the claims upon their intuition which such Maeterlinckian methods entail. Janáček's wonderfully vital music supplements the slight literary web and illuminates its obscurities. The original book tells the life story of a vixen cub, caught by the forest ranger and carried home to amuse two teasing children. Parallel with the animal story runs the slighter tale of the human characters. A mythical heroine—since she never appears on the stage—plays havoc in the hearts of three men—the ranger, the parson and the sensitive young schoolmaster. Perhaps Terinka, the wayward and fascinating, embodies the eternal feminine. The conduct of her love affairs compares unfavourably with the free, but faithful, mating of the foxes.

The freshness and pungency of Janáček's music to 'The Cunning Little Vixen' is indisputable; and there are moments—such as the ballet of the cocks and hens—when it is delightful in its naïve mirthfulness. It has also the quality of a new operatic style. The myriad short motives of the earlier works are now more closely welded and the musical language more eloquent; the orchestration keeps its primitive, astringent tang, but is surer than in any of its predecessors. The musical development of 'Lyška Bystrouška,' which shows Janáček alert to all modern procedure, and imitative of none, is astonishing in this septuagenarian. Janáček has all but completed an opera upon Čapek's fantastic play 'The Makropulos Affair.' The heroine finds the elixir of life and lives 300 years.²

INSTRUMENTAL WORKS.—Janáček's orchestral works are as individual as everything that comes from his pen. This quality of stark individualism, the complete absence of artifice and empty gestures, sometimes prove impediments to his popularity. The symphonic poems 'Šumařova Dítě' (The Fiddler's Child), 'The Ballad of Blaník,' and the orchestral rhapsody 'Taras Bulba,' are worth study. But the master-key to the appreciation of his music is lost to those who know nothing of his operas; for it is in them that he discloses most authentically his temperament and philosophy.

Janáček's pianoforte music, small in proportion to the rest of his works, demands almost a new technique. Here, too, his style seems 'self-sown,' oblivious of tradition and not at all pianistic in the conventional sense. His chamber music is winning its way. The sonata for violin and piano, the 'Pohádka' for violoncello and piano, the impassioned string quartet, based on Tolstoi's novel The Kreutzer Sonata, and the sextet for wind instruments, appropriately entitled 'Youth,' though written in 1924, are finding new interpreters in Czechoslovakia and abroad.

Janáček is so closely identified with pioneer movements, and so completely accepted by the young musicians of Czechoslovakia as of their own generation, that we are apt to class him with the future rather than the past. Moreover, his output is still copious, and his range of ideas so diversified, that it is premature to speak of his genius as having definitely touched its goal. Having carefully considered his achievements, crowded closely into the period between his fortieth and seventieth years, it is, however, justifiable to account him a genius: one of those vital and initiative musicians who have given more elbow-room to their art and carried it to the verge of new developments. JANIEWICZ,¹ FELIX (b. Wilna, 1762; d. Edinburgh, 1848), a Polish violinist. He went to Vienna in 1784 or 1785 to see Haydn and Mozart, and hear their works conducted by themselves. Jahn (iii. 297) considers that an andante of Mozart's for violin and orchestra, dated Apr. 1, 1785 (K. 470), was written for Janiewicz. He had nearly made arrangements to study composition under Haydn, when a Polish princess offered to take him to Italy; and he availed himself of her protection in order to hear the best violinists of the period, such as Nardini, Pugnani and others, as well as the best singers. After three years in Italy he went to Paris, and appeared at the Concert Spirituel and Olympiens. Madame de Genlis procured him a pension from the Duc d'Orléans as a musician on the establishment of Made-moiselle d'Orléans, but on the reduction of the expenses of the Duke's court in 1790 he left Paris, and probably returned to Poland for a time. In 1792 he came to London, and made his début in February at Salomon's Concerts. He also appeared at Rauzzini's Bath concerts, visited Ireland several times, and for many years conducted the subscription concerts at Liverpool and Manchester. In 1800 he married Miss Breeze, a Liverpool lady, and settled in Liverpool, residing in upper Birket Street, St. Anne's. In 1803 he had embarked in the music-selling and publishing business, taking a shop in Lord Street, and living in Lime Street. He issued sheet music, some of it being compositions and arrangements by himself. In 1810 he was in partnership with a person named Green, but this lasted only about a couple of years. He was one of the thirty members who originally formed the London Philharmonic Society, and was one of the leaders of the orchestra in its first season. In 1815 he settled in Edinburgh, still retaining his Liverpool business, with which shortly afterwards a partner named W. G. Weiss was introduced. He added greatly to his reputation in Scotland, and was leader of the orchestra in the festivals of 1815, 1819 and 1824, took leave of the public at a farewell concert in 1829, and died in 1848.

His style was pure, warm and full of feeling, with that great execution in octaves which La Motte first introduced into England. Besides this, he was an excellent conductor. Parke in his Musical Memoirs, and G. F. Graham in his account of the Edinburgh Musical Festival in 1815, speak of the elegant and finished execution of his Concertos. Some of these were published in Paris; but he considered his best work to be a set of three Trios for two Violins and Bass, published in London.

JANITSCH, JOHANN GOTTLIEB (b. Schweidnitz, Silesia, June 19, 1708; d. Berlin, 1763), studied music at Breslau, and law at Frankfort-on-Oder (1729). In 1733 he became secretary to the minister von Happe at Berlin, and in 1736 joined the private music of the Crown Prince at Rheinsberg. When the latter ascended the throne as Frederick II., Janitsch became 'Lute-violon' (contrabass) in the Royal Chapel, and composer for, and conductor of, the court balls. He founded a musical academy which met on Fridays. His compositions, in the style of J. G. Graun, consist of quartets, trios, concertos, sonatas, etc., a Te Deum, and cantatas (Q.-L.; Riemann).

JANKO, PAUL VON (b. Totis, Hungary, June 2, 1856; d. Constantinople, Mar. 17, 1919), was educated at the Polytechnicum and Conservatorium of Vienna, and at the Berlin University (1881-82). The invention by which his name is known will be found described under KEYBOARD; it was a great practical improvement on a keyboard devised at first by an Englishman, and patented in 1843, but in spite of the successful tours about 1886, in which it was brought before the public by various pianists who had taken the trouble to master its peculiarities, it found little favour. For fuller information, Von Janko's pamphlet, Eine neue Klaviatur (Wetzler, Vienna, 1886), may be consulted. From 1892 until his death the inventor lived in Constantinople. (Riemann; Zeitschrift of the Int. Mus. Ges. vol. v. pp. 165 and 321.) M.

JANNACONI (JANAONI), GIUSEPPE (b. probably Rome, 1741; d. there, Mar. 16, 1816), learnt music and singing from Rinaldi, G. Carpinì and Pisari, under whom, and through the special study of Palestrina, he perfected himself in the methods and traditions of the Roman school. In 1811, on the retirement of Zingarelli, he became maestro di cappella at St. Peter's, a post which he held during the rest of his life. He died from the effects of an apoplectic stroke, and was buried in the church of S. Simone e Giuda. A Requiem by his scholar Basili was sung for him on the 23rd. Baini was his pupil from 1802, and the friendship thus begun lasted till the day of his death. Baini closed his eyes, and all that we know of Jannaconi is from his affectionate remembrance as embodied in his great work on Palestrina. A motet by him was published in the second part of Hullah's Part Music, 'The voice of joy and health,' adapted from a 'Laetamini' in Domino, the autograph of which, with that of a Kyrie for two choirs, formed part of the excellent Library founded by Hullah for the use of his classes at St. Martin's Hall. Jannaconi was a voluminous writer; especially was he noted for his works for two, three and four choirs. Santini's collection of MSS. contained a Mass and four other pieces, for four voices. His compositions include 30 masses, varying from eight to two voices, some with instruments; 42 psalms, and a quantity of motets and other pieces for service, some with accompaniment, some without, and for various numbers of voices. An 8-part Mass is at Bologna, and a 16-part Mass at Amsterdam. (See Q.-L.) A MS. volume of six masses and a psalm forms No. 1811 in the Fétis library at Brussels; the other pieces named at the foot of Fétis's article in the Biographie seem to have disappeared.

JANNEQUIN, CLEMENT, composer of the 16th century, by tradition a Frenchman, and usually considered on the authority of a mention by the poet Ronsard as one of the immediate disciples of Josquin Des Prés.

There is no musician of the time of whose life we know less. No mention is made of his holding any court appointment or of his being connected with any church. An edition of some of his works, described as 'revuez et corrigez par lui-même,' published in 1559, would appear to show that he was then still living, and according to Fétis, in another work dedicated to the Queen of France, published about the same time, he speaks of his poverty and old age. Ronsard, too, writing in 1560, evidently regards him as a composer of a bygone time. There is certainly no evidence in favour of the conjecture which has been expressed that for a time he may have been attached to the Sistine Chapel in Rome. His name does not appear in the list of Papal singers given in Haberl's Bausteine ('Die Römische Schola Cantorum,' etc., Leipzig, 1888), and none of his compositions are in the MS. codices of the Chapel as catalogued by Haberl. His only church compositions are two Masses based on his own chansons 'La Bataille' and 'L'aveugle Dieu,' the one published in 1540, the other in 1554, and a Motet, 'Congregati sunt,' published in 1538. Later in life, it is true, he writes again with sacred words, but in a different style, setting to music 'Proverbes de Salomon en cantiques et rime française selon la vérité hébraïque' (Paris, 1558) and 'Octante deux psaumes de David' (Paris, 1559), works which would lead us to infer with Fétis that he had become a convert to the Huguenot faith.

The works, however, by which he is best known to us in latter days, and by which he acquired the greatest fame in his own lifetime, are of another character, and consist of the numerous chansons a 4, which appeared and were reprinted over and over again by Attaignant and others from 1529-69. Following in the wake of Gombert he made a speciality of imitative descriptive music. Among his first works published by Attaignant in 1529 there is a collection of 5 chansons a 4, four of which are lengthy descriptive pieces, 'Le Chant des oiseaux,' imitating in words and notes the songs of various birds; 'La Guerre,' descriptive of the cries and noises of the battlefield; 'La Chasse,' similarly descriptive of the cries of hounds and huntsmen; 'Chant de l'alouette,' and 'Las povre Coeur,' a short sentimental piece, concludes the collection. 'La Guerre' became afterwards more generally known as 'La Bataille,' being intended to commemorate and describe the battle of Marignan, fought in 1515 between the French and the Swiss. Burney was the first to direct particular attention in his History to this remarkable composition, of which he made a copy in his Musical Extracts (B.M. Add. MSS. 11,588). In 1545 Tylman Susato of Antwerp republished it with a fifth voice part added 'si placet' by Philip Verdelot. In a later publication entitled 'Verger de musique contenant partie des plus excellents labours de Maître C. Jannequin' (Paris, 1559), the work appears in a shortened and revised form purporting to be by the composer himself, and also with Verdelot's fifth voice. Henri Expert has reprinted in modern score the original collection of 1529 as one of the volumes of his series 'Les Maîtres-Musiciens de la Renaissance française,' including therefore 'La Bataille' in its original form, which he considers vastly superior to its later revised form. With Verdelot's fifth voice the piece has been found very effective in modern performance, the constantly changing rhythm and the lively declamation offering some compensation for the absence of beautiful motives or striking modulation. Other later descriptive pieces by Jannequin are: 'Le Chant du rossignol,' 'La Prinse et reduction de Boulogne,' 'Le Caquet des femmes,' 'Voulez ouir les cris de Paris.' Claude Le Jeune followed Verdelot's example in adding a fifth part to 'Le Chant du rossignol' and 'L'Alouette.' Apart from these descriptive pieces Jannequin wrote an immense number of chansons of an amorous or of a witty satirical character, over 200 of which are enumerated in Eitner's Bibliographie (1877), and several other collections are mentioned in Q.-L. In another volume of 'Les Maîtres-Musiciens' Expert has reprinted 'Trente-et-un Chansons musicales à quatre parties' (Attaignant, 1529), in which 5 by Jannequin appear. He has also edited a few other pieces of Jannequin in separate numbers.

One or two have appeared with English words edited by L. Bonson.

JANSA, LEOPOLD (b. Wildenschwert, Bohemia, Mar. 23, 1795; d. Vienna, Jan. 24, 1875), violinist and composer. Though playing the violin from his childhood, he entered the University of Vienna in 1817 to study law according to the wish of his father, but very soon gave up the law and devoted himself to music. After a few years he appeared successfully in public as a violinist; in 1824 became member of the Imperial Band, and in 1834 conductor of music at the University of Vienna. Jansa, though a good player and sound musician, was not a great virtuoso. In 1849 he lost his appointment in Vienna for having assisted at a concert in London for the benefit of the Hungarian refugees. He then remained in London and gained a good position as teacher. He appeared for the last time in public, at the age of 76, in 1871 at Vienna.

The most eminent of his pupils was Norman NEBUDA (q.v.). Jansa published a considerable number of works for the violin: four concertos; a concertante for two violins; violin duets; eight string quartets, etc.—all written in a fluent, musicianly style, but with no claim to originality. His duets were much valued by violin-teachers.

JANSON, (1) JEAN BAPTISTE AIMÉ JOSEPH (b. Valenciennes, 1742; d. Paris, Sept. 2, 1803), violoncellist; pupil of Berteau. He made his début at the Concert Spirituel, Paris, 1766, and went to Italy until 1771. After his return to Paris he toured in northern Europe until 1789. In 1795 he became professor of violoncello at the newly founded Paris Conservatoire, but lost his position in 1802 at the reorganisation, and died poor at the moment when the Government had decided to reinstate him. He composed concertos, symphonies, quartets, trios, duets and sonatas (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello; Q.-L.).

(2) LOUIS AUGUSTE JOSEPH, brother of above (b. Valenciennes, July 8, 1749), violoncellist at the Paris Opéra, 1789–1815; composed trios for 2 violins and bass, and 2 books of sonatas for violoncello and bass, opp. 1 and 2.

JAPANESE MUSIC. HISTORY.—Chinese music passed through Corea to Japan towards the end of the 3rd century A.D., musicians and instruments being included in the tribute paid by Corea after its conquest by the Empress Jingō; and during the succeeding years expert musicians crossed from the mainland in great numbers. Towards the end of the 6th century many young Japanese were sent both to Corea and to the seat of learning, China, to study the art, and Chinese music became firmly established in Japan under court favour, a musical bureau, Gagaku Rio, being attached to the household of the Emperor Mommu.

The orchestra consisted of the Hichiriki (piccolo), Shō (mouth-organ), flutes, gongs and drums. In 935, commissioners sent to China returned with the Biwa (a sort of theorbo) and the Shakuhachi (flageolet). Chinese music thus became the classical music, as its language became the classical language, of Japan. But the priests of the temples of Nara, inspired by the spirit of Old Japan—Yamato Damashi—remained faithful to the native music and preserved it for their festivals. The principal instruments were the Koto and flute. From this music the sacred music of the temples, known as the Kangura, which accompanies the worship of the Sacred Treasures, is descended. Such as these two styles of music were centuries ago, such they are to-day.

THE KOTO.—But to those who have spent a few weeks in the country 'Japanese music' means something very unclassical—the tinkling of the Samisen which pervades the streets, some prettily quaint flashes of melody casually whistled, and the Koto music which he has heard at a Japanese dinner. Both indicate the existence of something he would like to hear more of—would indeed have heard more of were it not for the horrid droning of the human voices which usually accompanies it. This music pervades the life of the people, and it also has its roots in China. The modern Japanese Koto is derived from the Chinese Kin, and was installed as the national instrument of Japan early in the 17th century. In form like an elongated dulcimer, it consists of a slightly convex sounding-board on which thirteen strings are stretched, each with its own movable bridge. It is 6 ft. long, 9 in. broad and 3 in. deep. The lower end rests on the floor, the upper end being supported by two small legs which raise it to 5½ in. The strings are ¾ in. apart, and pass over a low ridge at the upper end of the board, the movable bridges being 2½ in. high. The player sits (on his heels) on the floor in front of the instrument, with the 'above bridge' (finger-board) portion of the strings on his right. He plucks with three ivory tsume or plectra, in form like an elongated finger-nail, on the thumb and first and second fingers of his right hand; his left hand hovers over the strings below bridges, busily occupied pressing them in order to raise them a half or a full tone, and adjusting the bridges which have moved.

THE SCALE.—The theory of the Japanese scale is that of the Chinese—12 semitones arrived at by perfect (untempered) fifths, the Pythagorean scale, in fact. The absolute pitch is F♯; we take it here as C only for convenience of comparison with other scales. The 'bearings' are as follows: From C to F is a rising fourth, junroku (jun-, rising; -roku, six notes at the distance of a semitone, reckoning in-clusively). From C to G a rising fifth, junpachi. After that, all the remaining 10 notes (D, A, E, etc., to E \sharp = F) are got by junpachi and gyaku-roku (falling fourths).

But in practice the thirteen strings (of the original instrument descended from the Chinese Kin) are spread out over two octaves in the Japanese Koto, thus :

This is the usual tuning (called Hirajoshi) though there are others. It is of the form called 'semitonal pentatonic' (in contrast with the 'tonal' of, for instance, the Celtic races). It comprises notes of the 12-semitone system which most nearly correspond with what we call Just intonation, as will be seen by comparing the cents of the Pythagorean and Just scales. (See INTERVAL.)

The 'gaps' of the pentatonic are filled in (the bracketed notes) by 'double pressure' (niju-oshi) which raises the note below them a whole tone, as opposed to 'single pressure' (ka) which raises it a semitone.

It is clear that this semitonal pentatonic was forced upon their ears by the feeling for the true major third (386) working on the Pythagorean basis which gave them G - D \sharp (702 - 318 = 384, whereas their C - E was 408). The two other principal tunings are 'modes' of Hirajoshi. Kumoi is the F mode and Iwato the D mode.

the necessary adjustment being made by shifting one or more bridges (as in the Indian sitar) though (unlike the sitar) each bridge affects only one string. Hirajoshi has also special tunings, C, D, E \flat , G, A, and C, D, E, G, A \flat , which are effected by this alteration of the bridge in question.

In these two variations of Hirajoshi there is a distinction which we should call 'major' and 'minor,' and this is much employed for pathetic effect. It is obvious also that the alteration of a single bridge can produce other modes which are not modes of Hirajoshi, and this has its counterpart in Chinese music. The Japanese scale may therefore be summed up thus: it is semitonal pentatonic, and each pentatone can be sharpened by single pressure (semitone) or double (tone), and be sharpened or flattened by shifting its bridge (tone or semitone). It is obvious that as the bridges can only be altered beforehand, and as the pressures are special devices unsuitable for rapid execution, most of the popular music is pentatonic.

OTHER INSTRUMENTS.—The Samisen, about the size and shape of a spade, is the Japanese guitar with three strings over a belly of cat's skin (originally snake's skin). The strings are tuned in a fourth and a fifth, or in two fourths (occasionally in two fifths for light music); different tunings suit different melodies, the object being to get as many open notes as possible both for resonance and for ease of execution. Length over all is 3 ft. 1 in., of which the neck is 2 ft. 5½ in. It is played with a plectrum (bachi) 8½ in. long and 3½ in. broad at the striking edge, held in the right hand.

The Kokyū, similar in shape to the Samisen, but is only 23½ in. over all, though the bow is 44½ in. It has four strings, of which the two upper are tuned (and played) in unison; the usual tuning is G \sharp , C \sharp , F \sharp , F \sharp .

The Hichiriki ('sad-toned tube') is a double reed instrument. It measures 7.1 in. in length, with an internal diameter tapering from .6 in. to .4 in. The reed projects 1 in. It is the diapason of the orchestra; the 'attack' is by a prolonged wailing slide.

FORM.—At first hearing, Koto music appears formless; its tones are weak, and the occasions on which it is mainly heard do not conduce to intelligent listening. Yet its melodies have structure, even if this amounts to little more than a skeleton. There are two classes. The Dan-mono (variations) are written in a severe style, without voice part, divided into 'steps' (dan) numbered 1st, 2nd, 3rd, etc. Each dan has 52 bars (kyōshi), though the first may have 54 and the last 50. The second class are the Kumi, with voice part, which accompanies the music rather than the music the voice, in stanzas (uta). For the Dan-mono see Piggott's Music of Japan, p. 120, from which 'Umega-e' (below) is taken as an instance of Kumi (pp. 116, 117).

This melody moves entirely on the open notes (F#, G#, A, C#, D), with an occasional A#, D# and G# got by single pressure (ka). Double pressure (niju-oshi) is rarer, e.g. :

GRACE NOTES.—There are three :

(1) The 'after-sharp' (é). The pressure is applied after the note has been struck and retained till the next note is played

(2) The 'twisted sharp' (ké). The string is twisted slightly below the bridge by the thumb and first finger, after it has been struck, and the twist is relaxed before the next note is struck (the principle of the harp) :

(3) The 'half-sharp' (yu). Ka was of the nature of a passing note; yu is made in the same way, but is an appoggiatura :

The asterisks show the notes which are struck.

HARMONY.—Three statements have been made about Japanese music—that it is unmelodious, that it makes no distinction between major and minor, and that it has no harmony. These may best be refuted by an instance. 'Hitotsu-toya,' the 'counting song,' is sung at the New Year; the tune and the second variation are as follows:

The harmony is confined to unisons, major sixths, minor sevenths and octaves, and for these the term awaseru (to put together) is used.

JAPART, JEAN, a contemporary of Josquin des Prés, and said to have been a singer in the service of the Duke of Ferrara. His known compositions consist exclusively of chansons, fourteen of which appear in the earlier publications of Petrucci 1501-03; others are still in MS. in Roman Archives. He is fond of combining together different texts and melodies, as for instance 'Vrai dieu d'amours' with the text and melody of a Church Litany. He sometimes makes his tenor consist of the constant repetition of one short motive, a practice of which there are several later examples in the motets of Orlando Lassus. In the art of the chanson Ambros and Eitner represent Japart as one of the best masters of the time. See Ambros, Geschichte der Musik, iii. pp. 260-61.

JAQUES-DALCROZE, ÉMILE (b. Vienna, July 6, 1865), the founder of the method of Eurhythmics that bears his name, is of Swiss parentage. His early musical studies were pursued in Paris under Léo Delibes, in Vienna under Bruckner and Fuchs, and in Geneva at the Conservatoire, to which he returned in 1892 as professor of harmony. It was through his efforts, when holding this chair, to broaden the basis of musical education and to make a musical training a means of expression and not merely an end in itself, that he gradually evolved his system of co-ordinating music and bodily movement. Working at it experimentally and unofficially with volunteer classes, he first gained public recognition of the method at a musical festival in Solothurn in 1905, and in the following year held the first training course for teachers. In 1910 he was invited to organise an institute for teaching rhythmical training in the garden suburb of Hellerau just outside Dresden, where he continued to develop his method on a gradually increasing scale until war broke out, when he returned to his native country and founded the Institut Jaques-Dalcroze at Geneva. He had already visited England with a group of pupils in 1912, giving lecture-demonstrations in London, Leeds, Manchester and Cheltenham, and in the following year the London School of Dalcroze Eurhythmics was founded under the directorship of Percy B. Ingham. Similar schools have been started in Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Stockholm, New York and other capitals, and classes in Eurhythmics are now held in numerous provincial towns both here and abroad.

The method itself, whilst originally aiming at developing the sense of rhythm in musical students, now provides the groundwork of a general training in musical theory, and also claims a place in the education of ordinary children, as distinct from those with a marked aptitude for music, inasmuch as it quickens mental responsiveness and individual powers of self-expression.

Its primary object is, in the words of its founder,

'to create by the help of rhythm a rapid and regular current of communication between brain and body, and to make feeling for rhythm a physical experience.'

By developing, that is to say, the pupil's attention and powers of concentration and of eliminating all but the most essential muscular movements so that a kind of automatic technique is brought into play (the arms beat time, whilst the lower limbs indicate the note-values), the entire physical system is almost unconsciously controlled by the brain in response to the dictates of musical rhythm. After this training to obtain the pupil's rapid physical reaction to changing rhythms, given out by the teacher improvising at the pianoforte, comes a later stage when whole musical compositions are translated into a language of gesture and bodily movement. Bach's fugues, Gluck's 'Orfeo' and other works have in this way been given plastic expression by the Jaques-Dalcroze schools, and the principles underlying the method have been applied in varying degrees by others both to theatrical and to operatic productions.

Besides having written books, pamphlets and articles in periodicals all dealing with his method, Jaques-Dalcroze is the author of a large number of musical compositions. A series of volumes of 'Chansons populaires,' 'Chansons de cœur qui vole,' 'Chansons de l'Alpe,' contain songs in the folk-song manner which have won a wide popularity, and the 'Chansons de route,' 'Chansons rustiques,' 'Chansons religieuses' are couched in much the same style; the 'Rondes enfantines' and the 'Chansons de gestes,' which have been taken up in elementary schools, contain the germs that developed later into eurhythmics. In addition to these definitely popular and pedagogic compositions he has written numerous pieces for the pianoforte, three string quartets, two violin concertos, and several orchestral suites, as well as choral works (two of them—'La Veillée' (1893) and 'Festival vaudois' (1903)—being on an extended scale), and works for the stage, amongst which are 'Le Violon maudit' (1893), 'Sancho Panza' (1897), 'Le Bonhomme Jadis' (1906), 'La Fête de Juin' (1914) and 'La Fête de la Jeunesse et de la Joie' (1923). Apart from the songs, which have spread into many countries, these compositions are best known in Switzerland, where many of them were produced and where their melodious and sincere idiom and democratic outlook have commended them to the simple taste of the people, especially to that section which frequents musical festivals.

The Méthode Jaques-Dalcroze and the compositions are published by Jobin et Cie; a number of collected essays have been published in English by Chatto & Windus under the title Rhythm, Music, and Education; and The Eurhythmics of Jaques-Dalcroze (Constable & Co.) contains papers on the method by Percy B. Ingham and others. L. W. H.

JARNACH, PHILIP (b. Noisy, France, July 26, 1892), composer, of Spanish parentage, his father being a well-known Catalonian sculptor. He received his first education at Nice, but in 1907 he was in Paris, studying the piano with Risler and harmony with Lavignac. In 1914 he went to live in Switzerland, and taught counterpoint from 1918-21 at the Zürich Conservatoire. During this time he met Busoni, with whom he studied anew. Afterwards he removed to Berlin.

The most important work written during Jarnach's studies with Busoni is the string quintet, op. 10, which was also the first to establish his reputation at various chamber-music gatherings in Central Europe. When the string quartet, op. 16, followed, he had ceased to be a pupil but remained a close friend, and at Busoni's death in 1924 he was charged with the delicate responsibility of completing the latter's opera, 'Doktor Faust.' Jarnach is an earnest musician of solid attainments, with strong leanings to polyphonic writing, mostly of somewhat austere character. The Swiss episode divides his published works into two distinct periods. Opp. 1 to 9 date from 1912-14, when he was living in Paris.

Beginning with songs, piano pieces and a ballade for violin and piano, this phase ends with four songs, op. 7; a sonata in A minor for violin alone, op. 8; and a sonata for violin and piano, op. 9. During the war period he wrote copiously, but these compositions remained mostly unpublished, and on resuming work he excluded them from his opus list. They include three orchestral works: a prelude to 'Prometheus,' a suite 'Winterbilder,' which had several performances in Switzerland, and one at Amsterdam in 1917, and a 'Prologue to a Tournament.' Among other unpublished works are a string quartet, and a sonatina for violoncello and piano. After the break the opus list is resumed as follows:

Op.

10. String Quintet (performed Donaueschingen, 1921).
11. Prelude, Prayer and Sacred Dance to 'Wandbild' for orch. and female chorus.
12. Sonatina for flute and PF.
- 12a. Romanza for vln. and PF.
13. Sonata (No. 2) for vln. alone.
14. Sinfonie brevis for orch.
15. Five Songs.
16. String Quartet (performed Donaueschingen and Salzburg, 1924).
17. Ballade, Rarabande and Burlesca for PF.
18. Sonatina (Romanero) for PF.

Arrangement.—Two sonatas after Giovanni Piatelli for flute or vln. with PF.

Completion of Busoni's opera 'Doktor Faust.'

JARNOWICK (1) (b. Palermo, c. 1745¹; d. St. Petersburg, Nov. 21, 1804)—whose real name, as he wrote it in Clement's Album, was Giovanni Mane Giornovichj, though commonly given as above—was one of the eminent violin-players of the 18th century and a scholar of the famous Lolli. He made his début in Paris in 1770 at the Concert spirituel, and for some years was all the rage in that capital. Owing to some misbehaviour he left Paris in 1779, and entered the band of the King of Prussia, but his disputes with Duport drove him thence in 1783. He then visited Austria, Poland, Russia and Sweden, and in 1791 arrived in London, where he gave his first concert on May 4. He had great success here, both as player and conductor. His insolence and conceit seem to have been unbounded, and to have brought him into disastrous collision with Viotti, a far greater artist than himself, and with J. B. Cramer—who went the length of calling him out, a challenge which Jarnowick would not accept—and even led him to some gross misconduct in the presence of the King and Duke of York. He lived at Hamburg from 1796 to 1802, and then went to St. Petersburg, where he died—it is said during a game of billiards. From the testimony of Kelly, Dittersdorf and other musicians, it is not difficult to gather the characteristics of Jarnowick's playing. His tone was fine, though not strong; he played with accuracy and finish, and always well in tune. His bow-hand was light, and there was a grace and spirit about the whole performance, and an absence of effort, which put the hearer quite at ease. He wrote about eighteen violin concertos, three string quartets, and duet and solo for the violin.

Dragonetti is said to have declared that his violin-playing was the most elegant he ever heard before Paganini's, but that it lacked power. Jarnowick lived for some time in Edinburgh, and several of his compositions were published by the Gow family. One, on a single sheet, is 'Mr. Jarnovichi's Reel, composed by himself,' c. 1800. 'Jarnovichi's Horn-pipe' was published in Gow's Fourth Collection of Strathspey Reels, 1800.

A grandson of Jarnowick, (2) PIERRE LOUIS HUS-DESFORGES (b. Toulon, Mar. 14, 1773; d. Pont-le-Voy, near Blois, Jan. 20, 1838), had an equally active musical career. He was successively violoncellist at the Grand Théâtre de Lyon, then a pupil of Janson l'aîné at the Paris Conservatoire, then a conductor in Russia. He returned in 1810, gave concerts in the provinces, settled in Paris in 1817 (violoncellist at the Théâtre de la Porte St. Martin founded in 1820), at a music school at Metz, which did not long succeed, was again in Paris in various posts as violoncellist or as conductor, and ended his days in a precarious post as professor of music at the École de Pont-le-Voy.

He has left some 50 works of instrumental music, and a Method for the violoncello (Paris).

M. P.

JARVIS, SAMUEL (d. London, c. 1785), an 18th-century blind organist and composer, pupil of Dr. Worgan, was successively organist of the Foundling Hospital and St. Sepulchre's, London. Wm. Russell, his pupil, filled his post at the former institution from 1801. Jarvis composed 6 Lessons for the harpsichord or pianoforte, op. 2 (Thorowgood, 1770 ?), an Ode, songs and a cantata. Gerber (2) mentions 6 sonatas for the pianoforte (Clementi, 1790), probably a second edition of op. 2. On the title-page of 12 songs published c. 1785 he is called 'the late Samuel Jarvis.'

JAY, (1) JOHN GEORGE HENRY, Mus.D. (b. Essex, Nov. 27, 1770; d. London, Sept. 17, 1849), after receiving rudimentary instruction from John Hindmarsh, violinist, and Francis Phillips, violoncellist, was sent to the Continent to complete his education. He became an excellent violinist. He returned to England in 1800, settled in London, and established himself as a teacher. He graduated as Mus.B. at Oxford in 1809, and Mus.D. at Cambridge in 1811, and was an honorary member of the R.A.M. He published several compositions for the pianoforte. His eldest daughter was a harpist and his second a pianist. His son, (2) JOHN (b. 1812; d. May 31, 1889), was a good violinist.

W. H. H.

JEAN, DUKE OF BRAINE (d. 1239), 4th son of Robert, Count of Dreux, and brother of Pierre de Dreux, Duke of Brittany. Three chansons with their melodies are in the National Library, Paris.

JEAN-AUBRY, G. (b. Havre, 1885), writer on music, is resident in London and editor of the Chesterian (see PERIODICALS, MUSICAL). He has written much on contemporary composers, and published La Musique française d'aujourd'hui (1915) (English trans. by E. Evans, 1919), and La Musique et les nations (1922) (English trans., R. Newmarch, 1923).

JEAN DE CHARTREUX (JOHANNES CARTHUSIUS), called de Mantua (b. Namur, a 14th-century Cathusian monk, wrote 'Libellus musicalis de ritu canendi vetustissimo et novo. . .')

JEAN DE NEUVELLOIS (DE NEUVILLE) (b. Neuville Castle, Champagne), a 12th-century troubadour. Nineteen of his chansons with the melodies are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris. Coussemaker mentions a Jean de Neuville living about that time, who is to all appearance the same as the above (Q.-L.).

JEAN DE PARIS, opéra-comique in 2 acts; music by Boieldieu. Produced Théâtre Feydeau, Apr. 4, 1812.

G.

JEANIE DEANS, opera in 4 acts, words by Joseph Bennett; music by Hamish MacCunn; produced Lyceum Theatre, Edinburgh, Nov. 15, 1894.

JEBB, REV. JOHN, D.D. (b. Dublin; d. Peterstow, Jan. 8, 1886), eldest son of Richard Jebb, the Irish judge, and nephew of Bishop Jebb of Limerick; he was educated at Winchester and at Trinity College, Dublin. He graduated B.A. at Dublin University in 1826, and M.A. in 1829. After holding a living in Ireland he was appointed prebendary in Limerick Cathedral in 1832, and became rector of Peterstow, Herefordshire, in 1843; in 1858 he was appointed a prebendary in Hereford Cathedral, and became canon residentiary in 1870. His works include Three Lectures on the Cathedral Service of the United Church of England and Ireland, delivered at Leeds in 1841, and published in 1845; The Choral Service of the United Church of England and Ireland, being an Inquiry into the Liturgical System of the Cathedral and Collegiate Foundations of the Anglican Communion, 8vo, 1843; The Choral Responses and Litanies of the United Church of England and Ireland, 2 vols. fol., 1847-57 (an interesting and valuable collection); and Catalogue of Ancient Choir Books at St. Peter's College, Cambridge. He edited Thos. Causton's Venite exultemus and Communion Service in 1862.

W. H. H.; addns. from D.N.B. and W. H. G. F.

JEDLICZKA, ERNST (b. Poltava, S. Russia, June 5, 1855; d. Berlin, Aug. 6, 1904), an eminent pianoforte-teacher. His father was his first teacher in music, and after finishing his general education at the St. Petersburg University, he entered the Moscow Conservatorium, and studied under Nicolas Rubinstein and Tchaikovsky. He was appointed professor at the Conservatorium, and held the post from 1881-88, when he joined the staff of the Klindworth Institute in Berlin, and in 1897 became pianoforte professor in the Stern Conservatorium of the same city. M.

JEEP, JOHANN (b. Dransfeld, Hanover, 1582). In 1609 he was at Nuremberg; from 1613 was Kapellmeister to Count Hohenlohe at Weickersheim, where he still was in 1640. He composed a book of psalms and several books of secular songs, some appearing in many editions. (See Q.-L.)

JEFFRIES, GEORGE (d. 1685?), English composer. The only discoverable references to him are contained in The Life and Times of Anthony Wood (Oxf. Hist. Soc.), in a passage describing some 16 persons with whom Wood spent his spare time at Oxford 'in the most delightful facultie of musick, either instrumental or vocal.' Among these is mentioned:

'Christopher Jeffreys, a junior student of Christ Church, excellent at the organ and virginals or harpsichord, having been trained up to those instruments by his father, Georg Jeffreys, steward to the lord Hatton of Kirbie in Northamptonshire and organist to K. Ch. I. at Oxon.'

It appears that Jeffries, then a member of the Chapel Royal, went to Oxford during the Civil War (1643) as joint organist to the King with Dr. John Wilson, also a gentleman of the Chapel.

'(G. J.) . . . Organist to Chas. I. when he was at Oxon 1643, . . . was succeeded in the Kg.'s Chapel by Mr. Low' (Edward Low, q.v.).

Jeffries contributed a motet, 'Erit gloria Domini,' to Dering's 'Cantica sacra' of 1674. He was a voluminous composer. Below is a summary of his sacred music still in MS.:

Service a 4, including G. S., 2 Communion responses. Autograph score, B.M. Add. MSS. 10,338.
Service in D, including V., T.D., J., M.: Latin C. } R.C.M. 920 a.

Carol, a 5, 'Hark, sheapard swayne'—for the Nativity of our blessed Saviour. Autograph score with basso continuo. B.M. Add. MSS. 10,338. Altus, tenor and basses parts, B.M. Add. MSS. 30,829, 30,830, 17,816.

Nearly all these collections are in Jeffries's own hand, as appears from B.M. Add. MSS. 17,816, folio 8, where his signature is appended, 'finis Geo. Jeffreys.' B.M. Add. MSS. 31,478 is a further collection of 96 motets in his hand, but there is no evidence to show that he was the composer of any one of them. Those designated are all by Italian authors (Grande, Reggio, Carissimi, Marini and others). It is evident that Jeffries studied the work of the Italians fairly extensively, as B.M. Add. MSS. 10,338 contains a selection of 12 Italian madrigals, written out in his own hand. The first page of this MS. book also contains a note explaining the words, Presto, Adagio, Fortis and Piano, which 'the Italians use in their vocall Musick to express their fancy.' Besides this mass of sacred music, B.M. Add. MSS. 10,338 also contains essays by him in almost every other branch of composition, including 2 solo songs with 3-part chorus, 2 dialogues, for a 'Nympe and Shepheard'; one to words by Thomas Randolph, 'Why sigh you swayne,' later set by John Jenkins; and a cantata, 'Felice pastorella,' containing solos, a duet, trios, 5-part choruses and 'symphonies' for 5-part strings. There is also some incidental music for masques and plays: a song for the 'Maskque of Vices,' 4 songs, a 4, 'made for some Comedyes . . . ' by Sir R. Hatton (in 1631), and a 3-part dialogue, solos and 4-part choruses, with basso continuo 'made for Dr. (Peter) Hausted's Comedy called y^e Riuall Freinda. Acted before y^e Kings and Queene, at Cambridge. An 1631(-2), 15 March.'

This last-mentioned comedy, although 'approved by the judicious,' was 'cryed downe by Boyes, Faction, Envie and Confident Ignorance' (W. W. Greg, Early English Plays). The MS. also contains 6 of his 'fantazies of 3 parts for the Violls and the Virginnall' (viol parts only), and another for treble and bass viol and organ. Ch. Ch. 468-72 also contains 6 other fancies by him for 2 trebles and a bass—4 of these are duplicated in Ch. Ch. 459-62.

From a mere consideration of the bulk and variety of his compositions, it seems probable that Jeffries will ultimately take up a position with John Jenkins among the most important of Purcell's immediate predecessors. To what extent the quality of his work justifies this assumption will not be known until some of his work, at any rate, is scored and collected.

JEFFRIES, MATTHEW, an English church music composer of the late 16th and early 17th centuries, described by Anthony Wood as Mus.B. Oxon., 1593, and as a vicar choral at Wells, and referred to by him as an 'eminent musician' (Fasti. Oxon.). He is also noted as 'of Wells' in BATTEN's Organ Book. The words of an anthem by him are given in Clifford's 'Collection' (1663), and the first three in the list below were contributed to Thomas Myriell's 'Tristitia remedium' (1616):

JEFFRIES, STEPHEN (b. 1660; d. 1712), was a chorister of Salisbury Cathedral under Michael Wise. In 1680 he was appointed organist of Gloucester Cathedral, where, though his irregularities caused some scandal (see West's Cath. Org.), he remained till 1710. He composed a peculiar melody for the Cathedral chimes, which will be found printed in Hawkins's History, ch. 160.

JELICH, VINCENTZ, of St. Veit a/Pflaun, Austria, was vicar, canon and instrumental musician to the Archduke Leopold at St. Mary's, Zabern, Alsace, in 1622. He composed 'Parnassia militia' (1622), songs a 1-4 v., and 4 Ricercari for 2 cornets and trombone; 'Arion I^{us}', sacred songs a 1-4 v. with organ, op. 2 (1628); 'Arion II^{us}', psalms a 4 v., a Magnificat, Salve Regina, op. 3 (1628); 6 motets in collective volumes (1627) (Q.-L.).

JÉLYOTTE, PIERRE DE (b. Lassenubé, Basses-Pyrénées, Apr. 13, 1713; d. Estos, same department, Sept. 11, 1787), a French singer (haute-contre), was the son of Joseph de Jéliote and Madeleine de Mauco.

In his earlier years he was destined for the priesthood and was attached to the singing school of Saint-Étienne, Toulouse; there he learned the clavessin, the guitar, the violoncello and composition. Called to the Opéra, Paris, he made his first appearance there, June 11, 1733, in 'Les Fêtes grecques et romaines' (Colin de Blamont), and appeared at the Concert Spirituel, 1734. Until 1755 Jélyotte took part in all the important productions and revivals (Lully, Rameau, etc.). He created 'Le Devin de village' (J.-J. Rousseau) and 'Daphnis' (Mondonville) (see FFL). He took part in the court concerts, in the Queen's private concerts, in the performances in the 'petits appartements' of Mme. de Pompadour (as a violoncellist, 1747-50). He asked to retire in 1759; and he was then offered the sum of 48,000 livres if he would remain. He did not retire until 1765. He had been theorbo-player and master of the guitar to the King. He had a pension of 6296 livres (1779). Jélyotte had, said his friend Marmontel,

'la voix la plus rare que l'on pût entendre, soit par le volume et la plénitude, soit par l'éclat percent de son timbre argenté. Il n'étoit ni beau, ni bien fait, mais pour s'embellir, il n'avoit qu'à chanter; on eût dit qu'il charmoit les yeux en même temps que les oreilles.'

Jélyotte produced at the court (Mar. 3 and 10, 1745) 'Zeliska,' comedy-ballet by La Nouë, of which he composed the music. A picture by Barthélemy Ollivier, 'Le thé à l'anglaise,' in the apartment of the Prince de Conti in the Temple (1766, now in the Louvre), represents Jélyotte playing the guitar by the side of the young Mozart, who is at the clavessin. A statue of Jélyotte, by the sculptor Ducuing, was unveiled at Pau (Mar. 1900).

JENKINS, C. (late 17th cent.), published 'New Ayres and Dialogues, composed for voices and viols, of three and four parts: Together with Lessons for Viols and Violins, by John Bannister . . . and Thomas Low . . . (1678).' Dedication signed by C. Jenkins and Roger L'Estrange. Another title is 'New Ayres and Dialogues, composed to be sung either to the Theorbo-Lute, or Bass Viol' . . . (1678) (Q.-L.).

JENKINS, JOHN (b. Maidstone, 1592; d. Kimberley, Norfolk, Oct. 27, 1678), became a musician in early life. He was patronised by two Norfolk gentlemen, Dering (or Deerham) and Sir Hamon L'Estrange, and resided in the family of the latter for a great portion of his life. From 1660-66 or the following year he lived in the family of Lord North, to whose sons he taught music. The second of his pupils, Roger North, gives a long account of him in his Memoirs of Musick (1846), and in his Autobiography (1887) are to be found many allusions to him. On p. 79 he says:

'He was a man of much easier temper than any of his faculty, he was neither conceited nor morose, but much a gentleman. . . . He was an innovator in the days of Alphonso, Lupo, Coperalio, and Lawes, . . . and superinduced a more airy sort of composition, wherein he had a fluent and happy fancy.'

He was a performer on the lute and lyra-viol and other bowed instruments, and one of the musicians to Charles I. and Charles II. He was a voluminous composer of 'Fancies,' some for viols and others for the organ; he also produced some light pieces which he called 'Rants.' Of these 'The Mitter Rant,' an especial favourite, was printed in Playford's 'Musick's Handmaid,' 1678, and other publications of the period. Two others by him, 'The Fleece Tavern Rant' and 'The Peterborough Rant,' are in Playford's 'Apollo's Banquet,' 1690. Another popular piece by him was 'The Lady Katherine Audley's Bells, or, The Five Bell Concert,' first printed in Playford's 'Courtly Masquing Ayres,' 1662. His vocal compositions comprise an Elegy on the death of William Lawes, printed at the end of H. and W. Lawes's 'Choice Psalms,' 1648; 'Theophila, or, Love's Sacrifice; a Divine Poem by E[dward] B[en]lowe, Esq., several parts thereof set to fit airs by Mr. J. Jenkins,' 1652; two rounds, 'A boat, a boat,' and 'Come, pretty maidens,' in Hilton's 'Catch that Catch can,' 1652; some songs, etc. in 'Select Ayres and Dialogues,' 1659; and

'The Musical Companion,' 1672; and some anthems. He published in 1660 'Twelve Sonatas for two Violins and a Base with a Thorough Base for the Organ or Theorbo' (reprinted at Amsterdam, 1664), the first of the kind produced by an Englishman. His numerous 'Fancies' were not printed. Many MS. copies of them, however, exist, a large number being at Ch. Ch.¹ J. S. Smith included many of Jenkins's compositions (amongst them 'The Mitter Rant' and 'Lady Audley's Bells') in his Musica antiqua (1812). Jenkins resided during the latter years of his life in the family of Sir Philip Wodehouse, Bart., at Kimberley, Norfolk, where he died. He was buried, Oct. 29, in Kimberley Church. W. H. H.

JENNY BELL, opéra-comique in 3 acts; words by Scribe; music by Auber. Produced Opéra-Comique, Paris, June 2, 1855. G.

JENSEN, the name of a family of musicians of East Prussia, of whom one, Adolph (3), became famous as a song-writer, and several others are noteworthy.

(1) WILHELM GOTTLIEB MARTIN (b. Stolp, 18th cent.; d. Königsberg, 1842), organist and composer, was a pupil of Hasse and Graun. He was principal Government Inspector of organ and church music, director of music and professor of Königsberg University. He composed cantatas, songs, chorals. (See Q.-L.) His son

(2) PAUL became a well-known opera singer.

(3) ADOLPH (b. Königsberg, Jan. 12, 1837; d. Baden-Baden, Jan. 26, 1879), grandson of Wilhelm (1), is by far the most important of the family for the songs with which he enriched the world.

He was a pupil of Ehlert and F. Marburg. In 1856 he visited Russia, but returned the next year to Germany, and was for a short time Kapellmeister at Posen. He paid a two years' visit to Copenhagen (1858-60), where he became intimate with Gade. The years 1860-66 were spent in his native place, and to this time a large proportion of his works (opp. 6-33) is due. From 1866-68 he was attached to Tausig's school as teacher of the piano, and from that time resided, on account of his health, at Dresden, Gratz and other places in South Germany. The score of an opera, 'Turandot,' was found after his death; it was finished by W. Kienzl.

Jensen was an enthusiast for Schumann, and for some months before Schumann's death was in close correspondence with him. In later years he was considerably influenced by Wagner. G., rev.

QUALITIES AS A SONG-WRITER.—Of Jensen, as of Franz, it may be said that both in his conception and treatment of song the strongest influence was that of Schumann. Though he lacked the qualities which place Schumann, when judged by his best work, among the great song-composers, there is much in Jensen both to admire and enjoy. His melodies are fresh and spontaneous, and his accompaniments, whether simple or elaborate, whether as a background to an emotional lyric or a romantic ballad, make admirably clear what he wishes to convey. Though the details are worked out with infinite care, no sense of labour is felt, his songs move with ease and security. His diction is always felicitous. Jensen is at his best when setting poems of a gay and happy nature, such as 'Klinge, klinge, mein Pandero,' 'An den Linden,' 'Margret am Thore,' 'Murmeldes Lüftchen' and 'Am Ufer des Flusses, des Manzanars,' all from op. 21, and all with graceful or sparkling accompaniments.

Sincerity and beauty of feeling is manifest in many more ambitious songs, such as 'Sonnenschein,' 'Im Walde' and 'Über die Welt wird Stille' from op. 22.

To the special vein of tender sentiment, which is the prominent feature of the Romantic school, Jensen is on the whole happily responsive in the songs from 'Dolorosa,' op. 30, and especially in 'O lass dich halten, gold'ne Stunde,' op. 35, and less happily in the weak but popular 'Lehn' deine Wang,' op. 1.

Reference must also be made to the jovial student songs in 'Gaudemus,' op. 40, and the famous 'Alt Heidelberg'—as well as to the vigorous settings of ballads by Cunningham and Scott, opp. 51 and 52, and to a selection of 7 songs by Burns, op. 49, of which 'My heart's in the Highlands' and 'I gaed a waeft gait yestreen' are perhaps the best.

To sum up, Jensen's songs are delightful to sing, delightful to play—for he was both singer and pianist—sincere, healthy and refreshing, but they lack the sterner qualities which belong to the great masters. W. F.

(4) GUSTAV (b. Königsberg, Dec. 25, 1843; d. Cologne, Nov. 26, 1895), brother of the above, was a pupil of his father and brother, subsequently studied with Dehn and Laub, and under Joachim's guidance became a capable violinist. He was appointed teacher of harmony and counterpoint at the Cologne Conservatorium in 1872. He wrote a good deal of concerted chamber music, and his useful editions of old violin music, under such titles as 'Classische Violinmusik,' are well known and generally esteemed.

JEPHTHA. (1) Oratorio by Giacomo Carissimi; first performed in England at St. Martin's Hall, London, under John Hullah's direction, May 21, 1851. (2) Handel's last oratorio. It was begun Jan. 21, and finished Aug. 30, 1751. The words were by Dr. Morrell. Produced Covent Garden, Feb. 26, 1752. Revived by the Sacred Harmonic Society, Apr. 7, 1841. (3) 'Jefte in Masfa' (Jephthah at Mizpeh) was the title of a short oratorio by Semplice, set by Barthélemon at Florence in 1776; performed there; in Rome—where a chorus from it even penetrated to the Pope's Chapel, and procured the composer two gold medals—and in London in 1779 and 1782. A copy of it is in the Library of the R.C.M. (4) 'Jephtha and his Daughter,' an oratorio in two parts; the words adapted from the Bible, the music by C. Reinthaler. Produced in England by Hullah, St. Martin's Hall, Apr. 16, 1856. (5) 'Jephthé,' 'tragédie lyrique,' words by the Abbé Pellegrin, music by Montéclair; produced at Académie Royale, Paris, Feb. 22, 1732. G.; addns. M. L. P.

JEREMIÁŠ, (1) BOHUSLAV (b. Restoký, near Chrudim, 1859; d. 1918, at Budějovice), Czech organist and choirmaster; composer of choral music. Director of the music school at Písek and conductor of the choral society, Gregora. From 1906 he was the principal of the music school at Budějovice. (2) JAROSLAV (b. Písek, 1889; d. Budějovice, 1919), son of the above, Czech composer. He studied at the Prague Conservatoire under Stecker and Vít. Novák. For a time he was conductor at Lublanja, in Jugoslavia, and afterwards taught in Prague and Budějovice. He followed in the steps of Smetana, and was regarded as a musician of great promise and conservative tendencies. He wrote a symphonic idyll, 'Letní Den' (A Summer's Day); an opera, 'Starý Král' (The Old King); a mystery play, 'Rimoni'; songs, etc.; but the work which brought him some posthumous fame is his oratorio 'Jan Hus' (pub. Hudební Matice, Prague). (3) OTAKAR (b. Písek, 1892), son of Bohuslav, student of the Prague Conservatoire; pupil of Vít. Novák. He succeeded his father as director of the music school at Budějovice. Starting, like his brother, as an adherent of the Smetana tradition, he has now developed on independent and more modern lines. This is specially evident in the opera which occupied him in 1925—a psychological music-drama based upon Dostoievsky's novel The Brothers Karamazov.

JERITZA, MARIA (b. Brünn, Austria), operatic soprano. The artistic gifts of this singer appear to have developed at an unusually early age and with a corresponding degree of celerity. She studied first in her native town and afterwards at Olmütz, where she obtained her first engagement in 1910 at the local opera-house. Her parts to begin with were Violetta, Marguerite and Elsa, and her success in these attracted the notice of the impresario of the Volksoper at Vienna. Five months later she was making her début there (1912) as Elisabeth in 'Tannhäuser' and laying the foundations of her remarkable career of popularity in the Austrian capital. She went to the Hofoper in 1913 and became an immense favourite with the whole musical community, from the Emperor downwards. To this result her exceptional personal attractions contributed almost as potentially as her beauty of voice, her dramatic talent, and a rare capacity for identifying herself with the characters that she undertook, notably those of Wagner and Puccini. She also created parts in several new operas, including Marietta in Korngold's 'The Dead City,' which had no success, however, beyond the borders of her native country. On the other hand, the artist greatly increased her reputation by her brilliant triumphs at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, where she made her début in Korngold's opera on Nov. 17, 1921, thereafter appearing regularly every season to the manifest delight of countless admirers. Nevertheless, she did not appear in England until the summer of 1925, when she sang at Covent Garden for the first time on June 16 in 'La Tosca,' and aroused much interest by her effective and passionate, if somewhat sensational, delineation of the title rôle. Among other prominent parts in her repertory may be mentioned Santuzza, Carmen, Ariadne, Thaïs and Sieglinde. In the last named she made her rentrée in London in 1926. H. K.

JERUSALEM. (1) The title of a French version of Verdi's I LOMBARDI (g.v.). (2) Sacred oratorio in 3 parts; words selected from the Bible by W. Sencroft Holmes, music by H. H. Pierson. Produced Norwich Festival, Sept. 23, 1852. G.

JESSONDA, opera in 3 acts; words by Édouard Gebe, after Lemièr's *La Veuve du Malabar*¹; music by Spohr. Produced Cassel, July 28, 1823; St. James's Theatre, in German, June 18, 1840; in Italian, Covent Garden, Aug. 6, 1853. G.

JEUNE, CLAUDE (or CLAUDIN) LE (*b. Valenciennes, c. 1523*²; d. about 1600), French or Flemish composer belonging to the latter half of the 16th century, was born at Valenciennes, as the titles of several of his works inform us. The inscription on a portrait of him in 1598 reads: 'Species Claudii Junii Valentini Belgae.' He is described as 'Belga,' because Valenciennes was then part of Flanders, and not of France. The date of his birth is uncertain. Fétis gives it as 1540, but Ernest Bouton, in a biographical notice of Le Jeune published at Valenciennes in 1845, fixes it at 1528.

The earlier date is the more probable, or at least some considerable time before 1540, inasmuch as already in 1554 there are 4 compositions by Le Jeune in the second and third books of chansons published by Phalèse at Louvain. His active life would seem to have been mostly spent at Paris, but in what position or under what circumstances we have no information. In 1564 appeared by him 'Dix Psaumes de David à 4 en forme de motets avec un dialogue à 7.' In the 21st to the 25th 'Livre de chansons,' first published by Le Roy and Ballard in 1569, and frequently reprinted afterwards, 39 numbers by Le Jeune were included in association with Lassus and other masters. In 1581, on the occasion of the marriage of the favourite of Henry III., the Duc de Joyeuse, with the sister of the Queen, there is the story handed down in Bayle's Dictionnaire of the magical effect of Le Jeune's music in first rousing and then quieting the martial ardour of a military officer present, this effect being attributed to the extraordinary knowledge and skill of the composer in the use of the twelve modes.³ The story may be apocryphal, but is interesting as testifying to the reputation which the composer had then acquired. In 1585 Christopher Plantin of Antwerp published Le Jeune's 'Livre de meslanges à 4, 5, 6, 8, et 10 parties.' This work was reprinted in Paris in 1587, but Henri Expert is disposed to think a first edition had already appeared in Paris in 1582. It consists of a miscellaneous collection of French chansons, Italian madrigals, Latin motets, and other pieces including what is described as a 'Venetian Echo' a 10. Expert has reprinted part of this work as one of the volumes of his series 'Les Maîtres - Musiciens de la Renaissance française.' One of the pieces described as a 'Villageoise de Gascogne,' with text in dialect, 'Debat la noste trill 'en Mai,' has also been edited with English words by Lionel Benson. In 1588, during the siege of Paris by Henry III. in the wars of the Catholic League, we are told that Le Jeune, whose sympathies were on the Huguenot side, endeavoured to escape from the city, carrying his MSS. with him, but was arrested by the Catholic soldiers, and would have seen his MSS. committed to the flames but for the timely intervention of his Catholic fellow-musician Jacques Mauduit. In 1598 appeared at La Rochelle one of Le Jeune's chief works entitled:

'Dodecachorde contenant douze Psaumes de David mis en musique selon les douze modes approuvez des meilleurs auteurs anciens et modernes à 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 & 7 voix.'

These Psalms are the metrical versions of Marot and Beza set in elaborate motet style, each in several divisions with varying number of voices, and with the Genevan tune of each Psalm as Cantus Firmus in one or other of the voices. On the title-page of this work we find Le Jeune for the first time described as 'compositeur de la musique de la chambre du roy,' so perhaps the permission to print such a work and the possibility of holding the appointment were a result of the Edict of Nantes in 1598. The publication of the work at La Rochelle, the headquarters of French Protestantism, is significant; also its dedication to the Duc de Bouillon, a patron of the Huguenot cause. In the dedication reference is made to the cessation of civil strife under Henry IV., and with an allusion to the supposed characteristics of the Dorian and Phrygian modes, the hope is expressed that music may also contribute its share to the restoration of lasting peace and concord. Sometime between 1598 and 1602 Le Jeune's life must have come to an end, as the next important publication bearing his name appears under the editorship of Cécile le Jeune, his sister, who prefixes a very flattering dedication to King James I. of England. It is entitled 'Le Printemps' a 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 (Paris, 1603). With other laudatory verses there is an 'Ode sur la musique du defunct Sieur Cl. de J.,' the second stanza of which begins thus :

³ The whole passage from Bayle is quoted in Hawkins's History of Music, chap. 22.

'Le Jeune a faict en sa vieillesse
Ce qu'une bien gaye jeunesse
N'auseroit avoir entrepris.'

There is also a preface 'Sur la musique mesurée,' in which the claim is made for Le Jeune of having successfully solved the problem of mating ancient rhythm with modern harmony, the music being made to follow exactly the metrical rhythm of the words in accordance with the rules of classical prosody. Metrical rhythm is extolled as being the soul of music, of which harmony is only the body. The poet Antoine Baif had in 1570 founded at Paris an Académie de Musique to encourage this new style of musical composition, and it would appear that Le Jeune, like Mauduit, was for some time associated with him. The work itself consists of 39 chansons, 33 of which are settings of 'vers mesurez,' i.e. in accordance with the quantities of classical prosody, and 6 are longer settings of ordinary 'vers rimez.' The 'vers mesurez' consist of an interchange of 'Rôchant' and 'Chant,' the former being a refrain sung at the beginning and between the verses of the song. The metrical scanning is at the head of each song, so that there seems to be no difficulty in understanding how it is to be sung. The 6 compositions to 'vers rimez' are in the ordinary madrigal or chanson form. Two of them consist of Jannequin's settings of 'Le Chant du rossignol' and 'Chant de l'alouette,' with a fifth voice part added, and the composition further extended by Le Jeune. There is also 'Ma Mignonne,' a lengthy piece in 9 divisions a 2 to 8, a Sestina a 5, 'Du trist' hyver,' and a Dialogue a 7, 'Amour quand fus tu né.' The text of this last piece is evidently a translation of an Italian madrigal which was also composed by Adrian Willaert as a Dialogue a 7, 'Quando nascest' Amor.' It would seem as if Le Jeune liked to experiment in every possible variety of style of vocal setting. 'Le Printemps' is now reprinted in modern score in 3 volumes of Expert's 'Les Maîtres-Musiciens.' There are also reprinted separately the two pieces of Jannequin with Le Jeune's additions.

A simple setting of all the tunes of the Genevan Psalter a 3, published by Cécile Le Jeune in 3 books (Paris, 1602-10), was soon forgotten and cast into the shade by the more important setting of the same tunes a 4 and 5, published by her in 1613. The latter work became immensely popular, and was frequently reprinted in France and Holland for the use of the reformed churches. Like the earlier work of Goudimel it was also adapted to the German translation of the French Psalms by Ambrosius Lobwasser. The music is almost entirely in simple counterpoint, note for note, the proper tune being in the tenor, but sometimes in the bass, while as Ambros says, the descant part is so melodious that it might be mistaken for the proper tune. It is perhaps too much to say that Le Jeune's musical reputation rests entirely on this one work, since possibly the popularity of this work was rather due to the reputation the musician had otherwise acquired. While Ambros is disposed to consider Le Jeune's chanson as being somewhat of a declension from the higher style of earlier French masters, he yet gives high praise to the 'Dodécachorde' as showing him to be a solid and capable master of the polyphonic school.

A book of Psalms in a quite different style had also appeared under Cécile's editorship in 1606. It is entitled 'Psaumes en vers mesurez mis en musique à 2-8 parties.' This work consists of a selection of Psalms not from the Genevan version, but in a verse translation in accordance with the rules of classical prosody, and the music also set accordingly as in 'Le Printemps.' It is now republished by Expert in 3 volumes of his 'Les Maîtres-Musiciens.' Another publication of 1608 is 'Octonaire de la vanité et inconstance du monde mis en musique à 3 & 4.' This is also being now (1925) reprinted by Expert. In 1608 Cécile Le Jeune published a book of 'Airs' a 3 to 6, forming a sequel to an earlier book of the same kind in 1594. Lastly, in 1612 a nephew of Le Jeune published a 'Second livre de melanges à 4-10,' in which, judging from its miscellaneous contents, he must have collected all he could still find of his uncle's works, chansons, madrigals, motets, etc., with two instrumental fantasias, one of which a 4 has been separately reprinted in score and parts by Expert. It only remains to add that besides his larger republications Expert has issued some works of Le Jeune in separate numbers. J. B. M.

JEWEES, THE, see JUIVE, LA.

JEWETT (JEWITT), RANDOLPH (RANDALL) (b. circa 1603; d. Winchester, July 3, 1675), a church composer and organist of some eminence. We find a 'Randle Juet' as a chorister at Chester, from 1612-15; possibly he may have been a son of John Jewett, who was precentor's vicar at Christ Church, Dublin, in 1619.¹

In 1631 Randolph Jewett succeeded Thomas Bateson (d. 1630) as organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, and in the same year was also appointed organist of St. Patrick's Cathedral, which post he held, with the organistship of Christ Church, until 1639. While organist of Christ Church he seems to have introduced orchestral music into the cathedral service. The rather puritanically inclined Bishop Bedell was much displeased with the pompous service at that cathedral,

'which was attended and celebrated with all manner of instrumental musick, as organs, sackbutts, cornetts, violls, etc., as if it had been at the dedication of Nebuchadnezzar's golden image in the plain of Dura.'

This description is in part borne out by a Chapter Act of 1637, whereby the Proctor was directed to pay

'to the two sackbutts and two cornetts for their service and attendance in this Cathedral the sume of twenty nobles each at or before Easter next ensuing.'

In 1639 Jewett was succeeded in the post of organist of Christ Church by Dr. Benjamin Rogers. In the same year he was deprived by the archbishop of the post as vicar choral which he held in St. Patrick's, for not being in priest's orders. He was restored in 1641. In 1642 we find him at Chester, whither he was brought from Dublin in connexion with some special services on the occasion of a visit from the King. In 1643-44 he was organist of Chester Cathedral, and as the cathedral accounts from 1644-64 are missing, it is probable that he remained there until 1646, when he returned to Dublin, and was appointed a vicar choral of Christ Church. This appointment was made on a letter of recommendation from the Lord Lieutenant (Lord Ormonde), which begins:

'Having understood howe much this bearer, Randall Jewett, hath suffered for his good affections towards His Majesty's Service, and howe ably he is qualified in his p'fession, and for the quire,' etc.

In the same year he was also appointed vicar choral of St. Patrick's. He probably returned to England on the suppression of the cathedral establishments under the Commonwealth,¹ as we next find him at St. Paul's, where he was almoner in 1660, and in 1661 minor canon and junior cardinal (an ancient office carrying no duties, and held by a minor canon). In 1666 he was appointed organist, master to the choristers, and lay-vicar of Winchester Cathedral, where he remained until his death. His burying-place in the north transept of the cathedral is still marked by a stone bearing the following inscription:

RANDOLPH JEWETT GENEROUS
ob. Jul. 3 æt. 72 Dom 1675.

He was succeeded at Winchester by John Reading (the composer of the tune 'Dulce Domum' of Winchester College). Jewett is stated by Hawkins (Hist.) to have taken out his bachelor's degree in music at Trinity College, Dublin, but no evidence on the point is furnished by the college books. The words of five anthems by Jewett appear in the book of 'Anthems to be sung in the Cathedral Church of the Holy and United Trinity in Dublin.' Printed 1662. (See CLIFFORD.) Only one of these is now extant, a Funeral Anthem, 'I heard a voice from Heaven,' for solo and chorus, preserved in Tudway's collection, vol. iii. pp. 91-3. J. S. Bumpus had an old cathedral book containing the bass voice parts only of some of these anthems, and also of a short Evening Service by Jewett for men's voices. Hawkins describes Jewett as 'a Scholar of Orlando Gibbons,' and as 'having acquired great esteem for his skill in his profession.' His music was probably sung a good deal in the English cathedrals during the latter part of the 17th century, as the first edition of Clifford's Anthem book (1662) contains two of his anthems, and the second edition (1664) contains four.

JEWISH MUSIC, see HEBREW MUSIC.

JEW'S HARP (Jew's TRUMP) (mediaeval Latin crembalum or cymbalum orale). In most European countries some form of the name Trump is given to this instrument, but the following titles are peculiar: French guimbarde (perhaps from the resemblance of the frame of the instrument to a cart with shafts); German Maultrommel (mouth drum) or Brummeisen (buzzing iron), Italian scacciapensieri ('Drive away thought,' a pastime). The ordinary English name Jew's Trump (cf. also the less common German Judenharfe) is probably a corruption of the Dutch Jeugd-tromp (child's trumpet). It has apparently no connexion either with Jews or jaws. The earliest French name was rebute, whence the ributhe of the Houlgate, a Scottish poem of the 15th century.

This little instrument consists of a frame of metal in horse-shoe shape, with the two ends extended into parallel branches; between them a metal tongue vibrates freely when set in motion by a stroke of the finger. The instrument is placed between the front teeth in such a way as to give the metal tongue unrestricted movement, and the performer is able to produce various tones by altering the size of the cavity of the mouth.

The Jew's harp is found not only in Europe but throughout Eastern Asia and Oceania, where both frame and tongue are generally made of wood, though sometimes of metal; but whereas in European examples the tongue is provided with an upturned end for plucking, in the primitive Oriental types it is set in motion by a jerking-string. In China it is called K'ou chin (mouth harp), and in a work of the 12th century it is depicted in quite a modern shape. In India it is known as the Murchang or simply the Chang (harp). No doubt at some remote period the instrument was brought into Europe from Asia; in an ancient grave in Norway a Jew's harp of copper finely gilt was discovered. Seeing that vibrating tongues of wood or metal are used in the popular and widely spread Zanza of Africa, it is somewhat strange that the Jew's harp is unknown to the primitive tribes of that continent; it is also absent amongst the American Indians.

The principle which underlies the sound-producing properties of the instrument is interesting, and has been the subject of some inquiry. Sir Charles Wheatstone, who studied the action of the free vibrating reeds and in 1829 invented the concertina, considered that the alteration of the cavity or resonance chamber of the mouth produced harmonics on the prime or fundamental note in their regular series as on the trumpet or violin; but the present accepted theory is that the prime note is a composite sound made up of a wide range of harmonics, and that these are reinforced and brought into prominence as the resonant chamber of the mouth is adapted in proper relation to them. Victor MAHILLON (q.v.), on experimenting with the Jew's harp, found that by forming the mouth as for the pronunciation in succession of the French vowels e, i, o, u, ou, the twelfth from the prime and the intervals of the major chord above were isolated in turn and reinforced.

Like the natural trumpet, therefore, from which it takes its name, the instrument suffers from the inevitable gaps in the ordinary diatonic scale (see TRUMPET), and the great virtuosi on the Jew's harp, such as Koch, Scheibler, Eulenstein and others, used several instruments of different sizes and therefore obtained a series of harmonics of different pitch in order to complete its scale. SCHEIBLER (q.v.) in 1816 produced an instrument of this class called aura, which was furnished with 10 vibrating tongues arranged in sections of five, one for each hand; and, according to another account, he used as many as twenty fixed on a disc with the tongues diverging from the centre. It is said the aura produced a magic effect in the concert-room owing to the power of expression it possessed. In Eastern specimens two or three tongues are not infrequently found upon the same frame. F. W. G.

JHAN, MAISTRE or MESTRE JAN (1519-43), was maestro di cappella to the Duke Ercole of Ferrara, according to the title-page of his 'Madrigali,' published 1541. The title-page of the Symphonia, 1543, has led to a supposition that Maistre Jhan of Ferrara was the same person as Joannes Gallus. Fétis (Biog. Univ.) was of opinion that Maistre Jhan was identical with Jhan GERO (q.v.). The following list of compositions has been largely taken from Eitner's Musik-Sammelwerke, 1877, and Vogel's Welliche Vocalmusik Italiens, 1892.

1. Il primo libro de i Madrigali, di Maistre Jhan, Maestro di Capella, Excellentissimo Signor Hercole Duca di Ferrara, & de altri Excellentissimi Autori. Nouamente posto in luce. 1541. Non sine privilegio. Excudebat Venetiis, apud Antonium Gardane. Obl. 4to, pp. 32. Dedicated by Ant. Gardane to Girolamo Bustrone. It contains five madrigals for four voices by Maistre Jhan:—'Amor non vedi'; 'Amor perche tormenti'; 'Cleco fandi'; 'Deh quant' e dolce amor'; 'Madonna i vostri baci.' Four partbooks in Vienna Hofbibliothek, etc.
2. Cautus Symphonia quatuor modulata vocibus excellentissimi musici Joannis Galli, alias Chori Ferrarie Magistri, quatuor Motecta Metre Jehan nominantur, nuper in lucem edita. Venetiis: Hieron. Scotum. 1543. Obl. 4to. (In the Tenor part-book 'excellent. Musici, vulgo occupati Metre Jehan quae alias et Motecta nominantur'. Four partbooks in the Vienna Hofbibl., etc.)
3. Motetti di la corona. Libro secondo. 1519. Petrus. Maistre Jan:—'O benigndine domine Jhu' for four voices.
4. Madrigal novi de div. excell. musici. Libro primo de la serenata. Roma. 1533. Maistre Jan:—'Hor vedete Madonna' for four voices.
5. Novum et insigne opus musicum. 6, 5, et 4 vocum. (Noribergae J. Otto. 1537.) M. Jhan (in MS.):—'Hodie in Jordane' and 'Descendit spiritus sanctus,' for six voices. See Evangelorum, 1565.
6. Il terzo libro de madrigali di Verdelotto. Venetiis: Scotto. 1537. Metre Jan:—'Amor vorla donna humana,' for four voices.
7. De i madrigali di Verdelotto et de altri eccell. autori a 5 voci. Lib. 2. Venetiis: Scotto. 1538. Maistre Jan:—'Altro non e il mio amor'; 'Amor se tu sei Dio'; 'Madonna lo v' amor et taccio'; 'Per aspri boschi'; 'Sio miro ogni.' The same work was published without date by Scotto, about 1537.
8. Verdelot la piu divina et piu bella musica. . . . madrigali a 6 voci. Venetiis: Ant. Gardane. 1541. Maistre Jhan:—'Deh perche non e in voi'; 'Ditemi o diva mi'; 'Madonna i priechi miei'; 'Non vi lassero mai'; 'Quando nasceti.' The two last are here without composer's name, but are by Maistre Jhan in the 1546 edition, which omits 'Madonna i priechi' and attributes 'Ditemi o diva' to Verdelot. In the 1561 edition only three appear: 'Deh perche'; 'Non vi lassero'; 'Quando nasceti.'
9. Frigida novem motetos. Ferrara. 1538. Dedicated to 'Ilus, Ferrariae & Carnatum Ducis Hieruli Rensens.' Contains three motets by Maistre Jan for four voices.
10. Motetti di la Simila. Lib. 1. Vignoli motetos. Ferrara. 1539. Dedic. aa. in No. 9. Maistre Jan:—'O sicut Hiesuiae' for five voices. It is also in Mutatorum divinitatis. Lib. 1. 1543.
11. Caudones 5 vocum selectissimas. . . . mutetorum. Lib. 1. Arrentorati. P. Schoeffer. 1539. Maistre Jan:—'Pater noster' and 'Ave Maria.'
12. Quartus liber motetorum ad 5 et 6 voces. Lugduni: J. Modernum. 1533. Two motets for five voices by M. Jhan.
13. Primus liber Motetti del frutto a 4 voci. Venetiis: Ant. Gardane. 1539. Reprinted by Scotto, Vinegia, in 1567. M. Jan:—'Cerne meos ergo gemitus'; 'Thomas unus ex duodecim' and 'Et post dies.'
14. Selectissime necnon familiarissime cantiones. (M. Kriesstein) Augsburg. 1540. M. Jhan:—'Miser quel huomo' for five voices. 'Miser qui amat' for four voices.
15. Le dotte et eccellente compositioni de i madrigali di Verdelotto a 5 voci. Venetiis: Ant. Gardane. 1541. Maistre Jhan:—'Per aspri boschi.'
16. D. autori il primo libro d' i madrigali de div. excell. autori a 5 voci. Venetiis: Ant. Gardane. 1542. Maistre Jhan:—'Ecco signor'; 'Miser quel huomo'; 'Ochi miei vaghi.'
17. Il primo libro di motetti di M. Adriano a sei. Venetiis. 1542. Maistre Jhan:—'Qui credit in Dominum.'
18. Il primo libro a due voci de div. autori. Venetiis: Ant. Gardane. 1543. M. Jan:—'Agnus Dei'; 'Benedictus.'
19. Concentus 4, 5, 3, & 4 vocum. Augsburg: P. Ullhardus. 1546. M. Jan:—'Paulus Apostolus, cum 2 parte' for four voices.
20. Cantiones 7, 6 & 5 vocum. Augsburg: M. Kriesstein. 1545. M. Jan:—'Two motets for six voices, and one for five voices.'
21. Diphona amoenae et florida. Selectores Eras. Rotenbuchero Bolaro. Norimbergae. 1549. Maistre Jan:—'Franelbia tecum' for two voices.
22. Il primo libro de motetti a 6 voci de div. excell. musici. Venetiis: Scotto. 1549. Three motets by M. Jhan.
23. Electiones diversorum motetorum distincte quatuor vocibus Venetiis: Ant. Gardane. 1549. Three motets by M. Jhan:—'Cum audierim', 'In viam pacis', and 'Levita laurentius.'

JIRÁK, KAREL BOLESLAV (b. Prague, 1891), Czech composer and professor of composition at the Prague Conservatoire. He studied under Vítězslav Novák (q.v.), but afterwards came under the influence of J. B. FOERSTER (q.v.). From 1915–18 he was conductor at the Hamburg Opera, and from 1920–21 conducted the choral society Hlahol touring in Jugoslavia. Jirák is one of the most successful of the younger Czech composers. He stands apart from the nationalist group. His style is independent and clear-cut, and he is something of a musical satirist. His PF. 'Suite in the Olden Style' is very popular. His works include :

Opera, 'Apollonius of Tyana'; 2 symphonies; overture to a Shakespearean comedy; string quartet, string sextet, violoncello sonata, violin sonata; song cycles, Tragi-comedy (texts from Heine); 'Meditace' (Meditations), 'Mjstvé štěstí' (Brief Happiness), 'Tři zpěvy domova' (3 songs of home), 'Večer a duše' (Evening and the Soul).

B. N.

JIRÁNEK, ALOIS (b. Ledeč, 1855), Czech pianist and teacher, probably the last remaining pupil of Smetana. From 1877–91 he was professor of the pianoforte at Kharkov (Russia), and now (1927) holds a similar post in the Prague Conservatoire. He took an active part in the celebration of the Smetana centenary in 1924. His compositions include: Ballad and Scherzo fantastique (orchestra); sonatas, pianoforte trio and quintet; an opera, 'Dagmar'; songs and choruses; Double Scales; School of Chord-playing; School Manual (Universal Edition, Vienna, and Bosworth, London).

JOACHIM, JOSEPH (b. Kittsee, near Pressburg, June 28, 1831; d. Berlin, Aug. 15, 1907), was the greatest master of the violin of his generation.

He began to play the violin at 5 years of age, and showing great ability he was soon placed under Serwaczynski, then leader of the opera band at Pest. When only 7 years old, he played a duet in public with his master with great success. In 1841 he went to Vienna, and studied successively with Miska Hauser, G. Hellmesberger the elder, and Boehm; in 1843 he went to Leipzig, then, under Mendelssohn's guidance, at the zenith of its musical reputation. On his arrival at Leipzig as a boy of 12, he proved himself already an accomplished violinist, and very soon made his first public appearance in a concert of Madame Vlardot's, Aug. 19, 1843, when he played a rondo of de Bériot's; Mendelssohn, who at once recognised and warmly welcomed the boy's exceptional talent, himself accompanying at the piano. On the 16th of the following November he appeared at the Gewandhaus Concert in Ernst's fantasia on 'Otello'; and in the following spring paid his first visit to England, appearing first at Drury Lane Theatre, Mar. 28, 1844, at a benefit of Bunn, the impresario; at a concert of Benedict's on May 19; and ultimately at the Philharmonic Concert of May 27. He won the unqualified eulogies of the press and the public for the perfection of his technique, his wonderful tone, and the musical maturity and intelligence he revealed. On Nov. 25 of the same year, he took part in a performance at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, of Maurer's Concertante for four violins with Ernst, Bazzini and David, all very much his seniors. The wish of his parents, and his own earnest disposition, prevented his entering at once on the career of a virtuoso. For several years Joachim remained at Leipzig, continuing his musical studies under Mendelssohn's powerful influence, and studying with David most of those classical works for the violin—the Concertos of Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Spohr, Bach's solos, etc.—which remained the staple of his repertory. At the same time his general education was carefully attended to, and it may truly be said that Joachim's character, both as a musician and as a man, was developed and directed for life during the years which he spent at Leipzig. He already evinced that thorough uprightness, that firmness of character and earnestness of purpose, and that intense dislike of all that is superficial or untrue in art, which made him not only an artist of the first rank, but a great moral power in the musical life of his day.

Joachim remained at Leipzig till October 1850, for some time side by side with David as leader of the Gewandhaus orchestra, but also from time to time travelling and playing with ever-increasing success in Germany and England. He repeated his visits to England in 1847, 1849, 1852, 1858, 1859, 1862, and annually after that date. His appearance at the Monday Popular, the Crystal Palace and other concerts in London and the principal provincial towns was a regular feature of the musical life in England. His continued success as a solo- and quartet-player, extending over a period of more than sixty years, is probably without parallel.

In 1849 Joachim accepted the post of leader of the Grand Duke's Band at Weimar, where Liszt, who had already abandoned his career as a virtuoso, had settled and was conducting operas and concerts. His stay at Weimar was not, however, of long duration. For one who had grown up under the influence of Mendelssohn, and in his feeling for music and art in general was much in sympathy with Schumann, the revolutionary tendencies of the Weimar school could have but a passing attraction. The history of Joachim's renunciation of the tenets of the 'new school' of Liszt and his friends, and the letters in which his own convictions were expressed, may be read in Moser's Joseph Joachim. In 1853 he accepted the post of Konzertmeister and solo violinist to the King of Hanover, which he retained till 1866. During his stay at Hanover (June 10, 1863) he married Amalia Weiss (q.v.), the celebrated contralto singer. In 1868 he went to Berlin to become the head of a newly established department of the Royal Academy of Arts—the 'Hochschule für ausübende Tonkunst' (High School for Musical Execution—as distinct from composition, for which there was already a department in existence). Joachim entered heart and soul into the arduous task of organising and starting this new institution, which under his energy and devotion not only soon exhibited its vitality, but in a very few years rivalled, and in some respects even excelled, similar older institutions. Up to this period Joachim had been a teacher mainly by his example. Thenceforth he was surrounded by a host of actual pupils, to whom he imparted the results of his experience, and into whom he instilled that spirit of devotion to art which, in conjunction with his great natural gifts, really contained the secret of his long-continued success. (See JOACHIM QUARTET.) In addition to the universal admiration of the musical world, numerous marks of distinction, orders of knighthood from German and other sovereign princes, and honorary degrees were conferred on Joachim. From the University of Cambridge he received the honorary degree of Doctor of Music on Mar. 8, 1877. Oxford and Glasgow also conferred their degrees on him. No artist ever sought less after such things; no artist better deserved them. The fiftieth anniversary of his entry into public life was celebrated by various memorable performances in Berlin in Mar. 1889; and the sixtieth anniversary of his first appearance in England was the occasion of a very interesting concert in the Queen's Hall on May 16, 1904, at which he played Beethoven's concerto, and conducted his own overture to 'Henry IV.' His portrait, painted by J. Sargent, R.A., was presented to him by the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour.

As to his style of playing, perhaps nothing more to the point can be said than that his interpretations of Beethoven's concerto and great quartets and of Bach's solo sonatas were universally recognised as models, and that his style of playing appeared especially adapted to render compositions of the purest and most elevated style. A master of technique, surpassed by no one, he used his powers of execution exclusively for the interpretation of the best music. If in later years his strict adherence to this practice and consequent exclusion of all virtuosic pieces resulted in a certain limitation of repertory, it must still be granted that his repertory was, after all, richer than that of almost any other eminent violinist, comprising as it did the concertos of Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms; four or five of Spohr's, Viotti's twenty-second, his own Hungarian, Bach's solos, the two romances of Beethoven, and in addition the whole range of classical chamber music.

Purity of style, without pedantry; fidelity of interpretation combined with a powerful individuality—such are the main characteristics of Joachim the violinist and the musician. An interesting and very able analysis of his playing is to be found in the Musical Gazette for Mar. and July 1900, under the title Performance and Personality.

As a composer Joachim was essentially a follower of Schumann, and his style was developed in close association with his intimate friend, Brahms. Most of his works are of a grave, melancholy character—all of them, it need hardly be said, are earnest in purpose and aim at the ideal. Undoubtedly his most important and most successful work is the Hungarian concerto (op. 11), a creation of real grandeur, built up in noble symphonic proportions, which holds a place in the first rank of masterpieces for the violin. The following is a list of his published compositions:

JOACHIM QUARTET (1869-1907). This famous organisation was founded at Berlin in the autumn of 1869. Joachim was then at the zenith of his powers, and the possessor of ripe experience, not a little of which was gained on English concert platforms, as a quartet leader, and it occupied from the first, as by natural right, a supreme position in the world of chamber music. Various changes had to be made subsequently in the personnel of the Quartet, but one feature remained constant. The colleagues of Joachim were invariably chosen from among those artists who, besides possessing technical mastery of their instruments, were in sympathy with the artistic ideals associated with his name. What these changes were is set forth in the following table :

First Violin.	Joseph Joachim, 1869-1907.
Second Violin.	Ernst Schliever, 1869-72.
" "	Heinrich de Ahna, 1872-92.
" "	Johann Kruse, 1892-97.
" "	Carl Halir, 1897-1907.
Viola.	Heinrich de Ahna, 1869-72.
" "	Eduard Rappoldi, 1872-77.
" "	Emanuel Wirth, 1877-1907.
Violoncello.	Wilhelm Müller, 1869-79.
" "	Robert Hausmann, 1879-1907.

Beginning in 1869, annual series of concerts were given by the Joachim Quartet in Berlin. Annual visits to Vienna, besides frequent performances in the leading German towns, in Budapest, London and provinces, Paris, Rome, followed. In Germany no musical festival of importance was considered complete without their presence. They took part regularly in the Meiningen Festivals, and in those held at Bonn (in the Beethoven house), Basle and Zürich. At Zwickau on the occasion of the unveiling of the Robert Schumann memorial, and at Mannheim during the inauguration of the Festival Hall, they were also present, acclaimed as representative figures of German art. In the spring of 1905 they visited Rome, giving the sixteen quartets of Beethoven in the Farnese Palace.

In 1897 and subsequently, Joachim, Kruse, Wirth and Hausmann appeared together in London at the Popular Concert, but the Quartet, as such, did not visit England till 1900, in which year an influential London Committee organised a series of concerts in St. James's Hall, and secured for the Quartet (Joachim, Halir, Wirth, Hausmann) a splendid reception. The first concert was given on Apr. 25, the old Musical Union practice of placing the platform in the centre of the Hall being adopted and continued in the succeeding years (1901-04). In 1905 they gave two series of concerts in Bechstein Hall, St. James's Hall being no longer available. The next year they gave a complete series (Queen's Hall) of Brahms's chamber music. In 1907 Joachim was prevented by illness from leading the series which had been arranged, and the Quartet, led by Halir, was completed by Klingler, Wirth and Hausmann. The London programmes were always devoted to the German classics, from Haydn to Brahms. In one instance only a work from the pen of a living composer was given, the string quintet, op. 86, by Stanford, in which Alfred Gibson co-operated as second viola. In Berlin their programmes were more eclectic in character, the romantic as well as the classic element being represented. Dvořák's name appeared frequently, but one looks in vain for examples of the French, Belgian, Russian or Scandinavian schools.

Of Joachim's readings of Brahms a special word needs to be said. He was not only the composer's intimate friend, but was entrusted by him with the recension of many of his chamber works. It follows that no such authoritative readings will ever be heard again. Thousands have realised for the first time through the medium of the Joachim Quartet how much of romantic beauty underlies the supposed austerity of the master.

Each of the members of the quartet possessed a Stradivari of the best period, and therefore the tone produced, besides being pure, was homogeneous in all the parts. W. W. C.

JOANNA MARIA, see GALLIA.

JOANNES, ARCHICANTOR, choirmaster of St. Peter's and Abbot of S. Martin, Tours (according to another MS., 'in Rome'), was sent to England by Pope Agathon c. 679 to introduce the Roman liturgy, and did much to raise the singing in English churches. He died on the journey back and was buried at Tours.

JOAN OF ARC, opera in 3 acts; words by A. Bunn, music by Balfe. Produced at Drury Lane, Nov. 30, 1837. Tchaikovsky's opera on this subject, text written by himself, is entitled 'The Maid of Orleans.' It was written in 1879 and produced St. Petersburg, 1881. Another opera on the same subject composed by Raymond Roze was produced at Covent Garden, Nov. 1, 1913.

JOB, an oratorio; composed by C. H. H. Parry, produced at the Gloucester Musical Festival of 1892.

JOBIN, BERNHARD, a 16th-century lutenist, and printer in 1572-73 of his own two very interesting lute books, at Strassburg (Q.-L.).

JOCONDE, ou LES COUREURS D'AVENTURE, opéra-comique in 3 acts; libretto by Étienne; music by Isouard. Produced Théâtre Feydeau, Feb. 28, 1814; in English, by the Carl Rosa Co. (Santley's translation), Lyceum, Oct. 25, 1876. G.

JÖDEL, see TYROLIENNE.

JOHANNES DE LYNBURGIA (LYBURGIA, LIMBURGIA—of Limburg), an early 15th-century composer, living at Padua¹; composed numerous sacred songs and rondeaux in collective codices (see Q.-L.).

JOHANNES GALLICUS (or DE MANTUA; also CARTHUSIENSIS) (b. Namur, c. 1415; d. Parma, 1473), pupil of Victor Feltri and master of Nic. Burtius, lived at Mantua. He wrote two treatises on singing in Coussemaker.

JOHANNES THE GREAT, called Primarius, a famous composer of the mid-12th century, is mentioned by Coussemaker. Anonymus iv., Bury St. Edmunds, of the late 13th century (Coussemaker, Script. i. 342), is probably identical with Johannes Primarius, the successor of Petrus de Cruce as maître de chapelle at Notre Dame, Paris, and with Johannes de Garlandia.

JOHANNES SARISBURIENSIS (SALESBURIENSIS) (b. Salisbury, 1120; d. 1180), studied at Paris and was Bishop of Chartres in 1179. He returned to England and wrote a treatise 'De musica et instrumentis . . .' contained in his works printed 1513, Book i. chap. 6 (Q.-L.).

JOHN IV. (João) (b. Villa-Viçosa, Mar. 19, 1604; d. Lisbon, Nov. 6, 1656), King of Portugal 1640. His father, 7th Duke of Bragança, sent to Italy for a tutor, and the appointment fell to one Ruberto Torgb or Robert Tornar, said to have been an Englishman. The boy was well grounded in music, and afterwards pursued his studies with João Soares REBELLO (q.v.) (b. 1610), who in 1624 became a choir-boy in the ducal chapel. He succeeded to the dukedom in 1630, and either by inclination or by 'political calculation' to allay the suspicions of Spain (to which the kingdom of Portugal was then united), he began to interest himself in his choir. He ordered quantities of church music—there are records of payments made in Madrid—and his own collection, added to the ducal library founded by his grandfather, soon grew into the famous library, which was unhappily lost in the Lisbon earthquake of 1755. The first librarian was João Alvares Frovo (q.v.). The catalogue was printed in Lisbon by P. Craesbeeck (1649); copies exist in the Torre do Tombo, Lisbon, and in the Bibl. Nat., Paris. It was reprinted by Vasconcellos. Besides church music, the library contained sets of madrigals by Lassus, Marenzio, Monteverdi, Morley and Willaert, and the 'Amfiparnasso' of Orazio Vecchi; early operas such as the 'Orfeo' of Monteverdi, Peri's 'Euridice' and Cavalieri's 'Rappresentazione dell' anima e del corpo.' It was generously endowed, and the King included in his will certain regulations for its upkeep, with the penalty of excommunication for any one who removed the books or dirtied the pages.

John IV. once or twice entered into musical controversy. A Defensa de la musica moderna (in Spanish) was published in Lisbon (1649) and translated into Italian (Venice, 1666), while Respuestas a las dudas que se pusieron a la misa: Panis quem ego dabo, Palestrina (Lisbon, 1654) is a defence of Palestrina.

A motet 'Crux fidelis' (Dresden MS.) has been reprinted in a modernised form and frequently sung. The King also composed a Magnificat (4 v.), Dixit Dominus (8 v.) and Laudate Dominum (8 v.), while his 'Adjuva nos, Deus' (MS. Lisbon Cathedral) is said still to be sung on Tuesdays and Fridays in Lent. The Passions according to St. Matthew and St. John, sung in Lisbon churches on Palm Sunday and Good Friday, are traditionally attributed to John IV.

'JOHN BROWN'S BODY,' one of the most popular of marching tunes, and possessing qualities in this respect of a high order. Its birth is American, and during the Civil War it was much in evidence. Its melody and its 'authentic' set of words are as follows:

John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave.
(Three times.)

But his soul goes marching on.

Chorus: Glory, Glory, Hallelujah! (Three times)
His soul goes marching on.

He's gone to be a soldier in the army of the Lord,
His soul goes marching on.

John Brown's knapsack is number ninety-three,
As he goes marching along.

His pet lambs will meet him on the way,
And they'll go marching along.

We'll hang Jeff Davis on a sour apple-tree,
As we go marching along.

The tune, fitted to a hymn—

Say, brothers, will you meet us
On Canaan's happy shore?

made its appearance in the 'fifties in the camp meetings of the Southern States, and from thence travelled northwards; it is stated that the tune is the composition of one William Steffe. Its introduction into the Northern army was, according to Elson in his History of American Music, by reason of the singing of the hymn by a couple of homesick recruits while stationed at Fort Warren near Boston in 1861. The regiment adopted the melody as its own, and the words which required merely a simple statement without a corresponding rhyme, grew as 'chaff' round a good-natured Scotchman named John Brown. The tune quickly became popular all throughout the Northern States, and was associated with the marches of its army. The 'John Brown' gradually grew to be recognised as the hero of Harper's Ferry, and a political meaning grew round the doggerel united to the tune. Many attempts have been made to wed respectable and consistent words to the air in place of those which have carried it along on the march and round the camp fire.¹

JOHN OF DAMASCUS, SAINT (JOH. CHRYSORRHOAS OF DAMASCUS) (b. circa 700; d. Monastery of S. Sabas, near Jerusalem, 754), first organiser and regulator of liturgical song, credited with the reform of musical notation. His hymns, which were held in high esteem, have been preserved in notations as far back as the year 1000 (Riemann).

JOHN OF FORNSETTE (b. Fornsett, Norfolk, Jan. 19, 1239), was monk of Reading Abbey, where he died on St. Wulstan's day. He is believed to be the composer of 'SUMER IS ICIUMEN IN' (q.v.).

JOHNSON, BARTHOLOMEW (b. Oct. 3, 1710), bassoon-player and violoncellist, appeared in London as soloist c. 1770. His hundredth birthday was celebrated at Freemasons' Hall, Scarborough, in 1810, when he played a minuet of his own composition. A reproduction of an engraving, from an original portrait in oils, is given in E. van der Straeten's History of the Violoncello. E. v. d. s.

JOHNSON, EDWARD, is mentioned in Meres's Palladis Tamia (1598) as one of the leading English composers. It is not known if he was related to the other musicians of this name. There is reason to think that he was employed to provide some of the music for the festivities on the occasion of the Queen's visit to Lord Hertford at Elvetham (Sept. 1591), as there exist five-part settings by him of two of the songs performed at the fourth day's Entertainment; these are 'Elisa is the fayrest Queen,' for treble voice and instruments; and 'Com agayne,' for two treble voices and instruments (B.M. Add. MSS. 30,480-4). If this is the original music composed for the occasion, we are told that 'this spectacle and musicke so delighted her Majesty, that she desired to see and hear it twice over.' (See Nichols's Progresses of Q. Elizabeth, where the Description of the Entertainment is reprinted.) In 1592 he contributed three settings of tunes to East's Whole Booke of Psalmes, which shows that by that date he had made some reputation as a musician 'expert in the Arte'; his work, however, does not appear till the end of the Book, and it may be supposed that he was not included in East's original scheme. (See PSALTER, where his work is criticised.) In 1594 Johnson took his degree of Bachelor of Music at Cambridge from Gonville and Caius College. In his 'Supplicat' he speaks of his many years' study and practice in the Science of Music, and asks to be examined by Dr. Bull and Dr. Dallis. A six-part madrigal by him, 'Come, blessed byrd,' appeared in the Triumphs of Oriana, 1601. An unprinted madrigal in two parts, 'Ah, silly John,' and 'That I love her,' for three voices, is in the R.C.M. Of his instrumental music, a paduan was printed in T. Simpson's 'Taffel Consort,' Hamburg, 1621; and three virginal pieces with his name are in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book' (a medley, and a pavan and galliard set by Byrd). G. E. F. A.

JOHNSON, HENRY PHILIP (HENRIK FILIP JOHNSON) (b. England, 1717; d. Stockholm, Feb. 12, 1779), was chamber organist of Adolf Frederic of Holstein-Gottorp when the latter went to Stockholm as Crown Prince of Sweden in 1743. In 1745 Johnson became organist of St. Clara, and afterwards court Kapellmeister. He was an excellent teacher of composition. Two operas of his were performed at Stockholm in 1774 and 1775; he also composed symphonies, organ and pianoforte pieces, and songs, etc. (Riemann; Q.-L.).

JOHNSON, JAMES (b. circa 1750; d. Feb. 26, 1811), a famous Edinburgh music-engraver, who, for nearly forty years, held the bulk of the Scottish trade, engraving from 1772 to about 1790 practically every piece of music issued in Scotland. The son of Charles Johnson, he was probably apprenticed to James Read, an early Edinburgh music-engraver. Johnson's first known work is dated 1772; it is 'Six Canzones for two voices. . . dedicated to the Scots Ladies by Domenico Corri, Edinburgh, 1772, James Johnson, Edinburgh,' oblong 4to.¹ In this year or the following he engraved M'Lean's 'Scots Tunes,' and in 1773 Daniel Dow's 'Twenty Minuets.' These and others are all clearly cut in copper, but all his later work is stamped on pewter, a practice which the writer of his obituary notice in the Scots Magazine, 1811, foolishly credits him with being 'the first to attempt.'

In 1787 he published the first volume of The Scots Musical Museum, a notable work which Robert Burns the poet, who largely contributed to its contents, said would remain the text-book of Scottish Song. The Museum contains 600 airs, and is comprised in six volumes issued as follows: 1st, 1787; 2nd, 1788; 3rd, 1790; 4th, 1792; 5th, 1797; 6th, 1803. To this work in a later reissue Wm. Stenhouse contributed historical notes to the songs and airs which have been bones of contention to musical antiquaries for the past half-century. Johnson (previously living in Bell's Wynd) in 1788 opened a music shop in the Lawnmarket, where he remained until his death. Shortly before it occurred he had taken his apprentice John Anderson into partnership, who also continued a year or two with Johnson's widow.

As before stated, Johnson engraved so much of the Scottish music of his time that a bibliography of his work would form almost a complete list of Scottish musical publications during this period. About 1790 George Walker came forward and supplied some portion of a rapidly increasing demand. He was, it is believed, another of Johnson's apprentices, and Anderson went into partnership with him in 1816. F. K.

JOHNSON, (1) JOHN (d. 1594/95), one of Queen Elizabeth's Musicians for the Lute, is named among the Musicians from as early as 1581 until his death.¹ His widow, Alice, was granted a lease in reversion for fifty years of Cranbourne Manor, Dorset, and other lands, in consideration of her husband's services (Jan. 25, 1594/95). Compositions for the lute by him are in the Cambridge University Library (Dd. iii. 18). He may perhaps be identified with a musician named Johnson who was in the service of Sir Thomas Kitson at Hengrave Hall, Suffolk, in 1572, and in London in 1574, in which year he went to take part in the entertainments given by Leicester at Kenilworth (Gage, History of Hengrave, 1822). Rimbault hastily assumed him to be the same as 'Robert the musician' also mentioned in the Hengrave accounts; but Sir T. Kitson kept several musicians in his service. Certainly this Johnson cannot be either of the Robert Johnsons of whom we know anything.

(2) ROBERT (d. before Apr. 30, 1634), son of John the lutenist, was apprenticed to Sir George Carey, husband of Sir Thomas Kitson's granddaughter, in 1596 for seven years as 'allowes or covenannt servaunt.' Sir George undertaking to have him taught and instructed in the art of music, and providing board, lodging and necessities.² It is not known if this Robert Johnson was related to the earlier writer of the name; Dr. Rogers told Anthony Wood in 1695 that he thought he was a Scotchman, but he undoubtedly confused the two.³

Johnson was appointed one of the King's Musicians for the Lute at Midsummer, 1604, with a salary of 20d. a day and £16 : 2 : 6 for his livery, and his name recurs yearly in the Audit Office Declared Accounts until 1633. It appears from the list printed by Hawkins that he was one of Prince Henry's Musicians in 1611, with a salary of £40. In 1620 he is named as one of the musicians who were to provide music for the proposed Amphitheatre in London, which shows that he was then highly esteemed. He retained his appointment as Musician on the accession of Charles I., his salary being given as £40 a year, with £20 for strings; and his name occurs in various documents in which the Musicians are specified. In 1628, on the death of Thomas Lupo, he applied for his place of composer to the Lutes and Voices. He died before Apr. 30, 1634, when his successor, Lewis Evans, received his appointment.

Johnson contributed two compositions to Leighton's 'Teares or Lamentacions,' 1614; a consort song, 'Yeelde unto God,' and a five-part 'Save me, O Lord'; and in his lifetime instrumental pieces by him were printed in Brade's 'Neuwe ausserlesene Branden,' etc., Lübeck, 1617, and in Simpson's 'Taffel Consort,' Hamburg, 1621 (Q.-L.). His reputation lasted for many years after his death. Hilton printed catches by him in 'Catch that Catch can,' 1652. Walter Porter in 1657 quotes him as a famous musician. A song, 'As I walked forth,' was printed in Playford's Ayres and Dialogues (1652 and 1659) and in the Treasury of Musick (1669), which later appeared in D'Urfey's Wit and Mirth, and has found its way into several modern collections. At the present day, however, it is to his association with the plays of the great dramatists that he owes his chief interest. His settings of 'Full fathom five' and 'Where the bee sucks' from 'The Tempest' (printed in a three-part arrangement in Wilson's 'Chearful Ayres,' 1660) are generally held to have been written for the production of the play. Rimbault⁴ also speaks of having 'recovered' some of Johnson's instrumental music for 'The Tempest,' but does not say where it was to be found. Johnson also set 'Care-charming sleep' from Beaumont and Fletcher's Valentinian; and 'Tis late and cold' from the same authors' Mad Lover, which are to be found with other songs by Johnson in B.M. Add. MSS. 11,608. Rimbault printed as Johnson's the music to some of Middleton's 'Witch' from the original MS. in the possession of the Editor, in his 'Ancient Vocal Music of England.' He also is the authority for saying that Johnson's music to Ben Jonson's Masque of Gypsies is in the Oxford Music School Collection, but no trace of it is now to be found in the catalogue.

Music by Johnson for virginals, lute and viols exists in MS. in the Fitzwilliam and University Libraries, Cambridge; the Oxford Music School and Ch. Ch.; R.C.M. and B.M.

JOHNSON, JOHN (d. circa 1762), a London music-publisher of the middle of the 18th century. He was established at premises in Cheapside 'facing Bow Church,' at the sign of the Harp and Crown, before 1740.

He probably succeeded to the business previously carried on by Daniel WRIGHT (q.v.) of St. Paul's Churchyard; he certainly reissued some of Wright's publications, including his two volumes of country dances. Johnson's issues comprised the best music of the day in songs and instrumental pieces by such composers as Geminiani, Felton, Garth, Nares, Gunn, Arne, Worgan, etc. His yearly sets and collected volumes of country dances are especially interesting to the musical antiquary of to-day. In many instances Johnson broke through the absurd unwritten law that printed music should remain undated, for we find a great number of his publications bear an engraved date of the year of issue. The engraving of his music and the quality of the paper were always remarkably good. Johnson appears to have died about 1762, for after that year to about 1771/72 most of the imprints are in the name of 'Mrs. Johnston' or 'R. Johnson,' presumably his widow, with the address as '110 Cheapside.' The signature, 'The Harp and Crown,' is absent from these imprints, and for a time was at this period adopted by Longman, who was just then beginning business in another part of Cheapside, nearer St. Paul's. F. K.

JOHNSON, ROBERT (b. Duns), often described as 'Priest' in old MSS., flourished in the middle of the 16th century. He was a Scottish priest, born in Duns, who fled to England 'lang before the Reformation . . . for accusation of heresy'; this is the account given of him by Thomas Wodde, Vicar of St. Andrews, whose MS. partbooks (now in the libraries of Edinburgh University; Trinity College, Dublin; and B.M. Add. MSS. 33,933) contain his 'Domine in virtute.' It is asserted by most historians that he was chaplain to Anne Boleyn (1533-36), but there seems to be no evidence for the statement, though it is to be found in Stafford Smith's writing on more than one old MS. coming from his collection. In the Roy. Lib. B.M. is a MS. in which Robert Johnson, 'Priest,' is also described as 'of Windsor'; as Baldwin, the writer of this MS., was a Windsor man, it is very likely that Johnson may have settled there.

Johnson, who was the most considerable composer born in Scotland until comparatively recent times, was chiefly a writer of sacred music. Of his music for the English Service, three so-called Prayers are to be found in Day's Certaine Notes, 1560, and Mornyng and Euenyng prayer, 1565; these, which may have been printed in Johnson's lifetime, are 'Relieve us, O Lord, that are weake and feble'; 'O eternal God'; and 'I geve you a new commaundment': the words of the two latter are in Clifford's Divine Services, 1663; a Service in the Ely Cathedral Library is attributed to him in Dickson's Catalogue; 'O Lord, with all my heart,' is in the B.M. Add. MSS. 4900.

Of his settings of Latin words, his 'Domine in virtute' (referred to above) is most frequently met with (Bodl. and Ch. Ch.; B.M.; St. Michael's, Tenbury).

The following seem also to have been written for the Latin Service, though not all have words, and some are only found in a lute arrangement:

- * Ave Del Patria, a 5, Bodl. MS. Mus. c. 1-5, etc.
- * Ave Domini filia, R.C.M.: St. Michael's, Tenbury.
- * Ave plena gratia, B.M. Add. MSS. 29,240.
- * Benedicam Domino, B.M. Add. MSS. 4900.
- * Deus miseratur, B.M. Add. MSS. 30,480-4.
- * Dicant nunc Judei, two settings a 2, Roy. Lib. B.M.
- * Dum transeat Sabbatum, a 4, B.M. Add. MSS. 17,802-5.
- * Gaude Maria, a 4, ibid.
- * Laudes Deo, a 2, Roy. Lib. B.M.
- * Sabbatum Maria (printed by Burney), Ch. Ch.

Among his secular works, besides a number of 'In nomines' and pieces without words, are: 'Defyled is my name,' printed by Hawkins as a 'Complaint of Anne Boleyn,' though the MSS. from which he printed it do not call it so (B.M. Add. MSS. 30,513 and B.M. Add. MSS. 30,480-4), 'Come, pale-faced Death,' in the last-named MS., and 'Ty the mare tomboy' (Harl. MS. 7578, a collection of old songs said to have been used 'in and about the Bishopric of Durham'). G. E. F. A.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, a playwright and a composer with the reputation of having been half crazy. He was a native of Cheshire, and originally a dancing-master. He is only worthy of remembrance as the composer and author of an extraordinary musical play named 'Hurlo-thumbo or the Supernatural,' acted at the Haymarket in 1729. In this piece he himself took the principal character, Lord Flame. The play had an immense success, mainly due to its singularity, and probably also to the influence of Sir Robert Walpole, who greatly patronised it. The songs and music were published in folio for the author by Daniel Wright the elder, in or near the year of its production. Johnson wrote other plays, and no doubt produced more music now forgotten. F. K.

JOHNSTON, JOHN, a London music-publisher of the latter part of the 18th century. His first address (about 1768) was 'Corner of York Street, Covent Garden.' Some time shortly after 1770 he removed to the Strand, where his address or addresses are variously given as: 'Opposite Lancaster Court, Charing Cross,' 'Near Northumberland House,' 'Near Exeter Change.' About 1776 he again removed, to 97 Drury Lane, and soon after ceased business, his plates and stock being acquired by Longman & Lukey, who had already published in conjunction with him. His publications include the early works of Charles Dibdin: 'The Padlock,' 1768; the Stratford Jubilee Musical Works, 1769; 'The Waterman,' 1774; 'The Quaker,' 1776; and other pieces by Dibdin, 'Lionel and Clarissa,' 'The Deserter' and Dr. Arne's adaptation of 'King Arthur,' 1773. Sonatas, country dances and general sheet music also bear his imprints F. K.

JOLIE FILLE DE PERTH, LA, opera in 4 acts, text by Saint-Georges and Adenis, music by Bizet; produced Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, Dec. 26, 1867; in English (Beecham), Manchester, May 4, 1917.

JOMMELLI, Niccolò (b. Aversa, near Naples, Sept. 10, 1714; d. Naples, Aug. 25, 1774), is conspicuous in the long list of composers who during the first half of the 18th century were the outcome and ornament of that Neapolitan school which had become famous under Alessandro Scarlatti.

Jommelli's first musical teaching was given him by a canon named Mozzillo. At 16 he entered the Conservatorio de' Poveri di Gesù Cristo as the pupil of Feo, but was transferred to that of La Pietà de' Turchini, where he learned vocal music from Prato and Mancini and composition from Leo. It was the boast of these schools that young musicians on leaving them were adepts in all the processes of counterpoint and every kind of scholastic exercise, but it seems that a special training at Rome was judged necessary to fit Jommelli for writing church music, the chief object he is said at that time to have had in view. However this may have been, his first works were ballets, in which no indication of genius was discernible. He next tried his hand on cantatas, a style of composition far better suited to his especial gifts, and with so much success that Leo, on hearing one of these pieces performed by a lady, a pupil of Jommelli's, exclaimed in rapture, 'A short time, madam, and this young man will be the wonder and the admiration of Europe!' The young composer himself had less faith in his own powers. According to the notice of his life by Piccini, he so much dreaded the verdict of the public that his first opera, 'L' errore amoroso,' was represented (at Naples, in 1737) under the name of an obscure musician called Valentino; the work, however, met with so encouraging a reception that he ventured to give the next, 'Odoardo,' under his own name.

In 1740 he was summoned to Rome, where he was protected by the Cardinal Duke of York, and where his two operas 'Il Ricimero' and 'L' Astianatte' were produced, the latter in 1741. Thence he proceeded to Bologna, where he wrote 'Ezio,' 1741, afterwards recast and produced at Naples in 1748. During his sojourn there he visited the Padre Martini, presenting himself as a pupil desirous of instruction. To test his acquirements, a fugue subject was presented to him, and on his proceeding to treat it with the greatest facility, 'Who are you, then?' asked the Padre; 'are you making game of me? It is I, methinks, who should learn of you.' 'My name is Jommelli,' returned the composer, 'and I am the maestro who is to write the next opera for the theatre of this town.' In later years Jommelli was wont to affirm that he had profited not a little by his subsequent intercourse with Martini.

After superintending the production of some important works at Bologna, Rome and elsewhere, Jommelli returned to Naples, where his opera 'Eumene' was given at the San Carlo in 1747 with immense success. A like triumph awaited him at Venice, where he aroused such enthusiasm that the Council of Ten appointed him director of the Scuola degl' Incurabili, a circumstance which led to his beginning at last to write that sacred music which had been the object of his early ambition and was to become one chief source of his fame. Among his compositions of the kind at this time was a 'Laudate' for double choir of eight voices, which, though once celebrated, appears never to have been printed. In 1748 we find him at Vienna, where he wrote successively 'Achille in Sciro' and 'Didone.' Here he formed with the poet Metastasio an intimate acquaintance. In 1749 he went to Venice to superintend the production of 'Ciro' and 'Merope,' and returned soon afterwards to Vienna for the production of 'Didone.'

In 1749 he went again to Rome, where he produced 'Artaserse.' He found an influential admirer and patron in Cardinal Albani, thanks to whose good offices he was, in 1750, appointed coadjutor of Bencini, maestro di cappella of St. Peter's. He quitted this post in Nov. 1753 to become Kapellmeister to the Duke of Würtemberg at Stuttgart, where he remained for more than fifteen years. Here he produced a number of operas, most important among them 'Fetonte' (republished in D.D.T.), an oratorio of the Passion, and a Requiem for the Duchess of Würtemberg. In these works German influence becomes apparent in a distinct modification of his style. The harmony is more fully developed, the use of modulation freer and more frequent, while the orchestral part assumes a greater importance and the instrumentation is weightier and more varied than in his former works. It added to the estimation in which he was held among the Germans, but was not equally acceptable to Italians when he returned to pass his remaining years among his own countrymen. The Neapolitans had forgotten their former favourite, nor did the specimens of his later style reconquer their suffrages. 'The opera here is by Jommelli,' wrote Mozart from Naples in 1770. 'It is beautiful, but the style is too elevated, as well as too antique, for the theatre.' 'Armida,' written for the San Carlo Theatre in 1770, and one of Jommelli's best operas, was condemned as heavy, ineffective and deficient in melody. 'Il Demofonte' (1770) and 'L' Ifigenia in Aulide' (originally produced in Rome, 1751) were ill executed and were failures.

The composer had retired with his family to Aversa, where he lived in an opulent semi-retirement, seldom quitting his home except to go in spring to l'Infrascata di Napoli, or in autumn to Pietra bianca, pleasant country resorts near Naples. He received at this time a commission from the King of Portugal to compose two operas and a cantata. But his old susceptibility to public opinion asserted itself now, and the failure of his later works so plunged him in melancholy as to bring on an attack of apoplexy. On his recovery he wrote a cantata to celebrate the birth of an heir to the crown of Naples, and, shortly after, the Miserere for two voices (to the Italian version by Mattei), which is, perhaps, his most famous work. It was hardly concluded when he died.

Jommelli was of amiable disposition, and had the polished manners of a man of the world. Good-looking in his youth, he became corpulent in middle age. Burney, who saw him at Naples in 1770, says (Present State, France and Italy, p. 316) he was not unlike Handel, a likeness which cannot be traced in any portraits of him that are extant. The catalogue of his works contains compositions of all kinds, comprising nearly fifty operas, two oratorios ('Betulia liberata,' 1743, and 'L' Isacco,' 1755), and a Passion music, 1749, besides masses, cantatas and a great quantity of church music. His Miserere for five voices, in G minor (included in Rochlitz's collection), contains great beauties, the long diminuendo at the close, especially, being a charming effect. But the work is unequal, and a scholarship, though elegant and ingenious, occasionally makes itself too much felt. The opening Kyrie of Jommelli's Requiem in E \flat (written at Stuttgart in 1756) was printed as Haydn's in some editions of the latter's Mass in the same key.

His ideas have, for the most part, a tinge of mild gravity, and it is not surprising that he failed in ballets and other works of a light nature. Yet he has left an opera buffa, 'Don Trastullo,' which shows that he was not devoid of a certain sedate humour. This opera is remarkable (as are others of his) for the free employment of accompanied recitative. Jommelli was one of the earliest composers who perceived the great dramatic capabilities of this mode of expression. He saw the absurdity, too, of the conventional Da capo in airs consisting of two strains or movements, by which the sympathy of the hearer, worked up to a pitch during the second (usually allegro) movement, is speedily cooled by the necessity for returning to the andante and going all through it again. He would not comply with this custom except where it happened to suit his purpose, but aimed at sustaining and heightening the interest from the outset of a piece till its close—anticipating by this innovation one of Gluck's reforms.

His invention seems to have required the stimulus of words, for his purely instrumental compositions, such as overtures, are singularly dry and unsuggestive. Yet he had a more keen appreciation of the orchestra than any contemporary Italian writer, as is evinced in his scores by varied combinations of instruments, by obligato accompaniments to several airs, and by occasional attempts at such tone-painting as the part written for horns con sordini in the air 'Teneri affetti miei' in 'Attilio Regolo.' In his Stuttgart compositions the orchestra becomes still more prominent, and is dialogued with the vocal parts in a beautiful manner. The Requiem contains much pathetic and exquisite music; but intensity is wanting where words of sublime or terrible import have to be conveyed. In this work and the 'Passion' is to be found a great deal that is closely allied to composition of a similar kind by Mozart. A comparison between the two is most interesting, showing, as it does, how much of Mozart's musical phraseology was, so to speak, current coin at the time when he lived. The Miserere, which was Jommelli's last production, seems in some respects a concession to Italian taste, which possibly accounts for the comparatively great degree of subsequent popularity it enjoyed. It possesses, indeed, much of the sympathetic charm that attaches to his other works, but the vocal parts are so florid as to be sometimes unsuitable to the character of the words.

He cannot, however, be said to have courted popularity by writing for the vulgar taste. Among contemporary composers of his own school and country, he is pre-eminent for purity and nobility of thought, and for simple, pathetic expression. In 1785 a project was started at Stuttgart for publishing a complete edition of his operas, but 'L'Olimpiade' was the only one published.

The following works of Jommelli have been republished in modern times:

'Fetonte,' opera, score (D.D.T. xxii. and xxxiii).
'Balmo (Miserere). Settings for two and four voices, with orchestra (Breitkopf & Härtel).
'Victime paschall. Five voices, score (Schott).
'Lux eterna. Four voices (Berlin, Schlesinger).
'Rosanna filio. Mulieres bonae, and in Monte Oliveto. Four voices (Berlin, Schlesinger).
'Requiem, for S.A.T.B. Accompaniment arranged for P.F. by Clasing ('Frantz).
Many other pieces of his are, however, included, wholly or in part, in miscellaneous collections, such as Latrobe's 'Sacred Music,' the 'Fitzwilliam Music,' Choron's 'Journal de chant,' Rochlitz's 'Collection de morceaux de chant,' Gevaert's 'Les Gloires de l'Italie,' and Porro's 'Musique sacrée,' etc.

JONAS, ÉMILE (b. Mar. 5, 1827; d. Saint-Germain, May 22, 1905), one of the younger rivals of Offenbach in opera-bouffe, born of Jewish parents. He entered the Conservatoire, Oct. 28, 1841, took second prize for harmony, 1846, and first ditto, 1847, and obtained the second Grand Prix de Rome for his 'Antonio' in 1849. His début at the theatre was in Oct. 1855 with 'Le Duel de Benjamin' in one act. This was followed by 'La Parado' (Aug. 2, 1856); 'Le Roi boit' (Apr. 1857); 'Les Petits Prodiges' (Nov. 19, 1857); 'Job et son chien' (Feb. 6, 1863); 'Le Manoir des La Renardières' (Sept. 29, 1864); and 'Avant la noce' (Mar. 24, 1865)—all at the Bouffes Parisiens. Then, at other theatres, came 'Les Deux Arlequins' (Dec. 29, 1865); 'Le Canard à trois becs' (Feb. 6, 1869); 'Désiré, sire de Champigny' (1869). Many of his pieces were given in London, such as 'Terrible Hymen' at Covent Garden, Dec. 26, 1866; 'The Two Harlequins' (adapted by A'Beckett) at the Gaiety, Dec. 21, 1868; and 'Le Canard,' also at the Gaiety, July 28, 1871. This led to his composing an operetta in three acts to an English libretto by A. Thompson, called 'Cinderella the younger,' produced at the Gaiety, Sept. 25, 1871, and reproduced in Paris as 'Javotte' at the Athénée, Dec. 22 following. 'Le Chignon d'or' was brought out in Brussels in 1874, 'La Bonne Aventure' in 1882 and 'Le Premier Baiser' in 1883.

Jonas was professor of Solfège at the Conservatoire from 1847-56. He was director of the music at the Portuguese synagogue, in connexion with which he published in 1854 a collection of Hebrew tunes. He was also bandmaster of one of the legions of the Garde Nationale, and after the Exhibition of 1867 he organised the competitions of military bands at the Palais de l'Industrie, whereby he obtained many foreign decorations. G.

JONCIÈRES, VICTORIN DE, the adopted name of FÉLIX LUDGER ROSSIGNOL (b. Paris, Apr. 12, 1839; d. Oct. 26, 1903). The name by which he is known was adopted by his father, a journalist and advocate of the Cour d'Appel, who, under the Empire, was one of the principal contributors to the Patrie and the Constitutionnel.

Victorin began by studying painting; but by way of amusement he composed a little opéra-comique adapted by a friend from Molière's 'Sicilien,' which was performed by students of the Conservatoire at the Salle Lyrique in 1859. A critic who was present advised the composer to give up painting for music, and accordingly Joncières began to study harmony with Elwart. He entered Leborne's counterpoint class at the Conservatoire, but left it suddenly on account of a disagreement with his master concerning Wagner, who had just given his first concert in Paris. From this time he studied independently of the Conservatoire. At the Concerts Musard he produced an overture, a march, and various orchestral compositions; he also wrote music to 'Hamlet,' produced by Dumas and Paul Meurice. A performance of this work was given as a concert at his own expense in May 1863, and a representation was given at Nantes on Sept. 21, 1867, under his direction, with Mme. Judith of the Comédie Française in the principal part. The play was produced in Paris at the Gaîté later in the following year, but for a performance of 'Hamlet' at the Français, Joncières's music was rejected by Perrin.

On Feb. 8, 1867, Joncières made his real début as a dramatic composer at the Théâtre Lyrique, with an opera, 'Sardanapale,' which was only partially successful in spite of Christine Nilsson. The same theatre, then under the management of Pasdeloup, produced a second opera, 'Le Dernier Jour de Pompéi' (Sept. 21, 1869), which was harshly received by the public. Shortly afterwards a violin concerto was played by his friend Danbé at the Concerts du Conservatoire (Dec. 12, 1869). The Théâtre Lyrique having come to an end after the war, Joncières's dramatic career ceased for a long time, as he would not write for the Opéra-

Comique, and could not gain admittance to the Opéra. He wrote a 'Symphonie romantique' (Concert National, Mar. 9, 1873), and various other pieces were produced at the concerts conducted by Danbé at the Grand Hotel. At length, on May 5, 1876, he succeeded in producing his opera 'Dimitri,' for the opening of the new Théâtre Lyrique at the Gaîté, under the direction of Vizentini; and the work, although it did not attract the public, was such a remarkable advance upon his earlier productions that hopes were formed which were not realised either by his 'Reine Berthe' (Dec. 27, 1878), given four times at the Opéra, nor by his 'Chevalier Jean' (Opéra-Comique, Mar. 11, 1885), which succeeded in Germany, though it had failed in Paris; nor his 'Lancelot,' a lyric drama in 4 acts (Opéra, Feb. 7, 1900), performed a few times only. Besides these dramatic works Joncières had written numerous compositions for the concert-room:

'Sérénade hongroise,' 'La Mer,' a symphonic ode for mezzo-soprano, chorus and orchestra, 'Les Nubiennes,' orchestral suite, a Slavonic march, a Chinese chorus, etc.

His works, of which 'Dimitri' is by far the best, have the merit of being carefully orchestrated, and his vocal writing is marked by a just sense of the laws of prosody. As a critic—for from 1871 he was musical critic to 'La Liberté,' and contributed to it theatrical notices, etc., under the pseudonym of 'Jennius'—his opinions, like his music, were considered to be wanting in balance and unity. In Feb. 1877 Joncières received the cross of the Légion d'honneur.

JONCKERS (JUNCKERS), GOESSEN, an early 16th-century composer of motets and sacred songs in collective volumes of 1538-55. It is uncertain whether 'Meistre Gosse' and 'Gosse Jonckers' are one and the same person (Q.-L.).

JONES, EDWARD (b. Ilanderfel, Merionethshire, Easter Day, Apr. 2, 1752; d. Easter Day, Apr. 18, 1824). He was born at a farm-house called 'Henblas,' i.e. Old mansion. His father taught him and another son to play on the Welsh harp, and other sons on bowed instruments, so that the family formed a complete string band. Edward soon attained to great proficiency on his instrument. In the spring of 1775 he came to London, and in May of the same year he played at a private concert at Dr Burney's; in 1783 he was appointed bard to the Prince of Wales. In 1784 he published a work of learning and research. Another edition appeared in 1794, and in 1802 a second volume of the work was issued under the title of The Bardic Museum. Jones had prepared a third volume, a portion only of which was published at his death, the remainder being issued subsequently. The three volumes together contain 225 Welsh airs. Besides this, he compiled and edited :

'Musical and Poetical Relicks of the Welsh Bards, with a General History of the Bards and Druids, and a Dissertation on the Musical Instruments of the Aboriginal Britons.'

'Lyric Airs; consisting of Specimens of Greek, Albanian, Walachian, Turkish, Arabian, Persian, Chinese and Moorish National Song; with . . . a few Explanatory Notes on the Figures and Movements of the Modern Greek Dances, and a short Dissertation on the Origin of the Ancient Greek Music,' 1804; 'The Minstrel's Serenades'; Terpsichore's Banquet, a Selection of Spanish, Maltese, Russian, Armenian, Hindostani, English, German, French and Swiss Airs'; 'The Musical Miscellany, chiefly selected from eminent composers'; 'Musical Remains of Handel, Bach, Abel, etc.'; 'Choice Collection of Italian Songs'; 'The Musical Portfolio; consisting of English, Scotch, Irish and other favourite Airs'; 'Popular Cheshire Melodies'; 'Musical Trifles calculated for Beginners on the Harp'; and 'The Musical Bouquet, or Popular Songs and Ballads'.

Besides his professional pursuits Jones filled a situation in the Office of Robes at St. James's Palace. He collected an extensive library of scarce and curious books, part of which, to the value of about £300, he sold in the latter part of his life, and the remainder was dispersed by auction after his death, realising about £800.

JONES, EDWARD, an early music typographer who for a time, after the death of John Playford, junior, printed the Playford publications. These include 'Harmonia sacra,' 1688-1693; 'Apollo's Banquet,' 1690-93; the eighth edition of the 'Dancing Master,' 1690, etc. His printing office was in the Savoy, and he is perhaps the Edward Jones referred to by Thomas Mace in Musick's Monument, 1676, as possessing a valuable lute.

JONES, EVELYN HOWARD (b. London, 1877), a pianist who in England and on the Continent has played with constant success, was educated as a scholar of the R.C.M., and afterwards studied under D'Albert in Germany. Though a musician of wide sympathies and possessing a very large repertory, his playing of Brahms gained him the reputation of a specialist. He is a very successful teacher in London, and was instrumental in founding the Federation of Music Clubs, which is becoming an important agency for the spread of chamber music in this country.

JONES, JOHN (b. 1728; d. Feb. 17, 1796), became organist of the Middle Temple, Nov. 24, 1749; of the Charterhouse (following Dr. Pepusch), July 2, 1753; and of St. Paul's Cathedral, Dec. 25, 1755. He died in possession of these three seats, and was buried in the Charterhouse. He published several sets of harpsichord lessons, and 'Sixty Chants Single and Double' (1785), some of which illustrate the florid taste of that time. One of these was sung at George III.'s state visit to St. Paul's, Apr. 23, 1789, and at many of the annual meetings of the Charity Children. At the latter, in the year 1791, Haydn heard it, and noted it in his diary as follows (with a material improvement in the taste of the fourth line) :

'No music has for a long time affected me so much as this innocent and reverential strain.'

G.

JONES, RICHARD, a fine violinist and composer for the instrument. He succeeded Stefano Carbonelli as leader of the band at Drury Lane Theatre about 1730, and was in turn succeeded at that post by Richard Charke and Michael Christian Festing, who was one of his distinguished pupils. Jones wrote a book of 'Chamber Airs' and one of 'Suites.' The title of one of his works runs :

'Chamber Airs for a Violin (and Through Bass) consisting Both of Double and Single stops Being a work very improving for that Instrument, Composed by Mr. Richard Jones opera (or work) the second London printed for William Smith . . . folio.

The other is :

'Six Suites of Lessons for a Violin with a Thorough Bass for the Harpsichord Composed by Mr. Rich Jones opera III printed for ye author and sold by John Johnson . . . folio.

In Wm. Randall's list for 1776 he is noted as composer of some 'Lessons for the Harpsichord,' probably first issued by Walsh. Alfred Moffat has also arranged a sonata in D major from the aforesaid 'Chamber Airs' (Novello). The 'Lessons for the Harpsichord' mentioned in the text (vol. ii.) were probably Jones's 'opera prima.' For his period his violin technique, as displayed in his sonatas, is distinctly advanced.

F. K.

JONES, ROBERT (fl. circa 1597-1617), madrigal composer, song-writer and lutenist. Little is known of the personal history of this musician. He took the Mus.B. degree at Oxford in 1597. On Jan. 4, 1609/10, in conjunction with Philip Rosseter, Philip Kingman and Ralph Reeve, he was granted a patent to provide and train a school of children to be designated the 'Children of the Revels to the Queene within Whitefryars.' On May 31, 1615, a further grant was issued to him and his three partners, by which they obtained leave to erect a new playhouse for the Children of the Revels on the site of a house occupied by Jones near Puddle Wharf in Blackfriars. When the building was nearly completed the project was opposed by the civic authorities, who obtained an order from the Privy Council, with the result that the playhouse was pulled down and the patent had to be surrendered.

In 1607 Jones published his 'First Set of Madrigals of 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 Parts, for Viols and Voices or for Voices alone; or as you please.' It was dedicated to Lord Salisbury. (ENGL. MADR. SCH., vol. xxxv.) No complete copy of this set is known to have survived. The printed cantus and bassus parts are complete in the B.M. Nos. 25 and 26 are in Bodl. MS. Mus. f. 25-28. And seven more (Nos. 7-10, 13, 14 and 22) are in manuscript in the Royal Library at Brussels. These are manifestly copied very carefully from the original printed books. Jones seems to have had a special fancy for writing madrigals on bird subjects. He contributed a 6-part madrigal, 'Oriana seeming to wink at folly,' to 'The Triumphes of Oriana.' Jones was also a notable lutenist and published as many as five books of Ayres, containing a total of more than 100 songs. He had the rare gift of being able to write melodies of a very singable character. His songs were mostly constructed on simple lines, but the rhythms are often very happily contrived; as, for example, in Bk. II. No. 3, at the words: 'Here in the cool of the stillest, clearest, sweetest evening Philomel did ever choose for singing.' The harmonic treatment of the lute accompaniment in Jones's work is individual and peculiar; allowing for a certain proportion of printer's errors, which seem more numerous in the Jones volume than in those of the other lutenist song-writers, there are many clashes of major and minor thirds which are difficult to explain, and some of these are decidedly cacophonous. The Muses' Gardin in particular offers many problems of this nature. Another feature of Jones's technique is his frequent use of the full chord on the lute; his method in this detail contrasts very markedly for instance with that of Dowland, who very rarely, except in a final cadence, obscures the melodic character of the part-writing in his lute accompaniments by the introduction of full chords with their upper notes. Jones's five books of lute-songs are as follows:

'The First Booke of Songes and Ayres of foure parts with Tablature for the Lute. So made that all the parts together or either of them severally may be song to the Lute, Orpherian or Viol de Gambo 1600. (B.M. K. 9. a. 17 (1).)

This volume was dedicated to Sir Robert Sidney. The opening phrases of 'Farewell, dear love' (No. 12 of the set) are introduced by Shakespeare in Twelfth Night, Act II. Sc. 3, but there is no evidence to show that Jones's music was used at the first production of the play. The words of the song seem to have been well known quite apart from individual musical settings. In 1601 was published:

'The Second Booke of Songes and Ayres, Set out to the Lute, the base Viol the playne way, or the Base by tablature after the leero fashion.' (B.M. K. 9. a. 17 (2).)

The bass tablature is separately printed, the lute being tuned to E flat B flat G D G D. The note-values of the bass tablature are expressed in 'prick-notes' instead of by the usual signs; and in the Preface, Jones claims to be the first to have adopted this method. This volume is dedicated to Sir Henry Lennard.

'Ukimum Vale, or the Third Book of Ayres of 1, 2 and 4 Voyces' was published in 1608. It was dedicated to Henry, Prince of Wales. The only known copy of this work is in the library of the R.C.M. The last six songs in the set are attractive duets for equal voices.

In the following year was issued:

'A Muscical Dreame, Or the Fourth Booke of Ayres, the First part is for the Lute, two Voyces and the Viols de Gambo; the Second part is for the Lute, the Viols and four Voyces to Sing; the Third part is for one Voyce alone or to the Lute, the Base Viol, or to both if you please, Whereof, two are Italian Ayres. (B.M. K. 2. g. 24'

Jones's patron in this instance was Sir John Levinthorpe.

The final volume was published in 1611 under the title:

'The Muses Gardin for Delights, Or the fift Booke of Ayres onely for the Lute, the Base-violl and the Voyce.'

It was dedicated to Lady Wroth, the daughter of his first patron, as he states. The only known copy of this work was formerly in the Bridgewater House Library and is now owned by Mr. E. Huntington of New York. A photographic reproduction given by Mr. Huntington to the present writer is now in the B.M. (K. 2. g. 3).

The five sets of Jones's Ayres in song-form edited by the present writer are published complete in his English School of Lutenist Song-writers, 2nd series.

Jones contributed three numbers to Leighton's 'Teares or Lamentacions,' 1614; 'Sing joyfully,' a 5-part anthem in Ch. Ch. 56-60; and three anthems in B.M. Add. MS. 31,418 and Roy MSS. 63 are probably by this composer

JONES, REV. WILLIAM ('Jones of Nayland') (b. Lowick, Northamptonshire, July 30, 1726; d. Nayland, Jan. 6, 1800), was educated at Charterhouse and at University College, Oxford. He included music in his studies and became very proficient in it. In 1764 he was presented to the vicarage of Bethersden, Kent, and subsequently became Rector of Pluckley in the same county, which he exchanged for the Rectory of Paston, Northamptonshire. He is said to have been presented to the Perpetual Curacy of Nayland, Suffolk, in 1776, but his name does not occur in the registers until 1784. In Jan. 1784 he published A Treatise on the Art of Music, which gained him considerable reputation. In Mar. 1789 he published by subscription his op. 2,

'Ten Church Pieces for the Organ, with Four Anthems in score [a psalm tune and a double chant], composed for the use of the Church of Nayland in Suffolk, and published for its benefit.'

This publication contained his well-known hymn tune 'St. Stephen.' In 1798 he became Rector of Hollingbourne, Kent. He was the author of many theological, philosophical and miscellaneous works, which were published in twelve vols. in 1801 and in six in 1810. He was buried in the vestry of Nayland church on Jan. 14, 1800. A second edition of his treatise on music was published at Sudbury in 1827. (See D.N.B.)

W. H. H.

JONES, SIR WILLIAM (b. London, Sept. 28, 1746; d. there, Apr. 27, 1794), famous orientalist and High Court Judge at Calcutta, wrote an essay On the Musical Modes of the Hindus (1784) (complete works, vol. iv. pp. 165-210). A German translation by F. H. von Dalberg, with commentaries and 30 copper plates, was published in 1802, 4to.

JONGEN, JOSEPH (b. Liège, Dec. 14, 1873), made all his musical studies at the Conservatoire of his birthplace. In a short time he won the distinctions offered by that institution, and in 1893 the Académie Royale of Belgium awarded him a prize of a thousand francs for the composition of a string quartet. In 1895 he made his first bid for the 'Prix de Rome,' winning the second prize, while two years later he succeeded in gaining the 'Grand Prix' with the cantata 'Comala.' During the same year (1897) the Académie Royale bestowed another prize on him for a trio.

From 1891 Jongen acted as monitor in the counterpoint class of the Liège Conservatoire, but temporarily abandoned this post in 1898, when he fulfilled the condition of four years' travel abroad, imposed by the 'Prix de Rome.' He visited, successively, Berlin, Munich, Leipzig, Dresden, Paris and various Italian cities, including Rome, where he spent eight months. During these years of freedom Jongen wrote several important works, including a symphony (produced at the Ysaÿe Concerts, Brussels, 1900), a concerto for violin, another for violoncello and a piano quartet (produced by the Société Nationale, Paris, Feb. 1903).

In 1902 Jongen returned to Belgium and was nominated, the following year, professor of harmony and counterpoint at the Liège Conservatoire, a post he occupied until the outbreak of the European War in 1914, when he emigrated to England with his family. Until Jan. 1919 he lived alternately in London and at Bournemouth. He formed a piano quartet with Désiré Defauw, Lionel Tertis and Emile Doehaerd, which appeared much in London and the provinces, and he also gave numerous organ recitals.

On his return to Liège Jongen resumed his duties at the Conservatoire, but relinquished them in Oct. 1920, when he was offered a professorship for counterpoint and fugue at the Brussels Conservatoire, of which he is now principal.

Between 1902 and 1914 the following important works were written :

'Fantaisie sur deux noëls wallons' for orchestra (1902); Violin Sonata No. 1 (1902); 'Lalla Rookh,' symphonic poem (1903); Songs and Part-songs (1904); Trio for piano, violin and viola (1907); an Opera (unfinished, 1907); pieces for piano and organ (1908); Violin Sonata No. 2 (1909); Ballet 'S'Arka' (1910, produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, 1912); Violoncello Sonata and organ pieces (1911); pieces for various instruments (1912); 'Impressions d'Ardenne,' symphonic poem (1913).

To the English period belong :

A Suite for viola and orchestra; String Quartet No. 2, A major; Suite, 'Tableaux pittoresques,' for small orchestra; 'Suite en forme de sonate' for piano; 2 Serenades for string quartet; songs; pieces for piano, organ, violoncello, etc.

Settled in Belgium once more, Jongen wrote, among other works, a third string quartet, a rhapsody for wind instruments and piano and 'Prélude élégiaque et scherzo' for orchestra.

JONGLEUR DE NOTRE DAME, LE, opera in 3 acts, text by Maurice Lena, music by Massenet. Produced Monte Carlo, Feb. 18, 1902; Covent Garden, June 15, 1906. The part of Jean, originally composed for tenor, was subsequently changed by the composer to soprano.

JORDAN, (1) ABRAHAM, belonged to an ancient family located in Maidstone in the 15th century. He was a distiller, but had a mechanical turn, and devoted himself to organ-building, removing to London, where he made many fine instruments. He instructed his son (2) ABRAHAM in the same business. The Jordans deserve especial notice as being the inventors of the swell, which was in the form of a sliding shutter, and was first applied to the organ which they built for St. Magnus's Church, London Bridge, in 1712. In 1720 they built the organ of the Duke of Chandos at Cannons, on which Handel used to play. This was sold by auction in 1747, after which they repaired it and conveyed it to Trinity Church, Gosport. (See BYFIELD, JORDAN and BRIDGE.) v. de p.

JOSEFFY, RAFAEL (b. Hunfalu, Hungary, July 3, 1862; d. New York, June 25, 1915), a distinguished and highly accomplished pianist. His youth was spent in Miskolcz, and there, when a boy of 8 years, he began his study of the pianoforte. Although he was not in any respect an infant prodigy, his father made him continue his studies in Budapest, under Brauer, who years before had been the teacher of Stephen Heller. Joseffy entered the Conservatorium at Leipzig when he was 14 years old; here he came under the instruction of E. F. Wenzel chiefly, though he also had a few lessons from Moscheles. In 1868 he went to Berlin to study with Carl Tausig. Another potent influence was exerted upon the young man by Liszt, with whom in Weimar he spent the summers of 1870 and 1871.

Joseffy made his first public appearance in Berlin in 1872, where he was received with marked appreciation; he thereafter gave a number of concerts in Vienna, and in most of the continental musical centres, that brought him the reputation of a virtuoso of remarkable technical powers. His style at this time, as described by Hanslick, was of great brilliance, showing Tausig's influence in a thorough development of his technique, his clearly and sharply chiselled phrasing, and the rich variety of his touch and tone; but it was lacking in some of the finer qualities of poetic insight. So it was when he went to the United States in 1879, where he made his home. He made his American début in New York in 1879, with an orchestra under Dr. Damrosch. He soon after played with the Philharmonic orchestra, and subsequently made many appearances in New York and other American cities with Theodore Thomas and his orchestra. With advancing years his artistic nature ripened and deepened, and he put his transcendent technical powers at the service of a richer and mellower musical style. He did pioneer work in spreading a knowledge and appreciation of Brahms's pianoforte works in the United States, and was one of the first to give frequent performances of his second concerto.

In his youth Joseffy published a number of salon pieces for the pianoforte. His chief contribution to the literature of the instrument is his important School of Advanced Piano Playing (New York, 1902), upon which he worked for many years. He also edited a large number of pianoforte compositions. R. S.

JOSEPH. (1) 'Joseph and his Brethren.' Oratorio; words by James Miller; music by Handel. Composed in Aug. 1743 and produced Covent Garden, Mar. 2, 1744. (2) Opéra-comique in 3 acts; libretto by Duval, music by Méhul. Produced Théâtre Feydeau, Feb. 17, 1807; English version (by Rev. John Webb) produced in concert performance at Birmingham Festival, Oct. 4, 1826; the opera given, Covent Garden, in German, Feb. 3, 1914. (3) An oratorio in two parts; words selected from the Bible by E. G. Monk; music by G. A. Macfarren. Produced Leeds Festival, Sept. 21, 1877.

JOSEPH, GEORG (second half of 17th cent.), said to have been a musician of the Prince-Bishop of Breslau. He composed several books of sacred songs by Angelus Silesius, the famous mystic and poet (1624-77) (Q.-L.).

JOSHUA, oratorio; words by Dr. Morell; music by Handel. Begun July 19, finished Aug. 12, 1747, and produced Covent Garden, Mar. 9, 1748. G.

JOSQUIN DES PRÉS (b. circa 1445; d. Condé, Aug. 27, 1521), was a great composer, alike of church music and of the secular chanson in several voices.

Josquin, the diminutive pet name by which Josse des Prés (or Deprés) has always been generally known, was born about 1445, probably at Condé in Hennegau (Hainault). His name appears Latinised as Jodocus Pratensis or Josquinus a Prato. He is said to have received his earlier musical education at the collegiate church of St. Quentin, and afterwards to have studied under Okeghem, the great master of the time, and the spiritual ancestor of all later generations of musicians, as Ambros describes him. From Okeghem undoubtedly Josquin learned all the subtleties of the old proportional system in music and the various devices of canonic imitation. But as Wooldridge¹ points out, it is from the school of Obrecht and Busnois, more or less contemporary with Okeghem, that Josquin will have learned the further secret of musical expressiveness.

The details of Josquin's somewhat checkered and erratic career have been difficult to make out consecutively, owing to wrong dates having previously been given to his time of service in the Sistine Chapel at Rome. He did not enter the Papal Chapel till 1486, but remained there, with some interruptions, till 1494. It was probably before 1486 that he spent some time at the various ducal courts of Florence, Milan and Ferrara. The stay at Ferrara is commemorated by the composition of a Mass bearing the designation 'Hercules dux Ferrariæ,' the musical themes of which are based on the solmisation syllables whose vowels correspond with those of the designation (i.e. Re, ut, re, ut, re, fa, mi, re). We are also told that it was Duke Hercules (Ercole) who commissioned the composition of Josquin's famous Miserere. After leaving the Papal Chapel Josquin appears to have entered the service of Louis XII. of France. Glarean in his Dodecachordon relates several anecdotes in connexion with Josquin's stay at the French court. The King having forgotten his promise to provide the composer with a church benefice, Josquin composed a motet for performance in the King's presence, based on words from the 119th Psalm, 'Memor esto verbi tui servo tuo,' with a second part, 'Portio mea non est in terra viventium,' the first words 'Memor esto verbi tui' being repeated with such urgency and frequency that, as Ambros says, the King would have been exceptionally hard of hearing if he had not taken the hint thus conveyed to him. As a thank-offering Josquin is said to have composed another motet on the words, 'Bonitatem fecisti cum servo tuo,' but of this work no trace remains. Glarean also relates that in response to the King's request, made either in jest or earnest, that the composer should write a piece in which the King himself might sing a part, Josquin composed a canon for two voices in the upper parts, with a tenor as the Vox Regis, consisting of one long-sustained note, supported by a bass, to be sung by the composer himself, consisting of an alternation of the same note in the lower octave with its fifth, as if to keep the King's voice in tune. Glarean quotes this little piece in extenso. Another anecdote, which may be more of the ben trovato kind, is that Josquin, asking a favour from some one in high position, and being frequently met with the answer, 'Laissez faire moy' or 'Lascia fare mi,' took occasion from this to compose his Mass bearing the designation 'La sol fa re mi,' which Ambros describes as one of his most beautiful works.

In his later years Josquin appears to have been in the service of the Emperor Maximilian, and became Provost of the Collegiate Church of Condé, where he died. He was buried in the choir of this church, where there was originally this epitaph:

'Chy gist sire Josse Despres
Prevost de Cheucs fut jadis
Priez Dieu pour les Trepassez qui leur doïent son paradis
Trepassa l'an 1521 le 27 d'Aoust
Spes mea semper fuleti'

TWO STYLES.—The works of Josquin were the astonishment and admiration of the musical world until the advent of Lassus and Palestrina. They were afterwards entirely forgotten, until attention was recalled to them and their merits recognised by musical historians, Burney, Fétis, Kisevewetter and others. The best that has yet been written on Josquin and his works is the very full and eloquent appreciation of him by Ambros, whose comments on the various works accessible to his critical examination, pointing out their chief peculiarities and beauties, may be usefully supplemented by the further penetrating observations of H. E. Wooldridge in the second volume of the Oxford History of Music. With Ambros and Wooldridge we may divide Josquin's works into two main classes, the first, those in which the elaboration of musical technique is the most conspicuous feature in the solution of the various problems presented by the subtleties of proportional notation and canonic device, the second, those in which, with a simplified technique, the great aim is to give musical expression to the sentiment of the words. The first style is that of his earlier work, and it was specially in the composition of his masses that Josquin lavished his utmost ingenuity in the invention and solution of the difficult problems of proportion and canon, but it was by these experiments that he gradually acquired his later freer and purer style, combining melodic beauty with harmonic propriety, by which he became a source of inspiration to his successors. Josquin was a pioneer in the direction of melody as well as in the discovery of appropriate harmony. In the works which most bristle with recondite contrapuntal artifices, there is, as Wooldridge points out, a more obvious striving after general beauty of effect than in the works of his predecessors Okèghem and Obrecht on the same lines, and even Baini, who is so severe in his censure of the 'extravagances' of Josquin, yet admits that in the midst of the tangled skein of his counterpoint Josquin knows how to introduce so opportunely his new agreeable style of melody that in his study of such passages he has felt obliged to exclaim, 'How beautiful' (ho devuto esclamare bello!). Ambros also dwells on this feature of Josquin's work, his interest and care for a beautiful flow of melody, as well as his acute sense of the æsthetic value of harmonic dissonance for the purpose of musical expression evidenced in so many of his motets.

MASSSES.—Of Josquin's masses 17 were printed and published in his lifetime, going through several editions. The First Book, published by Petrucci in 1502, contained those entitled, 'L'omme armé super voces musicales,' 'La sol fa re mi,' 'Gaudeamus,' 'Fortuna desperata,' and 'L'omme armé sexti toni.' Of these Ambros singles out 'La sol fa re mi' as specially notable for its beautiful melody and clear harmony. The first 'L'omme armé' he characterises as the most brilliant piece of the older style. It has been reproduced in modern score in a volume of Eitner's Publications devoted to a selection of Josquin's works. The Second Book of Masses, published by Petrucci in 1512, contains those entitled, 'Ave Maris Stella,' 'Hercules dux Ferrariae,' 'Malheur me bat,' 'L'ami Baudichon,' 'Una masque de Biscaia,' 'D'ung aultre amer.' Ambros specifies the first of these and the three last as very attractive examples of Josquin's simpler and purer style, and Baini also speaks favourably of the 'D'ung aultre amer' as the model of the more concise familiar style of mass that came into vogue afterwards.

The Third Book of Masses, published by Petrucci in 1516, contains those entitled, 'Mater patris,' 'Faisant regrès,' 'Ad Fugam,' 'Di dadi super n'arai je,' 'De Beata Virgine' and 'Sine nomine.' Of these the first, third and fifth are again examples of Josquin's better style, while the others seem to be only difficult studies. The Gloria of the Mass 'De Beata Virgine' is reproduced in modern score in Bohn's edition of Glarean's Dodecachordon (Eitner, vol. xvi.). The two remaining masses of Josquin, 'Da pacem' and 'Pange lingua,'¹ which seem to be his latest works of the kind, were not published till 1539 by Johannes Ott of Nuremberg. In the setting of the Mass these two works represent the high-water mark of Josquin's purer style in the direction of musical expressiveness apart from the ostentatious display of technique. Besides these 19 complete masses, there are in Petrucci's Fragmenta Missarum of 1505, as also in the Archives of the Sistine Chapel, several Patrens, settings of the Nicene Creed, based on popular French songs, of which, however, nothing can here be said.

MOTETS.—Of Josquin's motets about 100 appeared in the various miscellaneous Collections of such works printed at Venice, Nuremberg and Augsburg, between 1502 and 1564. In the motet there was room for greater variety of interest and expression, of which Josquin has taken full advantage. We may specify those works chiefly to which reference can be made in modern reprints. One of the most famous works of Josquin is his Stabat Mater for 5 voices, with its cantus firmus of long-sustained notes taken from a secular tune, 'Comme femme,' this being only a sort of scaffolding to support the melodious interweaving of the other voices. Perhaps even more interesting in construction, as well as in expression, is the Psalm Miserere, also for 5 voices, with its Pes Descendens and Ascendens, that is to say, in which, while the other voices go through the whole Psalm, the tenor simply repeats at intervals the pathetic opening phrase with the words 'Miserere mei Deus,' each time descending one degree in the scale in the first part, then in shorter notes ascending in the second part, and once again in longer notes in the third part descending to a very expressive conclusion with all the voices on the same words. In this mode of treatment Palestrina, in his motet 'Tribularer si nescirem,' has very successfully imitated Josquin, even adopting from him the same theme and text, 'Miserere mei Deus,' but he has not altogether surpassed his model. Wooldridge¹ has printed in full the very simple touching work, 'Absalon fili mi,' which, as he points out, is remarkable for its bold harmonies used for the expression of poignant sorrow.

Glarean's Dodecachordon, translated in Eitner's Publications, contains among other things the very curious work of Josquin, 'Liber Generationis,' a setting for 4 voices of the genealogy of Christ from the first chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, in which Josquin manages to invest with considerable musical interest so unpromising a text as a mere list of names. Such a work may have been sung in old time in a Cathedral or Collegiate Chapel, where, as old Breviaries show, our own Sarum and York included, the text originally formed part of the early Matins Office for Christmas Day. A similar work is the genealogy in St. Luke iii., 'Factum est cum baptizaretur,' which would be sung in the Matins Office of Epiphany. A simple, lovely work of great tenderness and beauty is an Ave Maria for 4 voices, with unusual words and concluding with what might seem to be a petition added by the composer on his own behalf, 'O Mater Dei memento mei.' A work of great power is 'Planxit autem David,' David's Lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i.), set for 4 voices, in which effective use is made of the plain-song theme from the Lamentations of Holy Week. Other works given and commented on by Glarean are: 'De profundis,' 'O Jesu fili David,' 'Victimæ paschali laudes,' all for 4 voices, and part of an Ave Verum for 2 and 3 voices.

Commer's Collectio operum musicorum Batavorum contains 10 motets by Josquin, mostly for 4 voices, two of which are specially notable for beauty of expression in fine melody and appropriate harmony without any use of artifice, 'Ave Christe immolate,' and the Psalm, 'Deus in nomine tuo.' In the motet for 6 voices Josquin shows his fondness for the combination of different texts, using one to emphasise the meaning of the other. While 4 voices sing the text 'Sic Deus dilexit mundum,' and in the second part 'Christus mortuus est,' the two other voices sing in canon throughout 'Circumdederunt me gemitus mortis.' (See MOTET).

Eitner's Publications, vol. 6, contains a selection of Josquin's works, among which one of a similar character to the last-mentioned may first attract our attention, 'Et ecce terræ motus,' for 6 voices, in which, while the other voices sing 'Jesus stetit in medio discipulorum,' etc. (Luke xxiv. 36 ff.), the tenor has in long-sustained notes the plain-song theme, 'Et ecce terræ motus,' etc. (Matt. xxviii. 2). As Ambros remarks, in such peculiarities of setting the mystical theological character of this older style of music is strongly manifested. Another example of Josquin's elaborate style is 'In nomine Jesu,' for 6 voices, with double canon. On the other hand, his numerous settings of Psalms are almost entirely in his later and simpler harmonic style without the artifices of cantus firmus and canon; examples in Eitner are 'Laudate pueri Dominum' and 'De Profundis,' both for 4 voices. The Marian motets are specially distinguished by graceful melodies, 'Inviolata,' based on a plain-song Sequence, and 'O Virgo genetrix,' both for 5 voices.

One work not appearing in modern reprints may just be mentioned on account of its exceptional character, 'Qui habitat in adjutorio,' for 24 voices, which opens the Tonus Tertius Psalmorum, published by Petreius at Nuremberg in 1542. It is a work in canon form for 6 choirs of 4 voices each, as the direction intimates, 'Est fuga bis trina quævis post bina tempora.'

SECULAR SONGS.—Another important part of Josquin's work consists of his settings of secular songs, scattered about in various collections during and after his lifetime. Many of the earlier, which are contained in Petrucci's publications, are wonderful specimens of contrapuntal ingenuity, and appear without any text but their titles. On the other hand, the seventh book of Chansons, published at Antwerp by Tylman Susato in 1545, almost entirely devoted to Josquin, contains 24 pieces for 5 and 6 voices, written in his later freer style with a more restrained and refined use of canon and cantus firmus. Among them is the famous 'Déploration de Jehan Okeghem,' scored by Burney in his History, a beautiful work for 5 voices with its cantus firmus, 'Requiem æternam,' and its touching conclusion with all the voices in solemn harmony on the words, 'Requiescat in pace, Amen.' Susato's book also has 3 Monodies on the death of Josquin himself, described as 'Princeps musicorum,' by Gombert, Vinders and Benedict Ducis. Seven chansons, mostly taken from Susato, are given in Eitner's Josquin volume, the first, of a somewhat lugubrious character, with the cantus firmus in canon, 'Circumdederunt me gemitus,' etc.; other pieces of a sentimental character with a spice of humour. Other pleasant and graceful pieces are: 'Petite Camusette,' for 6 voices, edited with English text by Lionel Benson²; also 'J'ai bien cause' and 'Adieu mes amours' in Kade's supplement to Ambros.

To sum up, we may not only say with Kiesewetter that 'Josquin deserves to be classed as one of the greatest musical geniuses of any period,' but without undervaluing the tentative efforts of his predecessors Dufay and Okeghem, we may add with Ambros that 'in Josquin we have the first musician who impresses us as having genius.' While the efforts of his predecessors were largely expended in the development of counterpoint as an end in itself, Josquin, surpassing them even in the exercise of contrapuntal ingenuity, was the first to employ its results as the means to a higher end—the musical expression of feeling, the first to discover the importance of flowing melody and appropriate harmony as the vehicles of such expression. There is no reason for surprise that the masses and motets of Josquin and his immediate successors soon disappeared from the Church repertory after the middle of the 16th century. This was not so much owing to any formal condemnation by Church authorities of the use of secular melodies as the basis of compositions for the Church, as to the further progress made in the direction in which Josquin had been a pioneer, the progress in musical expressiveness gained by greater simplicity of construction combined with greater fullness of harmony. Church music, apt to become dryly conventional, has always benefited by some influence from the better secular music of the day, and as in the earlier part of the 16th century there was the influence of the simple grace of the French chanson, so later on, the influence of the higher refinement of the Italian madrigal. Nor is there any reason for surprise if the works of Josquin do not often appear in modern programmes, considering that our own older music, with the exception of a handful of madrigals, has until recently been wholly neglected; considering, too, that the further we go back there must inevitably be greater difficulty of appreciation. There have, however, been occasional performances of Josquin's Stabat Mater, and the Schola Cantorum of Paris founded by Charles Bordes seems to have included in its repertory Josquin's Miserere, Ave Christe and Ave Maria.

In Van der Straeten's La Musique aux Pays-Bas, vol. i. (Brussels, 1867), a portrait of Josquin is reproduced from a book published by Peter Opmeere at Antwerp in 1591. It seems to have been copied from a picture originally existing in the church of St. Gudule at Brussels, and thence probably came the tradition that Josquin was buried there. Opmeere accompanies the portrait with the following words: 'Conspicitur Josquinius depictus Bruxellis in D. Gudulae (ecclesia) in tabula arae dextrae ante chorum, honestâ sanfacie ac blandis oculis.' Van der Straeten also quotes the following epitaph as formerly existing in St. Gudule's:

'O mors inevitabilis,
Mors amara, mors crudelis,
Josquinum dum necasti
Illum nobis abstulisti
Qui suam per harmoniam
Illustravit ecclesiam
Propterea dic: tu musice
Requiescat in pace. Amen.'

It is this epitaph which is set to music a 7 by H. Vinders in the Susato volume of 1545. Another portrait is given in the Josquin volume edited by Commer and Eitner, but whence taken is not said. A complete edition of Josquin's works is now in course of publication by the Vereeniging voor Nord-Nederlands Musikgeschiedenis under the editorship of Dr. A. Smijers, of which eleven parts have appeared (up to 1926) containing 29 motets, 23 chansons and two masses.

JOTA, one of the most popular of north Spanish dances, especially in the province of Aragon and in the villages of Navarre whose shores are bathed by the Ebro. Its origin dates from the 12th century, and is attributed to a Moor named Aben Jot; who, expelled from Valencia owing to his licentious singing, took refuge in a village of Aragon. There his effort was received with enthusiasm, while in Valencia the governor continued to impose severe punishments on its performance. Some authorities state that at that epoch it was called 'canario.'

The Jota is a kind of waltz, but with more freedom in the dancing, always in three-time. It is danced in couples, vis-à-vis, each couple independent of the other, but sometimes a circle is formed, and is generally accompanied with guitars, bandurrias, and at times with castanets, pandereta (a small tambourine), and triangle. In the north of Spain it is much sung and played, and in Aragon on every possible occasion.

There are many Jotas, in fact almost every town in the north of Spain has its own, but the best known is the Jota Aragonesa of which both Glinka and Liszt have made use. The following from Glinka's orchestral overture or piece, 'Jota Aragonesa,' is the melody—

JOULE, BENJAMIN ST. JOHN BAPTIST (b. Salford, Nov. 8, 1817; d. Rothsay, Scotland, May 21, 1895), studied the violin under Richard Cudmore, and the organ, singing and theory under Joseph John Harris. From May 8, 1846, to Mar. 20, 1853, he was organist and choirmaster at Holy Trinity Church, Hulme, and from Apr. 28, 1849, to Oct. 3, 1852, held a similar position at St. Margaret's, Whalley Range, Manchester. On Mar. 27, 1853, he became honorary organist of St. Peter's Church, Manchester. He was President of the Manchester Vocal Society, and author or compiler of The Hymns and Canticles pointed for Chanting, 1847; Directorium chori Anglicanum, 1849; a very comprehensive Collection of Words of Anthems, 1859; a pointed Psalter, 1865; and other works connected with choral service, several of which have reached many editions. He lectured on church music, and contributed to various periodicals. He was musical critic to the Manchester Courier from 1850-70.

JOURNET, MARCEL (b. Grasse, France, 1870), operatic bass. Educated at Nice, he entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1889 and made his début at the Brussels Monnaie in 1891. His youth notwithstanding, he was already a capable artist, his fine basso-cantante voice having developed with unusual rapidity. Moreover, he was endowed not only with a powerful, resonant organ but an easy production that was to enable him to withstand a career of continuous and prolonged hard work. In 1925, after 35 years on the principal operatic stages of France, Belgium, England, Italy and America, he was still sustaining leading rôles and enjoying the utmost popularity at La Scala, Milan. At Covent Garden, where he made his début as the Landgrave in a French performance of 'Tannhäuser' in May, 1897, he at once justified his Brussels reputation, though, with so many distinguished singers available, he had to be content with minor parts, one of which that year was the Duke in d'Erlanger's new opera, 'Inez Mendo.' However, in course of the dozen seasons that he visited London he gradually added to his repertory all the more important bass rôles. He sang for six years at the Paris Opéra in alternation with the regular winter seasons at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and with the Chicago Opera Co. His engagements at La Scala began after the war (1914-18).

JOUSSE, JOHN (b. Orleans? c. 1765; d. London, Jan. 1837), came of a French noble family who fled to London on the outbreak of the Revolution. John settled there as a teacher and wrote tutors for the voice, the violin and the pianoforte. The last appeared in many editions even as late as 1876. He also wrote some instruction books for harmony, biographical essays, and instructive pianoforte pieces.

JUDENKÜNIG, HANS (d. circa Mar. 4, 1526), a famous lutenist of the 16th century, who lived at Vienna about 1523, and who is said to have died in old age on Mar. 4, 1526. This last date appears in writing in a copy of his book in the court library, Vienna. The book apparently consists of a number of short sections, the first of which is Utilis et compendiaria introductio . . . instrumentorum et lutine, et quod vulgo Geygen nominant; this is followed by Harmoniae super odis Horatianis . . . ; Ain schone künstliche vnderweisung in diesem buechlein, leylichlich zu begreyffen den rechten grund zu lernen auff der Lauten vnd Geygen, mit vleiss gemacht durch Hans Judenkünig . . . ; and finally Item das ander puechlein zuuernemen. . . . Pieces for the lute are contained in the book, copies of which exist at Berlin and Brussels, as well as in two libraries at Vienna. (See Q.-L., and an excellent article by A. Koczir in the Sammelbände of the Int. Mus. Ges. vi. p. 237, where the titles of the sections of this book are given in full.) JUDGMENT OF PARIS, THE, a masque by William Congreve the dramatist. At the close of the 17th century a number of gentlemen, among whom the then Lord Halifax was considered chief mover and contributor, raised a sum of two hundred guineas to be given in prizes for the musical setting of a masque or similar subject, the 'Judgment of Paris' being finally selected for the contest.

On Mar. 21, 1699, the London Gazette inserted the following advertisement:

'Several persons of quality having for the encouragement of musick advanced 200 guineas to be distributed in 4 prizes, the first of 100, the second of 50, and the third of 30, and the fourth of 20 guineas to each master as shall be adjudged to compose the best. This is therefore to give notice that those who intend to put in for the prizes are to repair to Jacob Tonson at Grays Inn-gate before Easter next day, where they may be further informed.'

No record appears to exist as to what other competitors entered the lists, but the four prizes went in the order named to John Weldon, John Eccles, Daniel Purcell and Godfrey Finger. Editions of the masque with Eccles's music and with Daniel Purcell's were published in folio by John Walsh. Weldon's settings and Finger's do not seem to have been ever printed in their entirety, though Weldon's fine song from the masque, 'Let Ambition fire thy mind,' was for a century deservedly held in much esteem.

The contest was held at the theatre in Dorset Gardens early in the year 1701. Congreve, the author of the libretto, describes it in a letter to a friend as being a most remarkable sight. The whole fashionable world was there, the usual orchestra portion being 'turned into White's chocolate house, the whole family being transplanted thither with chocolate, cooled drinks, ratafia, portico, etc., which everybody that would, called for, the whole expense being defrayed by the subscribers.'

He also states that there were eighty-five performers besides the vocalists, and that the back of the stage was built into a concave with deal boards faced with tin to throw forward the sound.¹

In addition to the above were other musical productions under the title 'The Judgment of Paris,'² including a ballad opera acted at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1731, and a burletta acted at the Haymarket in 1768. Dr. Arne also set a piece under the name, and this was published by H. Waylett in or near the year 1740. This publication also included the first edition of 'Rule Britannia' as part of its contents.

JUDICE, CESARE DE (b. Palermo, Jan. 28, 1607; d. there, Sept. 13, 1680), a higher government official, and a good composer. He wrote a book of madrigals (2-4 v., 1628); a book of motetti and madrigals (1635). Gerber (2) mentions a Requiem by him on the death of Philipp IV. (1666). Five 4-part vocal numbers in modern score at the Hofburg, Vienna, under Caesar Jüdex, are apparently by the same (Q.-L.).

JULLIEN, JEAN LUCIEN ADOLPHE (b. Paris, June 1, 1845), was the son and grandson of distinguished literary men, his grandfather, Bernard Jullien (1752-1826), having held various professorships, and his father, Marcel Bernard Jullien (1798-1881), having been for some years principal of the College at Dieppe, and subsequently editor of the Revue de l'instruction publique, and having taken a prominent part in the compilation of Littré's Dictionary.

Adolphe Jullien was educated at the Lycée Charlemagne in Paris, and having taken the degree of licentiate in law, he completed his musical studies under Bienaimé, retired professor at the Conservatoire. His first essay in musical criticism was an article in Le Ménestrel on Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri,' which had just been produced unsuccessfully in Paris (1869). In that article his pronounced opinions in favour of the then advanced school of music are expressed as fearlessly as they are in his later writings. He fought valiantly for musical progress of every kind, and in the Wagnerian controversy he took up a position among the most advanced. His life of that master was for its time a monument of accurate and erudite information, and in most cases a just review of his works, while the collection of caricatures and the other illustrations make the book exceedingly amusing. The companion volume on Berlioz is an important contribution to the literature of its subject. He proclaimed his convictions with regard to Schumann, and other composers who were then too little appreciated in France, with great vigour and exhaustive knowledge of his subject. At various times he contributed to the Revue et Gazette musicale, the Ménestrel, the Chronique musicale, the Renaissance musicale, the Revue contemporaine, the Moniteur du bibliophile, the Revue de France, the Correspondant, the Revue britannique, L'Art, Le Figaro, and other periodicals. He was critic to the Français from May 1872 to Nov. 1887, when that paper was amalgamated with the Moniteur universel, and after the amalgamation Jullien remained on the staff. In Mar. 1873 he became and is still (1925) musical critic of the Journal des débats, thus succeeding to the post held by Berlioz and Reyer. Besides exercising the ordinary avocations of a musical critic, he made an intimate study of the history of the 18th century, especially in connexion with the theatrical affairs of the time; and most of his earliest books, which have become exceedingly difficult to procure, treat of this subject. His first books, L'Opéra en 1788 (1873) and La Musique et les philosophes au XVIII^e siècle (1873), were followed by several which have no direct bearing on music. His principal works from 1876 are:

Un Potentat musical, etc. (1876); L'Épique et l'opéra en 1735 (1877); Weber à Paris (1877); Airs variés, histoire, critique, biographie musicale et dramatique (1877); La Cour et l'opéra sous Louis XVI (1878); La Comédie et la galanterie au XVIII^e siècle (1879); Histoire du costume au théâtre (1880); Goethe et la musique (1880); L'Opéra secret au XVIII^e siècle (1880); La Ville et la cour au XVIII^e siècle (in which is embodied the second of the earlier works, 1881); Hector Berlioz (1882); La Comédie à la cour (1882); Paris dilettante au commencement du siècle (1884); Richard Wagner, sa vie et ses œuvres (1886); Hector Berlioz (1888); Musiciens d'aujourd'hui (1892 and 1894); Musique (1896), historical studies, Le Romantisme et l'Idéalisme (1897); Amours d'opéra au XVIII^e siècle (1898); Pastin-Latour (1899); Reyer (1909); Musiciens d'hier et d'aujourd'hui (1910).

JULLIEN (originally JULIEN), LOUIS ANTOINE (b. Sisteron, Basses Alpes, Apr. 23, 1812; d. Paris, Mar. 14, 1860). His father was a bandmaster, and the boy was thus familiar with instruments and music from his cradle. At 21 he went to Paris and entered the counterpoint class of Le Carpentier at the Conservatoire, Oct. 26, 1833. Composition, however, and not counterpoint was his object, and after a year's trial he quitted Le Carpentier for Halévy, Dec. 16, 1834, but with no greater success; he refused to do the exercises, and insisted on presenting the professor with dances as specimens of 'composition'—not perhaps quite to Halévy's annoyance if it be true, as it used to be said, that the waltz 'Rosita,' which became the rage in Paris as Julien's, was written by his master. He did not obtain a single mention at the Conservatoire, and at the beginning of 1836 finally left it, and soon after appeared before the public as the conductor of concerts of dance music at the Jardin Turc. The 'Huguenots' was just then in all the flush of its great success, and one of Julien's first quadrilles was made upon the motifs of that opera, the announcement of which, as quoted by Fétis, is exactly in the style with which Londoners afterwards became familiar. To this enterprise he joined the establishment of a musical paper. No wonder that he was unsuccessful. In June 1838 he became insolvent, and had to leave Paris. His first appearance in London seems to have been as conductor, jointly with Eliason, of shilling 'Concerts d'été' at Drury Lane Theatre, which opened June 8, 1840, with an orchestra of ninety-eight and chorus of twenty-six. On Jan. 18, 1841, he conducted 'Concerts d'hiver' at the same theatre, with a band of ninety and chorus of eighty. These were followed by Concerts de Société at the English Opera House, Lyceum, Feb. 7 to Mar. 18, 1842, at which Rossini's Stabat Mater was produced for the first time in England. In Dec. 1842 began his 'annual series of concerts' at the English Opera House, and he thenceforward continued them season after season, at the close of the year, now at one theatre, and now at another, till the Farewell series in 1859. 'His aim,' in his own words, 'was always to popularise music,' and the means he adopted for so doing were—the largest band; the very best performers, both solo and orchestral; and the most attractive pieces. His programmes contained a certain amount of classical music—though at the beginning hardly so much as that given by some of his predecessors, who announced a whole symphony on each evening. This was probably too much for a shilling audience in the then state of musical taste, and Julien's single movements and weaker doses just hit the mark. Later on in his career he gave whole symphonies, and even two on one evening. No doubt this judicious moderation did good, and should always be remembered to his credit, or that of his advisers. But the characteristic features of Julien's concerts were, first, his Monster Quadrille, and secondly himself. He provided a fresh quadrille for each season, and it was usually in close connexion with the event of the day. The 'Allied Armies Quadrille' during the Crimean war, 1854; the 'Indian Quadrille and Havelock's March,' during the Mutiny, 1857; the 'English Quadrille'; the 'French ditto'; and so on. These were written by himself, and though then considered noisy were always rhythmical, melodious and effective. In some of them as many as six military bands were added to the immense permanent orchestra. In front of this 'mass of executive ability,' 'the Mons.'—to adopt the name bestowed on him by Punch, whose cartoons have preserved his image with the greatest exactness—with coat thrown widely open, white waistcoat, elaborately embroidered shirt-front, wristbands of extravagant length turned back over his cuffs, a wealth of black hair, and a black moustache—itsself a startling novelty—wielded his baton, encouraged his forces, repressed the turbulence of his audience with indescribable gravity and magnificence, went through all the pantomime of the British Army or Navy Quadrille, seized a violin or piccolo at the moment of climax, and at last sank exhausted into his gorgeous velvet chair. All pieces of Beethoven's were conducted with a jewelled baton, and in a pair of clean kid gloves, handed him at the moment on a silver salver.

Not only did he obtain the best players for his band, but his solo artists were all of the highest class. Ernst, Sivori, Bottesini, Wieniawski, Sainton; Arabella Goddard, Marie Pleyel, Charles Hallé, Vivier; Sims Reeves, Pischek, and many others, all played or sang, some of them for the first time in England, under Julien's baton. In fact, he acted on the belief that if you give the public what is good, and give it with judgment, the public will be attracted and will pay. And there is no doubt that for many years his income from his Promenade Concerts was very large. His harvest was not confined to London, but after his month at Drury Lane, Covent Garden or Her Majesty's, he carried off his whole company of players and singers through the provinces, including Scotland and even Ireland, and moved about there for several weeks—a task at that time beset with impediments to locomotion which it is now difficult to realise. If he had but confined himself to the one enterprise, and exercised a proper economy and control over that! But this was impossible. He had started a shop soon after his arrival, first in Maddox Street and then in Regent Street, for the sale of his music. In 1847 he took Drury Lane theatre on lease, with the view of playing English operas. Gye was engaged as manager and Berlioz as conductor,¹ with a host of other officials, including Sir Henry Bishop as 'inspector-superintendent at rehearsals,' and a splendid band and chorus. The house opened on Dec. 6, with a version of 'Lucia,' in which Sims Reeves made his operatic début, and which was followed by Balfe's 'Maid of Honour,' 'Linda,' and 'Figaro.' 'All departments,' says a contemporary article² by one who knew him well, 'were managed on the most lavish scale; orchestra, chorus, principal singers, officers before and behind the curtain, vying with each other in efficiency and also in expensiveness. The result might have been anticipated. The speculation was a failure, and though his shop was sold for £8000 to meet the emergency, Jullien was bankrupt' (Apr 21, 1848). He left the court, however, with honour, and, nothing daunted, soon afterwards essayed another and still more hazardous enterprise. In May 1849 he announced a 'Concert monstre et Congrès musical,' 'six grand musical fêtes,' with '400 instrumentalists, three distinct choruses, and three distinct military bands.' The first two took place at Exeter Hall on June 1 and 15, and a third at the Surrey Zoological Gardens on July 20. The programme of the first deserves quotation. It was in three parts:

(1) David's Ode-sinfonie 'Le Désert'—Sims Reeves solo tenor.

(2) Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony.

(3) A miscellaneous concert, with Anna Thillon, Jetty Treffz, Miss Dolby, Braham, Pischek, Dreyshock, Mollue, etc. etc.

This project, too, if we may judge from its sudden abandonment, ended disastrously. In 1852 he wrote the opera of 'Pietro il Grande,' and brought it out on the most magnificent scale at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, on Aug. 17, at his own cost. The piece was an entire failure, and after five performances was withdrawn, leaving Jullien a loser of some thousands of pounds. Shortly after this he visited America and remained there till June 28, 1854. On his return he resumed the regular routine of his metropolitan and provincial concerts. But misfortunes pursued him. On Mar. 5, 1856, Covent Garden Theatre was burnt to the ground, and the whole of his music—in other words, his entire stock in trade—was destroyed; an irreparable loss, since his quadrilles³ and other original pieces were in MS. In 1857 he became involved in the Royal Surrey Gardens Company, and lost between £5000 and £6000. This enabled him to add to his achievements by conducting oratorios, but the loss, the protracted worry and excitement attending the winding up of the Company, and the involved state of his own affairs, which had been notoriously in disorder for some years and were approaching a crisis, must have told severely on him. The next season was his last in England. He gave a series of farewell concerts at the usual date—this time at the Lyceum, with a band reduced to sixty—made a farewell provincial tour, and then, probably forced thither by pecuniary reasons, went to Paris. There on the 2nd of May, 1859, he was arrested for debt and put in prison at Clichy, but on the 22nd of the following month was brought up before the court, heard, and liberated with temporary protection. Early in March following an advertisement appeared in the papers headed 'Jullien Fund,' stating that he was in a lunatic asylum near Paris, and appealing to the public on his behalf. Scarcely, however, was the advertisement in type when the news arrived of his death.

No one at all in the same category with Jullien, at least in modern times, has occupied anything like the same high position in public favour. Whatever the changes in his fortune, his popularity never waned or varied. Frequent allusions were made to him in the periodicals. And why so? Because, with much obvious charlatanism, what Jullien aimed at was good, and what he aimed at he did thoroughly well. He was a public amuser, but he was also a public reformer.

By his frequent performances of the music of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and other great masters, and by the constant engagement of the most eminent performers, he elicited at first the unconscious attention, and then the enthusiastic appreciation, of the vast multitudes that besieged his concerts, and that not merely in London but all over the provinces of Great Britain and Ireland. This will probably tend to preserve his memory among us even more than his unrivalled energy and talent, or his unprecedented zeal and liberality as a public entertainer. To Jullien, moreover, is attributable in a large measure the immense improvement which our orchestras have made during the last fifty years, he having been the means not only of bringing over some of the greatest foreign instrumentalists, but of discovering and nurturing the promise of many English performers, who JUMENTIER, BERNARD (b. Lèves, near Chartres, Mar. 24, 1749; d. St. Quentin, Dec. 17, 1829), musical director at Coutances, 1776; towards the end of the century maître de chapelle at St. Quentin Cathedral. His masses and motets were in great favour at Versailles and Paris. He also wrote a one-act opera, and a small treatise on singing (Fétis; Q.-L.).

JUMILHAC, DOM PIERRE-BENOÎT DE (b. Château St. Jean de Ligour, Limousin, c. 1611; d. Abbey of St. Germain de Près, Mar. 22, 1682), entered the monastery of St. Remi, Rheims, in 1630 as a Benedictine monk, and distinguished himself as a musical theorist, especially as an authority on plain chant, on which he wrote a book, La Science et la pratique du plain-chant . . . (1673), which was republished in 1847. His biography was written by Theodre Nisard.

JUNCK, BENEDETTO (b. Turin, Aug. 24, 1852; d. 1905), composer. His mother was an Italian, and his father a native of Alsace. After a mathematical training at Turin, he was sent into a commercial house at Paris. Such musical education as he brought with him to Paris was slight, and almost entirely confined to the pianoforte. Hence the orchestral works of the great masters which he first heard in Paris keenly stirred his artistic temperament; and his ambition to dedicate himself to music became deeply rooted. In 1870 he returned to Turin as required by law to perform a year of military service, and about this time his father died. He was now free to follow his own inclinations, and at the age of twenty-two he went to Milan, and put himself under Alberto MAZZUCATO (then principal of the Milan Conservatorio) for a course of study in harmony and counterpoint. He also worked a short time under Bazzini.

The list of his published works is as follows:

1. 'La Simona, a set of twelve songs for Soprano and Tenor (words by Fontana). 1878.
2. Otto romanze (words by Heine and Panzacchi). 1881.
3. Two Songs (words by Heine). 1883.
4. Sonata for PF. and Violin in G. 1884.
5. Sonata for PF. and Violin in D. 1885.
6. String Quartet in E. 1886.

Although the earliest of Junck's works, 'La Simona' still stands pre-eminent among them for originality and power; but some of the 'Otto romanze,'—especially Nos. 2 and 4, entitled 'Dolce sera' and 'Flebil traversa l'anima mia,' are also compositions of a high order.

composer. His father was a prominent official at Moscow. In 1888 he joined the Moscow Conservatoire and studied the violin under Hrimaly, and composition under Taneiev and Arensky. He completed his studies at the Hochschule in Berlin, under the direction of Woldemar Bargiel, and was awarded the Mendelssohn scholarship. After a short stay at Baku, where he obtained a teaching post, he settled down in Berlin, and had the good fortune to attract the attention of Herr Lienau, head of the publishing house of Schlesinger, which has brought out most of his compositions to date. These include two symphonies, of which the second, op. 23, was produced in Jan. 1903 at Meiningen, where it received a flattering reception from that highly critical audience, further a sextet for strings and piano, three string quartets, a piano trio, two violin sonatas, viola sonata, and numerous other chamber works. His piano compositions are entirely in the small forms, the best known being the concert pieces, op. 12; 'Satyrs and Nymphs,' op. 18; and preludes and capriccios, op. 26. His style is an interesting blend of Russian and German, the material being almost invariably Slav in character, whilst the treatment is thoroughly German, leaning now towards Brahms, now towards less recent German writers of chamber music. His powers of development are strong, and characterised by solidity of thought, whilst the danger of heaviness is cleverly avoided by the use of an exceptional rhythmical ingenuity, probably as Slav in its origin as the themes he uses. He relies for his construction to a large extent on contrapuntal device, at which he is an adept, but he occasionally allows himself to drift into sequential passages which are lacking in interest, and he has an inordinate love for the variation form. Nevertheless, works like the second symphony, the piano sextet and trio, the viola sonata, and the variations in the violin sonata are sufficient to reveal a strong inventive faculty, whilst the method displayed leaves no doubt as to the composer's excellent equipment. The symphony in A was played in London at the Promenade Concert of Sept. 6, 1904, and at the Philharmonic Concert of June 8, 1905. He was appointed by Joachim professor of composition at the Hochschule.

JUST, JOHANN AUGUST (b. Gröningen c. 1750), pupil of Kirnberger and Schwindel, entered the service of the Princess of Orange at the Hague, where Burney met him in 1772. He composed several operettas (Singspiele), overtures, concertos, a large quantity of chamber music, especially sonatas, with and without accompaniment.

JUST INTONATION is a term which is sometimes used, though quite incorrectly, as a synonym for singing or playing in tune.¹ It is properly used of the system of tuning according to true ratios of intervals.

Before the introduction of equal temperament, the process by which all the keys became equally available for practical use, the scale of C major was usually tuned, on keyboard instruments, in what is called Just Intonation, that is to say, the intervals were accurate in so far as they affected the key of C, and approximately so for a very few other keys on each side of it. The inherent error, which is one of the paradoxes of music, and for which the reader must be referred to the articles COMMA, INTERVAL and TEMPERAMENT, was accumulated, as it were, in the intervals that were most rarely used, so that the key of C could be made to sound quite pure, and those of F, G, and some others, nearly so. But reference to the article INTERVAL will show that absolute purity was unattainable in any two scales on a keyboard instrument, unless the number of keys was so greatly multiplied as to add very materially to its player's difficulties. (See also TUNING and WOLF.) It follows that if the simplest passage be referred first to one key and then to another, in the course of modulation, there must in Just Intonation be an appreciable difference between what appears to be the same interval. If the following passage be taken as in the key of C, rising to the fourth from the keynote, the first interval will be a major tone, and the second a minor; if it be taken as in the key of F, rising from the dominant to the tonic, it is clear that the first interval must be a minor tone, the second a major. Thus, the position of the note D must be slightly higher in the first case than in the second. Such a difference as this is only just appreciable by a trained ear, but on instruments or voices that are capable of performing in Just Intonation the beauty of an untempered chord is unmistakable. The instruments of the violin family, on which the notes are not fixed, can be played in Just Intonation, and choirs that are in the habit of practising without the aid of keyboard instruments can be made to realise the difference and to make the intervals really accurate. Occasionally solo singers are to be found who can adapt their voices to give the correct intervals, but, as a matter of course, the frequent modulations in modern music, causing delicate adjustment of pitch to be made at every moment, make it more and more difficult to realise Just Intonation in practice.
